PREFACE

THIS volume will serve its purpose if it proves a useful companion to ordinary everyday readers of English literature. It is necessarily a work of compilation and selection, because the range of the possible subject-matter is so great. English literature has a continuous history of over a thousand years, it has been produced in many lands, and there is no subject on which it does not touch. Completeness in a moderate compass, and the equipment of a specialist at all points, are therefore impossible.

According to the general scheme of the work, as designed by the publishers, two main elements are included, in alphabetical arrangement. The one is a list of English authors, literary works, and literary societies which have historical or present importance. Under an author's name is given a selection of facts—especially dates—bearing on his life and literary activity. Under the title of a work there is some indication of its nature, and for the greater works of fiction of the past—whether poetry, prose, or drama—there is usually a brief sketch of the plot. American literature is an essential part of the literature of our language, and a certain number of American authors and of their works, those best known in this country, have been treated on the above lines. Original literary appreciation is not attempted, and comments verging on aesthetic criticism are intended to give rather a conventional view of the importance and distinctive qualities of the author or work under discussion. In this part of the volume, where a compiler must often plead for the indulgence of experts, living authors present the hardest problem. Contemporary judgement is notoriously fickle and tends to be impassioned. I could have wished to exclude all living authors; yet some have established reputations that can hardly be ephemeral, and some may claim at least a place beside the popular favourites of other days. I have therefore, on advice, given very brief entries to a limited number of living authors and recent works; but without finding a criterion of choice that satisfies me. I must apologize to those whose merits I have unintentionally neglected, and ask readers to pass lightly over errors of selection on this difficult borderland. After all, it comprises only one of some fifty generations of English authors.

The other element is the explanation of allusions commonly met with, or likely to be met with, in English literature, in so far as they are not covered by the articles on English authors and works. The selection is limited to allusions which contain a proper name, with a few special exceptions: some literary terms, some names of wines, and names of old coins like 'gold moidores' and 'pieces of eight', which are more than mere common nouns to readers of English. Even among proper names the number of possible entries is huge. Apart from the characters of English fiction, one must reckon with names from several mythologies, with saints, heroes, statesmen, philosophers, men of science, artists, musicians, actors, with literary forgers and impostors—in short, with every kind of celebrity. In order to restrict the field of choice

I have had to bear in mind that this is not a dictionary of mythology, or history, or science, or music, but a companion to English literature, and therefore to look at all such special subjects through the mirror of English literature. It is sometimes a distorting mirror. Thus foreign authors are included as matter of allusion in English, not on any scale of merit which would satisfy students of those literatures. Eustache Deschamps, for instance, appears because of his relations with Chaucer, though many greater figures in French literature are passed over. In the selection of place-names, the grounds of choice are similar. A volume of this size would not hold all the places referred to in English writers of some standing. But Grub Street and Fleet Street have associations which greater thoroughfares do not share; Harvard and Yale have claims to inclusion over and above their merits as universities; Mount Helicon must be preferred to Everest.

If these general principles of selection win approval, it still remains true that no two persons would agree on their application in detail. But I hope I have included a large proportion of entries which would be admitted by common consent, and have contrived to provide many signposts that will direct the inquirer to fuller knowledge. Some of the entries may appear unnecessary from the very familiarity of the subject; but it must be remembered that what is familiar to residents in this country may not always be so to readers in other lands which have a common heritage in our literature.

In a compilation such as this, the debt to previous writers is necessarily very great, coextensive in fact with the book itself. I must, to begin with, acknowledge my special indebtedness to certain sources of general literary information. These are: the Cambridge Histories of English Literature and of American Literature; the various works of Prof. Saintsbury (including the Periods of European Literature issued under his general editorship); the Surveys of Prof. Elton; and A. C. Ward's Twentieth-Century Literature. The biographies of British authors in the following pages are mainly, but not exclusively, based on the Dictionary of National Biography. Many definitions are adapted and much miscellaneous literary information derived from the Oxford English Dictionary. I have, in addition, profited by the labours of the innumerable editors, biographers, and commentators of authors whose works are dealt with herein. It would be impossible to name them all, but I should perhaps mention my special debt to such outstanding biographers as J. G. Lockhart and Sir E. K. Chambers.

The articles on classical mythology are based, in the main, on Homer, Hesiod's Theogony, the Greek tragedians, Virgil, and Ovid, with much guidance and assistance from the Classical Dictionaries of Sir William Smith and Lemprière. Those on Scandinavian mythology are founded on the Poetic Edda and the Heimskringla; those on Celtic mythology, on the Hibbert Lectures of Prof. John Rhys and the Mythology of the British Islands of C. Squire; and the few notes on Indian and Moslem theology and mythology on W. J. Wilkins's Hindu Mythology, Sale's Koran, and Duncan Forbes's Mohammedan Mythology. In matters of archaeology and ancient religion and philosophy, I should mention the assistance I have had from the encyclopaedic writings of M. Salomon Reinach, and in respect of English philosophy from Prof. J. Seth, English Philosophers and Schools of Philosophy. As regards early English romances, I am particularly indebted to J. E. Wells, Manual of the Writings in Middle English.

It would be impossible to enumerate within the compass of a short preface the works that I have had recourse to when dealing with special subjects such as Old London, the history of journalism, London clubs, &c. I have endeavoured to draw my information from the authors best qualified to give it, and I hope that my acknowledgements in this general form will be accepted.

I have also consulted on particular points a number of works of reference such as the Encyclopaedia Britannica (11th and 14th editions), the Century Cyclopaedia of Names, and Haydn's Dictionary of Dates, from which I have taken a few facts and dates; also Notes and Queries, and its French counterpart, the Intermédiaire des Chercheurs; and the invaluable Dictionary of Phrase and Fable and Reader's Handbook of Dr. Brewer.

I should not omit to mention the assistance I have had from the ever instructive pages of the Times Literary Supplement, from the staff of the London Library, and from friends and correspondents in England, Ireland, France, and America. I owe a special debt of gratitude to Mr. C. R. L. Fletcher, who has read and commented on the whole of the proofs; and to the staff of the Oxford University Press for general guidance and detailed help in the preparation of the work. Mr. B. R. Redman, who read the proofs with that object, has added a number of short articles to fill gaps in the treatment of American authors and subjects. The suggestions and corrections of these helpers have contributed immensely to whatever standard of completeness and accuracy has been achieved. I only regret that considerations of space and the limited scope of the work have made it impossible to incorporate all the additions that they proposed. For the blunders that may have escaped their scrutiny, I alone am responsible.

PREFACE TO THE SECOND EDITION

IN this edition a general revision has been made and new entries have been added where these were felt to be necessary. Appendices are included, consisting of articles on the Censorship of the press and drama and on Copyright, and of a Perpetual Calendar, which it is hoped may be of value to students.

In the general work of revision I wish to acknowledge the help which I have received from many reviewers and correspondents. I am particularly indebted to Mr. R. P. Jago and to Dr. Eis of Brünn for a number of corrections and observations, and to Mr. A. E. Stamp, C.B., F.S.A., of the Public Record Office, for advice in the preparation of the Perpetual Calendar. Sir Frank MacKinnon was good enough to contribute the article on Copyright which bears his signature.

PREFACE TO THE THIRD EDITION

THE text has again undergone revision, and many articles have been amended or rewritten. Recent events have brought a multitude of fresh names into the class of common allusions. A few of the more prominent of these, such as Roosevelt, Hitler, and Mussolini, the Battle of Britain and the Atlantic Charter, Lend-lease and the New Deal, have been included in this new edition. To many kind critics who have helped me with corrections and suggestions, and in particular to Dr. C. T. Onions, Professor Ernest Weekley, and the late Sir John Fox, I owe acknowledgements and thanks.

A

A BECKETT, GILBERT ABBOTT (1811-56), educated at Westminster School, and called to the bar at Gray's Inn, was the first editor of 'Figaro in London' and on the original staff of 'Punch' (q.v.). He was for many years a leader-writer on 'The Times' and 'Morning Herald', and was appointed a Metropolitan police magistrate in 1849. He wrote a large number of plays and humorous works, including a 'Comic History of England' (1847-8), a 'Comic History of Rome' (1852), and a 'Comic Blackstone' (1846).

His son, GILBERT ARTHUR A BECKETT (1837-91), educated at Westminster School and Christ Church, Oxford, was, like his father, a regular member of the staff of 'Punch' from 1879. He wrote, in collaboration with Sir W. S. Gilbert (q.v.), the successful comedy, 'The Happy Land' (1873).

A per se, the letter A when standing by itself, hence the first, chief, most excellent, most distinguished, or unique person or thing. 'The flour and A per se of Troie and Grece' (Henryson, 'Testament of Cresseid').

Abaddon, the Hebrew name of Apollyon, the angel of the bottomless pit (Rev. ix. 11).

A'bana and Pharpar, the rivers of Damascus referred to by Naaman as better than all the waters of Israel (2 Kings v. 12).

Abaris, a Scythian priest of Apollo, who is said to have visited Greece, and to have ridden through the air on an arrow, the gift of the god.

Abbasides, a dynasty of Caliphs, descendants of Abbas (uncle of Mohammed), who ruled from A.D. 750, when the Umayyads (q.v.) were finally defeated, to 1258. Among them the most famous was Haroun-al-Raschid (q.v.). The sultans of Turkey derived their claim to the Caliphate from this family.

Abbey of Thelema, see Thelema.

Abbey Theatre, Dublin, see Yeats.

ABBO OF FLEURY (945-1004), a French theologian, author of an 'Epitome de Vitis Romanorum Pontificum' and of lives of the saints, one of the sources utilized by Ælfric (q.v.).

Abbot, The, a novel by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1820, a sequel to 'The Monastery' (q.v.).

The work is concerned with that period of the life of Mary Queen of Scots which she spent in imprisonment at Lochleven Castle, her escape, the rally of her supporters and their defeat at the battle of Langside, and her withdrawal across the border to England. With these historical events is woven the romantic story of Roland Graeme, or Roland Avenel, a spirited but hare-brained youth, over whose parentage hangs a certain mystery. After being brought up in the castle of Avenel as page to the Lady of Avenel, he is sent by the Regent Murray to act as page to Mary Stuart in her imprisonment, with directions to watch and report any attempt at escape. These directions he is prevented from carrying out both by his own chivalrous loyalty, by the influence of his fanatical grandmother, Magdalen Graeme, and by his love for Catherine Seyton, one of the queen's attendant ladies. Instead, he becomes an active agent in devising the queen's flight. The mystery of his birth is explained and he is found to be the heir of the house of Avenel. He is pardoned by the Regent and marries Catherine Seyton. The novel takes its title from the abbot of Kennaquhair, Edward Glendinning (Father Ambrose), brother of Sir Halbert Glendinning, the knight of Avenel (see Monastery).

Abbotsford, the name of Sir W. Scott's property near Melrose on the Tweed, purchased in 1812.

Abbotsford Club, THE, was founded in 1834, in memory of Sir Walter Scott, for the purpose of publishing materials bearing on the history or literature of any country dealt with in Scott's writings. It ceased its publications in 1865.

Abdêra, a Greek city on the coast of Thrace, birthplace of Democritus (q.v.), Protagoras the sophist, and Anaxarchus the philosopher; in spite of which its inhabitants were proverbial for stupidity.

Abdiel, in Milton's 'Paradise Lost', v. 805 and 897, the loyal seraph, who resists Satan's proposal to revolt: 'Among the faithless, faithful only he.'

ABÉLARD or ABAILARD, PIERRE (1079-1142), a brilliant disputant and lecturer at the schools of Ste Geneviève and Notre Dame in Paris, where John of Salisbury (q.v.) was among his pupils. He was an advocate of rational theological inquiry and the founder of scholastic theology. He fell in love with Héloïse, the niece of an old canon of Notre Dame, one Fulbert, in whose house he lodged, a woman of much learning to whom he gave lessons. Their love ended in a tragic separation, and in a famous correspondence. Abélard was much persecuted for alleged heresy, in particular by St. Bernard (q.v.), but was sought out by students. Héloïse died in 1163 and was buried in the same tomb as her lover.

Pope's poem 'Eloisa to Abelard' was published in 1717; G. Moore's 'Héloïse and Abélard' was published in 1921.

ABENCERRAGES

Abencerrages, THE, a legendary Moorish family of Granada, at enmity with the Zegrís, another family of Moors. 'This feud and the destruction of the Abencerrages by Abu Hassan, Moorish king of Granada, in the Alhambra, have been celebrated by Spanish writers, and form the subject of a romance by Chateaubriand (q.v.). The Abencerrages and Zegrís figure in Dryden's 'Conquest of Granada' (q.v.).

ABERCROMBIE, LASCELLES (1881-1938), poet and critic. His chief published works were: 'Interludes and Poems' (1908), 'Emblems of Love' (1912), 'Deborah' (1912), all poetry; 'Thomas Hardy, a Critical Study' (1912), 'The Epic' (1914), 'Theory of Art' (1922), all critical; 'Collected Poems' (in the 'Oxford Poets', 1930).

Abershaw, LOUIS JEREMIAH or JERRY (1773?-95), highwayman, the terror of the roads between London, Kingston, and Wimbledon. Hanged on Kennington Common.

Abessa, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', 1. iii, the 'daughter of Corceca slow' (blindness of heart), and the personification of superstition.

Abigail, in 1 Samuel xxv, the wife of Nabal and subsequently of David. The name came to signify a waiting-woman, from the name of the 'waiting gentlewoman' in 'The Scornful Lady' by Beaumont and Fletcher (q.v.), so called possibly in allusion to the expression 'thine handmaid', so frequently applied to herself by Abigail in the above chapter.

Abingdon Law. It is said that Maj.-Gen. Browne at Abingdon, during the Commonwealth, first hanged his prisoners and then tried them.

Abora, MOUNT, in Coleridge's 'Kubla Khan', is perhaps to be identified with Milton's Mt. Amara (q.v.). See J. L. Lowes, 'The Road to Xanadu' (1927), pp. 374-5.

Abou Ben Adhem, may his tribe increase, the first line of a poem by Leigh Hunt (q.v.). Abou Ben Adhem sees a vision of an angel writing in a book of gold the names of those who love the Lord. His own name is not included. He prays that he may be written down as one who loves his fellow men. The next night the angel returns and Abou Ben Adhem's name then heads the list.

Abou Hassan, in the 'Arabian Nights' (q.v., 'The Sleeper Awakened'), a merchant of Bagdad, carried while intoxicated to the palace of Haroun-al-Raschid, and persuaded when he woke up that he was the Caliph. Cf. the incident of Christopher Sly in the Induction of Shakespeare's 'The Taming of the Shrew'.

Abracadabra, a cabalistic word intended to suggest infinity, which first occurs in a poem by Q. Severus Sammonicus, 2nd cent. It was used as a charm and believed to have the power, when written in a triangular arrangement and worn round the neck, to cure agues, &c. Fun is made of it in 'A Lay of St. Dunstan' in Barham's 'Ingoldsby Legends' (q.v.).

ABSALOM AND ACHITOPHEL

Abraham, the Hebrew patriarch, figures largely in Arabian and Mohammedan legend. It is said, for instance, that King Nimrod sought to throw him into a fiery furnace, whence he was rescued by the grace of God. This legend is referred to by Moore in 'Lalla Rookh' (q.v., 'Fire-Worshippers'). Again, the black stone in the Kaaba (q.v.), which had fallen from Paradise, was given by Gabriel to Abraham, who built the Kaaba.

Abraham-man, ABRAM-MAN, one of 'a set of vagabonds, who wandered about the country, soon after the dissolution of the religious houses; the provision of the poor in those places being cut off, and no other substituted' (Nares). The OED. suggests that the name is possibly in allusion to the parable of the beggar Lazarus in Luke xvi. Brewer states that inmates of Bedlam who were not dangerously mad were kept in 'Abraham Ward', and were allowed out from time to time in a distinctive dress and permitted to beg. The 'Abraham-man' is referred to in Awdley's 'Fraternity of Vagabones' (1561) and frequently in the dramatists of the 16th-17th cents. Hence, to sham Abram, to feign sickness. 'When Abraham Newland was cashier of the Bank of England, and signed their notes, it was sung: "I have heard people say That sham Abraham you may, But you mustn't sham Abraham Newland"' (J. C. Hotten, 'Dict. Slang').

Absalom, the son of King David, who rebelled against his father, and whose death occasioned David's lament in 2 Sam. xviii. 33.

Absalom and Achitophel, a satirical poem, in heroic couplets, by Dryden (q.v.), published in 1681. The poem deals in allegorical form with the attempt by Lord Shaftesbury's party to exclude the Duke of York from the succession and to set the Duke of Monmouth in his place. It was written at the time when Shaftesbury's success or failure hung in the balance, and was designed to influence the issue by showing, under their scriptural disguise, the true characters of the various political personages involved. Chief among these are: Monmouth (Absalom); Shaftesbury (the false tempter Achitophel); the Duke of Buckingham (Zimri), who, as responsible for the 'Rehearsal' (q.v.), was particularly obnoxious to Dryden; Charles II (David); Titus Oates (Corah); and Slingsby Bethel, sheriff of London (Shimei).

The poem, which was immensely popular, was followed in 1682 by a second part, which was in the main written by Nahum Tate (q.v.), but revised by Dryden, who moreover contributed 200 lines, entirely his own, containing, among a number of savagely satirical portraits, the famous characters of Og (Thomas Shadwell, q.v.) and Doeg (Elkanah Settle, q.v.). The lines in question begin

Next these a troop of busy spirits press, and end with

To talk like Doeg, and to write like thee.

ABSENTEE

Absentee, The, a novel by M. Edgeworth (q.v.), published in 1812.

Lord Clonbrony, the absentee landlord of Irish estates, lives in London to please his extravagant wife, who is ashamed of her Irish origin, and is mocked by the society into which she forces her way by her lavish expenditure. Lord Clonbrony becomes heavily indebted and is threatened with an execution. Meanwhile his son, Lord Colambre, a sensible young man, has gone incognito to visit his father's estates, and his eyes are opened to the evils of absenteeism. He helps his father to discharge his debts on condition that he returns to his estates, a condition to which Lady Clonbrony is with difficulty brought to consent; and the story closes with the promise of a happier era.

Absinth, a potent liqueur, distilled from wine mixed with wormwood. Barnes Newcome (in 'The Newcomes', q.v.) drank absinth-and-water at Bays's. See also Artemisia.

Absolute, SIR ANTHONY, and his son CAPTAIN ABSOLUTE, characters in Sheridan's 'The Rivals' (q.v.).

Abt Vogler, a poem by R. Browning (q.v.). The Abbé Vogler (1749-1814), the subject of the poem, was court chaplain at Mannheim and inventor of improvements in the mechanism of the organ. Vogler has been extemporizing upon the musical instrument of his invention, calling up a vision of pinnaced glory. He laments that this palace of beauty has disappeared with the music. But presently he takes comfort in the thought that there is no beauty, nor good, nor power, whose voice has gone forth, but survives the melodist. It is enough that God has heard it.

Abu Bakr, the first Caliph elected after the death of Mohammed.

Abu Ibn Sina, commonly known as Avicenna (q.v.).

Abus, THE, the Roman name of the river Humber, mentioned in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', II. x. 16.

Abýdos, a city of Asia, on the shores of the Hellespont, famous for the loves of Hero and Leander. For Byron's poem see Bride of Abydos. See also Sestos.

Abýla, one of the Pillars of Hercules (q.v.).

Acadēmus, a Greek who revealed to Castor (q.v.) and Pollux, when they invaded Attica to recover their sister Helen, the place where Theseus had concealed her. See Academy.

Academy or ACADEME, from Academia, a grove near Athens, sacred to the hero Academus (q.v.), near which Plato (q.v.) had a house and garden and in which he opened his school of philosophy. The second Academy, where a modified Platonic doctrine was taught, was founded by Arcesilaus about 250 B.C.; the third by Carneades about 213 B.C. Together with the School of Athens, the Academy was finally closed by Justinian.

Academy, The, a periodical, was founded in 1869 as 'a monthly record of literature, learning, science, and art', by Charles Edward Cutts Birch Appleton. In 1871 it was converted into a fortnightly, and in 1874 into a weekly review. It included Matthew Arnold, T. H. Huxley, Mark Pattison, and John Conington, among its early contributors. 'The Academy' came to an end in 1909.

Academy, THE BRITISH, a society, incorporated in 1902, for the promotion of the study of the moral and political sciences, including history, philosophy, law, political economy, archaeology, and philology. It publishes Proceedings, administers endowments for a number of annual lectures, encourages archaeological and oriental research, &c. Its first secretary was Sir Israel Gollancz.

Academy, THE DELLA CRUSCA, see Della Crusca.

Academy, THE FRENCH (Académie française), was founded by Cardinal Richelieu in 1635. It is essentially a literary academy. One of its principal functions is the compilation and revision of a dictionary of the French language. The first edition of this appeared in 1694, and there have been numerous subsequent editions. A work that has been approved by the Academy is said to be 'crowned' by it. See Immortals.

Academy of Arts, THE ROYAL, was founded under the patronage of George III in 1768, for the annual exhibition of works of contemporary artists and for the establishment of a school of art. It was housed at first in Somerset House, then in the National Gallery, and finally removed to Burlington House in 1869. Sir Joshua Reynolds was its first president. It is occasionally referred to as 'The Forty', from the number of the Academicians.

Acadia, now known as Nova Scotia, was discovered by the Cabots (1497) and first settled by the French at the end of the 16th cent., who gave it the name of Acadia. The French inhabitants were attacked by the Virginians in 1613, and the country was in 1622 occupied by Scotsmen under Sir William Alexander, who obtained a grant of it from James I. Its possession was finally confirmed to England by the Treaty of Utrecht. The sufferings of the French Acadians, when expelled in the 18th cent., are recounted in Longfellow's 'Evangeline' (q.v.).

Acapulco ship, THE, another name for the 'Manila ship', one of the Spanish royal ships that sailed annually from Manila in the Philippines for Acapulco on the coast of Mexico, and brought back from that port the output of the Mexican mines. They were regarded as valuable prizes by the English privateers of the 17th-18th cents. Anson (q.v.) is said to have taken the equivalent of £500,000 in the Acapulco ship that he captured (see his 'Voyage round the World', c. viii). See also, e.g., Woodes Rogers, 'Cruizing Voyage'.

Acatalectic, 'not catalectic' (q.v.), a term applied to a verse whose syllables are complete, not wanting a syllable in the last foot.

'Stern daughter of the voice of God!' is an iambic dimeter (see Metre) acatalectic.

Acel'dama (pron. Acel'da-mah), a Hebrew word, the 'field of blood', the name given to the 'potter's field' purchased with Judas's thirty pieces of silver, to bury strangers in. See Matt. xxvii. 8 and Acts i. 19.

Acestes, in Virgil's 'Aeneid' (v. 525), a Sicilian who shot an arrow with such swiftness that it caught fire from friction with the air.

Achātēs, usually styled 'Fidus Achates', a friend of Aeneas (q.v.), whose fidelity was so exemplary as to become proverbial.

Achēron, a river of Hades, interpreted as ὁ ἄγρυ πένυ, the river of woe. See Styx.

Achilles, son of Peleus and Thetis (qq.v.), the bravest of the Greeks in the Trojan War. During his infancy Thetis plunged him in the Styx, thus making his body invulnerable, except the heel, by which she held him. He was educated by the centaur Cheiron, who taught him the arts of war and of music. To prevent him from going to the Trojan War, where she knew he would perish, Thetis sent him to the court of Lycomēdēs, where he was disguised in female dress among the king's daughters. As Troy could not be taken without the help of Achilles, Ulysses went to the court of Lycomedes disguised as a merchant, and displayed jewels and arms. Achilles discovered his sex by showing his preference for the arms and went to the war. He was deprived by Agamemnon of Briseis, who had fallen to his lot in a division of booty. For this affront he retired in anger to his tent, and refused to appear in the field, until the death of his friend Patroclus recalled him to action. In armour made for him by Hephaestus, he slew Hector, the champion of Troy, and dragged his corpse, tied to his chariot, to the Greek ships. He was wounded in the heel by Paris as he solicited the hand of Polyxēna, a daughter of Priam, in the temple of Athena. Of this wound Achilles died.

The TENDON OF ACHILLES, the tendon by which the muscles of the calf of the leg are attached to the heel, is so called from the above story of the vulnerable heel of Achilles.

Achilles' spear: Telephus, a son-in-law of Priam, and king of Mysia, attempted to prevent a landing of the Greeks on their way to Troy, and was wounded by Achilles. Learning from an oracle that he would be cured only by the wounder, he sought the camp of the Greeks, who had meanwhile learnt that they needed the help of Telephus to reach Troy. Achilles accordingly cured Telephus by applying rust from the point of his spear. Shakespeare ('a Henry VI', v. 1) and Chaucer

ACTES AND MONUMENTS

('Squire's Tale', 232) refer to this power of the spear of Achilles both to kill and cure.

The plant ACHILLEA (milfoil) is supposed to have curative properties.

Achilles and the Tortoise, a paradox propounded by the philosopher Zeno (q.v.). Achilles and a tortoise have a race. Achilles runs ten times as fast as the tortoise, which has a hundred yards start. Achilles can never catch the tortoise, because when Achilles has covered the hundred yards, the tortoise has covered ten; while Achilles is covering these ten, the tortoise has gone another yard; and so on.

Achitophel, see Absalom and Achitophel. Ahithophel (2 Sam. xv-xvii, spelt 'Achitophel' in the Vulgate and Coverdale's version) conspired with Absalom against David, and his advice being disregarded, hanged himself.

Acidālia, a surname of Aphrodite, from the well Acidalius near Orchomenos in Boeotia.

Acis, see Galatea.

Acrasia, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', II. xii, typifies Intemperance. She is captured and bound by Sir Guyon, and her Bower of Bliss destroyed.

Acre or ST. JEAN D'ACRE, a seaport on the coast of Palestine, was captured by the Crusaders of the Third Crusade in 1191, Richard Cœur de Lion contributing by his energy to its fall. It was the last stronghold held by the Christians in the Holy Land. It was successfully defended in 1799 against Buonaparte by a Turkish garrison aided by Sir Sidney Smith. It was captured from Mehemet Ali in 1840 by the allied fleet under Sir Robert Stopford, with Sir Charles Napier (1786-1860) as his second in command.

Acrislas, see Danaë.

Actaeon, according to Greek legend a famous hunter, who saw Artemis and her attendants bathing, or, according to another version, boasted himself superior to her in the chase. For this he was changed into a stag, and devoured by his own hounds.

Actes and Monuments of these latter perilous times touching matters of the Church, popularly known as the BOOK OF MARTYRS, by Foxe (q.v.), first published at Strasburg in Latin in 1559, and printed in English in 1563.

This enormous work, said to be twice the length of Gibbon's 'Decline and Fall', is a history of the Christian Church from the earliest times, with special reference to the sufferings of the Christian martyrs of all ages, but more particularly of the protestant martyrs of Mary's reign. The book is, in fact, a violent indictment of 'the persecutors of God's truth, commonly called papists'. The author is credulous in his acceptance of stories of martyrdom and partisan in their selection. The work is written in a simple homely style, and enlivened by vivid dialogues between the persecutors and their victims. The title of the Latin version is 'Rerum in Ecclesia Gestarum . . . maximarumque per Europam persecutionum, &c.'

ACTON, SIR JOHN EMERICH EDWARD DALBERG, first Baron Acton (1834–1902), was born at Naples of a Shropshire Roman Catholic family, and educated at Paris, Oscott, and privately at Edinburgh. He studied history and criticism at Munich under Döllinger from 1848 to 1854, and with him visited Italy in 1857. He was Whig M.P. for Carlow (1859–65) and formed a friendship with Gladstone. In the 'Rambler' (converted under his direction to the 'Home and Foreign Review') he advocated Döllinger's proposed reunion of Christendom, but stopped the 'Review' on the threat of a papal veto. He was strenuous in his opposition to the definition by the Catholic Church of the dogma of papal infallibility, publishing his views in his 'Letters from Rome on the Council' (1870). In 1874, in letters to 'The Times', he criticized Gladstone's pamphlet on 'The Vatican Decrees'. His literary activity was great, and took the form of contributions to the 'North British Review', the 'Quarterly Review', and the 'English Historical Review' (which he founded), besides lectures and addresses. Lord Acton was appointed Regius professor of modern history at Cambridge in 1895, on which occasion he delivered a remarkable inaugural lecture on the study of history (reprinted in 'Lectures on Modern History', 1906). One of his principal works was the planning of the 'Cambridge Modern History' (1899–1912), for which he wrote the opening chapter. His other published works include 'Historical Essays and Studies' (1907), 'The History of Freedom' (1907), and 'Lectures on the French Revolution' (1910). He had planned early in life a history of liberty, 'the marrow of all modern history' in his view, and for this he collected much material, but only fragments of it, as above, were published.

Ada Clare, one of the two wards in Chancery in Dickens's 'Bleak House' (q.v.).

Adah, in Byron's 'Cain' (q.v.), Cain's wife.

Adam, the name given in the Bible to the first man, the father of the human race, 'the goodliest man of men since born' of Milton's 'Paradise Lost' (iv. 323). Hence the phrase the Old Adam, the unregenerate condition or character.

Adam, the designation of a 12th-cent. Norman-French dramatic representation of scriptural history (the Fall, the death of Abel, and the prophets of the Redemption), in eight-syllabled verse, probably written in England, important in the evolution of the drama in England from its liturgical origins.

Adam, in Shakespeare's 'As You Like It' (q.v.), the faithful old servant who accompanies Orlando in exile.

ADAM BELL

Adam, ROBERT (1728–92), architect, the most famous of four brothers, John, Robert, James, and William, of Maryburgh, Fife. In 1762, after visiting Italy (including the earlier excavations at Pompeii) and Diocletian's palace at Spalato, Robert Adam was appointed architect to the Board of Works (in which post he was succeeded by his brother James), and subsequently entered parliament. With his three brothers he acquired on a 99 years' lease the land on the bank of the Thames on which was erected the Adelphi, a fine group of buildings of Adam's design, so called from the Greek ἀδελφοί ('brothers'), reminiscent of the Spalato ruins. Robert Adam also designed the screen and gate of the Admiralty, Portland Place, other buildings in London and Edinburgh, and various country mansions, e.g. Kenwood, Osterley, Kedleston. He influenced English furniture as well as architecture, introducing a light simple style, with painted and inlaid decorative motives, in which the wreath, the honeysuckle, and the fan are prominent. He also produced beautiful ceilings and mantelpieces.

Adam Bede, a novel by G. Eliot (q.v.), published in 1859.

The plot is founded on a story told to George Eliot by her aunt Elizabeth Evans, a Methodist preacher and the original of the Dinah Morris of the novel, of a confession of child-murder, made to her by a girl in prison. Hetty Sorrel, pretty, vain, and selfish, is the niece of the genial farmer, Martin Poyser. She is loved by Adam Bede, a stern high-minded village carpenter, but is deluded by the prospect of the position which marriage with the young squire, Arthur Donnithorne, would give her, and is seduced by him, in spite of the efforts of Adam Bede to save her. Arthur breaks off relations with her, and Hetty, broken-hearted, presently consents to marry Adam. But before the marriage, Hetty discovers that she is pregnant, flies from her home to seek Arthur, fails to find him, is arrested and convicted of the murder of her child, and is transported. After a time Adam discovers that he has won the heart of Dinah Morris, a deeply religious young Methodist preacher, whose serene influence pervades the whole story, and whom Adam's brother, the gentle Seth, has long loved hopelessly, and now with a fine unselfishness resigns to him.

The work is remarkable for the characters of the two brothers; of Dinah and Hetty; of the garrulous Mrs. Poyser; the kindly vicar, Mr. Irwine; and the sharp-tongued schoolmaster, Bartle Massey. Also for its pleasant descriptions of scenery, and particularly of the Poyser's farm.

Adam Bell, Clym of the Clough (or CLEUGH), and William of Cloudeley, three noted outlaws, as famous for their skill in archery in Northern England as Robin Hood and his fellows in the Midlands. They lived in the forest of Englewood, not far from Carlisle, and are supposed to have been contemporary with Robin Hood's father. Clyn of the Clough is mentioned in Jonson's 'Alchemist', i. ii; and in D'Avenant's 'The Wits', ii. i. There are ballads on the three outlaws in Percy's 'Reliques' ('Adam Bell') and in Child's collection. In these, William of Cloudeley, after having been captured by treachery, is rescued by his comrades. They surrender themselves to the king and are pardoned on William's shooting an apple placed on his little son's head.

Adam Blair, see Lockhart.

Adam Cast Forth, a dramatic poem (1908) by C. M. Doughty (q.v.), dealing with the separation of Adam and Eve after the expulsion, and their reunion.

Adam Cupid, in Shakespeare's 'Romeo and Juliet', ii. i. 13, perhaps alludes to Adam Bell (q.v.), the archer.

Adam, or EDOM, o' Gordon, a Berwickshire freebooter, subject of a Scottish ballad included in Percy's 'Reliques'.

Adam's Ale, a humorous expression for water, as the only drink of our first parents.

Adamastor, in the 'Lusiads' (v. li) of Camoens (q.v.), the spirit of the Cape of Storms (now known as the Cape of Good Hope), who appears to Vasco da Gama and threatens all who dare venture into his seas. 'Adamastor' is the title of a poem by Roy Campbell.

Adamites, in ecclesiastical history, the name of sects who affected to imitate Adam in respect of his nakedness. 'An enemy to Clothes in the abstract, a new Adamite' (Carlyle, 'Sartor Resartus').

ADAMNAN, ST. (c. 625-704), abbot of Iona from 679. The life of St. Columba is generally attributed to him.

Adams, PARSON ABRAHAM, a character in Fielding's 'Joseph Andrews' (q.v.).

ADAMS, HENRY BROOKS (1838-1918), American man of letters and grandson and great-grandson of Presidents of the United States. His most ambitious work was a history in nine volumes of the administrations of Jefferson and Madison, but it is probable that he will be remembered chiefly by 'Mont-Saint-Michel and Chartres' (1904), and 'The Education of Henry Adams' (1907), an autobiography.

ADAMS, JAMES TRUSLOW (1878-), American historian and essayist, born at Brooklyn, New York. His chief works are: 'The Founding of New England' (1921), 'Our Business Civilization' (published in England as 'A Searchlight on America', 1929), 'The Adams Family' (1930), 'The Epic of America' (1931), 'Henry Adams' (1933).

ADAMS, SARAH FLOWER (1805-48), is remembered as a writer of hymns, including 'Nearer, my God, to Thee'. She also wrote 'Vivia Perpetua', a dramatic poem (1841).

ADDLED PARLIAMENT

ADAMSON, ROBERT (1852-1902), educated at Edinburgh University, became professor of philosophy and political economy at Owens College, Manchester, and subsequently at Aberdeen and Glasgow. His chief works, 'On the Philosophy of Kant' (1879), a monograph on Fichte (1881), 'The Development of Modern Philosophy' (1903), and 'A Short History of Logic' (1911, the reprint of an earlier article), show a gradual reaction from idealism to realism.

ADDISON, JOSEPH (1672-1719), the son of a dean of Lichfield, was educated at the Charterhouse with Steele, and at Queen's College, Oxford, and Magdalen, of which he became fellow. He was distinguished as a classical scholar and attracted the notice of Dryden by his Latin poems. He travelled on the Continent from 1699 to 1703, having been granted a pension for the purpose, with a view to qualifying for the diplomatic service. His 'Dialogues upon the usefulness of Ancient Medals' (published posthumously) were probably written about this time. In 1704 he published 'The Campaign', a poem in heroic couplets, in celebration of the victory of Blenheim. He was appointed under-secretary of state in 1706, and was M.P. from 1708 till his death. In 1709 he went to Ireland as chief secretary to Lord Wharton, the Lord Lieutenant. He formed a close friendship with Swift, Steele, and other writers, and was a member of the Kit-Cat Club (q.v.). Addison lost office on the fall of the Whigs in 1711. Between 1709 and 1711 he contributed a number of papers to Steele's 'Tatler' (q.v.), and joined with him in the production of the 'Spectator' (q.v.) in 1711-12. His tragedy 'Cato' was produced with great success in 1713, and during the same year he contributed to Steele's periodical, the 'Guardian', and during 1714 to the revived 'Spectator'. His prose comedy, 'The Drummer' (q.v., 1715), proved a failure. On the return of the Whigs to power, Addison was again appointed chief secretary for Ireland, and started his political newspaper, the 'Freeholder' (1715-16). In 1716 he became a lord commissioner of trade, and married the countess of Warwick. In 1718 he retired from office with a pension of £1,500. His last year was marked by increasing tension in the relations between him and Steele, of which several papers by Addison in the 'Old Whig' are evidence. Addison was buried in Westminster Abbey, and lamented in a noble elegy by Tickell (q.v.). He was satirized by Pope in the character of 'Atticus' (q.v.).

Addled Parliament, THE, the parliament summoned by James I in 1614 in the hope of obtaining money. Being met by a demand that Impositions (duties raised by the sole authority of the king) should be abolished and the ejected clergy restored to their livings, the king dissolved the parliament, which, having passed no act and granted no supplies, received the above nickname.

ADE, GEORGE (1866-1944), American humorist and dramatist, born in Kentland, Indiana, educated at Purdue University, whose reputation was largely won by several volumes of 'Fables in Slang'—'Fables in Slang' (1900), 'More Fables' (1900), 'Forty Modern Fables' (1901), 'Ade's Fables' (1914), 'Hand-Made Fables' (1920).

Admirable Crichton, THE, see Crichton.

Admiral Hosier's Ghost, a party song, written by R. Glover (q.v.), on the taking of Porto Bello from the Spaniards in 1739. Hosier had been sent in 1726 in command of a squadron to the West Indies, but was reduced by his orders to long inactivity, during which his men perished by disease, and he himself is said to have died of a broken heart. The ballad is in Percy's 'Reliques'.

Adonai, the Supreme Being, a Hebrew word signifying 'my Lords'. It is one of the names given in the O.T. to the Deity, and is substituted by the Jews, in reading, for the 'ineffable name', Yahweh or Jehovah.

Adonais, An Elegy on the Death of John Keats, a poem in Spenserian stanzas by P. B. Shelley (q.v.), published in 1821.

The death of Keats moved Shelley not only to sorrow for one whom he classed among the writers of the highest genius of the age, but to indignation at the savage criticisms on Keats's work which he believed had hastened his end. In this elegy (in form resembling classical elegies such as Bion's lament for Adonis) the poet pictures the throng of mourners, the Muse Urania, Dreams and Desires, Sorrow and Pleasure, Morning and Spring, and the fellow-poets, all bringing their tribute to the bier of Adonais. The lament then changes to a triumphant declaration of the poet's immortality.

Adōnis, the son of Cinyras, king of Cyprus, and Myrrha; a beautiful youth beloved by Aphrodite. He received a mortal wound from a wild boar, and the flower anemone was said to have sprung from his blood. Proserpine restored him to life, on condition that he should spend six months with her and the rest of the year with Aphrodite, a symbol of winter and summer. His death and revival were widely celebrated (in the East under the name of his Syrian equivalent, Thamuz; cf. 'Paradise Lost', i. 446-52). As a feature in this worship, the image of Adonis was surrounded with beds of plants in flower, whose rapid withering symbolized the cycle of life and death in the vegetable world. 'Gardens of Adonis' are referred to in Shakespeare, '1 Henry VI', i. vi; also in Milton, 'Paradise Lost', ix. 440, and in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', iii. vi. 29, though in the latter passages the similarity is only in the name.

An ADONIS in the 18th cent. was a particular kind of wig ('a fine flowing adonis'; Graves, 'Spiritual Quixote', iii. xix).

Adramelech, in Milton's 'Paradise Lost', vi. 365, one of the rebel angels.

Adrastus, king of Argos, leader of the expedition of the 'Seven against Thebes' (see Eteocles), and of the second expedition against Thebes, known as the war of the Epigoni.

Adriana, in Shakespeare's 'Comedy of Errors' (q.v.), the jealous wife of Antipholus of Ephesus.

Adriano de Armado, a character in Shakespeare's 'Love's Labour's Lost' (q.v.).

Adriatic: the annual ceremony of the wedding of the Doge of Venice to the Adriatic, the Sposalizio del Mar, was symbolical of the sea power of Venice. Traces of the ceremony are found as early as the 11th cent. The Doge, in his state barge, the Bucentaur, proceeded to sea on Ascension Day and dropped a ring into the water.

Adullamites, a name applied to a group of liberal M.P.'s, including Edward Horsman, Robert Lowe, and Earl Grosvenor, who seceded from the Reform party in 1866 and opposed the Franchise Bill. The name was first given by John Bright to Horsman, who, he said, 'had retired into what may be called his political cave of Adullam, to which he invited everyone who was in debt, and everyone who was discontented'. (1 Sam. xxii. 1-2.)

Advancement of Learning, The, a philosophical treatise by Francis Bacon (q.v.), published in 1605. Unlike most of Bacon's philosophical works, it appeared in English and not in Latin. After disposing of the various objections to learning and enunciating its advantages, the author considers the various methods of advancing knowledge and the defects in present practice. After which, the divisions of knowledge—history, poetry, and philosophy—are enumerated and analysed. This work was later expanded in Bacon's 'De Augmentis'.

Adventurer, The, a periodical conducted during 1752-4 by John Hawkesworth (1715?-73), to which Samuel Johnson and Joseph Warton (qq.v.) contributed many papers.

Adventures of a Guinea, Chrysal, or the, a satirical narrative by Charles Johnstone

ADVENTURES OF A GUINEA

(1719?-1800?), published in 1760-5, in which a guinea is made to describe its various owners. Several chapters are given to an account of the 'Hellfire Club' (q.v.).

Adventures of a Younger Son, The, a novel by E. J. Trelawny (q.v.), published in 1831.

The work, which is partly autobiographical, is the story of the life of a wild Byronic character, a lawless daredevil, warped in youth by the harshness of his father, who deserts from the navy and takes to a life of piracy in the Indian Ocean, encountering many exciting adventures. These are told with much vigour and freshness, and there are good descriptions of Eastern scenes.

Advocates' Library, THE, in Edinburgh, founded by Sir George Mackenzie of Rosehaugh (1636-91), king's advocate, and opened in 1689. It was presented to the nation by the Faculty of Advocates in 1924, and endowed by Sir A. Grant with £100,000. It became the National Library of Scotland in 1925, and is one of the libraries that receive a copy of all works published in Great Britain.

Æginetan Marbles, THE, from the temple of Aphaea (see Britomartis) in the island of Aegina. They represent groups of warriors fighting, with a figure of Athena or Aphaea standing in the centre. The Marbles were bought in 1812 by the Crown Prince Louis of Bavaria and placed in the Glyptothek at Munich.

Ægir, in Scandinavian mythology, the chief of the sea-giants. He represents the peaceful ocean. His wife, Ran, draws mariners down to her abode in the deep. They have nine daughters, the stormy billows. A banquet given by Ægir to the gods is a prominent incident in this mythology.

AENEAS

Ægisthus, according to Greek legend, was the son of Thyestes (the son of Pelops) and his daughter Pelopia. As a result of the feud between Thyestes and his brother Atreus (q.v.), Ægisthus murdered Atreus. When the sons of Atreus, Agamemnon (q.v.), king of Argos, and Menelaus, king of Sparta, went to the Trojan War, Ægisthus seduced Agamemnon's wife Clytemnestra (q.v.), and with her murdered Agamemnon on his return from Troy. Orestes (q.v.), the son of Agamemnon, with the assistance of his sister Electra, subsequently avenged his father by killing Ægisthus and Clytemnestra.

Æglamour, the 'Sad Shepherd' in Ben Jonson's pastoral drama of that name (q.v.).

ÆLFRIC, called GRAMMATICUS (d. c. 1020), was a monk at Winchester and Cerne and abbot of Eynsham. His chief works are Catholic Homilies (990-2), largely drawn from the works of St. Augustine, St. Jerome, St. Gregory, and other Latin writers, and 'Lives of Saints' (993-6), a series of sermons in alliterative rhythms. His Paschal homily against transubstantiation was published in 1566 under ecclesiastical patronage as 'A Testimonie of Antiquitie'. Several other works of his survive, including a Latin grammar; a 'Colloquy' between the teacher, the pupil, and various persons, a ploughman, a shepherd, a hunter, &c.; a paraphrase in the vernacular of the first seven books of the Bible (not all of it his own work); and a treatise, 'De Veteri et de Novo Testamento', an introduction to the Testaments. Ælfric is a most prominent figure in Anglo-Saxon literature, and the greatest prose writer of his time; his writings are important from their illustration of the belief and practice of the early English Church.

Ælfthryth (ELFRIDA) (c. 945-1000), the daughter of Ordgar, ealdorman of Devon, the second wife of King Eadgar, and mother of Æthelred the Unready. She was believed to have caused the death of her stepson, Eadward the Martyr. According to William of Malmesbury's mainly fabulous account of her life, King Eadgar, hearing of her beauty, sent Æthelwald, ealdorman of East Anglia, to see her. Æthelwald falling in love with her, reported disparagingly on her appearance, in order to marry her himself. Eadgar subsequently discovered the deceit, caused the death of Æthelwald, and took Ælfthryth to wife.

Priam, king of Troy, by whom he had a son, Ascanius. When Troy was in flames at the end of the Trojan War, he carried away upon his shoulders his father Anchises and the statues of his household gods, leading his son by the hand and leaving his wife to follow behind. But she was separated from him in the confusion and lost. His subsequent adventures are told by Virgil in the 'Aeneid' and by other Latin authors, who, in a spirit of flattery, traced the descent of the Roman emperors to Aeneas. Leaving Troy with a fleet of twenty ships, he was shipwrecked near Carthage, where he was kindly entertained by Dido the queen, who fell in love with him. But Aeneas left Carthage by order of the gods, and Dido in despair took her own life. Coming to Cumæ, Aeneas was conducted by the Sibyl to the nether world, that he might hear from his father's shade the fates of his posterity. After a voyage of seven years, and the loss of thirteen ships, he reached the Tiber, where he married Lavinia, the daughter of King Latinus, having slain in single combat Turnus, king of the Rutulians, his rival for her hand. Aeneas succeeded his father-in-law as king of the Latins and after a short reign was killed in a battle with the Etruscans. He is known as 'pious Aeneas' for his filial piety and fidelity to his mission.

AENEAS SILVIUS PICCOLOMINI (1405-64), Pope Pius II from 1458, was a patron of letters, and author of a romance, 'Eurialus and Lucretia', of treatises on many subjects, and of Commentaries on his times.

Aeneid, The, a poem in Latin hexameters by Virgil (q.v.), recounting the adventures of Aeneas (q.v.) from the fall of Troy.

Aeolus, the god of the winds. In the 'Odyssey' (x. 1 et seq.) Aeolus was the ruler of a floating island in the west, on whom Zeus had conferred dominion over the winds. When Ulysses was returning to Ithaca, Aeolus gave him, confined in a bag, all the winds unfavourable to his voyage; but the companions of Ulysses out of curiosity untied the bag and released the winds. In consequence his ships were driven back.

AESCHYLUS (525-456 B.C.), the great Athenian tragic poet, was present in the Athenian army at the battle of Marathon, and may have been present at that of Salamis. He was defeated by his younger rival Sophocles in 468 B.C. He visited Syracuse more than once at the invitation of Hieron I, and died at Gela in Sicily. Legend attributes the manner of his death to the fall of a tortoise which an eagle let drop, mistaking his bald pate for a rock. Of the large number of tragedies that he wrote only seven have come down to us: 'The Persians' (on the triumph of Greece over the Persian invaders), 'The Seven against Thebes' (the story of Eteocles and Polyneices), the 'Prometheus Bound', 'The Suppliants' (i.e. the fifty daughters of Danaus), and the great trilogy on the story of Orestes, the 'Agamemnon', the 'Choephori', and the 'Eumenides'. Aeschylus may be regarded as the founder of Greek tragedy, having introduced a second actor (where there had previously been only one actor and the chorus), and subordinated the chorus to the dialogue.

Aesculāpius (ASCLEPIUS), son of Apollo and Coronis, was taught the art of medicine by Cheiron (q.v.), the Centaur. At the prayer of Artemis he restored her favourite, Hippolytus (q.v.), to life. Zeus, angered at this interference, struck Aesculapius with lightning. After his death he was honoured as the god of medicine, and was represented holding in his hand a staff, round which is wreathed a serpent, a creature peculiarly sacred to him. Among his children was a daughter, Hygieia (q.v.). His principal temple was at Epidaurus; patients who slept in the temple were cured in the night or learnt in a dream the method of cure.

Æsir, THE, in Scandinavian mythology the collective name of the gods, of whom the chief are Odin, his wife Frigga, and his sons Thor, Balder, Tyr, Vali, Vidar, Bragi, Hödur, and Hermod (qq.v.). Loki (q.v.) was also one of the Æsir, but an evil spirit. Their dwelling was known as Asgard. See also Vanir and Ragnarök.

Aeson, king of Iolchus and father of Jason (q.v.). He was restored to youth by the arts of Medea (q.v.).

AESOP (6th cent. B.C.), the fabulist, a semi-legendary person, said to have been originally a slave, who received his freedom from his master Iadmon, a Thracian. The fables attributed to him are probably a compilation of those of many authors. The story that Aesop was ugly and deformed appears to have originated with Maximus Planudes, a 14th-cent. monk, who wrote a life of the fabulist. Landor has two 'Imaginary Conversations' between Aesop and his fellow slave Rhodope.

Aesthetic Movement, a movement during the eighties of the last century in which the adoption of sentimental archaism as the ideal of beauty was carried to extravagant lengths and accompanied by affectation of speech and manner and eccentricity of dress. It was much ridiculed, e.g. in 'Punch' and in Gilbert and Sullivan's opera 'Patience'.

Æthelflæd (d. c. 918), the 'Lady of Mercia', daughter of King Alfred, and wife of Æthelred, ealdorman of Mercia. She was a great warrior, and aided her brother Eadward to subdue the Danish parts of England as far north as the Humber.

Æthelred, king of Wessex, 866-71.

Æthelred the Unready, king of England, 979-1016. 'Unready' is properly 'Rede-less', the man without counsel.

Æthelstan, king of England, 925-40. In his reign considerable progress was made towards the unification of the English people, and his policy tended to bring England into closer contact with the Continent. Many of the cultural changes which are commonly attributed to the Norman Conquest can be traced back to Æthelstan's reign.

Æthelwald, see Ælfthryth.

ÆTHELWOLD or ETHELWOLD, ST. (908?–984), born at Winchester, entered the monastery of Glastonbury, of which St. Dunstan was abbot, and became dean thereof. He subsequently re-established a monastic house at Abingdon, introducing the strict Benedictine rule from Fleury; and when Eadgar became king of England and Dunstan primate, was appointed bishop of Winchester. He co-operated with Dunstan and Oswald (qq.v.) in reforming religion, expelling the secular clergy from Winchester, Chertsey, Milton, and Ely, and substituting monks. He rebuilt the church of Peterborough, and built a new cathedral at Winchester. He exerted his influence also for the revival of learning. He was author of a treatise on the circle, and of a collection of the regulations and customs of Benedictine convents entitled 'Regularis Concordia'. He is commemorated on 1 August.

Aethiopica, a Greek romance by one Heliodorus of Emesa in Syria (? 3rd cent., improbably stated to have been a Christian bishop). Chariclea is the daughter of Persine, wife of the king of Ethiopia, and was born white owing to the effect of a marble statue on her mother while pregnant. The mother, in fear of the accusations to which this might give rise, entrusts the child to Charicles the Pythian priest, and Chariclea becomes priestess of Apollo at Delphi. Theagenes, a Thessalian, falls in love with her and carries her off. After many adventures they reach Ethiopia, and Chariclea is about to be immolated when she is discovered to be the daughter of the king of the country. Sidney drew on this romance in his 'Arcadia' (q.v.). An English version by Thomas Underdowne (1569?) is included in the Tudor translations.

Aetion, in Spenser's 'Colin Clouts come home againe', possibly represents Shakespeare.

Agamemnon, king of Argos, the son or grandson of Atreus (q.v.). He married Clytemnestra (q.v.) and was elected commander of the Greek host that went to Troy to recover Helen, the wife of his brother Menelaus, carried off by Paris (qq.v.). The Greek fleet was detained at Aulis, where Agamemnon sacrificed his daughter Iphigenia (q.v.) to appease Artemis, whose favourite stag he had killed. After the fall of Troy, Cassandra (q.v.) fell to his share and foretold that his wife would put him to death. On his return to Argos, he was murdered by Clytemnestra and her paramour Aegisthus (q.v.). See Aeschylus and Browning (R.).

Aganippe, a fountain on Mt. Helicon (q.v.), sacred to the Muses.

Agapē, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', iv. ii. 41, the Fay, mother of Priamond, Diamond, and Triamond, who, seeking to obtain for her children from the Fates

'Long life, thereby did more prolong their pain'.

The word in Greek means affection, charity.

Agapēmōnē, meaning 'abode of love', an institution founded in 1845 at Charlinch near Bridgwater, Somerset, by one Henry James Prince, where he and his followers lived on a communist basis, professing certain spiritual doctrines. (See Hepworth Dixon, 'Spiritual Wives' (1868), c. xxii et seq.)

Agdistes, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', II. xii. 48, the porter of the Bower of Bliss.

Agdistis, a Phrygian nature-goddess, sometimes identified with Cybele (q.v.), and connected with the legend of Attis (q.v.).

Age of Innocence, The, a novel by Edith Wharton, published in 1920.

Age of Reason, The, by Thomas Paine (q.v.), published as a whole in 1795. The first part appeared in 1793, but no copies are extant. This work, which sets forth Paine's 'thoughts on religion', was written in Paris at the height of the Terror.

Agincourt, a village in the north of France where, on St. Crispin's day, 25 Oct. 1415, Henry V of England defeated a superior force of French.

Aglaia, one of the Graces (q.v.).

Agnes, St., the patron saint of virgins, martyred in the persecution of Diocletian and commemorated on 21 January. It was a popular belief that by performing certain ceremonies on St. Agnes's Eve, one would dream of the person whom one was destined to marry. Tennyson wrote a poem, 'St. Agnes' Eve'.

For Keats's poem see Eve of St. Agnes.

Agnes Grey, a novel by Anne Brontë (q.v.), published in 1847. It is the story of a rector's daughter who takes service as a governess, and is ill-treated and lonely. She experiences kindness from no one but the curate, Mr. Weston, whom she finally marries. With her modest demeanour is contrasted the conduct of Rosalie Murray, her eldest charge, a heartless coquette.

Agnes Wickfield, a character in Dickens's 'David Copperfield' (q.v.).

Agni, in the religion of the Vedas (q.v.), the god of fire, an immortal who has taken up his abode among men, the lord and protector of the household.

Agramant, in the 'Orlando Innamorato' and the 'Orlando Furioso' (qq.v.), the emperor of Africa, supreme ruler of the infidels, a descendant of Alexander the Great, who leads his hosts against Charlemagne.

Agravain, SIR, in Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur', the son of King Lot and brother of Gawain, Gaheris, and Gareth; he conspires against Launcelot, and discloses to King Arthur Launcelot's love for Guinevere.

Agrican, in the 'Orlando Innamorato' (q.v.), the king of Tartary to whom the hand of Angelica (q.v.) has been promised. He besieges her in Albracca, and is slain by Orlando.

Agricola, GNAEUS JULIUS (A.D. 37-93), was Roman governor of Britain and subdued the whole country with the exception of the highlands of Scotland. Tacitus the historian, his son-in-law, wrote his life.

Agrippa, see Herod.

AGRIPPA, HENRICUS CORNELIUS, of Nettesheim (1486-1535), a scholar and writer on the occult sciences. He wrote 'De Occulta Philosophia libri tres' (1529) and 'De Vanitate Scientiarum' (1530), and argued against the persecution of witches. Jacke Wilton and the earl of Surrey meet him in the course of their travels (Nash, 'The Unfortunate Traveller', q.v.). He is said to be the astrologer, Her Trippa, of Rabelais's Third Book.

Aguecheek, SIR ANDREW, in Shakespeare's 'Twelfth Night' (q.v.), a ridiculous foppish knight.

Ahab, CAPTAIN, a character in Herman Melville's 'Moby Dick' (q.v.).

Ahania, in the mystical poems of Blake (q.v.), the wife of Urizen, symbolical perhaps of physical desire.

Ahasuerus, see Wandering Jew.

Ahmed, Prince, and the Fairy Peri-Banou, the subject of one of the 'Arabian Nights' (q.v.). The three sons of a king were in love with his niece, the princess Nur-al-Nihar. The king, embarrassed to choose between them, promised her to whichever son should bring him the greatest marvel. Hussein, the eldest, secured a flying carpet which would transport whoever sat on it wherever he wished; Ali, the second, a spying-tube which permitted one to see whatever one desired; and Ahmed, the youngest, a magical apple the scent of which cured all disorders. The brothers met at an appointed place. The spying-tube revealed Nur-al-Nihar dying of a disorder; the carpet transported them to her presence; and the apple cured her. The king, still embarrassed, proposed a shooting match, in which Ahmed's arrow travelled so far that it could not be found, and Nur-al-Nihar was assigned to one of the other brothers. But Ahmed, seeking his arrow, encountered the beautiful fairy Peri-Banou, fell in love with her and married her.

Aholah and Aholibah, in Ezek. xxiii, personifications of Samaria and Jerusalem as harlots, whom the prophet reproves for their adulterous intercourse with false religions. There is a poem entitled 'Aholibah' in Swinburne's 'Poems and Ballads, 1st Series' (1866).

Aholibamah, a character in Byron's 'Heaven and Earth' (q.v.). For the scriptural Aholibamah see Gen. xxxvi. 2.

Ahriman or ANGRA MAINYU, in the Zoroastrian system, the principle of evil, in perpetual conflict with Ormazd, the god of goodness and light.

Ahura Mazda, see Ormazd.

Aidonēus, a name of Pluto or Hades (q.v.).

Aids to Reflection, a philosophical treatise by S. T. Coleridge (q.v.) in the form of a series of aphorisms and comments, published in 1825.

The principal philosophical doctrine advanced in this is the distinction between Understanding and Reason. Understanding is the faculty by which we reflect and generalize from sense-impressions; while Reason either predetermines experience or avails itself of a past experience to supersede its necessity in all future time. The appropriate sphere of the Understanding is the natural not the spiritual world. By Reason, on the other hand, we have knowledge (and herein Coleridge parts company with Kant) of ultimate spiritual truths. Morality and Prudence in turn are distinguished by the fact that the former flows from the Reason and Conscience of man, the latter from the Understanding. The above doctrine is to be gathered in the main from the part of the work entitled 'Aphorisms on Spiritual Religion'.

AIKEN, CONRAD POTTER (1889-), American critic and poet, born in Georgia and for many years resident in England. His chief works are: 'Earth Triumphant' (1914), 'Nocturne of Remembered Spring' (1917), 'The Charnel Rose' (1918), 'Notes on Contemporary Poetry' (1919), 'Blue Voyage' (novel, 1927), 'Costumes by Eros' (short stories, 1928), 'Great Circle' (novel, 1933), 'Conversation' (novel, 1940). He also edited 'Modern American Poets' (1922), 'Selected Poems of Emily Dickinson' (1924).

Aimwell, a character in Farquhar's 'The Beaux' Stratagem' (q.v.).

AINGER, ALFRED (1837-1904), educated at King's College and at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, became canon of Bristol (1887-1903) and master of the Temple (1894 till his death). He was a popular lecturer and preacher, and author of a life of Charles Lamb (1882), a life of Crabbe (1903), and 'Lectures and Essays' (published posthumously, 1905); he also edited Lamb's Works (1883-8).

Aino, in the 'Kalevala' (q.v.), the sister of Youkahainen, whom Wainamoinen wins for a bride, and who to avoid him drowns herself.

AINSWORTH, WILLIAM HARRISON (1805-82), educated at Manchester Grammar School, published his first novel 'Rookwood', which was immediately successful, in 1834. He edited 'Bentley's Miscellany', 1840-2, and 'Ainsworth's Magazine', 1842-53, and then acquired the 'New Monthly Magazine'. He wrote thirty-nine novels, chiefly with some historical basis, of which the best known are 'Jack Sheppard' (1839), 'The Tower of London' (1840), 'Old St. Paul's' (1841), 'Guy Fawkes' (1841), 'The Miser's Daughter' (1842), 'Windsor Castle' (1843), 'The Lancashire Witches' (1848), and 'The South Sea Bubble' (1868).

Ajax, (1) son of Telamon, king of Salamis, was, after Achilles, the bravest of the Greek host that besieged Troy. After the death of Achilles, Ajax and Ulysses contended for the arms of the dead hero. When they were allotted to Ulysses, Ajax, maddened with rage, slaughtered a flock of sheep, thinking them the sons of Atreus who had given the preference to Ulysses, and stabbed himself. From his blood sprang a purple flower (perhaps the iris or the hyacinth). He was known as Telamonian Ajax to distinguish him from (2) Ajax son of Oileus, king of Locris, who led forty ships to the Trojan War, having been one of the suitors of Helen (q.v.). On his return homewards, his ship was wrecked, but Poseidon brought him to a rock, and he would have been saved if he had not boasted that his escape was due to his own efforts. Whereupon Poseidon split the rock with his trident and Ajax was drowned. According to Virgil's account, Ajax was struck by lightning after the shipwreck, having incurred the anger of Athene.

Akbar, the great Mogul emperor of Hindustan, who reigned 1556-1605.

AKENSIDE, MARK (1721-70), the son of a butcher of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and a physician who rose to eminence in his profession. He was the author of 'The Pleasures of Imagination' (q.v.), published in 1744 (rewritten and published in 1757 as 'The Pleasures of the Imagination'); also of a number of odes and minor poems, of which the best is the 'Hymn to the Naiads' (q.v.), written in 1746 and published in Dodsley's 'Collection of Poems' (1758).

Akhnaton, Amenhotep IV, king of Egypt, who came to the throne about 1375 B.C., and introduced a new religion, in which the sun-god Ra (designated as 'Aton') superseded Amon. He himself assumed the office of high-priest, and left Thebes, which was identified with the worship of Amon, for a new capital, Tell-el-Amarna. He was succeeded by his son-in-law, Tutankhamen (q.v.).

AKSAKOV, SERGEI TIMOFEYEVICH (1791-1859), Russian author, who drew his inspiration from Gogol (q.v.) and depicted family life in a rural community, showing a passionate sympathy with nature. His chief works are: 'Chronicles of a Russian Family' (1856), 'Recollections' (1856), 'Years of Childhood' (1858); they are autobiographical.

Al Asnam, Zayn, the subject of a tale in the 'Arabian Nights' (q.v.). Zayn was a prodigal king of Basra, who wasted his substance and ruined his city. When reduced to poverty he consulted a sheikh, and by his advice dug in the grounds of his palace near his father's tomb and there came upon a cavern in which were eight female statues made of precious stones; the pedestal for a ninth statue was vacant. He was told that this missing statue was twenty-fold more precious, and that in order to secure it he must first find a maiden of immaculate purity. For this purpose he was given a mirror which revealed any secret blemish. After long search he discovered the perfect damsel and fell in love with her. On proceeding to the cavern, he found that the damsel herself was the missing statue and occupied the ninth pedestal.

Al Sirat, in the Mohammedan creed, the bridge, 'stretched over the back of Hell, sharper than a sword and finer than a hair. The feet of the unbelievers slip upon it, by the decree of God, and fall with them into the fire. But the feet of believers stand firm upon it, by the grace of God, and so they pass to the Abiding Abode.' (A short creed by Al-Ghazzali, in Macdonald, 'Muslim Theology'.)

Alabama, The, the name of a war-steamer built at Birkenhead for the Confederates during the American Civil War, which wrought much havoc among the Federal mercantile shipping. The British government was charged with breach of neutrality in allowing the 'Alabama' to sail (1862) from a British port, and heavy damages were awarded by arbitration against it.

Aladdin and the Wonderful Lamp, an oriental tale generally regarded as belonging to the 'Arabian Nights' (q.v.), but not contained in any MS. of the collected tales.

ALADDIN

Aladdin, the scapegrace son of a poor tailor in China, is employed by a Moorish sorcerer to obtain for him, from a subterranean cavern, a lamp possessing magic powers, but disapproves the sorcerer by retaining the lamp for himself. Discovering its power, he acquires great wealth and marries Bedr-el-Budur, the Sultan's daughter, for whom by means of the lamp he constructs a wonderful palace. The sorcerer, disguised as an itinerant merchant, recovers the lamp by offering 'new lamps for old', and whisks palace and princess off to Africa. Aladdin, pursuing, kills the magician, regains the lamp, and conveys palace and bride back to China.

Alaham, a tragedy by Fulke Greville (q.v.), Lord Brooke, posthumously published in 1633.

Alaham, second son of the king of Ormus, deposes his father, and orders him as well as his elder brother Zophi to be blinded. They are taken to places of refuge by Caelica, the king's daughter. Alaham causes search to be made for them, threatens Caelica with the rack, and finally orders all three to the stake. A messenger relates their death and the popular discontent that follows. The tragedy might, as Charles Lamb remarked, with more propriety be termed a political treatise than a play.

Alastor, or The Spirit of Solitude, a poem by P. B. Shelley (q.v.), published in 1816. 'Alastor' is Greek for 'avenger'.

This was the poet's first important work. It is an allegory in which the idealist is depicted happy in the contemplation of high thoughts and visions of beauty. Presently he seeks in reality the counterpart of his dreams. He meets with frustration, is plunged into despair, and dies. The poem is a condemnation of self-centred idealism, and at the same time a lament for a world in which 'many worms and beasts and men live on', while 'some surpassing spirit' is borne away leaving 'pale despair and cold tranquillity' behind.

Alban, St. (d. ? 304), the first British martyr, who is said to have been put to death under the edicts of Diocletian. While still a pagan, he had sheltered in his house a Christian cleric by whom he was converted. The cleric was traced to Alban's house, and Alban, wrapped in the cleric's mantle, was arrested in his place. His identity having been discovered, he boldly declared himself a Christian and was ordered to immediate execution. The prodigies that attended his removal so impressed the executioner that he too declared himself a Christian, and another soldier had to be found to take his place. St. Alban was put to death on the hill overlooking the town of Verulam (q.v.). He is commemorated on 22 June.

Albany, ALBAINN, ALBIN, ALBANIA, ancient poetic names of Gaelic origin for the northern part of Britain.

ALBOVINE

Albany, DUKE OF, a character in Shakespeare's 'King Lear' (q.v.).

Albany, THE, Piccadilly, originally a single mansion, so called from the second title of the duke of York who owned it at the end of the 18th cent., subsequently divided into bachelor chambers. Lord Byron, Macaulay, George Canning, 'Monk' Lewis, and Bulwer Lytton (qq.v.) lived there.

Alberich, in Scandinavian mythology the king of the elves. In the 'Nibelungenlied' (q.v.) he guards the treasure of the Nibelungs, and is robbed of it by Siegfried. In Wagner's version of the story he is the Nibelung who steals the gold of the Rhine maidens and makes it into a ring.

ALBERICUS GENTILIS, see Gentilis.

Albert Memorial, THE, erected in Hyde Park in memory of the Prince Consort (d. 1861), was designed by Sir Gilbert Scott, whose idea, as quoted by Mr. Lytton Strachey ('Queen Victoria'), 'was to erect a kind of ciborium to protect the statue of the Prince . . . designed in some degree on the principles of the ancient shrines'. It includes a frieze containing 170 life-size figures, besides statues representing the virtues and sciences, and took some seven years to complete (1872). The statue of the prince, by J. H. Foley, was not finished till some years later.

ALBERTUS MAGNUS (1193-1280), a native of Swabia, a Dominican monk, and a great scholastic philosopher. He was an interpreter of Aristotle, whose doctrine he expounded at Cologne and Paris. Thomas Aquinas was among his pupils. His wide learning earned for him the name of Doctor Universalis.

Albigenses, a Christian sect living in Provence in the 12th cent., who took their name from the town of Albi, and were conspicuous in a dissolute age for their piety and virtue. They censured the corruptions of the papacy, and were accused of holding Manichaean (q.v.) doctrines. Pope Innocent III preached a crusade against them, which was conducted with extreme cruelty by Simon de Montfort (1208-13) and resulted in the fall of Count Raymond of Toulouse, the ruler of Provence, thus beginning the subjection of the southern provinces of France to the central government in Paris. There is an interesting passage on the Albigenses in Bridges, 'The Testament of Beauty', iii. 680 et seq.

Albinus, see Alcuin.

Albion, an ancient poetical name for Britain, perhaps derived from its white (Latin, albus) cliffs, visible from the coast of Gaul.

Albion's England, see Warner.

Albovine, a tragedy by D'Avenant (q.v.), printed in 1629, the author's first play.

Albovine (Alboin), king of the Lombards, having triumphantly entered Verona, marries his captive, Rhodolinda, whose royal father he has conquered and killed. In drunken exaltation at the marriage feast he requires Rhodolinda to drink a health from a cup formed of her father's skull. In revenge she determines on his death, and is assisted by her favourite, Hermegild, to whom she promises herself and the kingdom. For this purpose they make use of Paradine, the king's minion, making him believe that the king has dishonoured his bride Valdaura. Paradine kills Valdaura, and then the king. The truth being revealed to him, he kills Rhodolinda and Hermegild. The story, drawn from the history of the Lombards by Paulus Diaconus, is told in a novel by Bandello, translated by Belleforest ('Histoires tragiques'). The same subject is treated in 'The Witch' (q.v.) by Middleton, and in Swinburne's 'Rosamund, Queen of the Lombards'.

Albracca, in the 'Orlando Innamorato' (q.v.), the capital of Galafron, king of Cathay, in which Angelica is besieged by Agrican (qq.v.).

Albumazar, an Arabian astronomer (805-85), author of astronomical works. He is the subject of a play by Tomkis (q.v.), acted in 1615 before James I at Cambridge. In this, Albumazar is a rascally wizard, who transforms the rustic Trincalo into the person of his absent master with absurd consequences. The play was subsequently (1668) revived, and Dryden wrote a prologue for it, in which he wrongly charged Ben Jonson with adopting it as the model for his 'Alchemist' (q.v.). It was again revived by Garrick.

ALCAEUS (fl. c. 611-580 B.C.), a celebrated lyric poet of Mitylene in Lesbos, author of hymns to the gods, and songs of war and love, of which only a few fragments survive in Athenaeus. He was the inventor of the Alcaic (q.v.) metre.

Alcaic, the metre invented by Alcaeus (q.v.), a stanza of four lines, as follows:

- - - - - | - - - - - (twice)
- - - - -
- - - - -
- - - - -

Tennyson experimented in this metre:

O mighty-mouthed inventor of harmonies,
O skill'd to sing of Time or Eternity,
God-gifted organ-voice of England,
Milton, a name to resound for ages.

Alceste, see Misanthrops.

Alcestis, in Greek mythology, the wife of Admetus, king of Phrae. She gave her life to redeem her husband from death (see under Apollo), but was rescued by Hercules from the envoy of Hades—the subject of one of the plays of Euripides. See Balaustion's Adventure.

Alchemist, The, a comedy by Jonson (q.v.), first acted in 1610 and printed in 1612, by many considered the greatest of his plays. Love-wit, during an epidemic of the plague, leaves his house in London in charge of his servant, Face. The latter, with Subtle, the Alchemist, and Dol Common, his consort, use the house as a place for deluding and cheating gullible people, by holding out to them promise of the philosophers' stone. Among their victims are Sir Epicure Mammon, a greedy, voluptuous knight; Tribulation Wholesome, and Ananias, puritans; Dapper and Druggier, a clerk and a tobacco-nist; and Kastril, the quarrelsome lad who wants a good match for his sister Dame Pliant. Surly, the gamester, who sees through the fraud, attempts to expose it, by presenting himself disguised as a Spaniard; and the unexpected return of Love-wit puts Subtle and Dol to sudden flight. Face makes peace with his master by resourcefully marrying him to Dame Pliant.

Alcides, a name of Hercules (q.v.), who was the stepson of Amphitryon (q.v.), the son of Alcaeus (son of Perseus, q.v.).

Alcina, in the 'Orlando Innamorato' and the 'Orlando Furioso' (qq.v.), a witch who was mistress of an enchanted garden, and changed her lovers into beasts, stones, or trees. Astolfo and Rogero were among her prisoners.

Alcinous, the prosperous king of Phaeacia and father of Nausicaa (q.v.), who hospitably entertained Ulysses when cast upon his coast, on his return from Troy.

ALCIPHRON, a Greek writer of about A.D. 200, author of letters purporting to be by Athenians of various classes, depicting Athenian life in the 4th cent. B.C.

Alciphron, or The Minute Philosopher, a philosophical treatise in the form of dialogues by Berkeley (q.v.), composed in America, published in 1732.

There are seven dialogues, in which the interlocutors are Euphranor and Crito on the one side, and Alciphron and Lysicles, the 'minute philosophers', on the other. The 'minute philosophers' are the free-thinkers, who have rejected the ancient methods of philosophy and adopted new views of religion and morality. In the dialogues the free-thinkers are discussed as atheists, libertines, metaphysicians, &c. The setting is pleasant, and the polemic vigorous, with occasional touches of the Socratic method.

Alcmaeon, son of Amphiaraus and Erilphylê. His mother, induced by the present of the fatal necklace of Harmonia (q.v.), engaged her husband, Amphiaraus, to take part in the expedition against Thebes. Amphiaraus, knowing that he would perish in it, enjoined on Alcmaeon to slay his mother. This he did, and was punished by the gods with madness. Alcmaeon's wife, Callirrhoe, also desired to possess the necklace, and his attempt to procure it for her was the cause of his own death.

ALCMAN, a Greek lyric poet of the second half of the 7th cent. B.C., born at Sardis, who came to Sparta and there composed choral lyrics for the festivals. Of these his parthenia (choral songs for maidens) were especially celebrated. Only fragments of his work survive, one of them a part of a parthenion.

Alcmena, see Amphitryon.

ALCOFRIBAS NASIER, the pseudonym under which François Rabelais (q.v.) published his 'Gargantua' (q.v.); an anagram of the author's name.

Alicor, see Alioth.

Alcott, AMOS BRONSON, see Transcendental Club.

ALCOTT, LOUISA M. (1832-88), American author of books for girls, among which 'Little Women' (q.v., 1868) enjoyed a very wide popularity.

ALCUIN or ALBINUS (English name EALHWINE) (735-804), theologian, man of letters, and coadjutor of Charlemagne in educational reforms. He was born at York and educated in the cloister school of York under Archbishop Egbert. He met Charlemagne at Parma in 781, and settled on the Continent, becoming finally abbot of Tours. He wrote liturgical, grammatical, hagiological, and philosophical works and numerous letters and poems, including a Latin elegy on the destruction of Lindisfarne by the Danes.

Alcuin Club, THE, founded to encourage and assist in the practical study of ceremonial, and the arrangement of churches, their furniture, and ornaments, in accordance with the rubrics of the Book of Common Prayer, strict obedience to which is the guiding principle of the Club. The first publication of the Club ('English Altars', by W. H. St. John Hope), for the years 1897-8, was issued in 1899.

Alcyon, see Halcyon. Alcyon, in Spenser's 'Daphnida' and 'Colin Clout', is Sir Arthur Gorges, on whose wife's death the 'Daphnida' is an elegy. Gorges commanded the 'Warspite', Raleigh's flagship on the Islands Voyage, 1597, and was a poet and translator. He died in 1625.

Aldebaran, the Arabic name of a star of the first magnitude in the constellation of Taurus (α Tauri).

Aldersgate, originally EALDREDESGATE, one of the old gates of London. From the old gatehouse John Day (q.v.), the printer, issued his editions of Ascham's 'The Scholemaster', Foxe's 'Book of Martyrs', and some of Tynedale's works.

Aldgate, the principal east gate of the ancient city of London. Its earlier name was ALGATE or ALGATE, the derivation of which is doubtful. The gatehouse was at one time occupied by Chaucer.

ALDHELM, ST. (640?-709), the first titular of the bishopric of Sherborne, was educated under Theodore (q.v.) at Canterbury and was foremost in the intellectual movement led by him. He was author of a number of Latin works (including treatises in prose and verse on the merits of virginity, with illustrious examples of chaste living), which reveal a wide knowledge of classical and Christian authors. His ornate and difficult vocabulary shows the influence of Irish models. He was abbot of Malmesbury and built churches at Malmesbury, Bruton, and Wareham, and monasteries at Frome and Bradford. He is commemorated on 25 May. The best edition of his 'Opera' is that by Rudolphus Ewald for the 'Monumenta Germaniae Historica' (1913-19).

Aldiborontiphoscophornio, see Chronohotantologos.

Aldine Press, see Aldus Manutius.

Aldingar, SIR, the subject of a ballad included in Percy's 'Reliques', the treacherous steward of King Henry, who brings a false accusation against Queen Eleanor.

ALDRICH, THOMAS BAILEY (1836-1907), a New England author, born at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, who edited the 'Atlantic Monthly' from 1881 to 1890. His best-known work is 'The Story of a Bad Boy' (1870). Other prose works are 'Marjorie Daw' (1873), 'Prudence Palfrey' (1874), 'The Sullwater Tragedy' (1880). He also wrote verse, especially vers de société.

Aldus Manutius (ALDO MANUZIO, 1449-1515), the celebrated Venetian printer, who founded the Aldine Press, whence he issued the first printed editions of the works of a large number of Greek authors, influenced Greek typography, and powerfully assisted the advance of classical learning. He popularized the octavo in place of the cumbrous folio and introduced italics as a printing type.

Alectryon, a youth set by Ares to watch against the approach of the sun, during his amour with Aphrodite. But Alectryon fell asleep, and Ares and Aphrodite were discovered. Ares, in his wrath, changed Alectryon into a cock, who still heralds the dawn (Lucian, 'Alectryon').

Alessandria, the city founded by the Lombard League in the 12th cent. to defy Frederick Barbarossa, who had destroyed Milan.

Alexander, a name borne by Paris (q.v.), son of Priam, king of Troy.

ALEXANDER, SIR WILLIAM, Earl of Stirling (1567?-1640), a courtier, and a friend of Drummond of Hawthornden (q.v.). He was secretary of state for Scotland from 1626 till his death. His chief poetical works are a collection of sonnets called 'Aurora' (1604), a long poem on 'Doomsday' (1614) in eight-lined stanzas, a 'Paraenesis' to Prince Henry, and four tragedies on Darius, Croesus, Alexander, and Caesar, similar, but inferior, to those of Fulke Greville (q.v.), Lord Brooke.

Alexander VI, see Borgia (Rodrigo).

ALEXANDER OF HALES

ALEXANDER OF HALES (d. 1245), a native of Gloucestershire, held various ecclesiastical appointments and was finally archdeacon. He retired to Paris, where he studied metaphysics and theology and lectured to the Franciscan order. By direction of Innocent III he prepared a 'Summa Theologiae', a vast work which he left unfinished and which was completed by his pupils. It earned for its author the title of the Irrefragable Doctor.

Alexander the Great (356–323 B.C.), son of Philip II of Macedon and Olympias, born at Pella, and educated by Aristotle, became king of Macedon in 336 B.C. He caused the Greek states to nominate him to conduct the war against Persia and in 334 crossed the Hellespont. He captured the family of Darius and extended his conquests to Egypt, where he founded Alexandria; and, after completely defeating the Persians at the battle of Arbela in 331, to India. He married Roxana, the captive daughter of Oxyartes, a Bactrian prince, and a second wife, Barsine, daughter of Darius and Statira. He is said to have destroyed Persepolis, the capital of the Persian empire, at the instance of the courtesan Thais (331). He died of fever at Babylon in 323 when only 32 years old. His horse was named Bucephalus. See also Clitus, Dio-genes, Parmenio, Perciccas.

Alexander was made the centre of a cluster of medieval legends, comparable to those of the Carolingian and Arthurian cycles. The chief of the romances concerning him are the great French 'Roman d'Alexandre' of the 12th cent., some 20,000 alexandrines, and the English 'King Alisaunder' of the 13th cent., 8,000 octosyllabic verses. The story of the rivalry of his two wives forms the subject of Nathaniel Lee's tragedy, 'The Rival Queens' (q.v.).

Alexander and Lodowick, 'the Two Faithful Friends, who were so like one another that none could know them asunder; wherein is declared how Lodowick married the Princess of Hungaria in Alexander's name and each night laid a naked sword between him and the princess, because he would not wrong his friend', an old ballad in Evans's collection. There was also a play written by Martin Slaughter, called 'Alexander and Lodowick' (Dyce). The story is referred to in Webster, 'The Duchess of Malfi', i. ii.

Alexander's Feast, see Dryden.

Alexandria, the capital of Egypt under the Ptolemies, was founded by order of Alexander the Great in 331 B.C.

Alexandrian Library, THE, was formed at Alexandria during the reign of the Ptolemies (beginning with Ptolemy Soter, 323–283 B.C.). It is said to have contained at one time about 400,000 manuscripts, of which a part were accidentally burnt when Julius Caesar was besieged in Alexandria. The story that the library was destroyed by order of the Caliph Omar is without foundation.

Alexandrine, an iambic line of six feet, which is the French heroic verse, and in English is used, e.g., as the last line of the Spenserian stanza, or as a variant in a poem of heroic couplets. The name is derived from the fact that certain 12th- and 13th-cent. French poems on Alexander the Great were written in this metre.

Alfheim, in Scandinavian mythology, the home of the Elves (Alfar), and of the god Frey or Freyr (q.v.).

ALFIERI, VITTORIO (1749–1803), Italian dramatist, of a Piedmontese family and French in education, so that he subsequently had to master the Italian language. He was the devoted lover of the countess of Albany, wife of the Young Pretender. Between 1777 and 1789 he wrote nineteen tragedies, most of them on classical subjects from the Greek (Agamemnon, Antigone, Orestes, Oedipus Rex, &c.), others on more romantic themes (Saul, Myrrha, Mary Stuart), marked by severe conciseness and austerity of form. Alfieri also wrote comedies, mostly of a satirical turn, a satire on the extremists of the French Revolution ('Il Misogallo'), and a remarkable autobiography.

ALFRED (ÆLFRED) (849–901), king of the West Saxons (871–901), is important in the history of literature for the revival of letters that he effected in the west of England. He first translated into English the 'Cura Pastoralis' of Pope Gregory, with a view to the spiritual education of the clergy. A copy was sent to each bishop. The preface to this translation refers to the decay of learning in Wessex and indicates Alfred's intention of restoring it. He then translated the 'Historia adversus Paganos' of Orosius (q.v.), inserting the latest geographical information at his disposal, notably accounts of the celebrated voyages of Ohthere to the White Sea and of Wulfstan in the Baltic, which he received direct from the explorers. He had a translation made of Bede's 'Historia Ecclesiastica' (q.v.), with some omissions, but giving a West-Saxon version of the hymn of Cædmon (q.v.). He also translated the 'De Consolatione Philosophiae' of Boethius (q.v.), with some original additions. The West-Saxon version of Augustine's 'Soliloquia' is also probably the work of Alfred. He composed a code of laws, drawing on the Mosaic and earlier English codes. The 'Anglo-Saxon Chronicle' (q.v.) may represent in part his work or inspiration.

Alhambra, THE, from the Arabic al-hamra, 'the red house', the palace of the Moorish kings at Granada, built in the 13th cent. 'The Alhambra' is the name of a work by Washington Irving (q.v.).

Ali, the first cousin and son-in-law of Mohammed (q.v.). He was the fourth Caliph; but the Shia (q.v.) sect consider him the first, regarding his three predecessors as interlopers. His descendants, the ALIDS, include Ali's sons Hasan and Hoseyn, the Fatimid dynasty of Egypt, the sherifs of Morocco, and other rulers of parts of the Moslem world. Ali was assassinated A.D. 660.

Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves, an oriental tale generally regarded as one of the 'Arabian Nights' (q.v.), but not included in any MS. of these. The source from which Galland drew it is unknown.

Ali Baba and Kassim were two brothers in a town of Persia. Ali Baba one day, while collecting wood in the forest, observed forty robbers getting access to a cave by pronouncing the words, 'Open, Sesame!', whereupon a door in the rock opened. Using the same password he presently entered the cave, found it full of the robbers' treasure, and brought home some sacks full of gold. He was soon compelled to reveal his discovery to Kassim, who in turn went to the cave, but forgot the password after entering it, and was unable to get out. He was discovered in the cave by the robbers, cut in quarters, and hung up in the cave. Ali Baba, coming to seek him, conveyed the body home, and in order to simulate a natural death, sent for an old cobbler to sew the quarters of the body together. Through this cobbler the thieves, determined to destroy the person who still knew their secret, eventually traced the house of Ali Baba, though at first their purpose was defeated by the ingenuity of Morgiana, Ali Baba's servant, who placed chalk-marks on the neighbouring doors similar to that by which the thieves had sought to recognize her master's. At last the captain of the thieves brought his men concealed in leather oil-jars to the house of Ali Baba, intending to kill him in the night, but was again defeated by Morgiana, who destroyed them with boiling oil, and finally killed the captain himself.

Alice Brand, a ballad in the 4th canto of Scott's 'Lady of the Lake' (q.v.), telling how Urgan, 'a christened man', who has been carried off by the Elfin king and changed into a dwarf, is re-transformed into 'the fairest knight' by Alice Brand and is found to be her lost brother.

ALL FOOLS

Alice's Adventures in Wonderland, a story for children by Lewis Carroll (see Dodgson), published in 1865.

Alice is a little girl who dreams that she pursues a White Rabbit down a rabbit-hole, and there meets with strange adventures and odd characters, the Duchess and the Cheshire Cat, the Mad Hatter and the March Hare, the King and Queen of Hearts, and the Mock Turtle. See also Through the Looking-Glass.

Alifanfaron, in medieval romance, the pagan emperor of Taprobane (q.v.), in love with the daughter of Pentapolin, the Christian king of the Garamantes. Don Quixote (q.v.) takes two flocks of sheep for their opposing armies, and attacks what he supposes to be the forces of Alifanfaron.

Alloth and Alcor, two stars in the constellation of the Great Bear.

Alisaunder, King, the legendary story of Alexander the Great, a verse romance of the early 14th cent., some 8,000 lines in octosyllabic couplets. According to the legend, Nectanabus, king of Egypt, had tricked Olympias, wife of Philip of Macedon, by magic and begotten Alexander. The poem deals with the birth and youth of Alexander, his succession to Philip's throne, the conquest of Carthage and other cities, and his wars with Darius. The latter part of the poem relates Alexander's perils and conquests in the Far East (describing the geography and wonders of those regions), his seduction by Candace, and his death by poison.

ALISON, SIR ARCHIBALD (1792-1867), educated at Edinburgh University, and called to the Scottish bar, was a frequent contributor to 'Blackwood's Magazine', and the author of a 'History of Europe during the French Revolution' (1833-42), and its sequel, 'Europe from the Fall of the First to the Accession of the Third Napoleon' (1852-9). He also wrote a 'History of Scottish Criminal Law' (1832-3) and an 'Autobiography' (edited by his daughter in 1883).

Allison Wilson, in Scott's 'Old Mortality' (q.v.), the housekeeper of Silas Morton of Milnwood.

Alken, HENRY (fl. 1816-31), a famous draughtsman of sporting prints, some of which appeared in the 'Life of a Sportsman' and 'Memoirs of the Life of John Mytton' by C. J. Apperley ('Nimrod'), in Surtees's 'Analysis of the Hunting Field', and in Alken's 'National Sports of Great Britain'.

All Fools, a comedy by George Chapman (q.v.), first published in 1605, but probably produced in 1599. The plot is adapted from the Heautontimorumenos, and some of the characters from the Adelphi, of Terence. It deals with the fooling of Gostanzo, a dictatorial and conceited father, who is made instrumental in promoting the love-affairs of his son and daughter.

ALL FOOLS' DAY

All Fools' Day, see April Fool's Day.

All for Love, or The World well lost, an historical tragedy by Dryden (q.v.), published in 1678.

In this, his finest play, Dryden abandoned the use of the rhymed couplet, and adopted blank verse. The plot deals with the story of Antony and Cleopatra, but, as compared with Shakespeare's treatment of it, Dryden gains simplicity and concentration by confining his play to the last phase of Antony's career, when he is besieged in Alexandria, and to the struggle between Ventidius his general, Dolabella his friend, and Octavia his wife, on the one hand, and Cleopatra on the other, for the soul of Antony. The former are on the point of success, and a composition is to be made with Caesar (Octavianus, afterwards Augustus) involving the separation of Antony from Cleopatra, when Antony falls into jealous suspicion that Dolabella will supplant him in Cleopatra's affections. Meanwhile the forces of Caesar are pressing him hard. The defection of the Egyptian fleet seems the final blow. On a false report that Cleopatra has taken her life, Antony falls on his sword. Cleopatra finds him dying, and applies the asp to her arm.

All for Love, or A Sinner well saved, a poem by Southey (q.v.) published in 1829. The story is taken from a life of St. Basil, and tells how a freedman, Eleemon, makes a compact with Satan to forgo his hope of heaven if he may have his master's daughter, the high-born Cyra, for his wife. They live happily married for twelve years, after which the compact is revealed by the ghost of Cyra's father. Eleemon in agony of spirit flies to St. Basil, who imposes a penance on him. When Satan claims the fulfilment of his compact, Basil meets him in argument and proves the bond invalid.

All-Hallows' Day, All Saints' Day, the 1st November. ALL-HALLOW EVE, or Hallowe'en, the 31st October, was in the old Celtic calendar the last night of the old year, the night of all the witches, the new year beginning on the 1st November. Many superstitious and ancient customs, such as bobbing for apples, attached to it. See Burns's 'Hallowe'en' for Scottish customs. Mary Avenel, in Scott's 'The Monastery' (q.v.), being born on All-Hallow Eve, is supposed to be gifted with second sight.

All Saints' Day, the 1st November, the festival on which there is a general celebration of the saints, instituted early in the 7th cent., when Pope Boniface IV transformed the heathen Pantheon at Rome into a church dedicated to the Christian martyrs.

All Souls College, Oxford, was founded in 1437 by Archbishop Chicheley (1362?-1443), the friend of Henry V, to pray for the souls of those who fell in the wars of that king and of his son, Henry VI, against France. It is a unique foundation, consisting of a 'Warden and 54 Fellows, and no undergraduates. The college is largely devoted to the study of law.

All Souls' Day, the 2nd November, the festival on which prayers are offered for the souls of all the faithful deceased. It is said to have been instituted at Cluny at the end of the 10th cent.

All the Talents Administration, formed after the death of Pitt, in 1806, by William, Lord Grenville, Pitt's cousin. It was said to contain 'all the talents, wisdom, and ability of the country', and the term was used derisively by its opponents.

All the Year Round, see Dickens.

All's Lost by Lust, a tragedy by W. Rowley (q.v.), printed in 1633. It has not since been reprinted.

This was Rowley's principal play. According to the argument prefixed to it, Roderigo, king of Spain, deeply enamoured of Jacynta, daughter of Juliano his principal general, and urged on by Lothario, a gentleman of better fortunes than condition, sends Juliano to fight against Mulymamen, king of Barbary, and in his absence ravishes Jacynta. She escapes to her father, and he to avenge her induces Mulymamen to join him in ousting Roderigo from his kingdom. This they do, and Mulymamen now demands the hand of Jacynta, but she scorns him. The infuriated barbarian and Juliano fight with one another. Mulymamen snatches Jacynta before him as Juliano rushes to the attack, so that the father slays his own daughter and is presently himself slain by the Moor. Cf. Landor's 'Count Julian' and Southey's 'Roderick' (qq.v.).

All's Well that Ends Well, a comedy by Shakespeare (q.v.), composed at an uncertain date, placed by some as early as about 1595, by others as late as about 1604 (E. K. Chambers, 1602-3), first printed in the folio of 1623.

The plot is drawn from Painter's 'Palace of Pleasure' (No. xxxviii). Bertram, the young count of Rousillon, on the death of his father is summoned to the court of the king of France, leaving his mother and with her Helena, daughter of the famous physician Gerard de Narbon. The king is sick of a disease said to be incurable. Helena, who loves Bertram, goes to Paris and effects his cure by means of a prescription left by her father. As a reward she is allowed to choose her husband, and names Bertram, who unwillingly obeys the king's order to wed her. But under the influence of the worthless braggart Parolles, he at once takes service with the duke of Florence, writing to Helena that until she can get the ring from his finger 'which never shall come off', and is with child by him, she may not call him husband. Helena, passing through Florence on a pilgrimage, finds Bertram courting Diana, the daughter of her hostess there. Disclosing herself as his wife to these, she obtains permission to replace Diana at a midnight interview with Bertram, having that day caused him to be informed that Helena is dead. Thereby she obtains from Bertram his ring, and gives him one that the king had given her. Bertram returns to his mother's house, where the king is on a visit. The latter sees on Bertram's finger the ring that he had given Helena, suspects Bertram of having deceived her, and demands an explanation on pain of death. Helena herself now appears, explains what has passed, and claims that the conditions named in Bertram's letter have been fulfilled. Bertram, filled with remorse, accepts her as his wife.

Allecto, one of the Furies (q.v.).

Allegory, a figurative narrative or description, conveying a veiled moral meaning; an extended metaphor.

Allegra, daughter of Byron and Claire Clairmont, Mary Shelley's step-sister.

Allegro, L', a poem by Milton (q.v.), written in 1632. The Italian title means 'the cheerful man', and this idyll is an invocation to the goddess Mirth to allow the poet to live with her, first amid the delights of rustic scenes, then amid those of 'towered cities' and the 'busy hum of men'. Cf. Penseroso (II).

Allen, BENJAMIN and ARABELLA, characters in Dickens's 'Pickwick Papers' (q.v.).

Allen, ETHAN (1738-89), a famous soldier in the American Revolution, who was born in Connecticut, but who removed to New Hampshire in 1769. His name is inseparably associated with the 'Green Mountain Boys' (q.v.), whose leader he was. At the outbreak of the Revolution he captured Ticonderoga with a small force, demanding the surrender of the British garrison, it is said, 'in the name of the great Jehovah and the Continental Congress', words which have become historic (though perhaps never spoken).

ALLEN, JAMES LANE (1849-1925), an American novelist, born in Kentucky, who turned to literature after an early career as a teacher. Among his chief works are 'A Kentucky Cardinal' (1895), 'The Choir Invisible' (1897), and 'The Mettle of the Pasture' (1903).

Allen, RALPH (1694-1764), of Prior Park, Bath, the correspondent of Pope, and benefactor of Fielding. He was deputy post-master at Bath, and devised and managed a system of cross-posts for England and Wales by which he amassed a large fortune. He gave large sums in charity and was one of the models from whom Fielding drew Squire Allworthy in 'Tom Jones' (q.v.).

Let humble Allen, with an awkward shame,
Do good by stealth, and blush to find it fame.

(Pope, Epilogue to 'Satires', Dial. i. 135-6.)

Allen-a-Dale, one of the companions of Robin Hood (q.v.). He is the subject of a song in the 4th canto of Scott's 'Rokeby' (q.v.).

Alley, EDWARD (1566-1626), an actor (Richard Burbage's chief rival) and partner of Philip Henslowe, with whom he built the Fortune Theatre, Cripplegate. There he acted at the head of the Lord Admiral's company, playing among other parts the hero in Marlowe's 'Tamburlaine', 'Jew of Malta', and 'Faustus'. He acquired great wealth, bought the Manor of Dulwich, and built and endowed Dulwich College. His first wife was Henslowe's stepdaughter, his second the daughter of Dr. Donne. He was a patron of Dekker, John Taylor, and other writers.

Alliteration, the commencement of two or more words in close connexion with the same letter or the same sound. Alliteration was the basis of versification in OE. and other Germanic poetry, and among moderns is conspicuous in that of Swinburne.

Allworth, TOM and LADY, characters in Massinger's 'A New Way to pay Old Debts' (q.v.).

Allworthy, SQUIRE and BRIDGET, characters in Fielding's 'Tom Jones' (q.v.). The character of Squire Allworthy was drawn from Fielding's benefactors Ralph Allen and Lord Lyttelton (qq.v.).

Alma, a river in the Crimea, scene of the first battle in the Crimean War, 1854, in which the allies under Lord Raglan and Marshal St. Arnaud defeated the Russians under Prince Menschikoff.

Alma (in Italian meaning 'soul', 'spirit'), in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', II. ix and xi, represents the virgin soul. She is the Lady of the House of Temperance, where she is visited by Prince Arthur and Sir Guyon, and defended against her enemies by the former.

Alma, the title of a poem by Matthew Prior (q.v.).

Alma Mater, 'bounteous mother', a title given by the Romans to several goddesses, especially to Ceres and Cybele, and applied in England to universities and schools in respect of their relation to their pupils.

Almack's Assembly Rooms stood in King Street, St. James's, and were celebrated in the 18th and early 19th cents. as the scene of social functions. They were founded by one William Almack (d. 1781), who appears to have come to London as valet to the duke of Hamilton. Almack's was replaced as a social centre after 1863 by Willis's Rooms, and these were afterwards applied to other purposes. Almack was also founder of a gaming club, since converted into Brooks's (q.v.).

Almagest (from Arabic article al and Greek μεγιστη, greatest), the name applied to the great astronomical treatise of Ptolemy (see Ptolemy, Claudius), and extended in the Middle Ages to other great text-books of astrology and alchemy.

Alloysius, St., see Eloi.

Alph, in Coleridge's 'Kubla Khan' (q.v.), the sacred river in Xanadu. For its connexion with the river Alpheus and with the Nile, see J. L. Lowes, 'The Road to Xanadu' (1927).

Alpha and Oméga, the first and last letters of the Greek alphabet, 'the beginning and the end', originally said of the Divine Being (Rev. i. 8).

Alphéus, one of the largest rivers in Greece, rising in Arcadia and flowing through Elis. Milton refers to it in 'Lycidas': 'Return, Alpheus; the dread voice is past that shrunk thy streams.' See also Arethusa.

Alphonse Tables, astronomical tables by Arab and Spanish astronomers, collected under the direction of Alphonso X of Castile, in 1253. Also called TOLETAN TABLES, from the fact that they were adapted to the city of Toledo. They are referred to under the latter name by Chaucer, 'Franklin's Tale', 545.

Alsatia, a cant name given to the precinct of Whitefriars in London, which, until its privileges were abolished in 1697, was a sanctuary for debtors and lawbreakers. These privileges, which were confirmed by James I in a charter of 1608, had their origin in the exemption from the ordinary jurisdiction enjoyed by the establishment of Carmelite friars that originally occupied the precinct. See Shadwell, 'The Squire of Alsatia', and Scott, 'The Fortunes of Nigel', where the turbulent society of Alsatia is described. The name is taken from Alsace, the 'debatable land' between France and Germany.

Altamont, a character in Rowe's 'The Fair Penitent' (q.v.).

Altamont, FREDERICK, in Thackeray's 'Memoirs of Mr. C. J. Yellowplush' (q.v.), a handsome young gentleman who keeps a tilbury and disappears during the day on some business in the City, which turns out to be sweeping a crossing.

Altamont, COLONEL JACK, alias AMORY, alias ARMSTRONG, a character in Thackeray's 'Pendennis' (q.v.).

Althaea, in Greek mythology, see Meleager.

Althea, see Lovelace (Richard).

Altisidora, in 'Don Quixote' (q.v.), the duchess's wanton damsel, who made love to the don, and then accused him of stealing her garters. She finally admitted that she was like the man who searched for the mule on which he was riding.

Alton Locke, Tailor and Poet, a novel by C. Kingsley (q.v.), published in 1850.

The hero, the son of a small London tradesman, educated by a puritanical widowed mother, is brought into contact with the misery of the working classes by being apprenticed to a sweating tailor, and becomes imbued with Chartist ideas. His poetical gift leads to his being befriended first by a humorous old Scotch bookseller, Saunders Mackaye, and then by a benevolent dean, his beautiful daughter Lillian (with whom he falls hopelessly in love), and her cousin Eleanor Staunton. Under their influence he momentarily consents to the emasculation of his revolutionary poems before publication, a weakness that he bitterly regrets. Roused by the taunts of his Chartist comrades, he undertakes a mission that involves him in a riot, and is sentenced to three years' imprisonment. On emerging from this he learns that Lillian is engaged to his prosperous time-serving cousin, falls ill of typhus, is nursed by Eleanor and brought by her to a saner understanding of the grievances of the poor and of the teaching of Christianity. He emigrates to America and dies on the voyage.

Altruria, a Utopian land created by William Dean Howells (q.v.) in 'A Traveller from Altruria', published in 1894.

Amadis of Gaul (Amadis de Gaula), a Spanish or Portuguese romance, written in the form in which we have it by Garcia de Montalvo in the second half of the 15th and printed early in the 16th cents., but taken from 'ancient originals', now lost, perhaps by Joham de Lobeira (1261-1325), or by Vasco de Lobeira (d. 1403), the materials of the story being of French source. Many continuations were written relating to the son and nephew of Amadis, Esplandian and Florisando.

Perion, king of Gaul (Wales?), falls in love with Elisena, daughter of Garinter, king of Lesser Britain; their child Amadis is placed in an ark on the river, and until his identity is revealed, is known as the 'Child of the Sea'. He becomes the flower of chivalry and achieves wonderful feats of arms. He loves Oriana, daughter of Lisuarte, king of Great Britain, who is sought in marriage by the emperor of Rome and granted to him by her father, but rescued by Amadis. Whence arises a great conflict. The emperor arrives with his fleet, but is defeated and killed. Amadis then comes to the succour of Lisuarte, reconciliation follows, and all ends happily.

AMADIS OF GAUL

The romance was translated into French by Herberay des Essarts in 1540, and an abridged version of it was published (1803) by R. Southey (q.v.). 'Amadis of Gaul' and 'Palmerin of England' were the two works specially excepted from the holocaust of romances of chivalry carried out by the curate and the barber in 'Don Quixote' (q.v.).

Amadis of Greece, a Spanish continuation of the seventh book of 'Amadis of Gaul' (q.v.), of which Lisuarte of Greece, the grandson of Amadis, is the hero. The work is probably by Feliciano de Silva (16th cent.).

Amalmon, a devil of medieval demonology.

Amalthœa, the nymph who nursed the infant Zeus (q.v.) in Crete. According to the legend, she fed him with the milk of a goat. It was a horn of this goat that Zeus endowed with the power of producing whatever the possessor wished, and gave to Amalthea and her sisters. This horn of Amalthea was the 'horn of plenty' or cornucopia, the symbol of abundance. It is also called the 'Ammonian Horn', from the identification of Zeus with Ammon. In another version Amalthea was the name of the goat.

Amara, Mt., a place in Abyssinia, where the kings of that country secluded their sons, to protect themselves from sedition (Milton, 'Paradise Lost', iv. 28). It figures as 'Amhara' in Johnson's 'Rasselas' (q.v.).

Amarant, a giant slain by Sir Guy of Warwick on his way to the Holy Land, the subject of a ballad in Percy's 'Reliques', which is part of a longer poem by Samuel Rowlands (1649).

Amaryllis, the name given to a shepherdess by Theocritus, Virgil, and Ovid. Spenser, in his 'Colin Clouts come home againe', uses the name to signify Alice, one of the daughters of Sir John Spencer of Althorpe. She became the countess of Derby for whom Milton wrote his 'Arcades' (q.v.).

Amâsis, see Polycrates.

Amaurote, the capital of Sir Thomas More's 'Utopia' (q.v.). Rabelais (II. xxiii) uses the name 'Amaurotes' for an imaginary people invaded by the Dipsodes.

Amasing Marriage, The, a novel by G. Meredith (q.v.), published in 1895.

Carinthia Jane and her brother Chillon are children of old Captain John Peter Kirby, the 'Old Buccaneer', who carried off the countess of Cresset under her husband's nose, and married her when the earl conveniently died a fortnight later. On the old buccaneer's death they are left not far from destitute, and at the mercy of a miserly old uncle, Lord Levellier. Carinthia is a fine elemental creature, a 'beautiful Gorgon', brought up in the wilds of the Austrian mountains. Lord Fleetwood, spoilt by his immense wealth and parasitical companions, tyrannical and impulsive, proposes to her in the course of a quadrille the first day he sees her, and is accepted by the artless girl. He soon repents of his mad freak, and trusts that the girl has done the same. But he is held to his engagement by Lord Levellier, anxious to be rid of the charge of his niece. Fleetwood, priding himself on being a man of his word, consents to marry her, meets her at the church door, drives her straight to a prize-fight, which he forces her to witness, leaves her indefinitely at an inn, and goes on with his ordinary avocations, refusing to see her and treating her with every circumstance of insult, in order to punish her for forcing his hand. The birth of her child only increases his resentment. Circumstances have brought her for refuge to the home in Whitechapel of the Woodseers, the father a minister among the poor, the son Gower Woodseer (drawn perhaps from R. L. Stevenson), a penniless philosopher, with flashes of wit and a 'broad playfulness'. While walking in the Alps he has met Carinthia and Fleetwood, has become the devoted admirer of the first and friend of the second, and now strives to bring about a change of heart in Fleetwood. This comes at last, with the discovery of what a treasure he has lost. For Carinthia's heart has changed likewise, and when Fleetwood belatedly does penance and comes to woo his wife, he finds that she is no longer to be won. She accompanies her brother, as an army nurse, to an insurrectionary war in Spain, leaving Fleetwood to turn Roman Catholic monk and die of his austerities.

Amazon, RIVER, see Orellana.

Amazons, a race of female warriors alleged by Herodotus to exist in Scythia. They figure also in mythology in the legends of Troy (see Thersites), Hercules, Theseus (qq.v.), &c.

The word is explained by the Greeks from ἀ privative and μαστός a breast (in connexion with the fable that they destroyed the right breast so as not to interfere with the use of the bow), but this is probably the popular etymology of an unknown foreign word. [OED.]

Ambassadors, The, a novel by H. James (q.v.), published in 1903.

This is one of the novels in which, with much humour and delicacy of perception, the author depicts the reaction of different American types to the European environment. Chadwick Newsome, a young man of independent fortune, the son of Mrs. Newsome of Woollett, Mass., a widow of overpowering virtue and perfection, has been living in Paris and is reported to have got entangled with a wicked woman. Mrs. Newsome has decided to send out an ambassador to rescue Chad and bring him home. This ambassador is the elderly, amiable, guileless Strether, dependent on Mrs. Newsome, for whom he entertains prodigious respect and to whom he has allowed himself to become engaged. The story describes Strether's evolution in the congenial atmosphere of Paris, his desertion to the side of Chad and the bewitching comtesse de Vionnet (he is convinced that the relation between them is virtuous), and his own mild flirtation with the pleasant cosmopolitan Maria Gostrey. Meanwhile his attitude and the disquieting report of Waymarsh, Strether's stolid and conscientious American friend, have caused dismay at Woollett, and Mrs. Newsome sends out a fresh ambassador in the person of her daughter, the coldly glittering Sarah Pocock. The attempts to bamboozle Sarah utterly fail, and she presents her ultimatum—immediate return to America—to the delinquents Chad and Strether. Chad, exhorted by Strether, refuses to abandon the lady; and poor Mr. Strether is accordingly notified that all is over between him and Mrs. Newsome. Then, and then only, an accident throws Strether unexpectedly into the company of Chad and Mme de Vionnet in circumstances which leave no doubt as to the nature of their real relations. Sadly disillusioned, but still insisting on the necessity of Chad's loyalty to Mme de Vionnet, Strether from a sense of duty turns his back on Paris.

Amber Witch, Mary Schweidler, The, a novel by Meinhold (q.v.), published in 1843 and translated from the German by Lady Duff Gordon.

It is a story, remarkable for its simplicity and realism, told by a pastor of the island of Usedom, in the time of the Thirty Years War, of the fearful sufferings of the people, and of their belief in witchcraft. Mary Schweidler, the amiable daughter of the pastor, has the misfortune to attract the attention of the unscrupulous sheriff of the district, who, unable to obtain possession of her otherwise, causes her to be suspected of witchcraft, arrested, and subjected to a cruel trial, without being able to bend her to his will. At last, on the way to the stake, the girl is rescued by a sensible young nobleman who disbelieves in witchcraft, the sheriff meets a fearful death, and all ends well.

Ambree, MARY, a legendary English heroine, supposed to have taken part in the siege of Ghent in 1584, when that town was held by the Spaniards. A ballad about her is included in Percy's 'Reliques', and she is referred to by Ben Jonson ('Epicæne', iv. ii, 'Tale of a Tub', i. iv, and 'Fortunate Isles') and other Elizabethan dramatists.

Ambrose, FATHER, in Scott's 'The Abbot' (q.v.), Edward Glendinning, abbot of Kennaquhair.

AMBROSE, ST. (c. 340-97), born at Trèves, was a celebrated bishop of Milan

AMELIA

(elected against his will by the people when still a catechumen), one of the Fathers of the Church, and a vigorous opponent of the Arians. He developed the use of music in the services of the church, restoring its ancient melodies and founding what is known as the Ambrosian chant (as opposed to the Gregorian chant introduced two centuries later by Pope Gregory the Great). He composed several hymns, including, according to one tradition, the 'Te Deum' (q.v.).

Ambrose Lamela, see Don Raphael.

Ambrose's Tavern, the supposed scene of the 'Noctes Ambrosianae' (q.v.). 'The Street or Lane in which Ambrose's Tavern is situated derives its name of Gabriel's Road from a horrible murder which was committed there' (Lockhart, 'Peter's Letters to his Kinsfolk', 1819, vol. ii, p. 197). 'This locality, which still bears the name by which it was so bloodily baptised, is situated in the vicinity of West Register Street, at the back of the east end of Princes Street, and close to the Register Office. . . . But a too literal interpretation is not to be given to the scene of these festivities. Ambrose's Hotel was indeed "a local habitation and a name", and many were the meetings which Professor Wilson and his friends had within its walls. But the true Ambrose must be looked for only in the realms of the imagination—the veritable scene of the "Ambrosian Nights" existed nowhere but in their author's brain, and their flashing fire was struck out in solitude by genius independent of the stimulus of companionship' (Preface to Professor Ferrier's edition of John Wilson's 'Works').

Ambrosian Library, THE, at Milan, founded in 1609, was originally the private library of Cardinal Borromeo (1564-1631), archbishop of Milan, and was bequeathed by him to public uses. It was named after St. Ambrose, bishop of Milan.

Ambrosio, the hero of M. G. Lewis's 'The Monk' (q.v.).

Amella, the heroine of the episode of Celadon and Amelia in the book on 'Summer' of Thomson's 'The Seasons' (q.v.).

Amella, a novel by H. Fielding (q.v.), published in 1751.

This is the last of Fielding's novels and the story is less successfully told than that of 'Tom Jones'. A good deal of the book is devoted to exposing various social evils of the time, such as the defects in the law of debt, and the scandals of the sponging-houses and prisons. William Booth, a penniless young officer, with little to recommend him beyond a good person and physical courage, has run away with the virtuous Amelia, against her mother's wishes. The poverty of the couple, Booth's folly and weakness of character, and the beauty of his wife, involve the couple in the series of misfortunes with which the story is occupied. Booth himself succumbs to the charms of Miss Matthews, whom he meets in prison, but his infidelity, when it subsequently comes to the knowledge of Amelia, is generously forgiven. Amelia becomes the object of the illicit pursuits of various unscrupulous admirers. The couple are reduced to the utmost misery, and the long-suffering devotion of Amelia is prolonged, until the situation is saved by the discovery that the will by which her sister inherited her mother's property is forged and Amelia is the true heiress. Among the pleasant features of the book are some of the minor characters, the faithful Sergeant Atkinson; the benevolent Dr. Harrison, a sort of second Squire Allworthy; the pair of Colonels, James the unprincipled, and Bath, whose bravery is only equalled by his punctiliousness; and the admirably drawn women, Mrs. Atkinson and Miss Matthews.

American, The, a novel by H. James (q.v.), published in 1877.

American Democrat, The, or Hints on the Social and Civic Relations of the United States of America, by James Fenimore Cooper (q.v.), published in 1838. In this vigorous work Cooper examined and set forth, to the offence of his countrymen, the defects and dangers of democracy as it flourished in America.

American Fabius, THE, a name bestowed on George Washington because his tactics resembled those of Fabius Maximus (q.v.).

American Taxation, On, a speech by E. Burke (q.v.), made in 1774 on a motion for the repeal of the American Tea Duty.

After dealing with the narrower arguments regarding the expediency of the proposal, Burke turns to a broad historical view of the subject, going back to the Navigation Act and explaining the course of British policy. He shows that the Tea Duty is at variance with the declarations of ministers and an 'exhaustless source of jealousy and animosity' without practical benefit. He exhorts the Government to abandon it. 'Do not burden the Americans with taxes. You were not used to do so from the beginning. Let this be your reason for not taxing. These are the arguments of states and kingdoms. Leave the rest to the schools.'

Amerigo Vespucci (1451-1512), a Florentine merchant who settled at Seville and sailed in 1499 in an expedition to the West under Ojeda, and again in 1501 in the service of the king of Portugal. In the summary account of his travels addressed in 1504 to Duke René of Lorraine, which appeared in a book published in 1507 at St. Diez in Lorraine, he claimed to have made a voyage in 1497 in which he discovered "Terra Firma", the mainland of S. America. His name was given to the continent of America in virtue of this claim, which is not substantiated by evidence. The matter is discussed at length in an appendix to Washington Irving's 'Life of Columbus'.

AMONTILLADO

Amhara, see Amara.

Amharic, the principal language spoken in Abyssinia. It is partly Semitic, partly Hamitic, in origin.

Amiatinus Codex, the best extant MS. of the Vulgate, so called from the abbey of Monte Amiata, to which it was presented. It was discovered in the 19th cent. to have been written in England, early in the 8th cent., at Wearmouth or Jarrow. It was probably copied from an Italian original. It is now in the Laurentian Library at Florence.

Amidas, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', v. iv, the brother of Bracidas. Their dispute over their inheritance is solved by Sir Artegall.

AMIEL, HENRI-FRÉDÉRIC (1828-81), Swiss author. His 'Journal intime', originally published in 2 volumes in 1883, was translated by Mrs. Humphry Ward and published in 1885.

Amiens, THE TREATY OF, concluded in 1802 between the British and French governments. Great Britain abandoned her recent conquests with the exception of Ceylon and Trinidad, while France retained her conquests in Europe. War was renewed in 1803.

Amintor, the hero of Beaumont and Fletcher's 'The Maid's Tragedy' (q.v.).

Amis and Amiloun, a metrical romance of the Middle English period, in which the virtue of friendship is exalted. It is adapted from the French 13th-cent. romance, 'Li amitez di Ami et Amile'.

Amis and Amiloun, two noble foster-brothers, are bound in close friendship. Amiloun takes the place of Amis in a trial by combat, for which piece of guileful devotion he is punished with leprosy. Amis, discovering his friend in this grievous plight, at the bidding of Raphael sacrifices his own children in order to cure the leprosy. But the gods do not allow the sacrifice to be realized. Amis and his wife Belisante go to see the dead bodies of their children and find them only sleeping. This noble and pathetic tale finds a place in one of Pater's 'Studies in the History of the Renaissance', and has been told in prose by W. Morris; both use the form 'Amis and Amile'.

Amlet, Mrs. and Dick, characters in Vanbrugh's 'The Confederacy' (q.v.).

Ammon, or more correctly AMON or AMUN, the supreme god of the Egyptians in the Theban religion. His worship spread to Greece, where he was identified with Zeus, and to Rome, where he was known as Jupiter Ammon. His oracle in Africa became famous after Alexander the Great had visited it.

Ammonian Horn, see Amalthea.

Amon, see Ammon.

Amontillado, a dry Sherry (q.v.) wine, of a peculiar flavour, made by a special process and in small quantity. 'The Cask of Amontillado' is the title of a story by Poe (q.v.).

AMORET

Amoret, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', III. vi and xii, and IV. vii, daughter of the nymph Chrysogone and twin sister of Belpheobe. She is 'of grace and beauty noble Paragon', and has been married to Sir Scudamour, but carried off immediately after by the enchanter Busirane and imprisoned by him until released by Britomart. Timias (q.v.) loves her, but being reproved by Belpheobe leaves her. This incident refers to the displeasure of Queen Elizabeth at the relations of Sir W. Raleigh (q.v.) with Elizabeth Throgmorton.

Amorette, a series of eighty-eight sonnets by Spenser (q.v.), which have been thought to illustrate the course of his wooing of Elizabeth Boyle, the lady whom he married. These were printed with the 'Epithalamion' (q.v.) in 1595.

Amory, BLANCHE, a character in Thackeray's 'Pendennis' (q.v.).

AMORY, THOMAS (1691?–1788), a writer of Irish descent, the author of two eccentric works of fiction, 'Memoirs of several Ladies of Great Britain', published in 1755, and 'The Life of John Buncle, Esq.', published in 1756–66. Eighteen imaginary ladies were to be the subjects of the 'Memoirs', but the author confines himself to one, Mrs. Marinda Benlow, adding disquisitions on a great many miscellaneous subjects, among others, the doctrines of Athanasius. 'John Buncle' (q.v.) is virtually a sequel of the 'Memoirs', but is a good deal more entertaining. Amory was an ardent Unitarian, and a student of medicine, geology, and antiquities, and in his rambling narratives and digressions he gives a mass of information on these subjects.

Amos Barton, The Sad Fortunes of the Rev., see Scenes of Clerical Life.

Amphibology, AMPHIBOLY, a sentence that may be construed in two distinct senses; ambiguity arising from the uncertain construction of a sentence.

Amphibrach, a foot consisting of a long between two short syllables.

Amphictlonic Council, in Greek history, an association of Greeks worshipping at the shrine of the same god. The most important was that of Delphi, which included many of the principal peoples of Greece. It exercised as a rule little political influence, but Philip of Macedon used it to further his schemes. See also Sacred Wars.

Amphion, son of Zeus and Antiope, was a harper of such skill that when he and his brother Zethus were fortifying Thebes the stones moved of their own accord and formed a wall. See also Antiope.

Amphitryon, a Theban prince, who obtained the promise of the hand of Alcmena, daughter of Electryon, king of Mycenae, on condition that he should avenge the death of that king's sons, who had been killed by the Teleboans. Zeus, captivated with the charms of Alcmena, borrowed the features of Amphitryon while he was gone to the war, and introduced himself to her as her victorious husband. The son of Zeus and Alcmena was Hercules. This legend is the subject of plays by Plautus, Molière, and Dryden (see below). Amphitryon's connexion with gastronomy arises from a line in the play of Molière. The servant of Amphitryon, perplexed by the resemblance of the two who claim to be his master, hears Jupiter invite some friends to dinner, and is thereby convinced that he is the genuine Amphitryon—'Le véritable Amphitryon est l'Amphitryon où l'on dîne'.

Amphitryon, a comedy by Dryden (q.v.), published in 1690.

The play is adapted from the comedies of Plautus and Molière on the subject of Amphitryon (see above), who, expecting to arrive at home on the morrow from a successful campaign, sends his slave Sosia in advance to announce his return to his wife, Alcmena. Jupiter, in order to enjoy the favours of Alcmena, assumes the form of Amphitryon, and forestalls her husband; at the same time ordering Mercury to take the form of Sosia, and keep out the true Sosia. The comedy consists in the complications arising from the successive arrival at Amphitryon's palace of two indistinguishable Amphitryons, and two indistinguishable Sosas, and the final confrontation of the two Amphitryons.

Amram, the father of Moses (Exod. vi. 20). There is a reference to 'Amram's son' in Milton, 'Paradise Lost', i. 339.

Amrita, a Sanskrit word meaning 'immortal'; in Hindu mythology, the water of life or ambrosia, procured by the gods by churning the ocean.

Amundeville, LORD HENRY, a character in Byron's 'Don Juan' (q.v.), whose house is the scene of part of the last three cantos.

Amurath (Murad), the name of several Turkish Sultans in the 14th–16th cents. 'Not Amurath an Amurath succeeds, But Harry Harry'; Shakespeare, '2 Henry IV', v. ii.

Amyas, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', 'the Squire of low degree'. See Poena.

Amyas Leigh, the hero of C. Kingsley's 'Westward Ho' (q.v.).

Amymōnē, one of the daughters of Danaus (see Danaides). Mentioned by Milton, 'Paradise Regained', ii. 188, as a 'beauty rare'.

Amyntas, in Spenser's 'Colin Clouts come home againe', is Thomas Watson (q.v.).

AMYOT, JACQUES (1513–93), a French writer, whose version of Plutarch was translated into English by Sir T. North (q.v.).

Amyas and Amyllon, see Amis and Amiloun.

Āna, neuter plural termination of Latin adjectives in -anus (e.g. Virgiliana), a term used of a collection of the sayings of some person, or anecdotes or literary gossip about him.

ANABAPTIST

Anabaptist, one who baptizes over again, as the due performance of a rite ineffectually performed in infancy; the name of a sect that arose in Germany in 1521. There was a revolt of Anabaptists in 1534 at Münster, under John of Leyden, who founded a theocracy, and was executed in 1536. The name is applied (more or less opprobriously) to the Protestant religious body of the Baptists.

Anabasis, see Xenophon.

Anacharsis, a Scythian who went to Athens about 594 B.C., made the acquaintance of Solon, and became famous for his wisdom, in contrast to the stupidity and ignorance of his fellow countrymen.

Anacharsis, Le Voyage du Jeune, an historical romance by the Abbé Jean-Jacques Barthélemy (1716–95), descriptive of Greece in the time of Pericles. It was published in 1788.

Anacharsis Clootz, see Clootz.

Anacoluthon, Greek, 'wanting sequence'; a sentence in which a fresh construction is adopted before the former is complete.

ANACREON (6th cent. B.C.), a famous lyric poet of Teos in Ionia, author of many melodious verses on love and wine. He lived chiefly at Samos, but went to Athens at the invitation of the tyrant Hipparchus. He is said to have died choked by a grape-stone. Of his poems only a few genuine fragments have survived, many songs that bear his name being by other authors. T. Moore (q.v.) published in 1800 a translation of the 'Odes of Anacreon' into English verse. Byron calls Moore 'Anacreon Moore'.

Anacrusis, 'striking up', an additional syllable at the beginning of a verse before the normal rhythm, e.g. the 'and' in the second of the following lines:

Till danger's troubled night depart
And the star of peace return.

Anadyō'mēnē, see Venus.

Analogy of Religion, Natural and Revealed, to the Constitution and Course of Nature, The, a treatise in defence of the Christian religion, by J. Butler (q.v.), published in 1736.

The treatise is directed against the views of the Deists, which were very prevalent at that time. The author takes as starting-point the assumption, which was common ground to him and his adversaries, 'that there is an intelligent Author of Nature, and natural Governor of the world'. Proceeding from that part of the Divine government over intelligent creatures which comes under our view, to the larger and more general government which is beyond it, and comparing the acknowledged dispensations of Providence with what religion teaches us to believe and expect, he finds that the two are analogous and of a piece, and that the latter must reasonably therefore be accepted. On these lines the author discusses the credibility of a future life, of miracles, of revelation, and other religious doctrines.

Ananias, (1) the Jewish high-priest before whom Paul was brought and who caused him to be smitten on the mouth (Acts xxiii); (2) the husband of Sapphira who was struck dead because he 'lied unto God' (Acts v); (3) a character in Jonson's 'The Alchemist' (q.v.).

Anapaest, Greek, 'reversed'; a reversed dactyl, a metrical foot composed of two short followed by a long syllable.

Anaphora, 'carrying back', the repetition of the same word or phrase in several successive clauses; for instance, 'Awake up, my glory; awake, lute and harp; I myself will awake right early.'

Anarchiad, The, a verse satire produced in America during the Revolutionary period. It was inspired by the conflict with England and the subsequent internal fight between American Whigs and Tories. Four of the 'Hartford Wits' (q.v.)—Joel Barlow, John Trumbull, David Humphreys, and Lemuel Hopkins—collaborated in writing it.

Anarchy, The Masque of, a poem by P. B. Shelley (q.v.), 'written on the occasion of the Massacre of Manchester' (the Peterloo (q.v.) affair, August 1819).

Anastasis, a picturesque novel by Hope (q.v.), published in 1819.

The story, told in the form of an autobiography, is that of a Greek of Chios, a man of courage and ability, but utterly unscrupulous, who lived in the latter part of the 18th cent. It takes the reader to Greece, where the hero fights with prowess against the rebellious Albanians; to Constantinople, where he lives by his wits, and turns Moslem to escape the consequences of detection in an amour with a Turkish lady; to Egypt, where he enters the service of the Mamelukes and rises temporarily to a position of some eminence; to Smyrna, where he behaves atrociously to an amiable and trustful young lady; and to Arabia, where he lives for a time among the Wahabis. Notwithstanding the great variety of the adventures recounted and of the places whose oriental customs are depicted, the book, which is very long, is monotonous. It enjoyed, however, considerable popularity.

Anatomy of Melancholy, The, a treatise by Robert Burton (q.v.), published in 1621.

In purpose the treatise is a medical work. The introduction sets out that melancholy is 'an inbred malady in every one of us'. Part i deals with the definition, causes, symptoms, and properties of melancholy; part ii, with its cure; part iii, with the melancholy of love, and the melancholy of religion. But the subject is expanded until it covers the whole life of man; and social and political reform, as well as bodily and mental health, are brought within its purview. The treatment is marked by a sense of humour and pathos, and a olerant spirit in religion. In the exposition and illustration of his argument, Burton uses quotation (or paraphrase) to an extreme degree, drawing on a very wide field of literature, from the Bible and the Fathers, through Greek and Latin classics, to the Elizabethan writers. His book thus becomes a store-house of the most miscellaneous learning, and is apt to be regarded in that light rather than as a medical treatise.

Antaeus, the steersman of the ship 'Argo' (see Argonauts), who is said to be the occasion of a well-known proverb. He had been told by a seer that he should not live to taste the wine of his vineyard. A cup of his own wine being set before him, he laughed at the seer, who replied, πολλὰ μεταξύ πέλει κύλικος καὶ γέλεος ἄκρου, 'There's many a slip between the cup and the lip'. At that moment Antaeus was told that a wild boar was near. He went out to pursue it and was killed.

Antichises, a Trojan prince, who enjoyed the favour of Venus, and became by her father of Aeneas (q.v.).

Antien régime, a French expression signifying the old order of things before the French Revolution.

Ancient Mariner, The Rime of the, a poem by S. T. Coleridge (q.v.), which first appeared in 1798 in Wordsworth's and Coleridge's 'Lyrical Ballads' (q.v.), and subsequently in the latter's 'Sibylline Leaves', published in 1817.

An ancient mariner meets three gallants on their way to a marriage feast and detains one to recount his story. He tells how his ship was drawn towards the South Pole by a storm. When the ship is surrounded by ice, an albatross comes through the snow-fog and is received with joy and hospitality, but is presently shot by the mariner. For this act of cruelty a curse falls on the ship. She is driven north to the Line, and becalmed. The crew die of thirst except the mariner, who by the light of the moon beholding God's creatures of the great calm and their beauty, blesses them in his heart. The spell breaks and the ship is brought back to England, but the mariner for penance is condemned ever to travel from land to land and to teach by his example love and reverence to all God's creatures. J. L. Lowes, in 'The Road to Xanadu', traces the process by which Coleridge built up the poem from various sources.

Ancient of Days, a scriptural title of God; Dan. vii. 9.

Ancients and Moderns, Quarrel of the, see Battle of the Books.

Ancrene Riwele, or Ancrene Wisse, The, a devotional manual in prose written for the rule and guidance of certain English recluses. The author is unknown. Besides the Middle English copies, which vary considerably, there are French and Latin versions. The work, which is animated by a 'lofty morality and infinite tenderness' (C.H.E.L.), belongs to the early Middle English period (c. 1200-50).

ANDERSEN, HANS CHRISTIAN (1805-75), Danish poet and author of dramas, novels, and books of travel, is chiefly known in England by his series of fairy tales, of which the first volume appeared in 1835. They were first translated into English by Mary Howitt (1846), and by Caroline Peachey in the same year.

ANDERSON, SHERWOOD (1876-1941), American writer, born in Ohio. His chief works are: 'Marching Men' (1917), 'The Triumph of the Egg' (1921), 'A Story-teller's Story' (1924), 'Dark Laughter' (1925), 'Hello Towns' (1929), 'Beyond Desire' (1932).

Andouillets, ABBESS OF, the subject of an episode in vol. vii of Sterne's 'Tristram Shandy' (q.v.).

André, MAJOR JOHN (1751-80), an officer in the British army who during the American War of Independence was entrusted with secret negotiations with Benedict Arnold, an American general, for the betrayal by the latter of the forts on the Hudson River. André was captured within the American lines and hanged as a spy. A monument was erected to his memory in Westminster Abbey.

Andrea del Sarto, a poem by R. Browning (q.v.), included in 'Men and Women', published in 1855.

Andrea del Sarto (1486-1531) was called 'The Faultless Painter'. The poet presents him as reflecting, in a monologue addressed to Lucrezia, his wife, on his deficiencies: his inferiority in inspiration to Raphael; his faithlessness to his patron Francis I; his neglect of his parents; his weak devotion to Lucrezia, who is, in fact, unworthy. But he is peaceful and resigned. Perhaps in the New Jerusalem there will be four walls to be decorated, by Leonardo, Raphael, Michelangelo, and himself.

Andrea Ferrara, a celebrated maker of swords, probably a Venetian, of the 16th cent. The name came to be frequently used to signify a broadsword. According to the author's notes on 'Waverley' (q.v.), it is generally believed that Andrea Ferrara was brought over by James IV or V to instruct the Scots in the manufacture of sword-blades.

Andrea of Hungary, Giovanna of Naples, and Fra Rupert, three plays forming a trilogy, by W. S. Landor (q.v.), published in 1839-40.

These plays deal with the marriage of Andrea, brother of King Lewis of Hungary, to Giovanna, queen of Naples, in the 14th cent.; his assassination at his wedding-feast owing to the intrigues of the Hungarian monk Fra Rupert; the accusation brought against Giovanna of causing her husband's murder; the attempts, finally successful, to oust her from her throne; and the exposure at the last of Fra Rupert.

ANDREAS

Andreas, an OE. poem attributed by some to Cynewulf (q.v.), included in the 'Vercelli Book' (q.v.). It recounts a mission of St. Andrew to the Mermedonians, Ethiopian savages, among whom St. Matthew was in danger. It is remarkable for its description of a sea voyage.

Andrée, SALOMON AUGUST (1854-97), the Arctic explorer, born at Grenna in Sweden, and educated as an engineer. With Nils Strindberg and Knut Fraenkel, he attempted in 1897 to cross the North Polar regions in a balloon. They started on 11 July from Danes Island, Spitsbergen, but their balloon was driven down in 83° N. lat. Their remains, diaries, &c., were accidentally found on White Island off the NE. coast of Spitsbergen by a Norwegian expedition in August 1930.

ANDREW OF WYNTOUN, see Wyntoun.

ANDREWES, LANCELOT (1555-1626), educated at Merchant Taylors' School and Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, was bishop successively of Chichester, Ely, and Winchester. He was renowned for his patristic learning, wrote theological works, and was first on the list of the divines appointed to make the 'authorized version' of the Bible.

Androcles, or Androclus, and the Lion, a story told by Aulus Gellius (v. 14) of a slave who, running away from a cruel master and concealing himself in a cave in Africa, was confronted by a lion. The animal presented to him a swollen paw, from which he extracted a thorn. Androcles was subsequently captured and sentenced to fight with a lion in the arena. It chanced that this lion was the same that he had relieved. The lion recognized its benefactor and, instead of attacking him, showed every sign of affection and gratitude. Bernard Shaw wrote a play 'Androcles and the Lion' (1912).

Andrō'māchē, the wife of Hector (q.v.) and mother of Astyanax. Her parting with Hector before a battle is the most pathetic passage in Homer's 'Iliad' (Book VI). After the capture of Troy she fell to the share of Neoptolemus, and after his death married Helenus (q.v.), a brother of Hector. Aeneas met with her in Epirus ('Aeneid', iii).

Andrō'mēda, a daughter of Cepheus, king of Ethiopia, and Cassiopea. Cassiopea boasted herself (or her daughter) more beautiful than the Nereids. Whereupon Poseidon in anger sent a sea-monster to ravage the country. To abate his wrath, Andromeda was exposed on a rock to the monster, but was rescued by Perseus (q.v.), who, returning through the air from the conquest of the Gorgons, changed the monster to a rock by showing it the Medusa's head. Charles Kingsley (q.v.) wrote a poem on this myth, entitled 'Andromeda'.

Andronicus Comnenus, see Wilson (J., 1627-96).

Andvari, in Scandinavian mythology, a dwarf who was forced by Loki to give up his treasure and the magic ring with which he could make gold (known in German romance as the Ring of the Nibelungs). It passed into the possession of Fafnir, was taken from him by Sigurd, and by Sigurd given to Brynhild.

Aneirin, The Book of, see Aneurin.

Anelida and Arcite, a poem in rhyme-royal by Chaucer (q.v.), belonging to his early period. It is the lament of Queen Anelida for the falseness of Arcite her lover.

ANEURIN or ANEIRIN (fl. 600?), a Welsh bard whose compositions are contained in a MS. 'Book of Aneirin' of the 13th cent. This contains the 'Gododin', an elegy on the Welsh chieftains who fell at Cattraeth at the hands of the Saxons.

Angel, from the Greek word ἄγγελος, a messenger, used in the LXX to translate the Hebrew Malak, in full malak-yehowah, 'messenger of Jehovah', whence the name and doctrine of angels passed into Latin and the modern languages. [OED.] The angels in the Scriptures are prominent chiefly in the apocalyptic books, e.g. Revelation and the apocryphal Book of Enoch (q.v.). The latter (c. xxi) enumerates seven archangels: Uriel, Raphael, Raguel, Michael, Sariel, Gabriel, and Jerahmeel. But the names vary in other passages. According to the 4th-cent. work attributed to Dionysius the Areopagite, the heavenly beings are divided into three hierarchies, each containing three orders or choirs, viz. seraphim, cherubim, thrones; dominions, virtues, powers; principalities, archangels, angels. The Koran (q.v.) names four chief angels: Gabriel, who writes down the divine decrees; Michael, the champion of the faith; Azrael, the angel of death; and Israfil, who will sound the trumpet at the resurrection.

Angel, the coin, see Noble.

Angel in the House, The, see Patmore.

Angelic Doctor, THE, Thomas Aquinas (q.v.).

Angelica, in the 'Orlando Innamorato' (q.v.) and 'Orlando Furioso' (q.v.), the daughter of Galafron, king of Cathay, the object of Orlando's love and the cause of his madness. For the story see under the above-named poems. Cf. Milton, 'Paradise Regained', iii. 341.

Anglo-Saxon, originally a collective name for the Saxons of England as distinct from the 'Old Saxons' of the Continent, was extended to the entire Old English people and language before the Conquest. After the Conquest, natives and new incomers were at first distinguished as English and French; but as the latter also became in a few generations English politically and geographically, the name could no longer be applied distinctively to the people of Edward the Confessor and Harold. Hence the extended use of the name Anglo-Saxon. [OED.] In this book the English language before the Conquest is referred to as Old English (see English). See also Angles and Saxon.

Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, The, compiled by monks working at different centres, notably Winchester, Canterbury, and Peterborough, is, in the main, a dry chronological record, in vernacular, of events in England from the beginning of the Christian era to the middle of the 12th cent. It contains, however, some vivid and more detailed passages, notably the account of the struggle with the Danes during the period 893-7, and of the misery of the common people during the civil wars of the reign of Stephen. In the portion of the 'Chronicle' relating to the 10th cent. are inserted some important poems, among others the 'Brunanburh' (q.v.). The earlier part of the 'Chronicle', down to 892, may represent the work or inspiration of King Alfred.

Anima Poetae, a collection of aphorisms, observations, reflections, and other literary material, extracted from the numerous notebooks of S. T. Coleridge (q.v.), and published by Ernest Hartley Coleridge in 1895.

Anitra, in Ibsen's 'Peer Gynt' (q.v.), an unscrupulous Arab damsel, with whom the hero flirts when masquerading as a prophet.

Anna Christie, a play by Eugene O'Neill, first produced in 1921, which was one of the playwright's early successes.

Anna Karenina, a novel by Tolstoy (q.v.).

ANNA COMNENA (b. 1083), daughter of the emperor Alexius Comnenus, and author of the 'Alexiad' (a history in fifteen books, mainly of her father's life). She figures in Scott's 'Count Robert of Paris' (q.v.).

Annales Cambriae, ancient annals of Wales, of which the earliest extant MS. dates from the second half of the 10th cent. They have a special literary interest on account of their reference to the 'Battle of Badon, in which Arthur carried the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ on his shoulders, and the Britons were victors', placing it in the year 518. They Annals of the Parish, a novel by Galt (q.v.), published in 1821, in which the Rev. Micah Balwhidder chronicles, with quaint simplicity and unconscious humour, the events, great and small, that affected the homely lives of the parishioners of Dalmailing in Ayrshire during the period 1760-1810. The scene of the death of Mr. Cayenne (ch. xlvii) has been declared by a competent authority 'one of the greatest things in all literature'.

Anne, queen of England, 1702-14.

Anne of Geierstein, or The Maiden of the Mist, a novel by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1829.

The period of the story is the reign of Edward IV. The earl of Oxford and his son Arthur de Vere, exiled from England after the victory of the Yorkist party at Tewkesbury, are travelling on the Continent engaged in intrigues in the Lancastrian interest, under the name of Philipson and in the guise of merchants. Passing through Switzerland and overtaken by a storm in the mountains, they are hospitably entertained by Arnold Biederman, the Landamman or chief magistrate of Unterwalden, whose niece, the young countess Anne of Geierstein, rescues Arthur from death. The business of the Philipsons being with Charles the Bold, duke of Burgundy, they accompany Biederman and other Swiss delegates who are setting out to remonstrate with the latter against the outrageous proceedings to which the Swiss have been subject at his hands. The Philipsons are seized by the cruel Archibald of Hagenbach, the duke's governor of the citadel of Brisach, and narrowly escape death, a fate only averted by a rising of the citizens against Hagenbach and his condemnation by the Vehmgericht (q.v.) and execution. The story is then occupied by the negotiations between Philipson (or Oxford), the duke of Burgundy, and Margaret of Anjou (Henry VI's queen), of which the object is to secure the duke's assistance to the Lancastrian cause in return for the cession to him of Provence. These negotiations are interrupted by the utter defeat of the duke by the Swiss at Granson and Morat. After the duke's death at Nancy, Oxford and his son return to Geierstein, where Arthur marries Anne.

Apart from the vivid portrait of Charles the Bold, and the picture of the court of René, the king of Troubadours, the most interesting feature in the book is the description of the secret tribunal of the Vehmgericht, of which Anne's father, Count Albert of Geierstein (alias the Black Priest of St. Paul's), is for the time being the chief figure. For this description Scott drew on Goethe's 'Goetz von Berlichingen', which he had translated.

ANNOT LYLE

Annot Lyle, a character in Scott's 'Legend of Montrose' (q.v.).

Annual Register, The, an annual review of events of the past year, founded by Dodsley (q.v.) in 1758, which still survives.

Annus Mirabilis, a poem by Dryden (q.v.), published in 1667, and probably written at Charlton in Wiltshire, where the poet lived during the plague and fire years. It is written on the model of 'Gondibert' (q.v.) in quatrains, of which the first 200 deal with the sea-fight against the Dutch at Bergen on 3 August 1665, the indecisive four days' battle of June 1666, and the victory over the Dutch off the N. Foreland on 25 July of the same year. The remaining hundred quatrains relate the Fire of London (2-7 Sept. 1666).

ANSELM, ST. (1033-1109), a native of Aosta in N. Italy, and a pupil of Lanfranc at the abbey of Bec in Normandy. He made the monastic profession and became in time abbot of Bec. While he held this office he visited England, where William Rufus had left the see of Canterbury vacant for four years. In a fit of sick-bed repentance, Rufus appointed Anselm archbishop (1093), a responsibility which the latter reluctantly accepted. The king resumed his tyrannous course and in 1097 Anselm withdrew to Rome. He returned to England as archbishop under Henry I. Anselm wrote many theological and philosophical works, including the famous 'Monologion', 'Proslogion', and 'Cur Deus Homo'. He is commemorated on 21 April.

Anson, GEORGE, BARON ANSON (1697-1762), who became first lord of the Admiralty, made his famous voyage round the world in 1740-4. The account of it, compiled by his chaplain, R. Waters, was published in 1748. It is a stirring narrative of the sea. The seven vessels of the squadron were reduced by storms to three. Of these, two sailed refitted from Juan Fernandez, attacked and destroyed the town of Paita, and captured the Manila galleon with a vast treasure. Anson finally reached home with a single ship.

ANSON, SIR WILLIAM REYNELL (1843-1914), Warden of All Souls, M.P. for the University of Oxford, and a learned writer on the Law and Custom of the Constitution (1879-86) and on Contracts (1879).

Antenor, a wise counsellor of Priam (q.v.), king of Troy. In post-Homeric legend he is a traitor, who plans to surrender the city and the palladium (q.v.) to the Greeks.

Anthology, The Greek, a collection of some 6,000 short elegiac poems, inscriptions, &c., by more than 300 writers (7th cent. B.C.-10th cent. A.D.), originating in a collection by Meleager of Gadara (the 'Garland of Meleager', c. 60 B.C.), which grew by successive additions. In its present form it is substantially the collection of Constantinus Cephalas, a Byzantine of the 10th cent. A.D., known as the 'Palatine Anthology' because it was discovered (by the French scholar Salmasius (q.v.) at the age of 19) in the Palatine Library of Heidelberg.

Anthropophagi, in Greek legend, a people of Scythia that fed on human flesh.

Antichrist, the archetypal personal opponent of Christ and His Kingdom, expected by the Early Church to appear before the end of the world, and much referred to in the Middle Ages. The term was at one time applied by some (e.g. Wycliffe) to the Pope or the Papal power. 'Antichrist' is mentioned in 1 John ii. 18, 22, and 2 John vii, and variously referred to as the Man of Sin (2 Thess. ii. 3), the Beast (Revelation), &c.

Anti-Corn-Law League, see Corn Laws.

Antigōnē, a daughter of Oedipus (q.v.) and Jocasta. When the strife between her brothers Eteocles (q.v.) and Polyneices had led to the death of the latter, she buried his body by night, against the order of King Creon, and was ordered by him to be buried alive. She took her own life before the sentence was executed, and Haemon, the king's son, who passionately loved her, killed himself on her grave. The incident was made the subject of one of the tragedies of Sophocles.

Antigōnus, (1) a character in Shakespeare's 'The Winter's Tale' (q.v.); (2) a character in Beaumont and Fletcher's 'The Humorous Lieutenant' (q.v.); (3) the name of one of Alexander's generals, who on Alexander's Anti-Jacobin, The, a journal founded by Canning (q.v.), to combat the subversive principles of philosophy and politics that were current at the end of the 18th cent., and to deride their supporters. It was edited by Gifford (q.v.), and included among its contributors, besides Canning, Ellis (q.v., a converted author of 'Rolliad' satires), and Frere (q.v.). In addition to ordinary news, the journal published satirical verse, mainly in the form of parody, of which 'The Needy Knife-grinder', a parody of Southey, and 'The Loves of the Triangles', a parody of Erasmus Darwin's 'The Loves of the Plants', are famous examples. 'The Rovers' was an amusing burlesque of contemporary German drama. Its final and most important satire was 'The New Morality' by Canning, a denunciation of the French propaganda and an exhortation to maintain the old English institutions. The 'Anti-Jacobin' came to an end in 1798, but its crusade, in feeblar form, was continued by 'The Anti-Jacobin Review and Magazine'. 'The Poetry of the Anti-Jacobin' was reprinted in 1852, with explanatory notes by Charles Edmunds.

Antilla, see Seven Cities.

Antinomian, one who maintains that the moral law is not binding upon Christians, under the 'law of grace'. A sect appeared in Germany in 1535 which was alleged to hold this opinion. See Hutchinsonians.

Antinōus, a youth of remarkable beauty, who was a favourite of the Emperor Hadrian. He was drowned in the Nile in A.D. 122.

Antīōpē, a daughter of Nycteus, king of Thebes, was beloved by Zeus, by whom she became mother of Amphiion and Zethus. To avoid her father's anger she fled to Epopeus, king of Sicyon, or was carried off by him. Nycteus made war on Epopeus and when dying entreated his brother Lycus to continue the war and recover his daughter. This Lycus did and married Antiope. But Dirce, the first wife of Lycus, imprisoned and tormented Antiope. The latter escaped to her sons, who undertook her revenge. They killed Lycus and tied Dirce to the horns of a bull, which dragged her till she died. A fountain in the neighbourhood of Thebes which bore her name sprang from her blood.

Antiphōlus, the name of the twin brothers, sons of Aegeon, in Shakespeare's 'Comedy of Errors' (q.v.).

Antiquaries, THE SOCIETY OF, was founded about the year 1572 at the instance of Archbishop Parker, but was suppressed on the accession of James I. The present Society was founded in January 1717-18, with Peter Le Neve as president. Its 'Archaeologia' was first printed in 1770.

ANTONIO

Antiquary, The, a novel by Sir W. Scott, (q.v.), published in 1816.

A gallant young officer, known as Major Neville, on whose birth there is supposed to be the stain of illegitimacy, falls in love in England with Isabella Wardour, who, in deference to the prejudices of her father, Sir Arthur Wardour, repulses him. Under the assumed name of Lovel, he follows her to Scotland, falling in on the way with Jonathan Oldbuck, laird of Monkbarns, a learned and garrulous antiquary, and a neighbour of Sir Arthur. Lovel saves the lives of Sir Arthur and his daughter at the peril of his own, fights a duel with Hector M'Intyre, Oldbuck's impetuous nephew, and saves Sir Arthur from the ruin that his credulity and the impositions of the German charlatan Dousterswivel have brought on him. He finally turns out to be the son and heir of the earl of Glenallan, and all ends happily. The charm of the book, Scott's 'chief favourite among all his novels', lies in the character of the Antiquary, drawn according to Scott from a worthy friend of his boyish days (George Constable), but in which we may recognize a portrait or caricature of Scott himself; and in that of old Edie Ochiltree, the king's bedesman, shrewd, ironical, and kindly, who is instrumental in routing the rascally Dousterswivel, and in bringing events to a satisfactory termination.

Antisthēnēs, the founder of the Cynic school of philosophy. He was an Athenian, lived in the 5th cent. B.C., and was a pupil of Socrates. He taught in the Cynosarges, for which reason probably his pupils were called Cynics, though others attribute the name to their surliness (from κύων, a dog). He despised art and learning, and the luxuries and comforts of life, and taught that virtue consists in the avoidance of evil and independence of needs. Diogenes (q.v.) was the most famous of his pupils.

Antī'strōphē, meaning 'turning about', in a Greek chorus, the response to the strophe (q.v.), recited as the chorus proceeded in the opposite direction to that followed in the strophe. The metre of strophe and antistrophe was the same.

Antonīnus Plus (A.D. 86-161), Roman emperor from 138 to 161. He devoted himself to promoting the happiness of his people and his reign was an exceptionally peaceful and prosperous one. The WALL OF ANTONINUS, or Antonine Wall, was built in the course of the reign by the prefect Lollius Urbicus between the Forth and the Clyde to strengthen the protection of the province of Britain against invasions from the North.

Antonio and Mellida, a tragedy by J. Marston (q.v.), printed in 1602, and probably acted two years earlier, is interesting as having provided Ben Jonson with materials for his ridicule of Marston in the 'Poetaster' (q.v.). In Part I of the play, Antonio, son of Andrugio, duke of Genoa, is in love with Mellida, daughter of Piero, duke of Venice. The two states are at war and Genoa has been defeated, and a price set in Venice on the heads of Antonio and Andrugio. Antonio, disguised as an Amazon, comes to Piero's court to seek Mellida. Mellida flees with Antonio but is captured. Andrugio offers himself as a victim to Piero, who appears to relent, and assents to the marriage of Antonio and Mellida, and the first part closes joyfully.

In Part II Piero reveals his true character. He kills Andrugio, contrives the dishonour of Mellida in order to prevent the match, plots the death of Antonio, and gains the hand of Andrugio's widow. Mellida dies broken-hearted. Antonio, urged by the ghost of his father, assumes the disguise of a fool, and kills Piero.

Antony and Cleopatra, an historical tragedy by Shakespeare (q.v.), probably written about 1606-7, and first printed in the folio of 1623. In it the poet closely follows North's 'Plutarch'.

The play presents Mark Antony, the great soldier and noble prince, at Alexandria, enthralled by the beauty of the Egyptian queen, Cleopatra. Recalled by the death of his wife Fulvia and political developments, he tears himself from Cleopatra and returns to Rome, where the estrangement between him and Octavius Caesar is terminated by his marriage to Octavia, Caesar's sister, an event which provokes the intense jealousy of Cleopatra. But the reconciliation is short-lived, and Antony leaves Octavia and returns to Egypt. At the battle of Actium, the flight of the Egyptian squadron is followed by the retreat of Antony, pursued to Alexandria by Caesar. There, after a momentary success, Antony is finally defeated. On the false report of Cleopatra's death, he falls upon his sword. He is borne to the monument where Cleopatra has taken refuge and dies in her arms. Cleopatra, fallen into Caesar's power, but determined not to grace his triumph, takes her own life by the bite of an asp.

Apelles, a celebrated Greek painter, born probably at Colophon in Ionia, of the time of Alexander the Great, who, it is said, honoured him so much that he forbade any man but Apelles to draw his portrait. When Alexander ordered him to make a picture of Campaspe, one of his mistresses, Apelles became enamoured of her, and Alexander allowed him to marry her. His most celebrated paintings were a picture of Venus Anadyomene for a temple at Cos (subsequently placed by Augustus in the temple of Caesar at Rome), and a portrait of Alexander wielding a thunderbolt. Apelles is said never to have let pass a day without practising with his pencil, whence the proverb, nulla dies sine linea. Apelles is a character in Lyly's 'Alexander and Campaspe' (see Campaspe).

APELLES AND THE COBBLER: a cobbler, having found fault with the drawing of a shoe-latchet in one of the pictures of Apelles, proceeded to criticize the drawing of the legs. To which Apelles replied, 'ne supra crepidam iudicaret', or according to another version, 'ne sutor ultra crepidam', of which the modern equivalent is 'the cobbler should stick to his last'. Hazlitt coined the word 'ultracrepidarian' for a critic who goes beyond the sphere of his knowledge, with reference to William Gifford (q.v.), at one time a shoe-maker's apprentice.

Apemantus, the 'churlish philosopher' in Shakespeare's 'Timon of Athens' (q.v.).

Aphaeresis, the suppression of a letter or syllable at the beginning of a word.

Aphorism, a term transferred from the 'Aphorisms of Hippocrates' to other sententious statements of the principles of physical science, and later (e.g. in Coleridge's 'Aids to Reflection' (q.v.)), which are divided into 'Aphorisms' and 'Comments') to statements of principles generally. Thence it has come to mean any short pithy statement into which much thought or observation is compressed. J. S. Mill wrote a fragment on aphorisms, and John Morley a short discourse on the same subject.

Apis, an ancient Egyptian deity, the incarnation as a bull of Ptah, the god of the sun, identified with Osiris (q.v.). Apis was represented as a bull with the disk of the sun between his horns.

Apocalypse, from a Greek verb meaning 'to disclose', the 'revelation' of the future granted to St. John in the isle of Patmos; the book of Revelation in the N.T.

Apocrypha, THE, in its special sense, those books included in the Septuagint and Vulgate versions of the O.T. which were not originally written in Hebrew and not counted genuine by the Jews, and which, at the Reformation, were excluded from the Sacred Canon by the Protestant party, as having no well-grounded claim to inspired authorship. They are Esdras (I and II), Tobit, Judith, the Rest of Esther, the Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch (with the Epistle of Jeremiah), the Song of the Three Holy Children, the History of Susanna, Bel and the Dragon, the Prayer of Manasses, Maccabees (I and II).

The texts of the Apocryphal Gospels, Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypses are printed in 'The Apocryphal New Testament', translated by M. R. James (1924).

Apollo, called also PHOEBUS, often identified with the sun, was the son of Zeus and Latona (q.v.). He was the god who brings back sunshine in spring, who sends plagues, and who founds states and colonies. He was the god of music and poetry (cf. Shelley's 'Hymn of Apollo') and had the gift of knowing the future, so that his oracles were in high repute. He was the type of manly youth and beauty, and was represented in the famous Colossus (q.v.) at Rhodes. When his son Aesculapius (q.v.) had been killed by the thunders of Zeus, Apollo in his resentment killed the Cyclops who had fabricated the thunderbolts. Banished by Zeus from heaven for this act, he hired himself to Admetus, king of Phærae, as one of his shepherds and served him for nine years. He rewarded the kind treatment of Admetus by obtaining for him the boon that he might be redeemed from death, if another would die in his place (see Alceitis). See also Delos, Delphi. APOLLONIUS RHODIUS, a poet and grammarian of Alexandria, who wrote at the end of the 3rd and beginning of the 2nd cents. B.C. His 'Argonautica', a poem in the Homeric style on the expedition of the Argonauts (q.v.), lacked the epic fire and was the occasion of a literary feud between him and Callimachus (q.v.). He spent part of his life at Rhodes and is said to have subsequently become chief librarian at Alexandria.

Apologia pro Vita sua, see Newman.

Apologie for Poetrie, The, or Defence of Poesie, a prose essay by Sir P. Sidney (q.v.), probably written at Wilton in 1580 during the queen's temporary displeasure with him. A treatise by Stephen Gosson (q.v.), entitled the 'Schoole of Abuse, containing a pleasant invective against Poets, Pipers, Players, Jest-ers, and Such like Caterpillers of a Commonwealth', dedicated to Sidney, was probably the occasion. The 'Apologie' was published in 1595 after Sidney's death, in two editions, one of which bore the first of the above titles, the other the second.

It is a methodical examination of the art of poetry and a critical discussion of the state of English poetry in the author's time, such as had not before appeared in English. Starting with the essential nature of poetry, the art of imitation or representation, the author classifies the various kinds of poetry, discusses their relation to philosophy and history, the objections (including Plato's) that have been raised to poetry, and English poetry from Chaucer to his own day. He next deals with the principles that should be observed in tragedy and comedy, laments the poverty of English lyrical poetry and the affectation of the current English style. Lastly, he deals with prosody in its special relation to the English language.

The above work, which remained unfinished, was a vast synthesis of the moral and political sciences, brought within a theological and metaphysical framework, one of the greatest monuments of the medieval intellect. St. Thomas Aquinas was known as the 'Angelic Doctor', and by his school companions as 'the Dumb Ox'. His followers were called THOMISTS.

Ara vos prec, the title of a work by T. S. Eliot (q.v.), taken from Dante, 'Purgatorio', xxvi. 145. The words are Provençal, 'Now I do pray you'.

Arabesque, the Arabian or Moorish style of mural decoration, composed in flowing lines of branches, leaves, and scroll-work fancifully intertwined. Representations of living creatures were excluded from it. But in the arabesques of the Renaissance human and animal figures, both natural and grotesque, were freely introduced.

Arabia Deserta, Felix, Petraea, in ancient geography, the several parts of the desert region between Egypt, Syria, and the Euphrates. ARABIA PETRAEA included the peninsula of Mt. Sinai and the country N. and NE. of it, and was named after its capital Petra. ARABIA DESERTA included the Syrian desert and part of the Arabian peninsula. ARABIA FELIX (i.e. fertile, as it was supposed to be) included the more southerly parts of the peninsula.

Arabian Nights' Entertainments, or The Thousand and One Nights, is a collection of stories written in Arabic which were made known in Europe early in the 18th cent. by the translation into French of Antoine Galland. They were translated into English by Edward William Lane in 1840, with some omissions, and an unexpurgated version was published by Sir Richard Burton in 1885–8. There is a French translation by J. C. Mar-drus (1899 and subsequent years).

The source of the tales is uncertain. The framework (that is, the story of the king who killed his wives successively on the morning after the consummation of their marriage, until he married the clever Scheherazade, who saved her life by the tales she told him) is of Persian origin. It is mentioned by Mas'udi (A.D. 944) and in the 'Fihrist' (A.D. 987) as occurring in a book called the 'Hezār Afsāne' or 'Thousand Tales', attributed to a Princess Homai, the daughter according to tradition of Artaxerxes I. But the stories themselves told by Scheherazade are, for the most part, not Persian but Arabian in character, and were probably collected in Egypt by a professional story-teller at some time in the 14th–16th centuries.

Arabin, THE REV. FRANCIS, a character in Trollope's 'Barchester Towers' (q.v.) and subsequent Barsetshire novels, a protégé of Dr. Grantly, vicar of St. Ewold's and afterwards Dean of Barchester. He marries the widow, Eleanor Bold.

Arachne, a woman of Colophon in Lydia, so skilful a weaver that she challenged Athene (q.v.) to a contest. She depicted in her work the amours of the gods, thereby arousing the wrath of Athene, who tore the work in pieces. Arachne in despair hanged herself, but was changed into a spider.

Arafa or ARAFAT, a hill near Mecca, the scene of certain ceremonies in the course of the Mohammedan pilgrimage (such as pelting a cairn with stones), no doubt the survival of heathen rites, explained by legends relative to Adam and Eve, to Abraham's sacrifice, and the like.

ARBUTHNOT, JOHN (1667-1735), was M.D. of St. Andrews and physician in ordinary to Queen Anne. He formed a close friendship with Swift and was acquainted with Pope and most of the literary men of his day, and earned general praise both for his medical science, his wit and humour, and his kind heart. His 'History of John Bull' (q.v.), a collection of pamphlets issued in 1712 advocating the termination of the war with France, was included in Pope and Swift's 'Miscellanies' of 1727. The first of these pamphlets was called 'Law is a Bottomless Pit, exemplified in the case of the Lord Strutt, John Bull, Nicholas Frog, and Lewis Baboon, who spent all they had in a Law Suit'. This work was the origin of JOHN BULL, the typical Englishman. Dr. Arbuthnot was the principal author of the 'Memoirs of Martinus Scriblerus' (q.v.), which were published with Pope's 'Works' in 1741. He also wrote medical works, which proved him to be in advance of his age in medical science. Of these the most interesting is 'An Essay concerning the nature of Aliments' (1731), in which he urges the efficacy of appropriate diet in disease, and 'An Essay concerning the effect of Air on Human Bodies' (1733). In 'A Sermon preached to the People at the Mercat Cross, Edinburgh' (1706), he advocated the union of Scotland with England. His 'Essay on the Usefulness of Mathematical Learning' (1701) is said to be an excellent work. He wrote one poem, an ethical study, 'ΤΝΩΘΙ ΞΕΑΥΤΟΝ, Know Thyself' (1734).

Arcades, Part of an Entertainment presented to the Countess-Dowager of Derby at Harefield by some noble persons of her Family, by Milton

ARCADIA

(q.v.), written about 1633. It was probably composed at the request of Henry Lawes, the musician, while Milton was at Horton.

The piece is short, and consists of a song by nymphs and shepherds as they approach the seat of state of the countess, an address to them by the Genius of the Wood, in decasyllabic couplets, describing his occupations and praising music, and two further songs, one by the Genius, the other by the chorus.

Arcadia, a mountainous district in the Peloponnese, the domain of Pan, the shepherd's god, taken as an ideal region of rustic contentment. Arcades ambo, 'Arcadians both', is applied by Virgil (Ecl. vii. 4) to Corydon and Thyrsis, young shepherds and poets. The phrase Et in Arcadia ego is first found in a picture by Guercino (1590-1666). It shows a skull, which shepherds have discovered, with those words inscribed below it, meaning 'Even in Arcady there am I' (sc. 'Death'). The phrase is sometimes misinterpreted, or altered to Et ego in Arcadia [vixi], 'I too have lived in Arcady', to express the idea of a supreme happiness now lost. See E. Panofsky in 'Philosophy and History: Essays presented to E. Cassirer', 1936.

Arcadia, a series of verse eclogues connected by prose narrative, published in 1504 by Sannazzaro (q.v.), occupied with the loves, laments, and other doings of various shepherds in Arcadia. The work, which was immensely popular, was a link between the pastorals of Theocritus and Virgil and those of Montemayor, Sidney, Spenser, and later writers.

Arcadia, Greene's, see Menaphon.

Arcadia, The, a prose romance by Sir P. Sidney (q.v.), including at the end of each book a pastoral eclogue. It was begun in 1580 for the amusement of his sister, the countess of Pembroke, but not published until 1590, after Sidney's death. Sidney had no high opinion of the work and is said to have asked when dying that it should be destroyed. But it has importance in the history of English literature. The chief incidents were dramatized in 'The Arcadia' (1640) by James Shirley (q.v.).

The scene is laid in Arcadia, with its flowery meads, where 'shepherd boys pipe as tho' they would never be old'. The main thread of the story is as follows. Pyrocles and Musidorus, son and nephew of the king of Macedonia, gallant knights and devoted friends, are wrecked on the coast of Laconia. Pyrocles is carried off by pirates, Musidorus rescued by shepherds and carried to Arcadia, whose king, Basilius, in consequence of an oracle, has retired with his young wife Gynecia and his beautiful daughters Pamela and Philoclea into a forest. Pyrocles seeing Philoclea in the forest falls in love with her, disguises himself as a woman (Zelmane), and is admitted by Basilius to his household. Basilius falls in love with Zelmane, while both Philoclea and her mother Gynecia, seeing through the disguise, also fall in love with him.

Musidorus discovers Pyrocles, falls in love with Pamēla, and obtains employment as servant to Dametas, who has charge of Pamēla. He makes love to Mopsa, daughter of Dametas, to veil his affection for Pamēla. The pathetic story is here introduced of the true Zelmene, daughter of the wicked Plexistus, who from love of Pyrocles had followed him as a page, fallen sick, and died. (The character of Bellario in Beaumont and Fletcher's 'Philaster' is borrowed from this Zelmene.) Cecropia, who had been heiress to the crown of Arcadia until Basilius married and had daughters, now carries off Pamēla, Philoclea, and the disguised Pyrocles. She is besieged in the castle where she holds them captive, trying by the most cruel devices to make one or other of the sisters marry her son Amphialus. (Pamēla's prayer during imprisonment acquired celebrity; Charles I on the scaffold handed a copy of it to Bishop Juxon, incurring thereby the censure of Milton.) Finally, after deeds of valour by the disguised Pyrocles, the stirring narrative of which is unfortunately unfinished, the sisters are delivered.

The sisters and Pyrocles return to the forest, where finally Musidorus runs away with Pamēla, and Pyrocles, pestered by both Basilius and Gynecia, gives to each an assignation in a cave on the same night, thus confronting husband and wife with each other. On this occasion Basilius drinks a love potion intended by Gynecia for Pyrocles, and falls apparently dead. Pyrocles is found in Philoclea's chamber and arrested; Musidorus is captured. Gynecia confesses that she is the cause of Basilius's death. Pyrocles and Musidorus are sentenced to death, Gynecia to be buried alive, Philoclea to a nunnery. At this moment a stranger arrives, who reveals the identity of Pyrocles and Musidorus as princes of Macedon and Thessaly, and Basilius comes to life again, his potion proving to have been only a sleeping draught. A general pardon and clearing up follow.

The miscellaneous poems printed with the 'Arcadia' contain little that is comparable to Sidney's other work, but they include the splendid dirge 'Ring out your bells, let mourning shews be spread', and the song 'My true love hath my heart'.

Archangel, an angel of the highest rank, a title generally applied in Christian legend to Michael (q.v.). For the seven archangels enumerated by the Book of Enoch, see under Angel.

Archdeacon Singleton, Letters to, see Singleton.

Archer, a character in Farquhar's 'The Beaux' Stratagem' (q.v.).

Archer, ISABEL, the heroine of H. James's 'The Portrait of a Lady' (q.v.).

ARCHER, WILLIAM (1856-1924), educated at Edinburgh University, was a distinguished dramatic critic, and is remembered for his editing and translation of the plays of Ibsen. He also wrote a life of Macready (1890), a study of Henry Irving (1883), and other works, including the play, 'The Green Goddess'.

Arches, COURT OF, the ecclesiastical court of appeal for the province of Canterbury, formerly held at the church of St. Mary-le-Bow or 'of the Arches' (so called from its arched crypt).

Archie, a popular name during the War of 1914-18 for an anti-aircraft gun.

ARCHILOCHUS of Paros (fl. 648 B.C.), 'one of the great original forces in Greek literature' (Jebb), especially celebrated for his satirical iambic verses, and proverbial for his bitterness. It is said that when Neobulē, who had been promised to Archilochus in marriage, was given by her father to a wealthier man, the poet's satire drove her and her sisters to suicide.

Archimago or ARCHIMAGE, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', is the great enchanter, symbolizing Hypocrisy, who deceives Una by assuming the appearance of the Red Cross Knight (i. i). His deceits are exposed and Archimago is 'laid full low in dungeon deep' (i. xii. 36). From this he emerges in Book II to seek vengeance on Sir Guyon for what he has suffered at the hands of the Red Cross Knight, and employs Braggadochio (q.v.) for the purpose.

Archimēdēs (287-212 B.C.), a famous mathematician of Syracuse, many of whose works are extant, including the treatises 'De Sphaera et Cylindro', 'Circuli Dimensio', &c. He is said to have constructed a kind of orrery representing the movements of the heavenly bodies, to have invented the screw for raising water which bears his name, and to have set on fire with lenses the ships of the Roman consul Marcellus that were besieging Syracuse. When the town was taken, the Roman general gave strict orders that Archimedes should not be hurt and offered a reward to whoever should bring him alive. But a soldier, not knowing who he was, killed Archimedes, who was engaged in solving a problem and refused to follow him. 'Give me where to stand and I will move the earth' is a saying attributed to him. See also Eureka.

Arch-poet, see Golias. The term is also applied in Philemon Holland's translation of Camden's 'Britannia' to 'Henrie of Aurenches, Archpoet to King Henrie the Third', and used by Pope and Fielding as equivalent to poet laureate (q.v.).

Arcite, see Palamon and Arcite.

Ardashir Babagan, a Persian employed by the Parthian king Ardawan, who, as told in the 'Shahnameh' of Firdusi (q.v.), eloped with Ardawan's favourite wife, made himself master of Persia, and became the founder of the Sasanian dynasty. In A.D. 226 he occupied Ctesiphon and took the title of king of the Iranians.

Arden, a large forest in the Midlands, centred in Warwickshire, which figures frequently in Elizabethan literature. The scene of the greater part of Shakespeare's 'As You Like It' is laid there. Drayton in 'Polyolbion', xiii. 15, makes it extend from the Severn to the Trent.

Arden of Feversham, The Tragedy of Mr., a play published in 1592, of which the author is unknown. It has been attributed by some to Shakespeare. It deals with the persistent attempts, finally successful, of Mistress Arden and her paramour, Mosbie, to murder Arden, for which purpose they hire two murderers, Black Will and Shakbag. The crime is discovered and Mosbie and Mrs. Arden are executed. The play is founded on a murder actually committed in February 1550/1 and recorded by Holinshed. A play on the same subject was written by Lillo (q.v.).

Ardenne, THE FOUNTAIN OF, in Boiardo's 'Orlando Innamorato' (q.v.), had the power of changing to hate the love of those who drank its waters.

Ardennes, THE WILD BOAR OF THE, William de la Marck, the third son of John I, count of La Marck and Aremberg, so called because of his ferocity and acts of rapine. He was beheaded in 1485 by order of the Emperor Maximilian. He figures in Scott's 'Quentin Durward', where the historical facts regarding him are perverted.

Areopagitica: a Speech of Mr. John Milton for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing to the Parliament of England, by Milton (q.v.), published in 1644. The title is derived from Areopagus (q.v.).

In this discourse Milton, addressing the 'Lords and Commons of England', attacks their recent order 'that no book . . . shall be henceforth printed unless the same be first approved and licensed by such . . . as shall be thereto appointed'. He shows, first that licensing has been chiefly the practice of those whom the Presbyterian Government most detest, viz. the Papacy and the Inquisition; while Moses, Daniel, St. Paul, and the Fathers, by precept or example, enjoin freedom in the pursuit of learning. Next, that promiscuous reading is necessary to the constituting of human virtue. And thirdly, that the attempt to keep out evil doctrine by licensing is like 'the exploit of that gallant man who thought to pound up the crows by shutting his park gate'. Not only will licensing do no good, but it will be a grave discouragement and affront to learning; and he quotes the case of the imprisoned Galileo. Milton ends with a magnificent exhortation to the 'Lords and Commons of England' to consider 'what nation it is whereof ye are, and whereof ye are the governors: a nation not slow and dull, but of a quick, ingenious and piercing spirit'. He compares it to an 'eagle mewing its mighty youth', and urges that it should not be shackled and restricted. 'Give me the liberty to know, to utter, and to argue freely, according to conscience, above all liberties.'

Areopagus, the hill of Ares (Mars), near the Acropolis at Athens. It was the place of meeting of the 'Upper Council', the highest judicial tribunal of the city, with general supervision in political and religious matters.

Ares, the god of war of the ancient Greeks, identified by the Romans with Mars. He was said to be the son of Zeus and Hera, and to have been detected by Hephaestus (Vulcan) in an amorous intrigue with Aphrodite, caught in a net, and exposed to the ridicule of the assembled gods.

Aréthusa, a fountain in Ortygia (the island in the harbour of Syracuse). Legend relates that the river-god Alpheus (q.v.) fell in love with the nymph Arethusa when she bathed in his stream. She fled from him to Ortygia, where Artemis transformed her into a fountain. But Alpheus, flowing under the sea, was united with the fountain. The myth is the subject of Shelley's poem 'Arethusa', and Milton refers to it in 'Arcades'.

Arethusa, a character in Beaumont and Fletcher's 'Philaster' (q.v.).

ARETINO, PIETRO, or the ARETINE (1492-1556), born at Arezzo in Italy, whence his name. He was author of five comedies and a tragedy, and also of satires and other poems of a scandalous or licentious character. He is frequently mentioned in English works of the Elizabethan and later periods and differently appreciated, from 'It was one of the wittiest knaves God ever made' of Nash ('The Unfortunate Traveller') to 'that notorious ribald of Arezzo' of Milton ('Areopagitica').

Argalla, in Boiardo's 'Orlando Innamorato', the brother of Angelica (q.v.).

Argan, the malade imaginaire in Molière's comedy of that name.

Argante, (1) in the Arthurian legend, Morgan le Fay (q.v.), the fairy queen to whom Arthur, after the last battle, is borne to be healed of his wounds; (2) in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene' (III. vii), a mighty and licentious giantess, daughter of Typhoeus the Titan, whom Satyrane puts to flight; (3) a character in Molière's 'Les Fourberies de Scapin'.

Argantes, in Tasso's 'Jerusalem Delivered' (q.v.), a fierce Circassian, a champion on the pagan side, finally killed by Tancred.

Argents, see Barclay (J.).

Argentile and Curan, a story in the 'Albion's England' of Warner (q.v.), reprinted in Percy's 'Reliques'. King Adelbriht on his death-bed leaves his daughter Argentile to the care of King Edel, who, hoping to get her kingdom, keeps her from the sight of princely suitors. Curan, son of a Danish prince, takes service in Edel's household as a kitchen drudge in order to woo her, and Edel, to further his own plans, encourages his suit. The indignant Argentile flees, and Curan in despair becomes a shepherd. He falls in love with a neatherd's maid, who turns out to be Argentile. They are married, and Curan, claiming his wife's kingdom, conquers and kills Edel and becomes king of Northumberland.

Argentina or ARGENTORATUM, in imprints, Strasburg.

Argestes, the Latin name for the west-south-west, or according to Pliny the west-north-west, wind.

Argonauts, the name given to the heroes who accompanied Jason (q.v.) on board the ship 'Argo' to Colchis to recover the Golden fleece. The cause of this expedition was as follows: Phrixus and Helle, pursued by the hatred of their step-mother Ino (q.v.), fled from Thebes to the court of Aëtes, king of Colchis, on the back of a ram who had a golden fleece and wings. On the way, Helle became giddy and fell into the part of the sea called, in consequence, the Hellespont; but Phrixus arrived safely, sacrificed the ram to Zeus, and dedicated the golden fleece. Aëtes, to obtain possession of the fleece, murdered Phrixus. When Jason, some time after, demanded of his uncle Pelias the kingdom of Iolchos, which Pelias had usurped, Pelias to get rid of him said he would surrender the kingdom if Jason would first avenge the death of their relation Phrixus. Jason undertook the expedition, embarked on the 'Argo' with the bravest of the Greeks, and after many adventures reached Colchis. Aëtes promised to surrender the fleece, which had been the cause of the death of Phrixus, if Jason performed certain difficult tasks. These included the sowing of a dragon's teeth, from which armed men would arise whose fury would be turned against Jason. With the help of Medea (q.v.), the king's daughter, who fell in love with Jason and possessed a knowledge of enchantments, the tasks were successfully accomplished, and Jason and Medea returned to Iolchos with the golden fleece.

The story is the subject of one of Pindar's best odes (Pyth. iv), of the 'Argonautica' of Apollonius Rhodius (q.v.), and of W. Morris's 'Life and Death of Jason' (q.v.).

Argos or ARGUS, (1) a monster with a hundred eyes. Hera, jealous of Io (q.v.), whom Zeus had changed into a heifer, sent Argus to watch her rival. But Hermes by order of Zeus slew him, having lulled him to sleep with his lyre. Hera put the eyes of Argus in the tail of the peacock, a bird sacred to her. (2) the dog of Ulysses (q.v.), who recognized his master on his return from Troy after an absence of twenty years.

Argyle, ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL, eighth earl, first marquess of (1598–1661), who took a prominent part in the events in Scotland that contributed to the downfall of Charles I, figures in Scott's 'The Legend of Montrose' (q.v.), where his character is contrasted with that of his great rival, the earl of Montrose. Beheaded 1661.

Argyle, JOHN CAMPBELL, second duke of (1678–1743), a prime agent in bringing about the union of England and Scotland, and a distinguished military commander (he suppressed Mar's rising of 1715), figures in Scott's 'The Heart of Midlothian' (q.v.).

Ariadne, daughter of Minos (q.v.), king of Crete, fell in love with Theseus (q.v.), who had come to deliver the Athenians from the tribute of youths and maidens sacrificed to the Minotaur (q.v.). With her help he penetrated the Labyrinth where the monster was confined and destroyed it. He carried away Ariadne, but when they arrived at the island of Naxos, forsook her. Ariadne in despair hanged herself, or according to another legend was found by Dionysus (Bacchus), who took her to wife.

Arian heresy: 'under Constantine the emperor about three hundred years and upward after Christ, Arius a priest in the church of Alexandria, a subtle-witted and a marvellous fair-spoken man, but discontented that one should be placed before him in honour, whose superior he thought himself in desert, became through envy and stomach prone unto contradiction, and bold to broach at the length that heresy, wherein the deity of our Lord Jesus Christ contained but not opened in the [Apostles'] creed, the co-equality and co-eternity of the Son with the Father, was denied' (Hooker, 'Eccles. Polity', v. xlii). The heresy was repudiated in the Nicene Creed and in the Athanasian Creed. One of the most interesting points about this heresy is that all the 'barbarian' tribes who overran the western Roman Empire in the 4th, 5th, and 6th cents. had been converted by Arian preachers (except the Franks, who were heathens till the time of Clovis, and the Angles and Saxons). The result was that the Franks were Catholics from the first, and had inducement to fight the Arian tribes.

Ariel, (1) in Shakespeare's 'The Tempest' (q.v.), an airy spirit whom the witch Sycorax has imprisoned in a cloven pine and whom Prospero by his magic releases and employs to give effect to his designs; (2) in Milton's 'Paradise Lost' (vi. 371), a rebel angel; (3) in Pope's 'The Rape of the Lock' (ii. 53 et seq.), the chief of the sylphs 'whose humbler province is to tend the fair'.

Aries, see Ram.

Arimanes, Ahriman (q.v.), the form of that name used by Byron in his 'Manfred' (q.v.).

Arimaspians, a Scythian people, of whom Herodotus (iv. 27) relates that they had only one eye, and that there were gold-guarding gryphons in their country; a legend that probably relates to the presence of gold in the Urals.

Arloch, in Milton's 'Paradise Lost', vi. 371, one of the rebel angels.

ARION (7th cent. B.C.?), a semi-mythical poet and musician of Lesbos, whose principal achievement was to perfect the dithyramb or hymn to Dionysus. He is said to have spent the greater part of his life at the court of Periander, tyrant of Corinth, and also to have visited Italy, where he amassed much wealth. On his return he was thrown overboard by the sailors, who desired to acquire his treasure. But a dolphin, charmed by the song he had been allowed to sing before his death, carried him to land.

Arion, a fabulous horse, the son of Poseidon and Demeter. It belonged to Adrastus (q.v.), and its swiftness enabled him to escape after the failure of his expedition against Thebes.

ARIOSTO, LUDOVICO (1474-1533), born at Reggio, spent the greater part of his life at Ferrara and for many years was in the service, first of Cardinal Ippolito, and then of Duke Alfonso, of Este. This family he exalted in his poem, the 'Orlando Furioso' (q.v.), published in its final form in 1532, the greatest of Italian romantic epics. There is a portrait by Titian, said to be of Ariosto, in the National Gallery.

Ariosto of the North, so Byron calls Sir W. Scott ('Childe Harold's Pilgrimage', iv. 40).

Aristaeus, an ancient divinity worshipped in many parts of Greece, as the protector of flocks and herds, and vines and olives. He is generally described as the son of Apollo and Cyrene. Virgil in the fourth Georgic relates how Aristaeus, having angered the Dryads and lost all his bees in consequence, was able with the advice of Proteus to conciliate the nymphs and obtain new swarms from the carcasses of bulls. He was father of Actaeon (q.v.).

Aristarchus of Samos, who lived about 280 B.C., was an eminent astronomer and mathematician; he lived at Alexandria. Going beyond Pythagoras (q.v.), he maintained that the earth revolved round the sun, and that this was the cause of the seasons.

Aristarchus of Samothrace, a celebrated grammarian and critic, who was head of the Alexandrian Library from c. 180 to c. 145 B.C. His principal work was the revision of the text of Homer's 'Iliad' and 'Odyssey'.

Aristides, an Athenian general and statesman, surnamed 'The Just', who commanded his tribe at the battle of Marathon (490 B.C.) and was archon in 489. He was the advocate of a quiet and conservative policy as opposed to the 'strong navy' policy of Themistocles. The struggle between the leaders became acute and Aristides was ostracized (see below) in 482, but fought at the battle of Salamis, and commanded the Athenian contingent at the battle of Plataea. He died about 468 B.C., so poor that his funeral could not be paid for from his estate. Ostracism (from οστρακον, potsherd) was effected by popular vote, the voters writing on a potsherd or tablet the name of the person they desired to be sent into exile. Plutarch relates that an illiterate voter asked Aristides (not knowing him) to write 'Aristides' upon his tablet. The good man, surprised, asked whether Aristides had ever injured him. 'No,' replied the voter, 'but it vexes me to hear him everywhere called the Just.'

Aristippus, of Cyrene, a disciple of Socrates and founder of the Cyrenaic school of philosophy. He regarded pleasure as the only absolute good in life. But he was not a sensualist, and held that the pleasant was identical with the good, and must be obtained by self-control.

Aristippus, or the Jovial Philosopher, see Randolph (T.).

ARISTOPHANES (c. 448-c. 380 B.C.), the great Athenian comic poet, whose comedies are of historical value for their caricatures of the leading personages of the time and their comments on current affairs. The following are his extant comedies: the 'Acharnians' (an attack on the war-party), the 'Knights' (an attack on the demagogue Cleon), the 'Clouds' (a criticism of the new spirit of philosophical inquiry), the 'Peace' (advocating peace with Sparta), the 'Wasps' (an attack on demagogues), the 'Birds' (general political satire), the 'Frogs' (Euripides and Aeschylus contending for the tragic prize among the dead), the 'Plutus' (an allegory on the coming of wealth to the worthy), the 'Lysistrata' and 'Ecclesiazusae' (dealing with government by women), and the 'Thesmophoriazusae' (Euripides tried and convicted at the female festival of the Thesmophoria).

Aristophanes, THE ENGLISH, Foote (q.v.).

Aristophanes' Apology, a poem by R. Browning (q.v.), published in 1875.

Balaustion (see Balaustion's Adventure) is returning to Rhodes, with Euthukles her husband, after the fall of Athens and the death of Euripides. She relates the events of the night on which the news of the death of Euripides was received. Aristophanes, half-drunk and flushed with the triumph of his 'Thesmophoriazusae', had come to their house, and a discussion had followed, which forms the substance of the poem, between Aristophanes and Balaustion: the former defending comedy as the representation of real life and attacking the ascetic and unnatural Euripides; the latter maintaining the superior value of the tragic poet, and supporting her view by reading his 'Herakles'.

ARISTOTLE (384-322 B.C.), the great Greek philosopher, was born at Stageira in Chalcidice (Macedonia). His father was Nicomachus, the physician of Amyntas II, king of Macedonia. Aristotle studied at Athens under Plato, and stayed there for twenty years. He was subsequently appointed by Philip of Macedon to be tutor to his son Alexander. On the accession of the latter to the throne (335), Aristotle returned to Athens, where in the shady paths surrounding the Lyceum he lectured to many scholars, while walking up and down (περιπατών), whence his school came to be known as the Peripatetic. He remained thus occupied for thirteen years, and here composed the greater part of his works. After the death of Alexander in 323 Aristotle came under political suspicion and retired to Chalcis in Euboea, where he died. His works (in the main notes or summaries of his oral lectures), which had an immense influence on thought and some of which serve as text-books to-day, cover an extraordinarily wide field: logic, moral philosophy, metaphysics, poetry, physics, zoology, politics, and rhetoric. He created Logic, the science of reasoning. He surveyed the whole range of zoology, adopting broad classifications which have been accepted by later science. His most famous treatises are his 'Ethics', an introduction to moral philosophy (he was the first to point out that virtue is a state of the will, and not of the reason), 'Poetics', and 'Politics', though the scope of this last is limited to the city-state of his day. He was made known in the Middle Ages by Latin versions of the commentaries of the Arabian scholar Averroes (q.v.).

Ark, The, Sir W. Raleigh's ship at the battle with the Spanish Armada.

Arlotto Malnardo (1396-1484), the curate or piovano of S. Cresci di Maciuoli, near Fiesole, a witty and jovial priest, who made several journeys to Flanders and is said even to have visited England, where he obtained the favour of Edward IV. The witticisms attributed to him were collected in 'Facetie Piacevoli' (1500), which were frequently reprinted.

Armachanus, the Latin title of the archbishops of Armagh; see Fitzralph.

Armada, THE INVINCIBLE, consisting of some 130 ships (besides smaller vessels), was collected by Philip II of Spain and dispatched in 1588 under the duke of Medina Sidonia. It was to sail to Flanders to transport thence to England the Spanish army of the duke of Parma. It was defeated and dispersed by the English fleet under Lord Howard of Effingham and such captains as Drake, Frobisher, and Hawkins.

frey de Bouillon, and going to the Christian camp lured away by her beauty many of the principal knights. She inveigled them by magic power into a delicious garden, where they were overcome by indolence. Among her captives were Rinaldo of Este and Tancred (qq.v.).

Armine, FERDINAND, the hero of Disraeli's 'Henrietta Temple' (q.v.).

Arminianism, the doctrine of James Arminius or Harmensen (d. 1609), a Dutch protestant theologian, who put forth views opposed to those of Calvin, especially on predestination, refusing to hold God responsible for evil. In 1618-19 his doctrines were condemned by the synod of Dort; but they spread rapidly and were embraced, in whole or in part, by large sections of the Reformed Churches.

Arminius (latinized form of HERMANN) (B.C. 18-A.D. 19), the chief of the German tribe of the Cherusci, who incited his countrymen to rise against the Romans and destroyed the army of Varus in A.D. 8. He also conducted the resistance to Germanicus.

ARMSTRONG, JOHN (1709-79), a physician and poet, author of 'The Art of Preserving Health' (1744), a surprisingly pleasant poem in spite of its unattractive title; also of 'Taste', a satirical epistle of literary criticism.

Armstrong, WILLIAM, known as KINMONT WILLIE (fl. 1596), a border moss-trooper, whose nickname is taken from his castle of Kinmont in Canonby, Dumfriesshire. He was captured in 1587 but escaped; he was imprisoned in 1596 at Carlisle, but was rescued by the Scottish warden. His fate is unknown. He is the hero of the ballad, 'Kinmont Willie', included in Scott's 'Border Minstrelsy'.

Arnaut, an Albanian.

Arno, the river on which stands Florence, the city where Dante was born and the home of Boccaccio, the Medici, &c.

Arnold, in Byron's 'The Deformed Transformed' (q.v.), the ugly son of Bertha, who is miraculously transformed into the shape of Achilles.

Arnold, BENEDICT, see André.

ARNOLD, SIR EDWIN (1832-1904), educated at King's College, London, and University College, Oxford, was principal of the Poona College, Bombay Presidency, 1856 to 1861, when he joined the staff of the 'Daily Telegraph'. The fruit of his Indian experience is seen at its best in 'The Light of Asia, or The Great Renunciation' (q.v., 1879), a poem of which Buddha is the subject. He wrote a number of other poems, some of them translations from the Sanskrit.

ARNOLD, MATTHEW (1822-88), son of T. Arnold (q.v.), the great head master of Rugby, was educated at Rugby, Winchester, and Balliol College, Oxford, where he won the Newdigate Prize. He became fellow of Oriel College, and an inspector of schools, a post which he held from 1851 till 1883. He was professor of poetry at Oxford from 1857 to 1867. His first volume of poems, 'The Strayed Reveller and other Poems', appeared in 1849. It contained 'The Forsaken Merchant', 'The Sick King in Bokhara', and the sonnet on Shakespeare. 'Empedocles on Etna' [q.v.], and other Poems, containing 'Tristram and Iseult' (q.v.), followed in 1852. Both these volumes were shortly afterwards withdrawn from circulation. In 1853 appeared a volume of 'Poems' containing extracts from the earlier books, 'Sohrab and Rustum' and 'The Scholar-Gipsy' (qq.v.); also the 'Church of Brou', 'Requiescat', the 'Memorial Verses to Wordsworth' and the 'Stanzas in Memory of the Author of Obermann'. 'Poems, Second Series', including 'Balder Dead' (q.v.), appeared in 1855; 'Merope, a Tragedy' (q.v.) in 1858; and 'New Poems', including 'Thyrsis' (q.v.), 'Rugby Chapel', 'Heine's Grave', 'A Southern Night' (a lament for one of his brothers), and other well-known pieces, in 1867.

The bulk of Matthew Arnold's prose works appeared after 1860. The most important of these were the 'Essays in Criticism' (1865 and 1888), in which he gave literary criticism an unusually wide scope, extending it to an attack on the 'philistinism' or 'provinciality' then, in his opinion, prevailing in England. He also published lectures, 'On Translating Homer' (1861) and 'The Study of Celtic Literature' (1867). His 'Culture and Anarchy', a criticism of English social and political life, appeared in 1869; and this was followed by various works of religious criticism, 'St. Paul and Protestantism' (1870), 'Literature and Dogma' (1873), 'God and the Bible' (1875), and 'Last Essays on Church and Religion'.

Special reference is due to Arnold's attempts to secure the improvement of education, and particularly secondary education, in England. He was sent in 1859, and again in 1865, to study educational systems on the Continent, and his reports, 'The Popular Education of France' (1861) and 'Schools and Universities on the Continent' (1868), drew attention to our deficiencies in this respect. There are further references to his views on education in other writings, e.g. 'Culture and Anarchy' (1869), and the 'Letters on Compulsory Education' in 'Friendship's Garland' (1871).

ARNOLD, THOMAS (1795-1842), educated at Winchester and Corpus Christi College, Oxford, is principally remembered as the head master (1828-42) who raised Rugby to the rank of a great public school. He was author of an unfinished 'History of Rome' (1838-42), inspired by Niebuhr (q.v.), and of an edition of Thucydides (1830-5). He was appointed Regius professor of modern history at Oxford in 1841. His 'History of the later Roman Commonwealth' appeared posthumously in 1845.

ARNOLD, SIR THOMAS WALKER (1864-1930), a learned writer on the Caliphate, Legacy of Islam, &c.

Arnold of Brescia (d. 1155), an Italian Augustinian, an eloquent ascetic, who vigorously condemned the temporal power and abuses of the clergy and papacy. He gathered round him a following known as Arnoldists, and fomented the revolution by which the Roman republic of 1145 was instituted. Arnold fled from Rome in 1155, was seized by order of Frederick Barbarossa, handed over to the pope, Adrian IV (Nicholas Breakspear), and executed.

Arraignment of Paris, The, a pastoral play in verse by Peele (q.v.), published in 1584.

It was written for and played before Queen Elizabeth, whose beauty and virtue are duly celebrated. Paris is tending his flocks on Ida, with Oenone his wife, when he is called on to decide to which of the three goddesses, Juno, Pallas, or Venus, the golden apple shall be awarded. He decides in favour of Venus, who carries away Paris, leaving Oenone disconsolate. Juno and Pallas arraign Paris before the gods of partiality in his judgement. The case is referred to Diana. She evades the delicate choice by awarding the apple to the nymph Eliza, 'our Zabeta fair'.

Arria, see Paetus.

ARRIAN (c. A.D. 95-175), of Nicomedia in Bithynia, an officer in the Roman army who became consul under Antoninus Pius, wrote a history of the Asiatic expedition of Alexander the Great, with a supplementary account of India, including the voyage of Nearchus, Alexander's general, from the mouth of the Indus to the Persian Gulf; also a manual of the philosophy of Epictetus, and other works.

Arrowsmith, Martin, a novel by Sinclair Lewis (q.v.), published in 1925.

Arsâcês, the founder of the Parthian empire and the first of the Arsacid rulers. He revolted against the Seleucids about 250 B.C.

Arsis, in modern acceptation, the strong or accented syllable in English metre. The precise meaning of the word in Greek is uncertain.

Artegal, a legendary king of Britain, son of Gorbodan, deposed for his crimes and replaced by his brother Elidure. When Artegal returned from exile, Elidure restored him to the throne. The story, which is in Geoffrey of Monmouth, is the subject of a poem, 'Artegal and Elidure', by Wordsworth.

Artegall, Sir, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', Bk. V, the champion of Justice. Britomart (q.v.), to whom his image has been revealed by a magic mirror, is in love with him, and her quest of him ends in their union. Symbolizing Lord Grey de Wilton, he undertakes the rescue of Irena (Ireland) from the tyrant Grantorto. Jointly with Prince Arthur he slays the Soudan (Philip II of Spain).

Artemis, see Diana.

Artemisia, (1) a queen of Halicarnassus in Caria, who accompanied Xerxes in his invasion of Greece and fought with distinction at the battle of Salamis. This is 'the Carian Artemisia' referred to by Tennyson in 'The Princess', ii; (2) the sister, wife, and successor of Mausölus, king of Caria. Her grief at his death was so great that she mixed his ashes with her drink, and built in his memory at Halicarnassus the Mausoleum, which passed for one of the seven wonders of the world. She reigned 352-350 B.C.

The name 'Artemisia' is given to the genus of plants that includes wormwood or absinth, either from the goddess Artemis, because of their medicinal properties, or from the above queen, who mixed her husband's ashes with her drink.

Artful Dodger, THE, a character in Dickens's 'Oliver Twist' (q.v.).

Arthur, KING. The romantic figure of King Arthur has probably some historical basis, and there is reason to think that, as Nennius (q.v.) states, he was a chieftain or general (dux bellorum) in the 5th or 6th cent. The 'Annales Cambriae' (q.v.) place the battle of Mount Badon, 'in which Arthur carried the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ on his shoulders', in 518, and the 'battle of Camlan, in which Arthur and Medraut fell', in 539. The contemporary chronicler Gildas (q.v.) makes no mention of Arthur (though he refers to the battle of Badon), nor do some of the principal Welsh bards of the 6th and 7th cents. But there is mention of him in certain ancient poems contained in the 'Black Book of Carmarthen' and more especially in the ancient Welsh romance 'Kilhwch and Olwen' (q.v.), where he figures with Kay, Bedivere, and Gawain (Gwalchmei). But this Arthur is a king of fairyland, and the author of the tale is building, in Matthew Arnold's words, with the 'materials of an older architecture, greater, cunninger, and more majestic'. In fact, Arthur and several other characters in the Arthurian legend can be traced to figures in the ancient Celtic pantheon (Rhys, 'Studies in the Arthurian Legend', 1901), but their working up and fashioning was, in the wide sense of the word, English (Saintsbury, 'The Flourishing of Romance' in P.E.L.). Rhys suggests that there were originally two Arthurs, the British god and the human general, whose characters have become blended in legend.

Arthur first takes definite form as a romantic hero in the 'Historia Regum Britanniae' of Geoffrey of Monmouth (q.v.), a work in which the author's imagination played a very large part. In this narrative Arthur is the son of Uther Pendragon (Welsh = chief leader in war) and Ygaeerne (Igraine), wife of Gorlois of Cornwall, whom Uther wins by the help of Merlin's magic. The elves bestow on him long life, riches, and virtues. At the age of 15 he becomes king of Britain and wars against Scots, Picts, and Saxons. With his sword 'Caliburn' (Excalibur) he slays Childric, defeats the heathen, and conquers Scotland, Ireland, Iceland, and the Orkneys. He marries Guanhmara (Wenhaver, Guinevere), a lady of noble Roman family. He conquers many lands on the Continent. His court is at Caerleon on Usk. He is summoned to pay tribute to the Emperor Lucius of Rome, resists, and declares war. Guanhmara and the kingdom are left in Modred, his nephew's, charge. On his way to Rome he slays the giant of St. Michael's Mount. Walwain (Gawain), his ambassador, defies the emperor and bears himself bravely in the ensuing combat. Arthur is about to enter Rome when he receives warning that Modred has seized Guanhmara and the kingdom. He returns with Walwain, who is slain on landing. Modred retreats to Cornwall, and in a final battle on the Camel, is slain with all his knights. Arthur is mortally wounded, and is borne to the island of Avalon for the healing of his wounds. Guanhmara takes the veil.

This story was developed by the Norman writer Wace (q.v.), who added many details. The 'Round Table' is first mentioned by him, a device to settle the disputes as to precedence among Arthur's knights. The wounded king is expected to return from Avalon and resume his kingdom. Wace's work served as the basis of the 'Brut' of Layamon (q.v.), the first English record of the 'noble deeds of England', which adds many romantic details, and a fairy element, to the story. Elves are present at Arthur's birth, his sword and spear are of magic origin. After the final battle at Camel-ford, Arthur is borne off to Argante (Morgan le Fay, q.v.) in Avalon, in a magic boat.

The Arthurian story was also developed in the French Matière de Bretagne, by such writers as Marie de France and Chrétien de Troyes, and later by Robert de Boron. Arthur became the centre of a mass of legends in various tongues. A number of these, dealing with various personages, Merlin, Launcelot, Tristram, &c., were gradually associated with him. He is the central figure only in the narratives of his earlier years and of his final battles and death. In the other tales his court is merely the rallying-point for the various adventurous knights. He ceases to be the model of purity and valour, and yields in importance to Gawain and Launcelot.

The story of Arthur, as summarized above, is the foundation of Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur' (q.v.), but the greater part of this work is occupied with the exploits of the Knights of the Round Table, the quest of the Holy Grail, the loves of Lancelot and Guinevere and of Tristram and Iseult. For Tennyson's presentment of the story see Idylls of the King. See also William of Malmesbury; and Glastonbury for Arthur's alleged burial there.

Arthur, PRINCE, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', symbolizes 'Magnificence' (? Magnanimity), in the Aristotelian sense of the perfection of all the virtues. He enters into the adventures of the several knights and brings them to a fortunate conclusion. His chief adventures are the slaying of the three-bodied monster Gerioneo (Philip II of Spain) and the rescue from him of Belgè (the Netherlands) (Bk. v, x and xi); and, jointly with Artegall, the slaying of the Soudan (Philip II) in his 'chariot high' (the Armada) (v. viii). Whether Spenser had in mind any particular living person in his description of Arthur is uncertain; perhaps the earl of Leicester is indicated.

Articles of Confederation and Perpetual Union, THE, were the thirteen Articles, agreed to by the Continental Congress in 1777, which provided for a union of the American Colonies to be known as the United States of America. The Articles were subject to ratification by the individual States, and it was not until 1781, when Maryland finally agreed to the Articles, that ratification was complete. Once the Articles were effective, the old Continental Congress proceeded to act as the Congress of the Confederation.

Articles of Religion, THE, or THE THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES, the thirty-nine statements to which those who take orders in the Church of England subscribe. In 1553 forty-two Articles were published. These were modified and reduced by Convocation to thirty-nine and received parliamentary sanction in 1571.

Arundel Marbles, THE, part of a collection of statuary, pictures, gems, and books made by Thomas Howard, 2nd earl of Arundel (1585?-1646), a patron of learning and the arts. The marbles and many statues were given by his grandson, the 6th duke of Norfolk, to the University of Oxford. The marbles include the 'Parian Chronicle' (q.v.).

Arundines Cami, a collection of Cambridge Latin verses, projected and published in 1841 by Henry Drury (1812-63).

Arvalan, the son of Kehama, in Southey's 'Curse of Kehama' (q.v.).

Arveragus, in Chaucer's 'Franklin's Tale' (see under 'Canterbury Tales'), the husband of Dorigen.

Arviragus, in Shakespeare's 'Cymbeline' (q.v.), one of the king's sons.

Aryan, a term applied by some to the great division or family of languages which includes Sanskrit, Zend, Persian, Greek, Latin, Celtic, Teutonic, and Slavonic, with their modern representatives; also called Indo-European and Indo-Germanic. Also applied to a member of the Aryan family, one belonging to or descended from the ancient people who spoke the parent Aryan language. [OED.]

As You Like It, a comedy by Shakespeare (q.v.), probably produced about 1599, not printed till the folio of 1623. It is a dramatic adaptation of Lodge's romance 'Rosalynde' (q.v.), with the addition of the characters of Jaques and Touchstone, the humorous scenes, and other minor alterations.

Frederick has usurped the dominions of the Duke his brother, who is living with his faithful followers in the forest of Arden (q.v.). Celia, Frederick's daughter, and Rosalind, the Duke's daughter, living at Frederick's court, witness a wrestling match in which Orlando, son of Sir Rowland de Boys, defeats a powerful adversary, and Rosalind falls in love with Orlando and he with her. Orlando, who at his father's death has been left in the charge of his elder brother Oliver, has been driven from home by Oliver's cruelty. Frederick, learning that Orlando is the son of Sir Rowland, who was a friend of the exiled Duke, has his anger against the latter revived, and banishes Rosalind from his court, and Celia accompanies her. Rosalind assumes a countryman's dress and takes the name Ganymede; Celia passes as Aliena his sister. They live in the forest of Arden, and fall in with Orlando, who has joined the banished Duke. Ganymede encourages Orlando to make love to her as though she were his Rosalind. Oliver comes to the forest to kill Orlando, but is saved by him from a lioness, and is filled with remorse for his cruelty. He falls in love with Aliena, and their wedding is arranged for the morrow. Ganymede undertakes to Orlando that she will by magic produce Rosalind at the same time to be married to him. When all are assembled in presence of the banished Duke to celebrate the double nuptials, Celia and Rosalind put off their disguise and appear in their own characters. News is brought that Frederick the usurper, setting out to seize and destroy his brother and his followers, has been converted from his intention by 'an old religious man' and has made restitution of the dukedom.

Jaques, a lord attending on the banished Duke, a contemplative character, compounded of humour and melancholy, and Touchstone, a cynical philosopher in the garb of a buffoon, who marries the country wench, Audrey, are among the delightful minor characters of the play.

Asaph, in the part of 'Absalom and Achitophel' (q.v.) written by Tate, is Dryden, and refers to the Asaph of 1 Chron. xvi. 4-7 and xxv. 1, and the hereditary choir, the 'Sons of Asaph', who conducted the musical services of the Temple.

Asaph, St. (d. c. 600), a pupil of St. Kentigern (q.v.) in his monastery at Llanelwy, and Ascendant, see House (Astrological).

ASCHAM, ROGER (1515-68), was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he distinguished himself in classics and became Greek reader in 1538. He published in 1545 'Toxophilus', a treatise in English in dialogue form on archery, urging the importance of physical training in education. He succeeded Grindal as tutor to Princess Elizabeth in 1548, and travelled on the Continent as secretary to Sir Thomas Morison, English ambassador to Charles V, in 1550-3. In the latter year he became Latin secretary to Queen Mary, being specially permitted to continue in his profession of Protestantism. In 1558 he was appointed private tutor to Queen Elizabeth. In his 'Scholemaster', published after his death, he dealt with the education of boys of position both at school, of which he criticized the prevailing discipline, and after leaving it, pointing out the dangers of idle attendance at court and of Italian travel. By his 'Toxophilus' and 'Scholemaster' and by his 'Letters' he contributed notably to the development of a simple English prose style. His love of sport is interesting. According to Camden ('Annales', 1568), he lived and died a poor man, owing to his addiction to dicing and cock-fighting. Whatever may be the truth about his gambling (which he condemns in 'Toxophilus'), he acknowledges in the 'Scholemaster' his interest in cock-fighting.

ASCLEPIADES, a lyric poet of Samos, of the 3rd cent. B.C., to whom is attributed the invention of the Asclepiadic metre (a spondee, two or three choriambes, and an iambus).

ASHMOLE, ELIAS (1617-92), antiquary and astrologer, studied physics and mathematics at Brasenose College, Oxford. He joined the Royalists and held several government appointments. He presented his collection of curiosities (see Ashmolean Building) to Oxford University, to which he subsequently bequeathed his library. He wrote or edited antiquarian and Rosicrucian works.

Ashmolean Building (the 'Old Ashmolean'), Oxford. Erected between 1679 and 1683 at the charge of the University, for the reception of the collection of natural and artificial curiosities given by Elias Ashmole (based on the collection given to him by John Tradescant, q.v.), and for the promotion of the study of chemistry and natural philosophy. The architect of the building is said ('Oxford Historical Register') to have been Mr. Wood, 'a stone-cutter or mason of Oxford'; the claim that the designer was Sir Christopher Wren is discussed in Sir Charles Mallet's 'History of Oxford' (vol. 3, 1927). The main floor of the building was used from 1901 for the compilation of the Oxford English Dictionary. In 1897 the Ashmolean collection, considerably augmented since its inception, was removed to new buildings in Beaumont Street, now known as the Ashmolean Museum of Art and Archaeology. The present Museum includes also the pictures belonging to the University Galleries.

Asiento Treaty, a treaty between Great Britain and Spain, accompanying the Treaty of Utrecht of 1713, by which Great Britain obtained the exclusive right for a period of years of importing negro slaves into the Spanish colonies in America, and also the right of sending each year one cargo of goods to Portobello.

Aslauga's Knight, a romance by De La Motte Fouqué (the author of 'Undine', q.v.) translated by Carlyle in 'German Romance'.

Aslauga was the daughter of Sigurd and wife of Ragnar Lodbrog. The Knight Froda, long afterwards reading of her, elects her as the lady of his heart and his helper in fight and song. Aslauga appears to him from time to time and controls his destiny, and finally carries him off to the land of spirits.

Asmadai, in Milton's 'Paradise Lost', vi. 365, one of the rebel angels, vanquished by Raphael. The name is the same as 'Asmo-dæus' (q.v.).

ASMODEUS

Asmodeus, in Tobit iii. 8, the evil spirit who loved Sarah, daughter of Raguel, and slew the seven husbands given to her in succession. The spirit was driven away to Egypt by the smoke made by the heart and liver of a fish laid on the ashes of incense, according to instructions given by the angel to Tobias; after which the latter was able to marry Sarah in peace.

Asmodeus is the name given by Le Sage in his 'Diable Boiteux' (q.v.) to the demon companion of Don Cleofas.

Asoka, emperor of India, 264-228 B.C. Inscriptions state that he abandoned a career of conquest by the sword in order to spread the religion of Buddha. He sent missionaries far and wide for this purpose, and is highly venerated by Buddhists.

Asolando, the title of the collection of the last poems of R. Browning (q.v.), published on the day of Browning's death, 12 Dec. 1889. It contains some of the author's most beautiful short pieces, and ends with the well-known 'Epilogue'—'At the midnight in the silence of the sleep-time'. The title is derived from a word ascribed to Cardinal Bembo, asolare, 'to disport in the open air, amuse oneself at random'.

Aspasia, the famous Greek courtesan, daughter of Axiochus of Miletus, came to Athens, where she acquired fame by her beauty, culture, and wit. She so captivated Pericles (q.v.), that he made her his lifelong companion. See Pericles and Aspasia.

Aspatia, a character in Beaumont and Fletcher's 'The Maid's Tragedy' (q.v.).

Asphodel, a genus of liliaceous plants, mostly native of Southern Europe. The poets make it the flower of the Elysian fields (Homer, 'Odyssey', xi. 539) and connect it with the legend of Proserpine (q.v.). The word 'daffodil' is a corruption of 'asphodel'.

Aspramont, Aspramonte in Calabria, which figures in the Charlemagne legends as the scene of a fictitious campaign against the Saracen king.

Asrael, see Azrael.

Assassins, THE, a fanatical sect whose religion was compounded of Magianism and Mohammedanism, founded in Persia at the end of the 11th cent. by Hasan-ben-Sabbah, known as the 'Old Man of the Mountain', from the castle of Alamut in the mountains south of the Caspian which was his stronghold. The Assassins migrated to the Lebanon and were notorious for the secret murders that they carried out at the orders of their chief. It was said that before they attacked an enemy they intoxicated themselves with hashish, whence their name, which means 'hashish-eaters'.

For the story of Hasan-ben-Sabbah's relations with Nizam-ul-Mulk and Omar Khayyam, see under Nizam-ul-Mulk.

ASTOLFO

Asseneth, in a variant of the story of Joseph and Potiphar's wife, is Potiphar's daughter, whom Joseph consents to marry if she will renounce her gods, which she does. An angel signifies approval and Pharaoh gives a feast to celebrate the nuptials. The story, perhaps of early Christian invention, was made the subject of a French prose romance, early in the 14th cent., by Jean de Vignay.

ASSER (d. 909?), a monk of St. David's, who entered the household of King Alfred and studied with him for six months in each year (c. 885). He received the monasteries of Amesbury and Banwell, and later a grant of Exeter and its district, and was bishop of Sherborne. He wrote a Latin life of Alfred and a chronicle of English history between 849 and 887. The authenticity of these has been disputed. The 'Life' is important as 'the earliest biography of an English layman'. The classic edition is by W. H. Stevenson (1904).

Assiento Treaty, see Asiento.

Assonance, the correspondence or rhyming of one word with another in the accented and following vowels, but not in the consonants, as, e.g., in Old French versification.

Assur, ASHUR, or ASSHUR, the local god of the city of the same name, which was the metropolis of the first Assyrian kingdom. He became the supreme god of the Assyrians, the god of war, the protector of the people, represented in a horned cap, shooting an arrow from his bow. His wife was Belit.

Astarte, ASHTAROTH, ASHTORETH, ISHTAR, the eastern equivalent of the Greek Aphrodite, the goddess of love and fruitful increase.

ASTARTE is the name under which Augusta (Byron's half-sister) figures in his poem 'Manfred' (q.v.). The story of Byron and Astarte is told in 'Astarte', by Ralph Milbanke, earl of Lovelace (issued privately in 1905 and for general sale in 1921).

Asti, the name of various wines, still and sparkling, produced at Asti in Piedmont.

Astley, SIR JACOB, Baron Astley (1579-1652), a Royalist who served as major-general with distinction in the Civil War. He was 'hurt' at Edgehill. His prayer before Warwick is famous: 'Lord, I shall be very busy this day: if I forget Thee, do not Thou forget me.'

Astley, PHILIP (1742-1814), the famous equestrian performer and circus-owner, joined General Elliott's light horse in 1759 and became breaker-in and sergeant-major. He opened an exhibition of horsemanship at Lambeth, and in 1770 a wooden circus at Westminster. Subsequently he established in all nineteen equestrian theatres, including Astley's Royal Amphitheatre, London.

Astolat, in Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur' (Ascolet in 'Le Morte Arthur', q.v.), is, according to Malory, Guildford in Surrey. For the 'Fair Maid of Astolat' see Elaine la Blak.

Astolfo, in the 'Orlando Innamorato' and the 'Orlando Furioso' (qq.v.), a courteous and graceful English knight, one of the suitors of Angelica (q.v.), and at one time a prisoner of Alcina (q.v.). He receives from Logestilla (q.v.) a magic horn, the blast of which fills its hearers with panic, and a book that tells him all he wishes to know. He gets possession of the hippogriff of Rogero, and, with an Englishman's partiality for travel, flies about the world, relieves Prester John in Nubia of his troubles with harpies, visits Paradise, whence St. John carries him in a chariot to the moon. There, in a valley, are collected all the things that are lost on earth, lost kingdoms, lost reputations, lost time, and in the heap he finds the lost wits of Orlando, which he restores to the crazy hero. As regards his description as an English knight, it appears that in the earlier French chanson he figures as Estout de Langres, or Lengrois, corrupted into Lenglois and l'Englois (F. J. Snell in P.E.L., 'The Fourteenth Century').

Astoria, or Anecdotes of an Enterprise Beyond the Rocky Mountains, by Washington Irving (q.v.), published in 1836.

One of Irving's early books, devoted to John Jacob Astor's development of the fur trade in the American North-west, and based upon the first-hand information furnished by various travellers.

Astraea, a daughter of Zeus and Themis. According to the poets, she lived on earth during the golden age and was a source of blessing to men; but their impiety drove her to heaven during the brazen and iron ages, and she was placed among the constellations of the zodiac, under the name Virgo.

ASTRAEA in line 290 of Pope's 'Imitations of Horace', Ep. II. i,

'The stage how loosely does Astraea tread', is Mrs. Behn (q.v.).

Astraea Redux, a poem on the Restoration of Charles II, by Dryden (q.v.), published in 1660.

Astrée, see Urfé.

Astrophel, a pastoral elegy, written by Spenser (q.v.) in 1586 on the death of Sir Philip Sidney, who was mortally wounded in that year at Zutphen. Spenser again lamented him in 'The Ruines of Time' (q.v.).

Astrophel and Stella, the series of sonnets in which Sir P. Sidney (q.v.), as commonly thought, expressed his love for Penelope Devereux, daughter of the 1st earl of Essex. In 1580 or in 1581 she was married against her will to Lord Rich, and Sidney's disappointment and passion are supposed to have found voice in these poems. It appears, however, that Penelope was in love before her marriage with Charles Blount, earl of Devonshire, whom she married after her divorce from Lord Rich. This renders the theory of Sidney's devotion to her improbable, but not impossible. The sonnets were not published until 1591, after Sidney's death, and their chronological order is uncertain. Eleven songs, originally printed after the Sonnets, were interspersed among them in the 'Arcadia' of 1598.

Asuras, in later Hindu mythology, evil demons, the enemies of the gods. In the Vedas, the term is frequently applied to the gods themselves.

Asynlur, in Scandinavian mythology, the collective name of the goddesses (see Æsir).

Atabalpa, in Milton's 'Paradise Lost', xi. 409, is Atahualpa, the Inca of Peru who was conquered by Pizarro.

Atala, see Chateaubriand.

Atalanta, according to legend the daughter of Iasus and Clymene, who was exposed by her father and suckled by a she-bear. She lived in celibacy, but her beauty gained her many admirers. She required her suitors to run a race with her. If any reached the goal before her, he was to be her husband; but all whom she distanced were to be killed with her dart. As she was almost invincible in running, many suitors perished in the attempt, till Milanion presented himself. Aphrodite had given him three golden apples from the garden of the Hesperides, and as soon as he had started on his course he cunningly threw down the apples, and Atalanta, charmed at the sight, stopped to gather them, so that Milanion arrived first at the goal. (According to another version, the successful suitor was Hippomenes.) Atalanta was present at the hunting of the Calydonian Boar, which she was the first to wound. She received its head from Meleager (q.v.). For Swinburne's 'Atalanta in Calydon' see Swinburne. 'Atalanta's Race' is the first poem in W. Morris's 'The Earthly Paradise' (q.v.).

Atalantis, The New, see Manley.

Atê, in Greek mythology, a daughter of Zeus, the goddess of evil, who incites men to wickedness and strife.

Atellan or OSCAN FABLES, Atellanae Fabulae, so called from Atella, a town of the Osci in Campania. They were 'a comic but not wanton kind of popular farce' (Lewis and Short), apparently representing scenes in the life of country towns. They were at first performed not by professional actors, but by amateurs. They were written in the Oscan language of southern Italy, which resembled Latin.

Athalia, the name of Racine's greatest play, which deals with the story of Athaliah, daughter of Ahab and Jezebel, and wife of Joram, king of Judah. She put to death all the children of the house of David, save Joash, who escaped and was hid in the house of the Lord. After six years Joash was proclaimed king, and Athaliah slain (2 Kings xi).

Athamas, see Ino.

Athanasian Creed, THE, the creed Quicunque vult, called in some manuscripts the creed of St. Athanasius (q.v.). Its origin has been the subject of much controversy. It is perhaps the work of Caesarius (d. 542), bishop of Arles.

Athanasius (c. 296–373), a famous bishop of Alexandria in the reign of the emperor Constantine, and a vigorous opponent of the Arian heresy. He was in consequence much attacked by the Arians, and persecuted by Constantine and his successor Constantius. For the creed that bears his name see previous entry. He was repeatedly driven into exile and concealment, but remained steadfast in his faith.

Atheism, On the Necessity of, see Shelley (P. B.).

Atheist's Tragedie, The, a tragedy by Tourneur (q.v.), printed in 1611.

D'Amville, the 'atheist', desiring, from the wish to increase the wealth of his family, to marry his son to Castabella, who is betrothed to Charlemont, the son of Montferrers, his brother, arranges that Charlemont shall go abroad on military service. During his absence, D'Amville and Belforest, Castabella's father, achieve their purpose, and Castabella is married to the sickly Rousard. D'Amville then murders Montferrers. Charlemont, falsely reported dead, and exhorted by the ghost of his father to 'leave vengeance to the King of Kings', now returns. D'Amville endeavours to secure his murder, but vengeance comes upon him in the death of his two sons. Finally, when himself about to carry out the execution of Charlemont, he dashes out his own brains by accident, and Charlemont is united to Castabella.

Athelstane of Coningsburgh, a character in Scott's 'Ivanhoe' (q.v.).

Athelston, a verse romance of about the year 1350, of some 800 lines. Four messengers meeting by chance in the forest swear brotherhood. One, Athelston, becomes king of England, and makes one of the brothers archbishop of Canterbury, one earl of Dover, and one earl of Stane and husband of Athelston's sister. Dover secretly accuses Stane and his wife of plotting against the king. Athelston imprisons them. The queen intercedes, but the king brutally kicks her and kills her unborn child. The archbishop, interceding in turn, is ordered to give up his office, but excommunicates the king, who submits on a threat of popular rising. Stane is tried by ordeal and exculpated. The king declares the son of the countess of Stane (St. Edmund) his heir. Dover is exposed by ordeal and executed.

Athenae Oxonienses, see Wood (A.).

Athenaeum, The, a literary and artistic review founded in 1828 by James Silk Buckingham (q.v.). It rose to eminence under the editorship of Charles Wentworth Dilke (q.v.), and many of the greatest English writers of the nineteenth century were among its contributors. 'It was full of the most awful swipes about poetry and the use of globes. . . . Golly, what a paper!' (John Finsbury in 'The Wrong Box' by R. L. Stevenson and Lloyd Osbourne, 1889, ch. xv). 'The Athenaeum' was incorporated in 'The Nation and Athenaeum' in 1921, and this in turn in 'The New Statesman' in 1931.

Athenaeum Club, THE, in London, was founded in 1824 as an association of persons of literary, scientific, and artistic attainments, patrons of learning, &c. Among its founders were the earls of Liverpool and Aberdeen, the marquess of Lansdowne, Scott, Davy, Faraday, Croker, Lawrence, and Moore. (There was an 'Athenaeum' at Rome, a university on the Capitoline, founded by the emperor Hadrian, for the promotion of science and literature.)

Athēnē, the Greek goddess of wisdom, industry, and war, identified by the Romans with their goddess MINERVA. She was the daughter of Zeus and Metis, and sprang fully grown and armed from the brain of her father, who had swallowed Metis when pregnant, fearing that her child would be mightier than he. Athene quarrelled with Poseidon for the right of giving the name to the capital of Cecropia (see under Cecrops). The assembly of the gods settled the dispute by promising the preference to whichever gave the more useful present to the inhabitants of the earth. Thereupon Poseidon struck the ground with his trident, and a horse sprang up. But Athene produced the olive, was adjudged the victor, and called the capital ATHENAE. The meaning of her other name Pallas is unknown. It was perhaps the name of a goddess of some other religion with whom the Greeks identified Athenae. She is represented generally with a countenance marked by masculine firmness and composure rather than by softness and grace. In one hand she holds a spear, in the other a shield with the head of Medusa (q.v.) displayed upon it. See also Arachne, Marsyas.

Athenian Gazette, The (afterwards known as the 'Athenian Mercury'), 'resolving all the most Nice and Curious Questions', was a penny weekly sheet issued from 1689/90 to 1695/6, a precursor of 'Notes and Queries'. It was published by Dunton (q.v.).

Athens of the North, a term applied sometimes to Edinburgh, sometimes to Copenhagen.

Atherstone, THE, a celebrated pack of foxhounds, dating from the end of the 18th cent., whose country lies partly in Leicestershire, partly in Oxfordshire, with Nuneaton as the centre.

ATHERTON, GERTRUDE FRANKLIN (1857–1948), American novelist, born at San Francisco. Her chief works are: 'Patience Sparhawk and her Times' (1897), 'The Aristocrats' (1901), 'Tower of Ivory' (1910), 'Black Oxen' (1923), 'The Crystal Cup' (1925).

ATHOS

Athos, Mt., the 'Holy Mountain', the easternmost of the three Chalcidic peninsulas projecting into the Aegean Sea from Macedonia. It has been occupied since the Middle Ages by various communities of monks.

Athos, Porthos, and Aramis, the 'Three Musketeers' (q.v.) in Alexandre Dumas's novel of that name.

Atkins, THOMAS or TOMMY, see Tommy Atkins.

Atlantic Charter, the name commonly given to the joint declaration, issued on 14 July 1941 by President Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill, of certain common principles in the national policies of their countries. These may be roughly summarized as follows. The U.S. and Britain (i) seek no aggrandizement; (ii) desire no territorial changes not wished for by the peoples concerned; (iii) respect the right of all peoples to choose their form of government and desire restoration of sovereign rights and self-government to those who have been deprived of them; (iv) will promote access on equal terms by all States to trade and raw materials; (v) will aim at collaboration of all nations to secure improved economic conditions and social security; (vi) desire, after the destruction of Nazi tyranny, a peace providing security for all nations and freedom from want and fear for all men, and (vii) enabling all to traverse the seas without hindrance; (viii) believe that, pending the establishment of a permanent system of general security, the disarmament of the aggressor nations is essential.

Atlantic Monthly, The, an American, and more particularly a New England, magazine, founded in 1857 with J. R. Lowell (q.v.) as editor. It has numbered among its distinguished contributors, O. W. Holmes, Emerson, Bret Harte, Whittier, and C. E. Norton (qq.v.).

Atlantis, a fabulous island in the ocean west of the Pillars of Hercules, a beautiful and prosperous country, the seat of an empire which dominated part of Europe and Africa. But owing to the impiety of its inhabitants, it was swallowed up by the sea. The story is told by Plato in the 'Timaeus'.

Atlantis, New, see New Atlantis.

Atlas, one of the Titans (q.v.). As punishment for his part in the revolt of the Titans he was employed to support the heavens with his head and hands somewhere in the west of the earth. He was changed into a mountain by Perseus (q.v.), who, being refused hospitality by Atlas, turned the eyes of the Medusa upon him. According to Lucian ('Charon') Hercules visited Atlas and for a time relieved him of his burden. Atlas was father of the Pleiades, Hyades, and Hesperides (qq.v.).

Atll, in W. Morris's 'Sigurd the Volsung' (q.v.), the Attila of history.

Atom, The History and Adventures of an, a satire by Smollett (q.v.), published in 1769.

ATTICUS

The Atom, having in the course of its trans-migrations lived in the body of a Japanese, relates to one Nathaniel Peacock his experiences in Japan. Japan stands for England, and the various Japanese personages referred to in the story represent prominent characters in the recent political history of England (e.g. Yak-strot, the earl of Bute). The satire is of the utmost coarseness.

Atossa, (1) wife of Darius and mother of Xerxes, the Persian king whose attempt in the 5th cent. B.C. to subjugate Greece met with disaster. She is a prominent figure in Aeschylus's tragedy of 'The Persians'; (2) see Moral Essays.

Atrēus, according to Greek legend, a son of Pelops (q.v.) and king of Argos. The tragedy associated with his name does not appear in Homer. The post-Homeric poets relate that Atreus, to revenge himself on his brother Thyestes for seducing his wife, invited Thyestes to a banquet and served him the flesh of his children to eat. Thyestes fled in horror, cursing the house of Atreus, which was visited by various calamities. Thyestes became the father of Aegisthus (q.v.) by his own daughter Pelopia. Aegisthus slew Atreus, who had ordered him to kill Thyestes, and restored Thyestes to the throne of which Atreus had deprived him. Atreus was the father of Agamemnon and Menelaus (qq.v.).

Atropos, see Parcae.

ATTERBURY, FRANCIS (1662-1732), educated at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford, became bishop of Rochester, after holding various important preferments. He engaged in the Phalaris (q.v.) controversy and in the political and theological disputes of the day. He was imprisoned in 1720 for alleged participation in a plot to restore the Stuarts, and subsequently left the country and threw in his lot definitely with the Jacobites. In religion he was a strong supporter of the Church of England, and opposed to the Latitudinarians (q.v.). He was a notable preacher and a trenchant political writer. His 'Sermons' were published in 1740, and his 'Miscellaneous Works' in 1789-98. His 'Discourse occasioned by the Death of Lady Cutts' appeared in 1698.

Attic, a dialect of ancient Greek spoken at Athens and in the surrounding country (Attica). As an epithet, it is applied to a pure, simple, polished style, as being characteristic of the best Greek writers.

ATTIC SALT, refined, delicate, poignant wit, of a kind characteristic of the ancient Athenians. From the Latin sal atticum, the word sal meaning both 'salt' and 'wit'.

See also Order.

Attic boy, THE, in Milton's 'Il Penseroso' (q.v.); see Cephalus.

Atticus, the character under which Pope (q.v.) satirized Addison (q.v.) in lines published in 1723 in a miscellany entitled 'Cytherca, or poems upon Love and Intrigue', and reprinted in 'Miscellanies, the last Volume', 1728. The lines, much altered, reappeared in Pope's 'Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot' (193-214), 1735.

ATTICUS

The original of the character, T. Pomponius Atticus (109-32 B.C.), was a Roman eques (a member of the order of 'Knights', who held a middle rank between the Senate and the Plebs). His surname was given him on account of his long residence in Athens and knowledge of Greek literature. He was a close friend of Cicero, whose letters to him still exist.

Attila, king of the Huns. He ravaged the Eastern Empire during the years 445-50, and after making peace with Theodosius, invaded the Western Empire and was defeated at Châlons by Aëtius in 451. He died in 453. The terror he inspired is shown in the name given to him, the 'Scourge of God' (flagellum Dei). In German heroic legend he figures as ETZEL, and in Norse legend as ATLI.

Attis, a Phrygian deity connected with the myth of the 'Great Mother', Rhea, Cybele, or Agdistis. Attis was the beautiful son of Nana, daughter of the river-god Sangarius; she conceived him after gathering the fruit of an almond tree sprung from the blood of Agdistis. Agdistis fell in love with Attis, and because he wished to marry the daughter of the king of Pessinus, drove him mad so that he mutilated himself. His spirit passed into a pine tree and violets sprang up from his blood. His death was mourned for two days, after which his recovery was celebrated, a symbol of the death and revival of plant life.

AUBREY, JOHN (1626-97), antiquary, educated at Trinity College, Oxford, was author of a 'Perambulation of Surrey', which was included in Rawlinson's 'Natural History and Antiquities of Surrey' (1719); of a collection of 'Lives' of eminent persons, much used by Anthony à Wood (q.v.), and subsequently published in 1813 (fuller editions in 1898 and 1931); and of 'Miscellanies' (1696), a book of stories and folk-lore.

Auburn, see Deserted Village.

Aubusson carpets, carpets made at the celebrated factory of Aubusson, in the Creuse, a department of central France. The factory dates from the 15th cent.

Aucassin and Nicolette, a 13th-cent. legend of Provence, which has been translated or adapted by F. W. Bourdillon, Swinburne, Andrew Lang, and Eugene Mason. With 'Amis and Amile' (see Amis and Amiloun) it forms the subject of one of Pater's 'Studies in the History of the Renaissance'. The original is in prose interspersed with songs.

Aucassin, son of Count Garins of Beaucaire, loves Nicolette, a beautiful Saracen captive. The father forbids their marriage and immures Nicolette in a tower, and subsequently, after further dissension with his son, imprisons Aucassin himself. The damsel escapes and is followed by Aucassin, and the story is concerned with their simple adventures and faithful love, which is finally rewarded.

Auchinleck (pron. 'Affleck'), the name of the family estate of James Boswell (q.v.).

Audhumla, in Scandinavian mythology, the cow that fed the giant Ymir (q.v.) with her milk.

Audrey, in Shakespeare's 'As You Like It' (q.v.), the country wench wooed and won by Touchstone.

Audrey, St., St. Etheldreda, daughter of Anna (king of East Anglia) and patron saint of Ely.

TAWDRY LACE, a silk 'lace' or neck-tie much worn by women in the 16th and early 17th cents., appears in the earliest quotation as St. Audrey's lace. It is told by Baeda that St. Audrey died of a tumour in the throat, which she considered to be a just retribution because in her youth she had for vain show worn many splendid necklaces. Harpsfield, archdeacon of Canterbury in the 16th cent., thinks that the silk neck-tie may have been worn in memory of this. Skinner in his 'Etymologicon' (1688) explains tawdry lace as 'ties . . . bought at the fair held at the fane of St. Etheldreda'. There is no discrepancy between the two statements. 'St. Audrey's laces' would naturally be largely offered for sale at her fair, and this doubtless led to the production of cheap and showy qualities of the article, which at length gave to tawdry its later meaning. [OED.]

AUDUBON, JOHN JAMES (1780-1851), an American ornithologist of French descent, noted for his remarkable pictures of birds. His 'Birds of America' was published in 1827-30, and his 'Ornithological Biography' in 1831-9.

Aufidius, a character in Shakespeare's 'Coriolanus' (q.v.).

Augéan Stables. Augeas, king of Elis, had an immense herd of oxen, whose stables had never been cleansed. Their cleansing in one day was one of the labours imposed on Hercules (q.v.) by Eurystheus. Hercules undertook the task for a reward of a tenth part of the herd, and accomplished it by changing the course of the river Alpheus so that it should flow into the stables. Augeas refused the promised payment on the pretext that Hercules had made use of artifice. Hercules thereupon conquered Elis and put Augeas to death.

Augsburg, INTERIM OF, a statement of religious doctrine prepared at the bidding of Charles V in 1548, which was in the nature of a compromise, adopting from the Roman Catholic position such doctrines as transubstantiation and papal supremacy, and from the Protestant position justification by faith and the marriage of priests.

AUGSBURG

Augsburg Confession, a statement of the Protestant position drawn up by Melancthon for the Diet of 1530.

Augusta, the name of several Roman towns colonized by Augustus or otherwise considered worthy of the title. Thus Augusta Emerita (Merida) in Lusitania was colonized by Augustus with veterans of the fifth and tenth legions, and Augusta Praetoria (Aosta) with men of the praetorian guard.

Ammianus Marcellinus (fl. A.D. 390) refers to Londinium (the Roman London) as a city on which the title Augusta had been conferred. Thomson in his 'Seasons' ('Spring') uses the name for London.

Augusta of Berkely, THE LADY, the heroine of Scott's 'Castle Dangerous' (q.v.).

Augustan Age, a period of literary eminence in the life of a nation, so named because during the reign of the Emperor Augustus (27 B.C.–A.D. 14) Virgil, Horace, Ovid, Tibullus, &c., flourished. The term is applied in the history of English literature to the period of Pope and Addison, or limited to the reign of Queen Anne, or extended backwards to include Dryden. In French literature the term is applied to the period of Corneille, Racine, and Molière. Goldsmith has an essay on the 'Augustan Age in England' in 'The Bee'; he identifies it with the reign of Queen Anne. See also Saintsbury's 'The Peace of the Augustans', a survey of 18th-cent. English literature (1916).

Augustin or AUSTIN FRIARS, a religious order of mendicant friars, formed in the 13th cent. to bring together under the single rule of St. Augustine a number of small congregations of hermits. Many houses of the order were swept away by the Reformation. Austin Friars Church in London (Old Broad Street) formed part of the priory founded in 1253, when the first friars of the order had recently reached England. At the dissolution, the church was transferred to the Dutch Protestants, who still possess it.

AUGUSTINE, ST., of HIPPO (345–430), was born at Tagaste in Numidia (Constantine), his mother being Monica, a devout Christian. He was trained as a rhetorician, formed an irregular union, and was father of a son (Adeodatus). He was for a time a Manichaean, but was converted after hearing the sermons of Ambrose, bishop of Milan, where Augustine was a teacher of rhetoric. The scene of his conversion is vividly described in his 'Confessions'. He became bishop of

AURELIA ALLOBROGUM

Hippo, and was engaged in constant theological controversy, combating Manichaeans, Donatists, and Pelagians. The most famous of his numerous works is the 'De Civitate Dei' ('City of God'), a treatise in vindication of the Christian Church. His 'Confessions' contain a striking account of his early life. His sermons were used throughout the Middle Ages. Augustine died during the siege of Hippo by the Vandals. His principal tenets were the immediate efficacy of grace, and absolute predestination; he furnished the doctrinal basis of the revolt of Luther and Calvin, and of the Jansenist heresy.

Augustine, Sr. (d. 604), first archbishop of Canterbury. He was prior of Pope Gregory I's monastery of St. Andrew at Rome, and was sent by that pope with forty monks to preach the Gospel in England. He was favourably received by King Ethelbert, who was afterwards converted. Augustine was consecrated 'bishop of the English' at Arles. He founded the monastery of Christ Church at Canterbury. St. Augustine's, also at Canterbury, was a Benedictine abbey, named from its founder, and is now used as a missionary college. St. Augustine is commemorated on 26 May.

Augustinian Canons, an order of canons regular of the Roman Catholic Church, who adopted the rule of St. Augustine in the 11th cent. The order spread to various parts of Europe, including England, during the later Middle Ages.

Augustus, GAIUS JULIUS CAESAR OCTAVIANUS (63 B.C.–A.D. 14), the nephew of Julius Caesar, and first Roman emperor, occupying the throne from 27 B.C. till his death. The title of Augustus was conferred on him in 27 B.C. by the senate and people as a mark of their veneration. It was borne by all subsequent Roman emperors; even Charlemagne used it, and several of his successors in the Holy Roman Empire.

Auld Lang Syne, a song whose words were contributed by Burns (q.v.) to the fifth volume of James Johnson's 'Scots Musical Museum' (1787–1803). It was not entirely of Burns's composition, but was taken down by him, according to his own account, 'from an old man's singing'. But, in fact, the refrain, at least, had long been in print. The original version has been attributed to Sir Robert Aytoun, an ancestor of W. E. Aytoun (q.v.).

Auld Reekie, a term familiarly applied to the old town of Edinburgh, in allusion to its smoky atmosphere.

Auld Robin Gray, see under Lindsay (Lady A.).

Aulic Council, a sovereign court in the Holy Roman Empire, instituted in 1506, which sat at Vienna. It heard appeals from the courts of the Germanic states.

AULUS GELLIUS, see Gellius.

AURENG-ZEBE

Aureng-Zebe, a tragedy by Dryden (q.v.), published in 1676.

This was Dryden's last rhymed play, and he subsequently adopted the use of blank verse. The plot is remotely based on the contemporary events by which Aureng-Zebe wrested the empire of India from Shah Jehan, his father, and from his brothers. But it turns on the attempt first of the old emperor, then of Morat, one of his sons, to take from Aureng-Zebe, by violent means, Indamora, a captive queen, his affianced bride. The attempt is defeated by the constancy of Indamora and the generous qualities displayed by Aureng-Zebe and by Arimant, the governor of Agra, aided by the jealous rivalry of Nourmahal, the empress.

Aurignac, in the Haute-Garonne, France, gives its name, from the flint implements found there, to an industry or culture, the AURIGNACIAN, which is believed to have prevailed in France from about 11,500 to 10,000 B.C. 'Throughout all this time Aurignacian men continued to carve figures and engrave small objects, and to decorate the walls of the caves which they inhabited' (Peake and Fleure, 'Hunters and Artists'). The three principal types of man of this culture are the Grimaldi, Cro-Magnon, and Combe Capelle.

Aurōra, the Greek Eos, a daughter of Hyperion (q.v.) and the goddess of the dawn. She is represented by the poets as rising in the east from the couch of her husband Tithonus, drawn in a rose-coloured chariot, preceding the sun, pouring the dew upon the earth, and making the flowers grow.

Aurora Leigh, a romance in blank verse by E. B. Browning (q.v.), published in 1856.

Aurora Leigh tells the story of her life. She is left an orphan, studious and poetical by nature, and is brought up in the uncongenial home of an aunt. She is often with her rich cousin, Romney Leigh, a man wrapped up in philanthropic schemes, but arrogant and dogmatic. He proposes to her, but his proposal, suggestive that he wants a 'help-mate not a mistress', wounds her pride and she refuses him. She goes to live in London, earning her bread by her pen. Romney rescues a poor outcast daughter of a tramp, Marian Erle, and offers to marry her. But the project is defeated. Later, when misfortune has overtaken Romney, his philanthropic plans have failed, his Hall has been burnt down and himself blinded, he and Aurora come together. The story is made the vehicle for the expression of the author's views on a variety of subjects, social, literary, and ethical.

Aurora Raby, a character in the last three cantos of Byron's 'Don Juan' (q.v.), a beautiful and innocent young heiress.

Aurungzebe, see Aureng-Zebe.

Ausonia, a name applied by poets to Italy, from the Ausones, an ancient, perhaps Greek, name for the inhabitants of middle and southern Italy.

AUSONIUS, DECIMUS MAGNUS (c. A.D. 310-90), a Roman poet, born at Bordeaux, near which he also died. He taught grammar and rhetoric, and acquired such reputation that he was appointed tutor to Gratian, son of the Emperor Valentinian, and in Gratian's reign rose to high official position. Among his many poems was one on the Moselle, its wine and trout.

AUSTEN, JANE (1775-1817), was born at Steventon in Hampshire, of which her father was rector, and lived an uneventful life at her birthplace, at Bath, Southampton, Chawton (near Alton), and Winchester, where she died and is buried. Of her completed novels (for which see under their titles) 'Sense and Sensibility' appeared in 1811, 'Pride and Prejudice' in 1813, 'Mansfield Park' in 1814, 'Emma' in December 1815, 'Northanger Abbey' and 'Persuasion' posthumously in 1818. The order in which they were written is somewhat different. 'Pride and Prejudice', in its original form and entitled 'First Impressions', was begun in 1796, refused by a publisher in 1797, and revised before ultimate publication. 'Sense and Sensibility' was begun in 1797 but apparently left unfinished for many years. 'Northanger Abbey' was begun in 1797, sold to a publisher in 1803, but not then published. The manuscript was recovered in 1816, and may have been revised, but appears to represent the earliest of her work as we have it in the six published novels. 'Mansfield Park' was begun in 1811, 'Emma' in 1814, and 'Persuasion' in 1815. Besides these Jane Austen was author of two works which she did not publish, 'Lady Susan' (the story, written about 1805, and told in letters, of a designing coquette, the widow Lady Susan Vernon) and a fragment, 'The Watsons' (q.v.). These were published by J. E. Austen-Leigh in the second edition of his 'Memoir of Jane Austen' (1871). A further fragment, written in 1817, known to her family as 'Sanditon', was published in 1925. The standard edition of Jane Austen is that of R. W. Chapman, 1923; Letters, 1932.

AUSTIN, ALFRED (1835-1913), of a Roman Catholic family, was educated at Stonyhurst and Oscott College. He became a barrister, but soon abandoned the legal profession for literature. He was much interested in foreign politics and a devoted follower of Disraeli. In 1883 he became joint-editor with W. J. Courthope of the newly founded 'National Review', and was its sole editor for eight years after the latter's resignation in 1887. Between 1871 and 1908 he published twenty volumes of verse, of little merit. A prose work, 'The Garden that I love', published in 1894, proved very popular, and in 1896 Austin was made poet laureate, shortly afterwards publishing in 'The Times' an unfortunate ode celebrating the Jameson Raid. Some of his pleasantest work is to be found in his prose writings, on the garden of his Kentish home (Swinford Old Manor) and kindred subjects. His 'Autobiography' appeared in 1911.

AUSTIN, JOHN (1790-1859), was called to the bar at the Inner Temple after serving in the army, was professor of jurisprudence at the London University, 1826-32, and while holding this post wrote his famous 'Province of Jurisprudence Determined' (1832). His 'Lectures on Jurisprudence' were published in 1863.

AUSTIN, MARY HUNTER (1868-1934), American novelist, short-story writer, essayist, and dramatist, chiefly known for her studies of American Indian life. Among her works are 'The Arrow Maker' (1911), 'The Basket Woman' (1904), 'A Woman of Genius' (1912), 'The Land of Little Rain' (1903), 'The American Rhythm' (1923).

AUSTIN, SARAH (1793-1867), née Taylor, wife of John Austin (q.v.), translated Ranke's 'History of the Popes' (1840), 'The History of the Reformation in Germany' (1845), and 'Germany from 1760 to 1814' (1854); also F. W. Carové's 'Story without an End' (1834).

Austin, the name of a popular English make of motor-car, after Sir Herbert Austin, the manufacturer; the 'Baby Austin', a 7 h.p. model, was the first successful attempt to produce a reliable car of very small horsepower.

Autōlýcus, (1) in Greek mythology, a son of Hermes, celebrated for his craft as a thief, who stole the flocks of his neighbours and mingled them with his own. In this he was outwitted by Sisyphus (q.v.); (2) the witty rogue and pedlar in Shakespeare's 'The Winter's Tale' (q.v.).

Autōmēdon, the charioteer of Achilles (q.v.). Hence a name used to signify a coachman.

Autun, THE BISHOP OF, sometimes used to designate Talleyrand (Charles Maurice de Talleyrand-Périgord, 1754-1838), the French diplomatist who played a great role as minister under Napoleon I and Louis XVIII. He had been appointed bishop of Autun in 1788. He accepted the Civil Constitution of the Clergy, but afterwards put off his orders.

Avalon, AVALLON, or AVELION, in the Arthurian legend, a place in the 'Isle of the Blessed' of the Celts, a mythical land like the Fortunate Isles (q.v.). It is to Avalon that Arthur is borne after his death. See Glastonbury for its identification with that place.

AVERROËS

Avare, L' ('The Miser'), one of Molière's most famous comedies. Harpagon, the miser, and his son Cléante are rivals for the hand of Mariane. Cléante gets possession of the casket containing the miser's treasure, and gives his father, whom his loss has reduced to frenzy, the choice between Mariane and the casket. The old man chooses the latter and abandons Mariane to his son.

Avars, a Tartar tribe who migrated to the region about the Don, the Volga, and the Caspian Sea in the 6th cent. Thence they extended their dominion westward to the Danube, were subdued by Charlemagne, and disappeared from history in the 9th cent. They built stockades of wood and earth round their settlements, known as AVAR RINGS, of which traces still remain. In one of these, in 796, Charlemagne, after defeating the Avars, captured an immense treasure, the fruit of the pillage of the Greek Empire by the Avars.

Avatar, in Hindu mythology, the descent of a deity to the earth in incarnate form; hence loosely, a manifestation, display, phase.

Ave atque vale, Latin, 'hail and farewell', as a farewell to the dead, notably in the poem of Catullus in memory of his brother, to which Tennyson refers in his poem 'Frater, ave atque vale'.

Ave Maria, 'Hail Mary!', the angelic salutation to the Virgin (Luke i. 28) combined with that of Elizabeth (v. 42), used as a devotional recitation, with the addition (in more recent times) of a prayer to the Virgin, as Mother of God; so named from its first two words.

AVELLANEDA, ALONSO FERNANDEZ DE, the name assumed by the author of the false Part II of Cervantes's 'Don Quixote', issued in 1614. Cervantes's own Part II appeared in 1615.

Avenel, SIR JULIAN and MARY, characters in Scott's 'The Monastery' and 'The Abbot' (qq.v.). ROLAND AVENEL is the hero of the latter work. The WHITE LADY OF AVENEL is a supernatural being introduced in 'The Monastery'.

Aventine, THE, the most southerly and one of the highest hills of Rome. On it was a temple of Diana, the sanctuary of runaway slaves and of plebeians.

Avernus, a lake of Campania, filling the crater of an extinct volcano. From its surface mephitic vapours arose, which led the ancients to regard it as the entrance to the infernal regions.

AVERROËS (ABUL WALID MOHAMMED BEN AHMED IBN ROSHD) (1126-98), a Moslem doctor born at Cordova, and a philosopher, the author of a famous commentary on Aristotle.

AVERROËS

He is mentioned with Avicenna (q.v.) by Dante, 'Averrois, che il gran comento feo' ('Inferno', iv. 144).

Avesta, the sacred writings of the Parsees, usually attributed to Zoroaster (q.v.). As we have them, they are the fragmentary and composite relic of an ancient priestly literature said to have been destroyed by Alexander the Great at Persepolis. In its present form it probably dates from the Sasanian period, but the oldest extant manuscript is of comparatively recent date (13th cent.).

AVIÄNUS, FLAVIUS, probably of the 4th cent. A.D., the author of fables in Latin elegiacs, which were much used as a school book in the Middle Ages.

Avice Caro, in Hardy's 'The Well-Beloved' (q.v.), the name of the three women, mother, daughter, and granddaughter, loved in succession by Jocelyn Pierston.

AVICENNA (ABU IBN SINA) (980-1036), a Persian physician and philosopher and commentator on Aristotle. He is mentioned by Dante ('Inferno', iv. 143).

Avignon, a city on the Rhône in France. Clement V removed the papal seat to Avignon in 1308, and there it remained until 1377. It was sold by Joanna I, queen of Naples, to Pope Clement VI in 1348, Provence being then the inheritance of the Angevin kings of Naples. After the outbreak of the papal schism in 1378, two anti-popes, Clement VII and Benedict XIII, resided successively in Avignon, the latter being expelled from the town in 1408. The city remained, with interruptions, in the possession of the popes until annexed by the French National Assembly in 1791. Avignon is also famous for its connexion with Petrarch (q.v.).

Avon, THE SWAN OF, Shakespeare, born at Stratford-on-Avon, so called by Jonson ('To the Memory of Shakespeare').

Awkward Age, The, a novel by Henry James (q.v.), published in 1899.

Awntyrs (Adventures) of Arthure at the Terne Wathelyne, an alliterative verse romance of the 14th cent., containing two parts. In the first, Arthur and his court go from Carlisle to 'Tarn Wathelyne' (Tarn Wadling near Hesketh in Cumberland) to hunt. Queen Guinevere is entrusted to the care of Gawain. During a storm, a fearful figure, the spirit of Guinevere's mother, appears to Guinevere and Gawain, reproaches her for her evil life, exhorts her to penance and amendment, and prophesies the destruction of King Arthur and the Round Table. The second part relates a fight between Gawain and Sir Galleron of Galway, who seeks to recover his lands taken by Arthur and given to Gawain. Arthur stops the fight, makes Gawain lord of Wales, and restores to Galleron his former territory.

AYTOUN

Ayala's Angel, a novel by A. Trollope (q.v.), published in 1881.

Lucy and Ayala Dormer, after having been brought up in an artistic and luxurious home, are left penniless orphans. The romantic Ayala is taken into the family of her aunt Emmeline, the vulgar and purse-proud wife of the city millionaire, Sir Thomas Tringle; while Lucy goes to the home of her uncle Dosett, a civil servant of small means, and his conscientious but depressing wife. Trouble soon follows. Lucy rebels against the drab conditions of life in the small house at Notting Hill, and Ayala shows a lack of proper deference to her wealthy aunt and cousins. An exchange is effected, and Ayala goes to Notting Hill. But this does not mend matters. Lucy falls in love with an impecunious artist; and Ayala, with equal perversity, refuses three eligible suitors: Tom Tringle, her cousin, who tries to charm her by a display of his jewellery, and shows his disappointment by knocking the breath out of a policeman and other outrageous proceedings; Colonel Jonathan Stubbs, an Admirable Crichton but for his red hair and large mouth; and the absurd Captain Batsby, who thinks the possession of a very pretty little place of his own down in Berkshire a sufficient claim to her affections. In the end, however, Ayala discovers that Stubbs is the 'Angel' after all, and sufficient means of subsistence are found for Lucy and her artist. Many amusing situations are also furnished by the love affairs of the two Tringle daughters.

Ayenbite of Inwit, 'Remorse of Conscience', a prose translation from a French moral treatise, made by Dan Michel of Northgate, Canterbury, about 1340, and chiefly of philological interest.

Ayesha, the favourite wife of Mohammed (q.v.). To her loss of a necklace under conditions regarded as suspicious may broadly be traced, it is said, the seclusion of Moslem women down to the present times.

Ayesha, (1) a novel by Morier (q.v., 1834), which introduced the Turkish word 'bosh' into English; (2) a novel by Sir Rider Haggard (q.v.).

Aylwin, a novel by W. T. Watts-Dunton (q.v.).

Aymon, The Four Sons of, a medieval French romance. See Rinaldo.

Ayrshire Legatees, The, a novel by Galt (q.v.), published in 1820.

It takes the form of letters recording the proceedings of a worthy Scottish minister and his family in the course of a visit which they pay to London in order to take possession of a legacy. Their naive comments on their experiences, and the comments of their friends in Scotland on the letters themselves, make an entertaining miscellany.

AYTOUN, WILLIAM EDMONDSTONE (1813-65), a descendant of the poet Sir Robert

AYTOUN

Aytoun (1570-1638) who was the reputed author of the lines on which Burns based his 'Auld Lang Syne', was educated at Edinburgh Academy and University. He divided his life between law and literature, becoming professor of Belles-Lettres at Edinburgh in 1845, and sheriff of Orkney in 1850. He is chiefly remembered for his share in the 'Bon Gaultier Ballads' (q.v., 1845), for his 'Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers' (q.v., 1849), and for his 'Firmilian, or the Student of Badajoz' (1854), a mock-tragedy, in which he parodied and ridiculed the poems of the so-called 'Spasmodic School' (q.v.). The hero of 'Firmilian', a student at the university of Badajoz, is engaged in writing a tragedy on the subject of Cain. In order to equip himself for his task, to learn 'the mental spasms of the tortured Cain', he embarks on a career of crime, with absurd results.

BABES IN THE WOOD

Azlm, the hero of 'The Veiled Prophet of Khorassan', one of the tales in Moore's 'Lalla Rookh' (q.v.).

Azo, in Byron's 'Parisina' (q.v.), the marquis of Este.

Azoth, the alchemists' name for mercury, and the universal remedy of Paracelsus (q.v.).

Azrael, in Jewish and Mohammedan mythology, the angel who in death severs the soul from the body.

Aztecs, a native American people first known as inhabitants of the valley of Mexico. They became important and extended their conquests in the 15th cent., their most successful leader being Montezuma I (1440-69). The Aztecs were conquered by the invading Spaniards under Cortez, early in the 16th cent. They figure in Southey's 'Madoc' (q.v.).

Aztlan, in Southey's 'Madoc' (q.v.), the capital of the Aztecas. The word means 'place of the heron' and is, in Aztec legend, the original home of the Aztec race.

B

B.B.C., THE, the BRITISH BROADCASTING CORPORATION, the national broadcasting authority, constituted in 1927. It succeeded the British Broadcasting Company, which had been formed in 1922.

Baal, name of the chief god, or in the plural (BAALIM) of the gods, of the Phœnician and Canaanitish nations; hence, a false god. The name appears in various forms and combinations, e.g. BEEL, the Baal of Babylon; BAAL-ZEBUB, the 'fly-god', &c.

Bāb, THE, or GATE, the name given to Mirza Mohammed Ali, a Shiite, who began to preach a reformed Moslem religion in Persia in 1845 and was executed in 1850. His followers were called the BABIS, and his religion BABISM. The Babis were expelled from Persia after an attempt on the life of the Shah.

The Bāb was succeeded in 1866 by Abdul-Baha, who preached a revised form of Bābism, in which the Koran is recognized, but its finality as a revelation is denied. The BAHAIS are now a flourishing sect, with their centre at Acre.

Bab Ballads, a collection of humorous ballads by W. S. Gilbert (q.v.), published in 'Fun' in 1866-71 and in volume form in 1869 and ('More Bab Ballads') 1873. Several of the Gilbert and Sullivan operas (q.v.) owed their origin to the 'Ballads', e.g. 'Patience', 'Iolanthe', 'Ruddigore', and 'The Yeomen of the Guard'. This matter is fully dealt with in I. Goldberg's 'The Story of Gilbert and Sullivan' (1929).

Babbage, CHARLES (1792-1871), educated at Peterhouse, Cambridge, a mathematician and scientific mechanician. He was a founder, secretary, and later, member, of the Astronomical Society. He devoted thirty-seven years of his life and much of his fortune to the perfection of a calculating machine of his invention.

Babbitt, a novel by S. Lewis (q.v.), published in 1922.

The book depicts life in Zenith, a prosperous American town of the present century, with its hustle, 'business-punch', and 'modern ideals', where minds and electrical appliances are equally standardized. Against this background the author draws in minute detail the character and mode of life of George F. Babbitt, a successful real-estate broker (what we should call a house-agent), weak, snobbish, lying, not averse to a questionable business deal if sufficiently remunerative; but periodically revolting against the futility of his life and the tyranny of his environment, even developing mildly liberal opinions (quickly suppressed by the 'Good Citizens' League')—altogether an intensely human and familiar being.

BABBITT, IRVING (1865-1933), American critic and professor at Harvard, born in Dayton, Ohio, who, with Paul Elmer More and W. C. Brownell, was a defender of the classic tradition in recent American criticism. Among his works are 'The New Laokoon' (1910), 'The Masters of Modern French Criticism' (1912), 'Rousseau and Romanticism' (1919), 'Democracy and Leadership' (1924), and 'On Being Creative' (1932).

Babu, a Hindu title of respect answering to our Mr. or Esquire; hence, a native Hindu gentleman; also in (Anglo-Indian use) a native clerk or official who writes English; sometimes applied disparagingly to a Hindu, or more particularly a Bengali, with a superficial English education.

Babylon, a magnificent city, once the capital of the Chaldee empire; also the mystical city of the Apocalypse; whence in modern times applied polemically to Rome or the papal power, and rhetorically to any great and luxurious city.

THE WHORE OF BABYLON is a term applied to the Roman Catholic Church by the early puritans, with reference to Rev. xvii.

THE HANGING GARDENS OF BABYLON are said to have been made, on the slope of the city towards the river, by Nebuchadnezzar (605-562 B.C.), who devoted much care to beautifying the city (Diodorus Siculus).

Babylon, an old ballad, of which the plot is known 'to all branches of the Scandinavian race', of three sisters, to each of whom in turn an outlaw proposes the alternative of becoming a 'rank robber's wife' or death. The first two choose death and are killed by the outlaw. The third threatens the vengeance of her brother 'Baby Lon'. This is the outlaw himself, who thus discovers that he has unwittingly murdered his own sisters, and thereupon takes his own life. The ballad is in Child's collection (1883-98).

Babylonian Captivity, the period (c. 603-536 B.C.) during which the Jews were captive in Babylon. Nebuchadnezzar, having subdued Judaea, removed the inhabitants to Babylon, whence they were released by Cyrus. 'By the waters of Babylon we sat down and wept, when we remembered thee, O Sion'; Ps. cxxxvii. 1.

'Babylonian Captivity' is also applied to the period of the residence of the popes at Avignon, under French influence, beginning with Clement V in 1308.

Bacbuc, in Rabelais, IV. i, and V. xxxiv et seq., the oracle of the Holy Bottle, consulted by Panurge on the question whether he should marry (see Pantagruel).

Bacchanalla, the mysteries or orgies celebrated in ancient Rome in honour of Bacchus (q.v.). They were attended by such licentiousness that they were suppressed in 186 B.C., but the evidence of excesses is now discredited by some and the suppression attributed to political motives.

Bacchanals, priests, priestesses, or votaries of Bacchus (q.v.).

Bacchantes, priestesses of Bacchus, represented with dishevelled hair and garlands of ivy, carrying a thyrsus, and clashing cymbals.

BACON

Bacchus, a name of the Greek God Dionysus (q.v.).

BACCHYLIDES, the most important Greek lyric poet after Pindar, since the publication by F. G. Kenyon (1897) of extensive fragments of his works discovered in the Oxyrhynchus papyri. He lived about 470 B.C., a native of Iulis in Ceos, and was a nephew of Simonides.

Bach, JOHANN SEBASTIAN (1685-1750), born at Eisenach, of a family that included many musicians, was one of the greatest composers of all time. He was for many years musical director of two churches at Leipzig, where he composed most of his music. Much of this is of a sacred character, highly intellectual, and showing a supreme command of counterpoint and fugue.

Dacharach, a town on the Rhine giving its name to a wine formerly much esteemed.

BACHELLER, IRVING (1859-1950), American writer born at Pierpont, N.Y., and educated at St. Lawrence University, known chiefly for his popular novel, 'Eben Holden' (1900), and for his story of Lincoln, 'A Man for the Ages' (1919).

Back Kitchen, THE, in Thackeray's 'Pendennis' (q.v.), was 'The Cyder Cellars' in Maiden Lane, frequented by Porson, Maginn, Charles Dickens, &c.

Backbite, SIR BENJAMIN, one of the scandal-mongers in Sheridan's 'School for Scandal' (q.v.).

Backwell, EDWARD (d. 1683), a London goldsmith and banker at the Unicorn in Fleet Street, probably the chief originator of the system of bank-notes. He had financial dealings with Cromwell and Charles II, and was ruined by the closing of the exchequer by the latter in 1672. There are frequent references to him in Pepys's 'Diary'.

Bacon, FRIAR, see Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay.

BACON, FRANCIS, first BARON VERULAM and VISCOUNT ST. ALBANS (1561-1626), was the younger son of Sir Nicholas Bacon, Lord Keeper in Queen Elizabeth's reign. He was born at York House, in the Strand, London, and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. He was admitted to Gray's Inn and went through the various steps of the legal profession. He entered Parliament in 1584 as member for Melcombe Regis, and subsequently represented other constituencies. He then wrote papers on public affairs, including a 'Letter of Advice to Queen Elizabeth' urging strong measures against the Catholics. He made the acquaintance of the earl of Essex, who treated him with generosity and endeavoured to advance him in his career. Nevertheless, having been appointed to investigate the causes of Essex's revolt in 1601, he was largely responsible for the earl's conviction. He married Alice Barnham in 1606, became Solicitor-General in 1607, Attorney-General in 1613, Lord Keeper in 1617, and Lord Chancellor in 1618. In 1621 he was charged before the House of Lords with bribery, and confessed that he had been guilty of 'corruption and neglect' but denied that he had ever perverted justice. He was deprived of the great seal, fined, condemned to confinement during the king's pleasure, and disabled from sitting in parliament. He remained in the Tower only a few days, the fine being subsequently assigned by the king to trustees for Bacon's own use. The remaining years of his life were spent in literary and philosophical work. Pope described him as 'the wisest, brightest, meanest of mankind'.

Bacon's works may be divided into three classes, the philosophical (which form by far the greatest portion), the literary, and the professional works. The principal and best known of the philosophical works are: (1) the 'Advancement of Learning' (q.v.), published in English in 1605; (2) the 'Novum Organum' (q.v.), published in Latin in 1620, under the general title 'Francisci de Verulamio . . . Instauratio Magna', with a second title (after the preface) 'Pars secunda operis, quæ dicitur Novum Organum sive indicia vera de interpretatione naturæ'; and (3) the 'De Augmentis', published in Latin in 1623 with the title 'Opera F. Baconis de Verulamio . . . Tomus primus, qui continet de Dignitate et Augmentis Scientiarum libros ix'. It was Bacon's ambition to create a new system of philosophy, based on a right interpretation of nature, to replace that of Aristotle; the 'Novum Organum' describes the method by which the renovation of knowledge was to be achieved, and is thus the keystone to the whole system. The 'Advancement of Learning', of which the 'De Augmentis' may be regarded as an enlarged edition, was included in the 'Great Instauration' or Renewal of the Sciences as a preliminary review of the present state of knowledge. Of Bacon's literary works, the most important are the 'Essays' (q.v.), first published in 1597, and issued in final form in 1625; 'De Sapientia Veterum', published in 1609; 'Apophthegms New and Old', published in 1624; the 'New Atlantis' (q.v.) in 1626; and the 'History of Henry the Seventh' in 1622. The largest and most important of his professional works are the treatises entitled 'Maxims of the Law' and 'Reading on the Statute of Uses'.

Bacon wrote much in Latin, and always endeavoured to clothe in that language the works to which he attached importance, with a view, as he supposed, to their greater permanence. Yet he was capable of varied and beautiful styles in English, and there is a peculiar magnificence and picturesqueness in much of his writing. Many of the sentences in the 'Essays' have assumed almost the character of proverbs. But he is sometimes obscure. The standard edition of Bacon's 'Works' is that of James Spedding (q.v.), published in 1857-9, followed by the 'Life and Letters' in 1861-74.

BACON, ROGER (1214?-94), philosopher, studied at Oxford and Paris, where he may have graduated doctor, returned to England c. 1250, and probably remained at Oxford till c. 1257, when he incurred the suspicion of the Franciscan order, to which he belonged. He was sent under surveillance to Paris, where he remained in confinement ten years. He produced at the request of Pope Clement IV Latin treatises on the sciences (grammar, logic, mathematics, physics, and modern philosophy)—'Opus Majus', and, perhaps, 'Opus Secundum' and 'Opus Tertium'. He was again in confinement for his heretical propositions, c. 1278-92, and is said to have died and to have been buried at Oxford. He wrote also on chemistry and alchemy. By the public of his day he was regarded as a necromancer, and was believed to have constructed a brazen head capable of speech.

Roger Bacon may be described as the founder of English philosophy. Like his more famous namesake of the 17th cent., he advocated the substitution of an appeal to experience for the scholastic method of argument from general premisses based on authority. Like him, he begins by stating the chief causes of error (offendicula)—authority, custom, the opinion of the ignorant many, the concealment of ignorance under a show of knowledge. But, unlike Francis Bacon, he attached importance to mathematics, and his scientific method, by recognizing the value of deduction, is better than that of his namesake. At the same time, Bacon's outlook remained medieval and mystical. His attack on the methods of scholasticism was taken up again and developed by William Ockham (q.v.) in the next century. Bacon was a man of great learning: he had a wide knowledge of the sciences, was an accomplished Greek scholar, and knew Hebrew and Aramaic. As a practical scientist he invented spectacles, and indicated the manner in which a telescope might be constructed.

Bacon and Bungay, (1) the rival publishers in Thackeray's 'Pendennis' (q.v.); (2) see Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay.

Baconian Theory, the theory that Francis Bacon (q.v.) wrote the plays attributed to Shakespeare. It was started, apparently, in the middle of the 18th cent., and is based partly on (supposed) internal evidence in Shakespeare's plays (the knowledge displayed and the vocabulary), and partly on external circumstances (the obscurity of Shakespeare's own biography). Some holders of the theory have found in the plays cryptograms in support of it, e.g. in the word 'honorificabilitudinitatibus' in 'Love's Labour's Lost' (v. i).

Among prominent supporters of the theory, some of them Americans, may be mentioned Lord Penzance ('Judicial Summing Up'), Sir T. Martin ('Shakespeare or Bacon?'), I. Donnelly ('The Great Cryptogram'), Mrs. Gallup

Badinguet, a nickname of Napoleon III.

Badman, The Life and Death of Mr., an allegory by Bunyan (q.v.), published in 1680.

The allegory takes the form of a dialogue, in which Mr. Wiseman relates the life of Mr. Badman, recently deceased, and Mr. Attentive comments on it. The youthful Badman shows early signs of his vicious disposition. He beguiles a rich damsel into marriage and ruins her; sets up in trade, swindles his creditors by fraudulent bankruptcies, and his customers by false weights; breaks his leg when coming home drunk, and displays a short-lived sickbed repentance. His wife dies of despair, and Badman marries again, but his second wife is as wicked as he is, and they part 'as poor as Howlets'. Finally Badman dies of a complication of diseases. The story is entertaining as well as edifying, and has a place in the evolution of the English novel.

Badminton, the name of the duke of Beaufort's country seat in Gloucestershire. It has been given to a cooling summer drink, to the game resembling lawn-tennis played with shuttlecocks, and to a series of books on the various sports.

Badon, MOUNT, the scene of a battle connected with the legends of Arthur. It is first mentioned by Gildas (q.v.), but without reference to Arthur. The 'Annales Cambriae' (q.v.) give the date of the battle as 518, and state that Arthur bore the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ there and the Britons were victorious. Badon is identified by some authorities with Bath, by others with Badbury near Wimborne. For a discussion of the question see E. K. Chambers, 'Arthur of Britain'.

Baffin, WILLIAM (d. 1622), navigator and discoverer. He was pilot in the Muscovy Company's expeditions of 1615 and 1616 in search of the North-West Passage, which resulted in the discovery of the bay which has since been given his name. He was killed at the siege of Kishn in an expedition against the Portuguese in the Persian Gulf. He wrote accounts of most of his voyages.

BAGE, ROBERT (1728-1801), a paper-maker by trade, was author of six novels, 'Mount Henneth' (1781), 'Barham Downs' (1784), 'The Fair Syrian' (1787), 'James Wallace' (1788), 'Man as he is' (1792), and 'Hermesprong or Man as he is not' (1796). Scott included the first, second, and fourth in his 'Ballantyne novels'. Bage was a materialist, and 'Hermesprong', the best of his works, the story of a 'natural man' without morals or religion, is written to expound his views.

BAGEHOT, WALTER (1826-77), of Langport, Somerset, educated at Bristol and at University College, London, was a banker and shipowner, joint-editor with R. H. Hutton of the 'National Review' after 1855, and editor of the 'Economist' from 1860 till his death. His remarkable insight into economic and political questions is shown in his 'The English Constitution' (1867), 'Lombard Street' (1873), and 'Economic Studies' (1880, ed. Hutton). His 'Physics and Politics' (1876) is an 'application of the principles of natural selection and inheritance to political society'. In his 'Literary Studies' (1879) were republished papers contributed by him to the 'National Review'.

Bagford Ballads, The, illustrating the last years of the Stuarts' rule and the last years of the 17th cent., were published by the Ballad Society in 1878. They were assembled by John Bagford (1651-1716), originally a shoemaker, a book-collector who made for Robert Harley, first earl of Oxford, the collection of ballads that was subsequently acquired by the duke of Roxburghe, and at the same time made a private collection for himself.

Bagnell, MRS., a character in Meredith's 'Lord Ormont and his Aminta' (q.v.).

Bagnet, MR. and MRS., characters in Dickens's 'Bleak House' (q.v.).

BAGNOLD, ENID (Lady Jones), contemporary writer, author of 'National Velvet' (1935) and other works.

Bagstock, MAJOR JOE, a character in Dickens's 'Dombey and Son' (q.v.).

Bahals, see Bab.

Bahram I, the king of Persia who put to death Mani, the founder of Manichaeism (q.v.), in A.D. 274.

Bahram Gur, or the 'Wild Ass', a national hero of Persia, who came to the throne in A.D. 420, celebrated as a hunter in the 'Rubā'yyāt' of Omar Khayyām (q.v.).

Balae, a town on a small bay near Naples, in beautiful surroundings and possessing warm mineral springs, a favourite resort of the Romans, who built many palaces and villas there. Its site is now covered by the sea.

Bailey, THE OLD, on the site of Newgate gaol, the seat of the Central Criminal Court in London, so called from the ancient bailey or ballium of the city wall between Lud Gate and New Gate, within which it was situated. (A bailey is an external wall enclosing the outer court of a feudal castle, forming the first line of defence.)

Balarão, in the 'Orlando Furioso' (q.v.), the horse of Rinaldo. See Bayard.

BAILEY, NATHAN or NATHANIEL (d. 1742), author of an English dictionary (1721), the forerunner of Johnson's and very popular.

BAILEY, PHILIP JAMES (1816-1902), was privately educated at Nottingham and matriculated in Glasgow University with a view to the Presbyterian ministry, but soon renouncing this intention, studied law in a solicitor's office and became a barrister of Lincoln's Inn. Deeply impressed by Goethe's 'Faust' and feeling compelled to give his own version of the legend, he retired in 1836 to the seclusion of his father's house at Old Basford, near Nottingham, where in three years he wrote the original version of his 'Festus' (q.v.), published in 1839. A second, much enlarged edition appeared in 1845. The final edition of 1889, which exceeded 40,000 lines, incorporated the greater part of three volumes of poetry that had appeared separately in the interval: 'The Angel World' (1850), 'The Mystic' (1855), and 'The Universal Hymn' (1867). Bailey is often regarded as the father of the 'Spasmodic School' (q.v.). In 1856 he received a civil list pension. In 1858 he published 'The Age', a colloquial satire.

Bailiff's Daughter of Islington, The, the title of an old ballad, included in Percy's 'Reliques'. A squire's son loves the bailiff's daughter of Islington (probably the place of that name in Norfolk), but his friends send him to London bound as an apprentice. After seven years the lovers meet again and are united.

BAILLIE, JOANNA (1762-1851), Scottish dramatist and poetess, published in 1798 her first volume of 'Plays on the Passions', containing 'Basil' and 'De Monfort'; the latter was produced by Kemble and Mrs. Siddons in 1800. A second volume appeared in 1802, and a third in 1812. Her most successful drama, 'The Family Legend', was produced in 1810. 'Miscellaneous Plays' appeared in 1836. Miss Baillie's poems ('Fugitive Verses', 1790, and 'Metrical Legends', 1821) show sprightly humour. She was a close friend of Sir Walter Scott, who much admired the 'Plays on the Passions'.

BAKER

BAILLIE, ROBERT (1599-1662), Scottish Presbyterian divine, minister of Kilwinning, Ayrshire, and subsequently professor of divinity (1642) and principal (1660) of Glasgow University. He was with the Covenanters' army at Dunse Law, 1639, and in 1640; and was sent to London to draw up accusations against Laud, 1640. His 'Letters and Journals' (Bannatyne Club, 1841-2) are of importance for the history of the Civil War.

Bailly, HENRY, in Chaucer's 'Canterbury Tales' (q.v.), the host of the Tabard Inn.

BAIN, ALEXANDER (1818-1903), born in Aberdeen of humble parents, left school when eleven years old to work as a weaver, but continued his studies and obtained a bursary at Marischal College. He visited London and made the acquaintance of Mill and Carlyle. In 1860 he was appointed professor of logic at Aberdeen. In 1876 he founded the periodical 'Mind'. His two principal philosophical works were 'The Senses and the Intellect' (1855) and 'The Emotions and the Will' (1859). His other works include 'Mental and Moral Science' (1868), 'Logic' (1870), 'Mind and Body' (1872), and 'James Mill, a Biography' and 'J. S. Mill, a Criticism with Personal Recollections' (1882). Bain was one of the first exponents of a scientific psychology based on a physiological method that traces psychological phenomena to nerve and brain. He elaborated Mill's doctrine that the mind is to be explained by experience and association of ideas, extending this view from the intellect to the will and emotions. Though a Utilitarian in general, he accepted the existence in the human mind of 'motives that pull against our happiness', and held that purely altruistic conduct is possible.

Baines, CONSTANCE and SOPHIA, characters in Bennett's 'The Old Wives' Tale' (q.v.).

Bairam, the name of two Mohammedan festivals—the LESSER BAIRAM, lasting three days, which follows the fast of Ramadan (q.v.), and the GREATER BAIRAM, seventy days later, lasting four days.

Bajazet or BAJAYET, ruler of the Ottomans (1389-1402), overran the provinces of the Eastern empire and besieged Constantinople, but was interrupted by the approach of Timour (Tamerlane), and was defeated and taken prisoner by him. He figures in Marlowe's 'Tamburlaine the Great' and Rowe's 'Tamerlane' (qq.v.).

BAKER, SIR SAMUEL WHITE (1821-93), traveller and sportsman, whose explorations contributed to the knowledge of the sources of the Nile. He discovered and named Albert Nyanza (Lake Albert). He was appointed in 1860 for four years governor-general of the Equatorial Nile basin. His best-known works are 'Rifle and Hound in Ceylon' (1853), 'The Nile Tributaries of Abyssinia' (1872), and 'Ismailia' (1874).

BALAAM

Balaam, requested by Balak, king of Moab, to curse the invading Israelites, but warned by God not to do so, yet went on his ass with the princes of Moab. He would have been killed by an angel standing in the way if his ass had not saved him. When he beat the ass, the Lord opened her mouth, and she reproved him. Finally Balaam, inspired by God, foretold the happiness of Israel (Num. xxii-xxiv).

Balaam, SIR, the subject of a pungent satire in Pope's 'Moral Essays', Ep. iii. 339 et seq., a religious, punctual, frugal citizen tempted by the Devil through wealth, who becomes a corrupt courtier. He takes a bribe from France and is hanged:

The Devil and the king divide the prize;
And sad Sir Balaam curses God and dies.

Balaclava, a small seaport on the coast of the Crimea, near Sebastopol, was the scene in the Crimean War of the famous charge of the Light Brigade (26 Sept. 1854), celebrated in Tennyson's poem. The Russians, about 12,000 strong under General Liprandi, had captured certain redoubts held by a small force of Turks, and thus threatened the port. They had next attacked the English and been repulsed by the Heavy Brigade under General Scarlett. Owing to a misconception of Lord Raglan's orders, Lord Lucan then ordered Lord Cardigan with the Light Cavalry to charge the Russian army, which had reformed with artillery in front. The charge was heroically carried out, but out of 673 officers and men who took part in it, 247 were killed or wounded.

Balade of Charltie, The, see Chatterton.

Balafré, LE, HENRI DE GUISE (1550-88), a leader of the Ligue directed against the Protestants in France and one of the authors of the massacre of St. Bartholomew, so called from a scar on his face. He conspired to oust Henri III from the throne of France, but the latter caused him to be assassinated at the château of Blois. Scott gives this nickname, in his 'Quentin Durward' (q.v.), to Ludovic Lealy, the hero's uncle, one of the Scottish Archers of the Guard.

Balan, see Balin and Balan.

Balance, THE, see Libra.

Balaustion's Adventure, a poem by R. Browning (q.v.), published in 1871.

Balaustion, a Rhodian girl, a deep admirer of the Athenian poet Euripides, persuades her kinsfolk to leave Rhodes when that island joins the Peloponnesian league against Athens. Her ship is pursued by a pirate into the harbour of Syracuse, the bitter enemy of Athens, where refuge is denied them. The hostility of the Syracusans is however changed to welcome when Balaustion recites to them Euripides' play, the 'Alkestis', in which their god Herakles is celebrated. Browning 'transcribes' the play, putting his comments in the mouth of Balaustion.

BALDER DEAD

Balaustion appears again in 'Aristophanes' Apology' (q.v.).

Balbec, the name used by Proust (q.v.) for the seaside resort (Cabourg) in Normandy which is the scene of many of the incidents of 'À la recherche du temps perdu'.

Balboa, VASCO NUÑEZ DE (1475-1517), one of the companions of Cortez, the conqueror of Mexico. He is said to have joined the expedition of 1510 to Darien as a stowaway. It was he who first, in 1513, discovered the Pacific Ocean, not Cortez, as Keats supposed when he wrote:

Or like stout Cortez when with eagle eyes
He stared at the Pacific.

(Nor was Balboa silent on this occasion, as Keats makes Cortez. He exclaimed 'Hom-brel') Balboa was beheaded by Pedrarias, governor of Darien, on a charge of treason.

Balchristie, JENNY, in Scott's 'The Heart of Midlothian' (q.v.), the housekeeper of the laird of Dumbiedikes.

Balclutha, in the Ossianic poem 'Carthou' (q.v.), a town on the Clyde, burnt by Combal, father of Ossian, in one of his raids.

Balder or BALDUR, in Scandinavian mythology, a son of Odin (q.v.), the god of the summer sun, beloved by all, but threatened with death. Frigga, his mother, has persuaded all things to vow not to injure him, but has overlooked the mistletoe. Loki (q.v.) induces the blind god Hödur to throw a branch of mistletoe at Balder, and this kills him. In another legend Hödur is the rival of Balder for the beautiful Nanna, and has obtained possession of the irresistible Miming (q.v.) sword 'Mistelteinn' (mistletoe). For the legend of Hermod's journey to hell to recall Balder to the upper world, see Balder Dead.

Balder, a dramatic poem by Dobell (q.v.), published in 1854.

A poet has taken his young bride to live in 'a tower gloomy and ruinous'. He is engaged in mystic meditations, and believes himself selected to conquer the secret of the universe. Meanwhile she pines, but is for a time comforted by the presence of her infant child. Presently the child sickens and dies, and the mother goes mad. The poet conjures the doctor to cure her, threatening him with death if he fails. Finally, unable to witness his wife's sufferings and to listen to her prayers for death, he kills her.

The poem, which contains some fine passages, but is hardly readable to-day as a whole, is the most notable production of the 'Spasmodic School' (q.v.).

Balder Dead, a poem by M. Arnold (q.v.), published in 1853.

Balder (q.v.) has been slain by the blind Hödur through the scheming of Loki. The poem tells of the lament of the gods for him, and of Hermod's journey to the shades to persuade Hela to give him up. Hela consents if all things on earth will weep for Balder.

BALDER DEAD

This they all do except Loki, who, in the guise of an old hag, refuses. Hermod returns and relates his failure to Balder, who is reconciled to his lot, and holds out the hope of a happier world, after the destruction of Odin and the gods at Ragnarök.

Balderstone, CALEB, a character in Scott's 'Bride of Lammermoor' (q.v.).

Baldur, see Balder.

Baldwin, the name of four of the Christian kings of Jerusalem (and a nominal Baldwin V, an infant), including the successor of Godfrey de Bouillon, who figures in Tasso's 'Jerusalem Delivered' as one of the leaders of the Christian host, and also in Scott's 'Count Robert of Paris' (q.v.).

BALDWIN, WILLIAM, see Mirror for Magistrates.

BALE, JOHN (1495–1563), bishop of Ossory, author of several religious plays, a history of English writers, and numerous polemical works in favour of the cause of the Reformation. He is notable in the history of the drama as having written 'King John', the first English historical play, or at least a bridge between the interlude and the historical play proper.

BALFOUR, ARTHUR JAMES, Earl of (1848–1930), a distinguished statesman, educated at Eton and Trinity College, Cambridge, notable in a literary connexion as the author of 'A Defence of Philosophic Doubt' (1879), 'The Religion of Humanity' (1888), 'Essays and Addresses' (1893), 'The Foundations of Belief' (1895), 'Questionings on Criticism and Beauty' (Romanes Lecture, 1909), 'Theism and Humanism' (Gifford Lectures, 1915), 'Essays Speculative and Political' (1920), 'Theism and Thought' (Gifford Lectures, 1923), and 'Opinions and Argument' (1927).

Balfour of Burley, JOHN, a leader of the Cameronian sect, who figures in Scott's 'Old Mortality' (q.v.).

Balibari, THE CHEVALIER DE, in Thackeray's 'Barry Lyndon' (q.v.), the uncle of the hero.

Balin and Balan, one of Tennyson's 'Idylls of the King' (q.v.), published in 1885 with 'Tiresias'. See Balin le Sauvage and Balan.

The poem is described in the original edition as 'an introduction to Merlin and Vivien'. Balin, a violent, choleric, but honest man, a knight of Arthur's court, is filled with humble devotion to Queen Guinevere. Disturbed by a glimpse that he gets of the intrigue between Launcelot and the queen, he leaves the court. His suspicions are finally confirmed by the perfidious Vivien. Possessed with fury at the shattering of his idol, he defaces the queen's crown on his shield and flings it from him. His brother Balan, another knight of Arthur's court, who has been given the quest of a demon, ~~passing at the moment~~ and thinking that this mad knight must be the demon of whom he is in search, attacks him. The two brothers fall, mortally wounded by each other.

Balin le Sauvage and Balan, two brothers, 'marvellous good knights' whose deeds and death at each other's hands unwittingly are told in Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur', Bk. II; also in Swinburne's 'Tale of Balen' (1896). They appear to have had their origin in Belinus and Bran (qq.v.), gods of the sky and nether world respectively in Celtic mythology (J. Rhys, 'Studies in the Arthurian Legend').

Balliol, MRS. BETHUNE, in the introduction to Scott's 'Chronicles of the Canongate' (q.v.), the friend of Chrystal Croftangry, on whose recollections the latter draws for his stories.

Balliol, JOHN DE (d. 1269), father of John de Baliol, king of Scotland (1292–6), founded Balliol College, Oxford, about 1263, as an act of penance imposed for having 'vexed and damnified' the churches of Tynemouth and Durham.

Balkis, or BELKIS, the name given by the Arabs to the queen of Sheba who visited Solomon (1 Kings x). The Koran (c. xxvii) contains an allusion to the story that Solomon, having heard a report that her legs and feet were covered with hair, invited her into a court of which the floor was covered with glass. The queen, mistaking this for water, lifted her robe in order to pass through it, thus giving Solomon an opportunity of ascertaining the truth of the report. According to some legends Balkis (on her return to Ethiopia) bore a son to Solomon whom she named David and who became king of Abyssinia.

See also the song 'Balkis was in her marble town' in 'Emblems of Love' (Pt. III, 'Virginity and Perfection') by Abercrombie (q.v.).

Ball, JOHN, a leader of the Peasants' Revolt of 1381. He was a priest. He is the subject of W. Morris's romance 'The Dream of John Ball'.

Ballad, originally a song intended as the accompaniment to a dance; hence a light, simple song of any kind, or a popular song, often one celebrating or attacking persons or institutions. From this last is derived the modern sense in which a ballad is a simple spirited poem in short stanzas in which some popular story is graphically narrated. [OED.] In this sense of the word oral tradition is an essential element. There has been much discussion as to the origin and composition of the old English ballads. They appear to date, mostly, from the 15th cent. (See 'The Ballad of Tradition', by G. H. Gerould, 1932.)

Ballad of Bouillabaisse, a ballad by W. M. Thackeray (q.v.), published in 'Punch' in 1849. The author muses on the sad memories recalled by the old accustomed corner in the Paris inn, where with his young wife and friends he used to eat bouillabaisse.

BALLADE

Ballade, strictly, a poem consisting of one or more triplets of seven- or (afterwards) eight-lined stanzas, each ending with the same line as refrain, and usually an envoy addressed to a prince or his substitute; e.g. Chaucer's 'Compleynt of Venus'. More generally, a poem divided into stanzas of equal length, usually of seven or eight lines.

Balladino, ANTONIO, in Jonson's 'The Case is Altered' (q.v.), the character under which Munday (q.v.) is ridiculed.

Ballantyne, JAMES (1772-1833), at first a solicitor, then a printer in Kelso, printed Sir W. Scott's 'Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border' in 1802, and thenceforth continued to print Scott's works. He received a loan from Scott for the purpose of establishing a printing business in Edinburgh in 1802, and took a half-share with his brother, John, in the book-selling business, started in 1808 by Scott. He was ruined by the bankruptcy of Constable & Co. in 1826. Ballantyne's 'Novelists' Library', with 'Lives of the Novelists' prefixed by Scott, was issued in 1821-4. Scott nicknamed him 'Aldiborontiphoscophornio' from the character in Carey's 'Chrononhotonthologos' (q.v.).

Ballantyne, JOHN (1774-1821), brother of James Ballantyne (q.v.), became in 1808 manager of the publishing firm started by Sir Walter Scott. He was nicknamed by Scott 'Rigdumfunnidos' from the character in Carey's 'Chrononhotonthologos' (q.v.).

Balliol College, Oxford, was founded by John de Balliol (q.v.) in 1263, and his foundation was much increased by his widow, Devorguilla. Among famous masters of this college have been John Wycliffe and Benjamin Jowett (qq.v.), and among its many distinguished members Humphrey (q.v.), duke of Gloucester, Adam Smith (q.v.), and a large proportion of the British statesmen of the last hundred years.

Balm in Gilead, an allusion to Jer. viii. 22, where the prophet, lamenting the sorry state of the Jews, exclaims, 'Is there no balm in Gilead? Is there no physician there?' See also Gen. xxxvii. 25. Balm of Gilead is a modern term denoting an oleo-resin formerly esteemed for its medical properties.

Balmawhapple, THE LAIRD OF, FALCONER by surname, a character in Scott's 'Waverley' (q.v.).

Balmoral Castle, a royal residence near Braemar in Aberdeenshire. Queen Victoria visited the neighbourhood in the summers of 1848-50, taking a lease of Balmoral House; and the estate was purchased by her in 1852. The present castle was commenced in 1853.

Balnibarbi, in 'Gulliver's Travels' (q.v.), the country, subject to the king of Laputa, of which Lagado is the capital, where in every town there is an academy of projectors, engaged on projects for increasing the welfare of mankind, none of which come to perfection.

Balor, the chief of the Fomors (q.v.) of Gaelic mythology. One of his eyes had the power of destroying whatever it looked on. The eye was put out and himself slain by Lugh, the sun-god, at the great battle of Moytura.

Balthazar ('possessor of treasure'), one of the three Magi (q.v.) or 'wise men of the East'. He is represented as king of Chaldaea.

BALTHAZAR is the name assumed by Portia as a lawyer in Shakespeare's 'Merchant of Venice' (q.v.).

Baltic, The Battle of the, see Campbell.

Balwhidder, THE REV. MICAH, in Galt's 'Annals of the Parish' (q.v.), the minister of Dalmailing.

BALZAC, HONORÉ DE (1799-1850), French novelist, author of the great collection of romances entitled 'La Comédie Humaine' in which he endeavoured to represent, faithfully and minutely, the whole complex system of French society. The design is expounded in his famous 'General Preface' (1842). He has been considered by many authorities (including Henry James) the greatest of all novelists, and has powerfully influenced later writers of fiction. Balzac was a Parisian, poor and lonely during most of his life, working in a garret. He first attained success by 'Le Dernier Chouan' (1829), and more conspicuously by 'La Peau de Chagrin' (1831). These were followed by a number of masterpieces, 'Eugénie Grandet', 'Le Père Goriot', 'Le Cousin Pons', &c. His 'Contes Drolatiques', a Rabelaisian work, published in 1832-7, and a few comedies, stand apart from the main body of his work.

Bamboccio (cripple), the nickname of Pieter van Laar (1613-74?), Dutch painter of scenes of low life, whence the name BAMBOCHADES for genre pictures of this kind.

Bampton Lectures, THE, on theological subjects, are delivered at Oxford annually, the cost being defrayed out of the proceeds of the estate left for the purpose by the Rev. John Bampton, of Trinity College, Oxford, and a prebendary of Salisbury, who died in 1751. Among notable Bampton lecturers have been Whately, Milman, Mansel, Liddon, and Rashdall.

Ban, in the Arthurian legends, king of Britanny and father of Launcelot (q.v.).

Banastaire, HUMFREY, in Sackville's 'Complaint of Buckingham' (q.v.), the dependant of Buckingham who betrayed him.

Banbury, a town in Oxfordshire, formerly noted for the number and zeal of its Puritan inhabitants. Whence 'Banbury man' is used by Ben Jonson and others for a sanctimonious fellow.

BANBURY CAKES were known to Gervase Markham ('English Huswife', II. ii, 1615), and are still famous.

BANBURY CHEESES were thin, and Bardolph

BANBURY CROSS, destroyed by the Puritans, has been restored in recent times. It is the subject of a well-known nursery rhyme.

BANCROFT, GEORGE (1800–91), American historian and diplomat, born at Worcester, Massachusetts, and educated at Harvard College and Göttingen. The 'History of the United States from the Discovery of the American Continent' appeared from 1834 to 1876. Two supplementary volumes, 'History of the Formation of the Constitution of the United States', appeared in 1882.

BANDELLO, MATTEO (1480?–1562), a Lombard who fled to France and was made bishop of Agen by Francis I, was an Italian writer of amusing and licentious romances, which were translated by Belleforest into French in 1565, and some of them into English in the 'Tragical Discourses' of Geoffrey Fenton (1567), and became widely known. The tales in Painter's 'Palace of Pleasure' (q.v.) are largely drawn from Bandello.

Bandusia, a fountain celebrated by Horace, probably on his Sabine farm.

Bangorian Controversy, a church controversy of the early years of the reign of George I. The Anglican Church, which was committed to the hereditary principle of monarchy, found itself in a difficulty when the claims of the Stuarts were set aside on the death of Queen Anne and a parliamentary king brought in from Hanover. Strict churchmen refused the oaths of allegiance to the new king, and there was strong feeling between the non-jurors and the rest. Benjamin Hoadly, bishop of Bangor and the king's chaplain, published a pamphlet and preached a sermon in 1717 reducing Church authority to a minimum and making sincerity the chief test of true religion. These gave rise to the 'Bangorian controversy', in which a great number of pamphlets were issued, the most important among them being the 'Three Letters to the Bishop of Bangor' of W. Law (q.v.).

BANIM, JOHN (1798–1842), the 'Scott of Ireland', novelist, dramatist, and poet, is chiefly remembered for the pictures of Irish life and character, drawn with greater fidelity than by earlier novelists, and with more attention to the sombre side, contained in his 'Tales by the O'Hara Family' (first series, 1825). In some of these he was assisted by his brother, MICHAEL BANIM (1796–1874), who also wrote 'Father Connell' (1842), 'Clough Fion', and 'The Town of the Cascades'.

Bank of England, THE, was founded on the basis of a scheme put forward by William Paterson (1658–1719, who also conceived the unfortunate Darien project, q.v.), with a view to raising money for William III's foreign campaigns. The charter, after violent opposition in Parliament, was granted in 1695. Sir John Houblon was appointed the first governor, with Michael Godfrey (a nephew of Sir Edmund Berry Godfrey), one of the most active promoters, as deputy-governor. The bank began its operations in the Grocers' Hall. Leading works on the subject are 'A History of the Bank of England', by A. Andreadès (1909), and 'The Bank of England', by Sir John Clapham (1944). 'The Bank of England from Within, 1694–1900', by W. Marston Acres (2 vols., 1931), may also be consulted. In this work the financial side of the Bank is subordinated to internal affairs and the human element in the Bank's history.

Bankside, the right bank of the Thames at Southwark (q.v.), noted in the 16th and 17th cents. for its theatres and disreputable haunts.

Bannatyne Club, THE, was founded in 1823, with Sir Walter Scott as president, for the publication of old Scottish documents (see Lockhart's 'Scott', lviii). The club was dissolved in 1861. George Bannatyne (1545–1608), in whose honour it was named, was the compiler in 1568 of a large collection of Scottish poems.

Bannockburn, near Stirling, the scene of the great battle in 1314, when Robert Bruce utterly routed the English under Edward II, and all Scotland was lost to the latter. The battle is described in Scott's 'Lord of the Isles', vi.

Banquo, in Shakespeare's 'Macbeth' (q.v.), a general of the king of Scotland's army. Though mentioned by Holinshed, he is not regarded as an historical character.

Banshee, a supernatural being supposed by the peasantry of Ireland and the Scottish Highlands to wail under the windows of a house when one of the inmates is about to die. Certain families of rank were reputed to have a special 'family spirit' of this kind. The word is a phonetic spelling of the Irish 'bean sídhe', from OIr. 'ben síde', a female spirit or elf. [OED.]

Bantam, ANGELO CYRUS, in Dickens's 'Pickwick Papers' (q.v.), Grand Master of the Ceremonies at Bath.

Baphomet, the alleged name of the idol that the Templars were accused of worshipping. According to l'Abbé Constant, quoted by Littré, this word was cabalistically formed by writing backwards tem. o. h. p. ab., abbreviation of templi omnium hominum pacis abbas, 'abbot of the temple of peace of all men'.

Barabas, the 'Jew of Malta', in Marlowe's play of that name (q.v.).

Barabbas, the notable robber, released instead of Jesus (Matt. xxvii. 16-26).

Baralippton, a mnemonic term in scholastic logic constructed to represent by its first three vowels a syllogism in which the two premisses are universal affirmatives, and the conclusion a particular affirmative (see Barbara).

Barataria, in 'Don Quixote' (q.v.), the island of which Sancho Panza is made governor.

Barathron or BARATHRUM, a deep chasm behind the Acropolis at Athens, into which criminals' corpses were thrown.

Barbara, in logic, a mnemonic term designating the first mood of the first figure of syllogisms, the three A's signifying that the major and minor premisses and the conclusion are universal affirmatives. In this system, E signified a universal negative proposition, I a particular affirmative, O a particular negative. Of the possible combinations of these four letters in groups of three, only nineteen are valid syllogisms, which are enumerated in a well-known mnemonic verse, beginning:

Barbara, celarent, dartii, ferioque priores.
(See Aldrich, 'Artis Logicae Rudimenta'.)

Barbara Allan, a Scottish ballad included in Percy's 'Reliques', on the subject of the death of Sir John Grehme for unrequited love of Barbara Allan, and her subsequent remorse. 'Barbara Allen's Cruelty', another ballad on the same theme, is also in the 'Reliques'.

Barbarossa, the nickname ('Red-Beard') of Frederick I, emperor of the Holy Roman Empire (1152-90). He made five expeditions into Italy for the purpose of its subjugation, and entered Rome. But the last expedition was opposed by the Lombard League and was a failure. Barbarossa was drowned in a river in the course of the Third Crusade (having gone by land to avoid the perils of the sea), but legend says that he still sleeps in a cavern in the Kyffhäuser mountain, with his companions about him and his beard grown round a stone table, until the need of his country shall summon him forth. This legend appears to have been transferred from Charlemagne to Barbarossa, and from Barbarossa to his grandson, Frederick II.

Barbary Corsairs, the cruisers of Barbary (the Saracen countries along the N. coast of Africa), to whose attacks the ships and coasts of the Christian countries were incessantly exposed.

BARCHESTER TOWERS

Barbason, the name of a demon mentioned by Shakespeare in 'The Merry Wives', II. ii, and 'Henry V', II. i.

BARBAULD, Mrs. ANNA LETITIA (1743-1825), née AIKIN, was author of miscellaneous poems and prose essays, including nature studies entitled 'Hymns in Prose'. She is chiefly remembered for her fine lines beginning:

Life! I know not what thou art.

Barbican, an outer fortification to a city or castle. The Barbican in London (Aldersgate Street) was, according to Stow, the site of an old watch-tower 'whence a man might behold the whole Citie toward the South, as also into Kent, Sussex, and Surrey'. In the street named after it lived Gondomar, the Spanish Ambassador, and John Milton (1645-7).

BARBOUR, JOHN (1316?-95), Scottish poet, was archdeacon of Aberdeen in 1357. He probably studied and taught at Oxford and Paris. He was one of the auditors of exchequer, 1372, 1382, and 1384. He composed his poem 'The Bruce' (q.v.), celebrating the war of independence and deeds of King Robert and James Douglas, about 1375. Other poems which have with reasonable certainty been ascribed to him are the 'Legend of Troy' and 'Legends of the Saints', being translations from Guido da Colonna's 'Historia Destructionis Troiae' and the 'Legenda Aurea'.

BARBUSSE, HENRI (1873-1935), French novelist, author of the well-known volume of short stories of the War of 1914-18, 'Le Feu' (1916); also of 'Clarté' (1919), 'La Lueur dans l'abîme' (1921), &c.

Barchester Towers, a novel by A. Trollope (q.v.), published in 1857.

This is the second in the Barchester series, the sequel to 'The Warden' (q.v.). To the characters included in that work are now added Dr. Proudie, the new bishop of Barchester, henpecked by the masterful Mrs. Proudie, and the bishop's chaplain, the intriguing and hypocritical Mr. Slope. 'Barchester Towers' is mainly occupied with the struggle between Mr. Slope and Mrs. Proudie for the control of the diocese, and in particular for the disposal of the wardenship of Hiram's Hospital as between the two candidates, Mr. Harding, the former warden, and Mr. Quiverful, the incumbent of a small living and the father of fourteen children, a struggle in which the lady comes out triumphant. Mr. Slope's manoeuvres are dictated partly by his rivalry with Mrs. Proudie, partly by his desire to win the hand of the widowed Mrs. Bold, Mr. Harding's daughter, while at the same time he is smitten with a violent passion for the Signora Vesey-Neroni, the daughter of Canon Stanhope, a lady in an equivocal matrimonial position. Mr. Harding's candidature for the wardenship is defeated, in spite of the strenuous advocacy of Archdeacon Grantly and his allies; but the tables are turned by the offer to him of the vacant deanery of Barchester, which Mr. Slope had hoped to obtain. Mr. Slope, defeated by Mrs. Proudie, disappointed of his hope of the deanery, rejected with contumely by Mrs. Bold, publicly exposed by the Signora Neroni, is unceremoniously bundled out of his chaplaincy and disappears from view. Mrs. Bold marries Mr. Arabin (q.v.).

Barchino, in imprints, Barcelona.

BARCLAY, ALEXANDER (1475?-1552), poet, scholar, and divine, probably of Scottish birth, was successively a priest in the college of Ottery St. Mary, Devonshire, a Benedictine monk at Ely, a Franciscan at Canterbury, and rector of All Hallows, Lombard Street, London. He translated Brant's 'Narrenschiff' into English verse as 'The Ship of Fools' (q.v., 1509), and wrote his 'Eclogues' (q.v.) at Ely (1515-21). He also translated a life of St. George from Baptist Mantuan, and Sallust's 'Bellum Jugurthinum' (c. 1520).

BARCLAY, JOHN (1582-1621), a Scot born at Pont-à-Mousson in France, author of 'Argenis' (1621), a Latin political and historical romance, in which there is reference, more or less precise, to recent events on the Continent, notably to the wars of the League, and the characters have some resemblance to actual personages, such as Henri IV of France. He also wrote 'Euphormionis Satyricon', a satire on the Jesuits in the form of a picaresque novel, in Latin, in two parts, published in 1603?-7.

Bard, The, a Pindaric ode by Gray (q.v.), published in 1757.

The ode is based on a tradition current in Wales that Edward I, when he completed the conquest of that country, ordered all the bards that fell into his hands to be put to death. It is a lamentation by a Welsh bard, and a curse pronounced by him and the ghosts of his slaughtered companions on Edward's race, whose misfortunes are foretold. Then the bard sings of the glories that will come with the house of Tudor, and of the poets of that age.

Bardell, Mrs., in Dickens's 'Pickwick Papers' (q.v.), Mr. Pickwick's landlady, who sues him for breach of promise.

Bardolph, in Shakespeare's 'Henry IV' and 'Henry V' (qq.v.), one of Falstaff's disreputable boon companions. He is 'white-livered and red-faced, by means whereof 'a faces it out and fights not'. He is hanged for looting in the French war. In Shakespeare's 'Merry Wives of Windsor' (q.v.) we find him discarded by Falstaff and employed as tapster by the host of the Garter Inn.

Bareacres, EARL and COUNTESS OF, characters in Thackeray's 'Vanity Fair' (q.v.).

Barebones Parliament, the assembly summoned by Cromwell in 1653, consisting of 133 members, so called from one of its members,

BARLAAM AND JOSAPHAT

Praise-God Barbon, an Anabaptist leather-seller in Fleet Street.

BARETTI, GIUSEPPE MARC' ANTONIO (1719-89), born at Turin, came to London and opened a school for teaching Italian in 1751. His 'Italian and English Dictionary' was published in 1760. He was a friend of Johnson and Thrale.

BARHAM, RICHARD HARRIS (1788-1845), educated at St. Paul's School and Brasenose College, Oxford, took orders and held various preferments, including that of a minor canon of St. Paul's. His 'Ingoldsby Legends', written in the latter part of his life and first published in 'Bentley's Miscellany' and 'The New Monthly Magazine', were reissued in 1840, and by their humour, felicity of verse, narrative power and variety of subject, became immensely popular, though charges of irreverence and the like have been made against them. He was particularly successful in the grotesque or frankly comic treatment of medieval legend.

BARING-GOULD, SABINE (1834-1924), educated at Clare College, Cambridge, was rector of Lew Trenchard in Devon, and author of a large number of religious and other works, hymns ('Onward Christian Soldiers'), and novels. The latter include 'Mehalah' (1880), 'John Herring' (1883), 'Court Royal' (1886), &c. He also wrote 'Curious Myths of the Middle Ages' (1866-8).

BARKER, HARLEY GRANVILLE GRANVILLE- (1877-1946), actor and dramatist, author of 'The Marrying of Ann Leete' (1901), 'The Voysey Inheritance' (1905), 'Waste' (1907), 'The Madras House' (1910), 'The Secret Life' (1923), and a number of other plays and publications, including four interesting series of Prefaces to plays of Shakespeare (1927, 1930, 1937, 1945). As a theatrical producer Granville-Barker was especially known for his remarkable productions of Shakespeare's 'Winter's Tale', 'A Midsummer Night's Dream', and 'Twelfth Night', at the Savoy Theatre in 1912-14.

Barkis, in Dickens's 'David Copperfield' (q.v.), the carrier, who sent a message by David to Clara Peggotty that 'Barkis is willin'.

Barlaam and Josaphat, a medieval religious romance, interesting as a christianized version of the legend of Buddha. It appears first in the works of John of Damascus (8th cent.), then in the 'Lives of the Saints' of Symeon Metaphrastes, a celebrated Byzantine hagiographer, and subsequently was widely disseminated.

Josaphat was, according to the story, the son of an Indian king, Abenner, who persecuted the Christians. A glorious and prosperous reign was foretold for Josaphat, but in a higher kingdom; and it was said that he would become a Christian. Abenner, perturbed by the prophecy, for a time secluded his son from the world, but yielding to his entreaties at last allowed him freedom. Barlaam, a holy man, now visited India, conversed with Josaphat, and converted him to Christianity. His father having failed to shake him in his faith, associated him in the kingdom, was himself converted, and then died. Josaphat handed over the kingdom to Barachias, sought out Barlaam, and died a hermit.

Barleycorn, JOHN, the personification of barley, as the grain from which malt liquor is made.

BARLOW, JOEL (1754-1812), American poet and diplomat, born at Redding, Connecticut, who is remembered as the author of 'The Columbiad' (q.v.), and as one of the 'Hartford Wits' (q.v.).

Barmecide, the patronymic of a family of princes ruling at Bagdad just before Haroun-al-Raschid, concerning one of whom the story is told in the 'Arabian Nights' (q.v., the story of the Barber's Sixth Brother) that he put a succession of imaginary dishes before a beggar, pretending that they contained a sumptuous repast. The beggar, entering into the spirit of the jest, pretended to be intoxicated by the imaginary wine offered him, and fell upon his entertainer. Hence 'Barmecide' is used of one who offers illusory benefits. See also Jaffar.

Barn Elms, at Barnes, near London, had in the 17th-18th cents. a fashionable promenade, favoured by Evelyn, and notorious for the duels fought there. Referred to in Congreve's 'Love for Love' (q.v.), II. ii.

Barnaby Bright, or LONG BARNABY, St. Barnabas' Day, 11 June, in the old style reckoned the longest day of the year.

Barnaby Rudge, a novel by Dickens (q.v.), published in 1841, as part of 'Master Humphrey's Clock'. This was the earlier of Dickens's two historical novels (for the other see Tale of Two Cities), the period dealt with being that of the Gordon anti-popery riots of 1780. Reuben Haredale, a country gentleman, has been murdered, and the murderer has never been discovered. Geoffrey Haredale, his brother, a Roman Catholic, and Sir John Chester are enemies. Chester's son Edward is in love with Haredale's niece, Emma; and the elders combine, in spite of their hatred, to thwart the match. The Gordon riots supervene, fomented secretly by the smooth villain Chester. Haredale's house is burnt, and Emma carried off. Edward saves the lives of Haredale and Emma, and wins Haredale's consent to his marriage with the latter. Haredale discovers the murderer of his brother, the steward Rudge, the father of the half-witted Barnaby and the black-mailer of the unhappy Mrs. Rudge. Rudge pays the penalty of his crime. Chester is killed by Haredale in a duel.

The principal interest of the book lies in the vivid descriptions of the riots, which held

BARNAVELT

London terrorized for several days, and in the characters accessory to the above plot: the pathetic figure of Barnaby; the sturdy locksmith Gabriel Varden, with his peevish wife, and the incomparable Dolly, his coquettish daughter; Simon Tappertit his apprentice, small in body but aspiring and anarchical in soul, and Miss Miggs, his mean and treacherous servant; John Willet, host of the Maypole Inn, and Joe his gallant son; Hugh the savage ostler, who turns out to be Chester's son, and Dennis the Hangman; and lastly Grip, Barnaby's raven.

Barnacle, a character in Shirley's 'The Gamester' (q.v.).

Barnacles, THE, in Dickens's 'Little Dorrit' (q.v.), types of government officials in the 'Circumlocution Office'.

BARNARD, LADY ANNE, see Lindsay (Lady A.).

Barnard's Inn, one of the old Inns of Chancery (q.v.). It was bequeathed by John Mackworth (d. 1451), dean of Lincoln, the owner, to the Dean and Chapter of Lincoln. It was at the time occupied by one Barnard and became a law students' Inn, but remained the property of the Dean and Chapter until 1894, when it was sold to the Mercers' Company, who established their school there. (G. R. Stirling Taylor, 'Historical Guide to London'.)

Barnardine, in Shakespeare's 'Measure for Measure' (q.v.), a prisoner 'that apprehends death no more dreadfully but as a drunken sleep; careless, reckless, and fearless of what's past, present, or to come'.

Barnardo, THOMAS JOHN (1845-1905), born in Dublin of a German father and an English quaker mother, entered the London Hospital in 1866 as a missionary medical student, intending to go to China, but found that the need for rescue work was more urgent at home. He founded an East End juvenile mission for destitute children in 1867, and in 1870 opened the boys' home in Stepney which developed into 'Dr. Barnardo's Homes'. This was followed by the 'Girls' Village Home' at Barkingside in Essex in 1876. He sent his first party of boys to Canada in 1882. Since then his institutions have been responsible for sending over fifty thousand children to the colonies and dependencies, where many have risen to good positions. At his death he had been the means of assisting 250,000 children. He was an excellent man of business, and successfully refuted charges against his disinterestedness.

Barnavelt, Sir John van Olden, an historical tragedy, probably by J. Fletcher (q.v.), acted in 1619. This remarkable play was discovered by Mr. A. H. Bullen among the MSS. of the British Museum and was printed in his 'Old English Plays' (1883).

The play deals with events in the contemporary history of Holland. Barnavelt, the great advocate, disturbed by the growing power of the Prince of Orange and the army, under cloak of a religious movement conspires against him and raises companies of burghers in the towns to resist the army. The plot is discovered, the companies disarmed, and Barnavelt's principal associates are captured. One of these, Leidenberch, confesses. Barnavelt, who by virtue of his great position is still left at liberty though suspect, upbraids him and tells him that death is the only honourable course left to him. Leidenberch, in remorse, takes his own life. The Prince of Orange, who had hitherto counselled moderation, now convinced of the gravity of the conspiracy, advises severe measures. Barnavelt is arrested, tried, and executed.

BARNES, BARNABE (1569?-1609), educated at Brasenose College, Oxford, was a voluminous writer of verse. He issued (perhaps privately) 'Parthenophil and Parthenophe, Sonnettes, Madrigals, Elegies, and Odes' in 1593, and 'A Divine Centurie of Spirituall Sonnets' in 1595. He also wrote an anti-popish tragedy, 'The Devil's Charter'.

BARNES, WILLIAM (1801-86), the son of a farmer in Blackmoor Vale, Dorset, entered St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1838, took orders, and became rector of Came in 1862, where he remained till his death. He wrote a number of poems in the Dorset dialect, marked by pleasant sentiment and a strong perception of the charms of the country ('Poems of Rural Life', three series, 1844, 1859, and 1863).

Barney, in Dickens's 'Oliver Twist' (q.v.), a Jew, associate of Fagin.

BARNFIELD, RICHARD (1574-1627), educated at Brasenose College, Oxford, published 'The Affectionate Shepherd' (1594), 'Cynthia, with certain Sonnets' (1595), and other poems (1598), including two pieces, which appeared in the 'Passionate Pilgrim' (q.v., 1599), and were long attributed to Shakespeare, the better known of these being the ode, 'As it fell upon a day, In the merry month of May'. 'The Affectionate Shepherd' is a pastoral, based on the second eclogue of Virgil and dedicated to Lady Rich (Sidney's 'Stella'). In 1598 Barnfield published 'The Encomion of Lady Pecunia', a satirical poem on the power of money.

Barnum, PHINEAS TAYLOR (1810-91), the great American showman, began his career by exhibiting a bogus nurse of George Washington, alleged to be aged 161. He then started the American museum, containing curiosities and monstrosities. He conducted Tom Thumb to Europe in 1844, and Jenny Lind to America in 1850. In 1881 he combined forces with the keenest of his rivals, launching the firm of Barnum and Bailey, which visited Olympia (London) in 1889. He acquired the elephant Jumbo in 1882.

Barnwell, George, see George Barnwell.

BARRIE

Baroque, a word adapted from the Portuguese barroco, Spanish barrueco, meaning a rough or imperfect pearl. It is applied to the heavily and grotesquely ornamented style of architecture that succeeded the style of the Renaissance. Baroque reached its culmination in Italy and France in the early part of the 18th cent. The word is used generally in literary criticism of ornamented or grandiloquent works. Cf. Rococo.

Barouche, an old-fashioned four-wheeled carriage, having a half-head behind, which can be raised or lowered, and seats inside for two couples facing each other.

BARRÈS, MAURICE (1862-1923), French writer and politician who is best known outside France for the extreme Nationalism of his views, the almost mystical fervour of his patriotism, and the fame that was brought to his writings by the War of 1914-18. Among his own countrymen his reputation was of longer standing, and was more purely literary. By birth he was a Lorrainer, and the love of his own particular corner of France was really the living heart of his fervent gallicism. At his death he may be said to have ranked with Anatole France as one of the representative figures of the literature of 19th and early 20th century France. His best-known books are: 'Un Homme Libre' (1889), 'Le Jardin de Bérénice' (1891), 'Le Roman de l'Énergie Nationale' (1897), 'L'Appel au Soldat' (1900), 'Colette Baudouche' (1909), 'Les Amitiés Françaises' (1903), 'Le Voyage de Sparte' (1906), 'Greco' (1912), 'La Colline Inspirée' (1913). During the War he contributed a daily article for four years to the 'Écho de Paris', and these were collected and published in a long series extending over the years 1915-19, entitled 'L'Âme Française et la Guerre'.

BARRIE, SIR JAMES MATTHEW (1860-1937), educated at Dumfries Academy and Edinburgh University, was in his early days a journalist (his experiences in this profession are reflected in his 'When a Man's Single', 1888). Among the best of his earlier works are the biography of his mother, 'Margaret Ogilvy' (1896), and such sketches as 'A Window in Thrums' (1889). As a dramatist his most original work is to be found in 'Quality Street' (1901), 'The Admirable Crichton' (1902), 'What Every Woman Knows' (in which he pricks the bubble of male self-sufficiency, 1908), and 'The Twelve-Pound Look' (the exposure of a pompous egoist, 1910); while he gained immense popularity with 'Peter Pan' (q.v., 1904). His other writings included: 'Better Dead' (1887), 'Auld Licht Idylls' and 'An Edinburgh Eleven' (1888), 'My Lady Nicotine' (1890), 'The Little Minister' (1891, the play was produced in 1897), 'Sentimental Tommy' (1896), 'Tommy and Grizel' (1900), 'The Little White Bird' (1902), 'Peter Pan in Kensington Gardens' (1906), and 'Peter and Wendy' (1911). Also a number of dramatic works, among others, 'The Professor's Love Story', produced in 1894; 'The Little Minister' (1897), 'Little Mary' (1903), 'Alice Sit-by-the-Fire' (1905), 'Dear Brutus' (1917), 'Mary Rose' (1920). See Kailyard School.

Barrington, DAINES (1727-1800), lawyer, antiquary, and naturalist, is said to have induced Gilbert White (q.v.) to write his 'Natural History of Selborne'.

Barrington, GEORGE (b. 1755), whose real name was WALDRON, was a famous pick-pocket, who was ultimately transported to Botany Bay. He moved in good society and robbed Prince Orloff of a diamond snuff-box said to be worth £30,000. He published a description of his voyage to Botany Bay and is chiefly remembered for the lines attributed to him (when a convict):

True patriots we, for be it understood,

We left our country for our country's good.

But these are now said to be by another hand (see R. S. Lambert, 'The Prince of Pick-pockets').

BARROW, ISAAC (1630-77), educated at Charterhouse, Felsted, and Peterhouse, Cambridge, was successively professor of Greek at Cambridge, of geometry at Gresham College, and of mathematics at Cambridge, resigning the latter appointment in 1669 in favour of his pupil, Isaac Newton. He became master of Trinity in 1672. He wrote an 'Exposition of the Creed, Decalogue, and Sacraments' (1669), 'Euclidis Elementa' (1655), 'Archimedis Opera' (1675), and a treatise on 'The Pope's Supremacy' (published 1680). His sermons rank among the best in the English tongue; they are written with great smoothness and lucidity, but are extremely long. Coleridge ('Anima Poetae') refers to Barrow's 'verbal imagination', in which he 'excels almost every other writer of prose'.

Barrow, SIR JOHN (1764-1848), accompanied Lord Macartney on his missions to China and the Cape of Good Hope. He became assistant secretary to the Admiralty, and revived the projects to explore the Arctic for a NW. passage, which had been dropped since the failure of Baffin (q.v.). His 'Autobiographical Memoir' (1847) contains an interesting account of his travels. He also published a 'History of Voyages into the Arctic Region' (1718) and other books of travel.

Barry, ELIZABETH (1658-1713), a celebrated actress who owed her entrance to the stage to the patronage of the earl of Rochester. She 'created' more than one hundred roles, including Monimia in Otway's 'The Orphan', Belvidera in 'Venice Preserved', and Zara in 'The Mourning Bride'. Otway was passionately devoted to her, but she did not return his affection.

BARRY CORNWALL, see Procter (B. W.).

Barry Lyndon, The Luck of, a Romance of the Last Century, by Fitzboodle, a satirical romance by Thackeray (q.v.), published in

BARTHOLOMEW FAYRE

'Fraser's Magazine' in 1844, subsequently entitled 'The Memoirs of Barry Lyndon, Esq., by Himself'.

It takes the form of the autobiography of Redmond Barry, an impudent Irish adventurer, who flies from Ireland under the delusion that he has killed (at the age of fifteen) his adversary in a duel, serves in the English and Prussian armies, and then turns gamester and man of fashion, a career in which he meets with such prodigious success that he becomes well-to-do, and by his effrontery is able to bully the wealthy widow, the countess of Lyndon, into marrying him; whereupon he assumes the name of Lyndon. He dissipates her fortune and grossly maltreats her until she is rescued by her relatives. He now falls on evil days and ends his life in the Fleet prison. In spite of being a thorough blackguard, his courage and frankness retain the reader's interest. And his old rascal of an uncle, the Chevalier de Balibari, is likewise an entertaining figure.

Barsetshire Novels, The, of A. Trollope (q.v.) are the following: 'The Warden', 'Barchester Towers', 'Doctor Thorne', 'Framley Parsonage', 'The Small House at Allington', and 'The Last Chronicle of Barset' (qq.v.).

Barthélemy, JEAN JACQUES, see Anacharsis (Le Voyage du Jeune).

BARTHOLOMAEUS ANGLICUS (fl. 1230-50), also known as BARTHOLOMEW DE GLANVILLE, though the addition 'de Glanville' is most uncertain; a Minorite friar, professor of theology at Paris, and author of 'De proprietatibus rerum', an encyclopaedia of the Middle Ages first printed c. 1470. A 14th-cent. English version by John Trevisa was issued by Wynkyn de Worde, c. 1495.

Bartholomew, MASSACRE OF ST., the massacre of Huguenots throughout France ordered by Charles IX at the instigation of his mother Catherine de Médicis, and begun on the morning of the festival, 24 Aug. 1572.

Bartholomew Fair was held, at least from Henry II's time, within the churchyard of the priory of St. Bartholomew, Smithfield, London, at Bartholomew tide (24 August, O.S.), attended by the 'Clothiers of all England and drapers of London' (Stow), and 'a Court of pie-powders (q.v.) was daily during the fair holden for debts and contracts'. The fair was continued as a pleasure-fair until 1855. For a description of the fair in the 17th cent. see Ben Jonson's 'Bartholomew Fayre': see also H. Morley, 'History of Bartholomew Fair' (1858).

Bartholomew Fayre, a farcical comedy by Jonson (q.v.), produced in 1614. The play, the plot of which is very slight, presents, with much humour and drollery, if somewhat coarsely, the scenes of a London holiday fair, with its ballad-singers, stall-keepers, bullies, bawds, and cut-purses. Bartholomew Cokes, the perfect simpleton, visits the fair and is successively robbed of his purses, his cloak and sword, and finally of his future wife, whom he is to marry against her will; while his servant, the self-confident and arrogant Wasp, is robbed of the licence which is to marry them, and is put in the stocks for brawling. The puritan, Zeal-of-the-land Busy, is ridiculed for his hypocrisy, and likewise gets put in the stocks. Overdo, the Justice of the Peace, who attends the fair in disguise to discover its 'enormities', is taken for a pickpocket and subjected to the same humiliation.

Bartholomew Pig, a pig sold at Bartholomew Fair (q.v.). 'Little tidy Bartholomew boar-pig' is a name applied by Doll Tear-sheet to Falstaff ('2 Henry IV', II. iv).

Bartholomew's Day, St.: on this day (24 August) in 1662 some 2,000 of the English clergy resigned their cures, refusing to assent to everything contained in the Book of Common Prayer, as required by the Act of Uniformity.

Bartholomew's Hospital, St., see Rahere.

Bartolist, a student of Bartolo, an eminent Italian jurist (1313-57); hence, a person skilled in the law.

Barton, Sir Andrew, the subject of a ballad in two parts, included in Percy's 'Reliques'. He was a Scottish sea officer who lived in the 16th cent. He obtained letters of marque to make reprisals against the Portuguese for damage suffered at their hands by his father, and availed himself of them to interfere with English ships. The earl of Surrey fitted out two ships under his sons Sir Thomas and Sir Edward Howard, who after an obstinate engagement, in which Barton was killed, captured the two Scottish vessels.

Barton, Elizabeth (1506-34), the NUN or MAID OF KENT, was a domestic servant, and at one time subject to trances. She attributed her utterances during these trances to religious inspiration. She was induced by Bocking, a monk of Canterbury, to anathematize all opponents of the Roman Catholic Church, and inveighed against Henry VIII's divorce from Catharine of Aragon, prophesying that he would die in a month after his marriage with Anne Boleyn. She was executed with her accomplices at Tyburn. The story is told by Froude in his 'History'.

BARTRAM, WILLIAM (1739-1823), American Quaker naturalist and traveller, author of 'Travels through North and South Carolina . . .' (1791), whose descriptions of nature influenced Coleridge and Wordsworth.

Baruch, a book of the Apocrypha, attributed in the text to Baruch the scribe of Jeremiah (Jer. xxxvi), a composite work containing a confession of sin, an exhortation to wisdom, and a song of comfort, probably written after A.D. 70.

Bas Bleu, see Blue Stocking.

Bashan, a kingdom beyond the Jordan conquered (with its King Og) by the Israelites under Moses (Num. xxi. 33). The mention of 'fat bulls of Basan' is in Ps. xxii. 12.

BASHKIRTSEFF, MARIE (1860-84), a Russian diarist, whose 'Journal', written in French and published posthumously in 1887, attained a great vogue by its morbid introspection and literary quality, and was translated into several languages (Engl. translation, 1890, by Mathilde Blind).

Basil, Pot of, see Isabella or the Pot of Basil. The word 'basil' is derived from the Greek βασιλικόν, 'royal', perhaps because the plant was 'used in some royal unguent bath or medicine' (Prior). For the many Greek and Italian traditions concerning this plant and its dual character, erotic and sinister, see Gubernatis, 'Mythologie des Plantes', vol. ii. The belief among the Creoles of Louisiana in its power of attracting love is referred to in 'The Grandissimes', by G. W. Cable (c. ix).

Basilea, in imprints, Basle.

Basilikon Doron, see James I.

Basillisco, a braggart knight in 'Solyman and Perseda' (perhaps by Kyd, q.v.), referred to in Shakespeare's 'King John', I. i.

Basillisk, a fabulous reptile, also called a cockatrice, alleged to be hatched by a serpent from a cock's egg. According to ancient authors its breath, even its look, was fatal. According to Pliny, it was so called from a spot resembling a crown on its head. Medieval authors furnished it with 'a certain combe or coronet'. In the 16th cent. the name was given to a kind of large brass cannon.

Basilius, (1) a character in Sidney's 'Arcadia' (q.v.); (2) in 'Don Quixote', the rival of Camacho (q.v.).

Baskerville, John (1706-75), the famous printer, began life as a schoolmaster at Birmingham, where he taught writing and book-keeping, and carved monumental inscriptions. He began to occupy himself with type-founding in 1750, and after experimenting for several years produced a type with which he was satisfied. His first work, a quarto edition of Virgil, appeared in 1757, and his 'Milton' in 1758, in which year he was appointed printer to Cambridge University for ten years. He first printed his edition of the Prayer Book in 1760, and of the Bible, one of the finest ever published, in 1763. He brought out a Greek New Testament (quarto and octavo) in 1763, a quarto Horace in 1770, and in 1772-3 a famous series of quarto editions of Latin authors. His printing plant was purchased after his death by Beaumarchais (q.v.) for the purpose of printing the Kehl edition of Voltaire.

Baskett, John (d. 1742), king's printer, was printer to the University of Oxford, 1711-42. He printed editions of the Book of Common Prayer, and the 'Vinegar Bible' (q.v.) in two volumes (1716-17), of which it was said that it was 'a basketful of errors'.

BASOCHE

Basoche, the guild of clerks attached to the French courts of justice under the old régime, which at one time possessed certain privileges, appointed a king (roi de la basoche), held parades, and gave dramatic performances.

Basrig or BACSECG, the Danish king defeated and killed at the battle of Assendun (Æscesdun) in 871 by the English under Æthelred.

Bass, a celebrated kind of ale, so named from the firm of Bass of Burton-on-Trent.

Bassae, near Phigalia in the south-west of Arcadia, the site of a famous temple to Apollo Epicurius, built by Ictinus (one of the architects of the Parthenon) and described by Pausanias as one of the most beautiful in the Peloponnese. Its ruins are still standing. The frieze of the inner cella, representing the combat of the Centaurs and the Lapithae, was acquired for the British Museum in 1814.

Bassanio, in Shakespeare's 'Merchant of Venice' (q.v.), the lover of Portia.

Bassett, COUNT, a character in Vanbrugh and Cibber's 'The Provok'd Husband' (q.v.).

Bassianus, a character in Shakespeare's 'Titus Andronicus' (q.v.).

Bastard, The, see Savage (R.).

Bastard, PHILIP THE, son of Sir Robert Faulconbridge, in Shakespeare's 'King John'.

Bastard, WILLIAM THE, in English history, is William the Conqueror, the natural son of Duke Robert of Normandy and of the daughter of a tanner of Falaise.

Bastille, THE, in Paris, was built as a fort under Charles V and Charles VI of France, in 1370-82, and was later used as a State prison. It was destroyed by the populace of Paris on 14 July 1789. The anniversary of its fall, as marking the end of the old régime, is the national holiday of republican France.

Batavia, the Netherlands, formerly inhabited by a Celtic tribe called the BATAVI. Also the capital of the Dutch East Indies.

Bates, MISS, a character in Jane Austen's 'Emma' (q.v.).

Bates, CHARLEY, in Dickens's 'Oliver Twist' (q.v.), one of the pickpockets in Fagin's gang.

BATES, HENRY WALTER (1825-92), naturalist, who visited Pará with Alfred Russel Wallace in 1848 and the Amazons in 1851-9. His researches revealed over 8,000 species new to science. He published his 'The Naturalist on the Amazons' in 1863.

Bates, JOHN, in Shakespeare's 'Henry V' (q.v.), one of the English soldiers with whom the king converses before the battle of Agincourt.

Bath, from aet Bathun ('at the baths'), the well-known city in the west of England, so called from its hot springs, said to have been discovered by the legendary prince Bladud. The Romans, who called it AQUAE SULIS

BATTLE OF ALCAZAR

(from a deity called Sul), built there a considerable city with fine baths and temples. Bath's modern reputation dates from the 17th cent., but it rose to the zenith of its fame and prosperity under the rule of Richard ('Beau') Nash (q.v.), the 'King of Bath' in the 18th cent. It is the subject of very frequent literary allusion, having been visited among many others by Smollett, Fielding, Sheridan, Fanny Burney, Goldsmith, Southey, Landor, Jane Austen, Wordsworth, Cowper, Scott, Moore, and Dickens. Its ruins seem to be the subject of the OE. poem 'Ruin' (q.v.). It was once a cloth-making centre, and is mentioned in this connexion by Chaucer ('Canterbury Tales', Prologue 447, concerning the 'Wife of Bath'). Bath owes many of its Palladian buildings to John Wood (1705?-54), the architect, and his son (d. 1782) of the same name.

Bath, COLONEL, a character in Fielding's 'Amelia' (q.v.).

Bath, KING OF, see Nash (R.).

Bath, ORDER OF THE, an order of British knighthood, so called from the bath which preceded installation, instituted in 1399.

Bath, Wife of, see Canterbury Tales.

Bath Guide, The New, see Anstey (C.).

Bathos, Greek, 'depth'. The current usage for 'descent from the sublime to the ridiculous' is due to Pope's satire, 'Bathos, the art of sinking in Poetry' ('Miscellanies', 1727-8). The title was a travesty of Longinus's essay, 'On the Sublime'.

Bathsheba Everdene, a character in Hardy's 'Far from the Madding Crowd' (q.v.).

Bathyllus, a beautiful youth of Samos, loved by Anacreon (q.v.).

Batrachomyomachia, or Battle of the Frogs and the Mice, a mock-heroic Greek poem, at one time erroneously attributed to Homer. It describes in Homeric style a battle between the tribes of the mice and the frogs, the cause of hostilities being the destruction of a mouse while visiting a frog. Zeus and Athena deliberate as to the sides that they shall take. The frogs are at first defeated, but Zeus intervenes and having failed with thunderbolts sends crabs to quell the strife.

Thomas Parnell (q.v.) wrote a satirical 'Homer's Battle of the Frogs and the Mice' (1717), directed against Theobald and Dennis.

Battle, SARAH, the subject of one of Lamb's 'Essays of Elia' (q.v.), 'Mrs. Battle's Opinions on Whist', a character drawn from Mrs. Burney, the wife of Admiral Burney, and sister-in-law of Fanny Burney (q.v.).

Battle of Alcazar, The, a play in verse by Peele (q.v.), published in 1594. It deals with the war between Sebastian, king of Portugal, and Abdelmelec, king of Morocco, who had recovered his kingdom from a usurper, Muly Mahamet. The latter invokes the assistance of Sebastian, offering to give up the kingdom of Morocco to him and to become his tributary. Sebastian sails with his fleet to Morocco, and at the battle of Alcazar is killed, as are also Abdelmelec and Muly Mahamet, the latter being drowned while fleeing from the field. Sebastian is assisted in his expedition by the adventurer Stukeley (q.v.), who is likewise killed at the battle (which was fought in 1578).

Battle of Britain, the name popularly given to the series of encounters between the R.A.F. and the German Luftwaffe over the Channel and Great Britain, in the late summer and autumn of 1940 after the evacuation from Dunkirk, the enemy's object being so to weaken our air defences as to make invasion possible. These encounters were especially frequent and extensive from 11 August to the middle of September, and resulted in heavy losses to the enemy, culminating in the destruction of 185 of his aircraft on 15 September. The prime minister in his survey of the air warfare in the House of Commons on 20 August said: 'Never in the field of human conflict was so much owed by so many to so few.'

Battle of Dorking, The, an imaginary account of a successful invasion of England, designed to draw attention to the lack of adequate military preparation, published in 'Blackwood's Magazine', May 1871, by General Sir G. T. Chesney.

Battle of Lake Regillus, The, the title of one of Macaulay's 'Lays of Ancient Rome' (q.v.). Lake Regillus lay east of Rome in the territory of Tusculum and on its banks was won the great victory of the Romans over the Latins under Tarquin in 496 B.C.

Battle of Maldon, see Maldon.

Battle of Otterbourne, see Otterbourne.

Battle of the Books, The, a prose satire by Swift (q.v.), written in 1697, when Swift was residing with Sir W. Temple, and published in 1704.

Temple had written an essay on the comparative merits of 'Ancient and Modern Learning' (the subject at that time of an animated controversy in Paris), in which by his uncritical praise of the spurious Epistles of Phalaris he had drawn on himself the censure of William Wotton and Bentley. Swift, in his 'Battle of the Books', treats the whole question with satirical humour. The 'Battle' originates from a request by the moderns that the ancients shall evacuate the higher of the two peaks of Parnassus which they have hitherto occupied. The books that are advocates of the moderns take up the matter; but before the actual encounter, a dispute arises between a spider living in the corner of the library and a bee that has got entangled in the spider's web. Aesop sums up the dispute: the spider is like the moderns who spin their scholastic lore out of their own entrails; the bee is like the ancients who go to nature for their honey. Aesop's commentary rouses the books to fury, and they join battle. The ancients, under the patronage of Pallas, are led by Homer, Pindar, Euclid, Aristotle, and Plato, with Sir W. Temple commanding the allies; the moderns by Milton, Dryden, Descartes, Hobbes, Scotus, and others, with the support of Momus and the malignant deity, Criticism. The fight is conducted with great spirit. Aristotle aims an arrow at Bacon but hits Descartes. Homer overthrows Gondi-bert. Virgil encounters his translator Dryden, in a helmet nine times too big. Boyle transfixes Bentley and Wotton. On the whole the ancients have the advantage, but a parley ensues and the tale leaves the issue undecided.

Battle of the Frogs and the Mice, see Batrachomyomachia.

Battle of the Spurs, a name given (1) to the battle of Courtrai (1302) in which the Flemings defeated Robert, count of Artois, on account of the number of gilt spurs the victors collected; (2) to the battle of Guine-gatte (1513) in which Henry VIII with the Emperor Maximilian defeated the French, on account of the hurried flight of the latter.

Battle Abbey Roll, The, was probably compiled about the 14th cent. purporting to show the names of families that came over to England with William the Conqueror. The roll itself is not extant. We have only 16th-cent. versions by Leland, Holinshed, and Duchesne, all said to be imperfect and to contain names which have obviously no right there. [E.B.]

Battle Hymn of the Republic, a patriotic hymn of the Federal party in the United States of America, written by Julia Ward Howe (1819-1910). She visited the army of the Potomac in 1861, and was invited to provide dignified words for the popular marching tune, 'John Brown's body lies a-mouldering in the grave' (q.v.). The fine stanzas beginning 'Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord' were the result of her effort. The poem was first published in the 'Atlantic Monthly' in 1862.

Battledore-book, see Horn-book.

Battus, a shepherd of Arcadia, who saw Hermes steal the flocks of Admetus. He was bribed by the god not to tell, but broke his promise, and was turned into a stone.

Baucis, see Philemon.

BAUDELAIRE, CHARLES (1821-67), French poet, whose chief work is contained in his 'Fleurs du Mal' (1857), poems in which the melancholy romantic spirit is carried to a morbid excess, but remarkable for their originality and peculiar charm. The first edition was suppressed; a second edition with omissions and additions appeared in 1861.

Bavlad, The, see Gifford.

Bavleca, the horse of the Cid (q.v.).

BAXTER, RICHARD (1615-91), a presbyterian divine, who sided with parliament and was a military chaplain during the Civil War. 'A pious, useful, irrepressible heresiarch' (Saintsbury), he was the author of 'The Saint's Everlasting Rest' (1650, the book that Mrs. Glegg, in 'The Mill on the Floss', used to favour in a domestic crisis), and of 'Call to the Unconverted' (1657). He contributed powerfully to the Restoration and had a bishopric offered to him; but soon after refusing it he suffered much ill-treatment under Charles II and James II, being imprisoned in 1685-6, and fined by Judge Jeffreys on the charge of libelling the Church in his 'Paraphrase of the New Testament' (1685). His numerous writings include a lengthy autobiography, 'Reliquiae Baxterianae', published in 1696.

BAXTER

Bay State: Massachusetts, see United States.

Bayard or BAIARDO, the magic horse given by Charlemagne to Renaud, son of Aymon, or Rinaldo (q.v.), which figures in 'The Four Sons of Aymon', the 'Orlando Innamorato', and the 'Orlando Furioso' (q.v.). Bayard was formerly used as a mock-heroic allusive name for any horse, and also as a type of blind recklessness. [OED.]

Bayard, PIERRE DU TERRAIL, SEIGNEUR DE (c. 1473-1524), the 'chevalier sans peur et sans reproche', born in the Dauphiné, a famous captain in the Italian campaigns of Charles VIII, Louis XII, and Francis I, killed after the battle of Romagnano. He won his first laurels fighting against the 'Great Captain', Gonsalvo de Cordova (q.v.), at the Garigliano in the kingdom of Naples.

Bayes, the name under which Dryden is ridiculed in Buckingham's 'The Rehearsal' (q.v.). The name is taken from the bay laurel, sprigs of which were woven into a wreath to crown a conqueror or poet.

Bayeux Tapestry, THE, a strip of linen 19 inches wide and over 200 feet long, on which are represented the events in the life of Harold from his visit to William, duke of Normandy, until his death. It was traditionally said to be the work of Matilda, wife of William the Conqueror. It is preserved at Bayeux near Caen, and a reproduction is in the Victoria and Albert Museum, South Kensington. Although known as a tapestry, 'it is exclusively of needlework, executed in wools of different colours' (A. F. Kendrick, 'English Embroidery'), and is thought by Mr. F. R. Fowke ('The Bayeux Tapestry') to have been ordered by Bishop Odo of Bayeux for the decoration of his cathedral and worked by Normans in the vicinity of that city.

Bayham, FRED, 'huge, handsome, and jolly', a character in Thackeray's 'The Newcomes' (q.v.).

BAYLE, PIERRE (1647-1706), French philosopher, author of the 'Dictionnaire historique et critique' (1697-1702), a pioneer work in scientific biography and in criticism of religion and legend. There were English editions in 1710, 1734-8, 1734-41, and 1826.

BEARDSLEY

BAYLY, THOMAS HAYNES (1797-1839), educated at Winchester and St. Mary Hall, Oxford, produced songs, ballads, and dramatic pieces, including 'I'd be a butterfly', 'She wore a wreath of roses', and 'Perfection' (a successful farce). Becoming involved in financial difficulties, he in a short time produced thirty-six pieces for the stage. His verse has been the object of a good deal of ridicule.

Baynard Castle, Blackfriars, London, perhaps a royal residence in pre-Conquest times (see W. R. Lethaby, 'London before the Conquest'), took its name from Baynard, a follower of William the Conqueror, to whom the estate was granted. From him it passed to the Fitzwalters, by whom it was transferred to the Black Friars. A later Baynard's Castle, farther east (Upper Thames Street), was an important residence of the dukes of York in the 15th cent. It was destroyed in the Great Fire.

Baynes, GENERAL, MRS., and CHARLOTTE, characters in Thackeray's 'The Adventures of Philip' (q.v.).

Bayona, see Namancos.

Bazzard, MR., in Dickens's 'Edwin Drood' (q.v.), Mr. Grewgious's clerk.

Beaconsfield, EARL OF, see Disraeli.

Beagle, H.M.S., see Darwin (C. R.).

Bean Lean, DONALD, in Scott's 'Waverley' (q.v.), a Highland marauder.

Bear, THE, AT THE BRIDGE FOOT, a tavern that stood just outside the Great Gate at the Southwark end of old London Bridge (q.v.). It is frequently mentioned by Pepys, e.g. 26 Oct. 1664; 24 Feb. 1666-7.

Bear, THE GREAT: for its mythological origin see Callisto.

Bear and Ragged Staff, THE, a crest of the earls of Warwick, borne before the Conquest by the Saxon earls of Warwick, and derived from the chivalrous Guy of Warwick (q.v.).

Beardsley, AUBREY VINCENT (1872-98), an artist in black and white, worked for a short time in an architect's office after leaving school and then became a clerk in the Guardian Insurance Company. At about the age of eighteen he became known to a small circle for the designs that were to make him famous. His earliest important commission was from Messrs. Dent & Sons, to illustrate the 'Morte d'Arthur'. He became art editor of the 'Yellow Book' in 1894; and his connexion with that periodical lasted a little more than a year. Shortly after this had ceased, Beardsley joined in the production of 'The Savoy', of which eight numbers appeared, and to which he contributed three poems and a prose fragment, 'Under the Hill'. His later work included designs for Oscar Wilde's 'Salome', 'The Rape of the Lock', 'Mademoiselle de Maupin', Ernest Dowson's 'Pierrot of the Minute', and a set of initials for an edition of 'Volpone'. Beardsley died of consumption in his 26th year, after achieving an unusual amount of work in so brief a life.

Beast, NUMBER OF THE, in Revelation xiii. 18. The precise figures composing the number are uncertain, 666 or 616, but the former are generally adopted. It has been suggested that since each digit in 666 falls short by one of the perfect number seven, the number thereby symbolizes Antichrist. But it is more probably a cryptogram, of which no interpretation commanding general assent has yet been offered. One of the most likely rests on the fact that the letters of the name 'Nero Caesar' written in Hebrew represent numbers which added together make 666, or 616 if the name Nero is written as in Latin without a final n. Least probable are attempts to make the cipher represent some conspicuous character of modern history (Swete, 'Apo-crypha').

Beatrice, DANTE'S, see Dante.

Beatrice, a character in Shakespeare's 'Much Ado about Nothing' (q.v.).

BEATTIE, JAMES (1735-1803), professor of moral philosophy at Marischal College, Aberdeen, and poet, is remembered as the author of 'The Minstrel', a poem in Spenserian stanzas, tracing the development of a poet in a primitive age. The work remained unfinished. Book I appeared in 1771, Book II in 1774.

Beau Beamish, a character in Meredith's 'The Tale of Chloe' (q.v.).

Beau Brummel, see Brummel.

Beau Nash, see Nash (R.).

Beau Tibbs, a character in Goldsmith's 'The Citizen of the World' (q.v.); an absurd creature, poor and unknown, but boasting of familiarity with the nobility and affecting the airs of a man of fashion. His wife is at once a slattern and a coquette, who washes her husband's shirts while her talk is of countesses.

Beauchamp's Career, a novel by G. Meredith (q.v.), published serially in 1875, in volume form in 1876.

Nevil Beauchamp's career begins in the navy, where he shows himself a gallant officer and a chivalrous if somewhat Quixotic gentleman. In spite of subversive views on political and social questions, he earns the approval of his rich aristocratic uncle, the Hon. Everard Romfrey, a medieval baron in ideas and a hater of radicals and the like. After the Crimean War, Nevil plunges into politics, stands unsuccessfully as a radical candidate for parliament, and comes under the influence of Dr. Shrapnel, an enthusiastic servant in the cause of humanity, but a republican, a free-thinker, and everything that is detestable in the eyes of Mr. Romfrey and his friends. Induced by misrepresentations, Romfrey goes so far as to horsewhip Shrapnel, thereby incurring the fierce indignation of his nephew, who makes it a point of honour to force his proud uncle to apologize to the radical. This apparently hopeless enterprise becomes an obsession with Nevil, whose love affairs are likewise a source of distress to him. He is torn between his early passion for Renée de Croisnel, now the unhappy wife of an elderly Frenchman, and his love for her utter contrast, the ideal English girl, Cecilia Halkett. He resists the temptation which the flight of Renée from her husband places in his way; but he loses Cecilia, whom her father and her friends conspire to marry to Nevil's more humdrum cousin. Harassed and unhappy, Nevil falls desperately ill and lies at death's door. His danger effects the miracle, and Romfrey comes to Shrapnel's cottage, where the sick man lies, and tenders his apology. Nevil recovers and marries Shrapnel's ward, Jenny Denham, a kindred soul. But after a few months' happiness, Beauchamp's career is prematurely closed. He is drowned while trying to rescue a child from the sea.

Beaumains, in Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur', the nickname given to Sir Gareth by Sir Kay, the steward.

Beaumanoir, in Disraeli's 'Coningsby' (q.v.), represents Belvoir Castle.

Beaumanoir, SIR LUCAS, in Scott's 'Ivanhoe' (q.v.), Grand Master of the Knights Templars.

BEAUMARCHAIS, PIERRE AUGUSTIN CARON DE (1732-99), son of a Paris watchmaker named Caron. He obtained admission to the court as music-master to the daughters of Louis XV, became popular and wealthy, had many adventures, and took the name of Beaumarchais from a small property belonging to his wife. He was author of the famous comedies 'Le Barbier de Séville' (1775) and its sequel 'Le Mariage de Figaro' (1784), the latter a keen satire on French society.

BEAUMONT, FRANCIS (1584-1616), was born at Grace-Dieu in Leicestershire of an ancient family. He was educated at Broadgates Hall, Oxford, and was entered at the Middle Temple in 1600. He made the acquaintance of Jonson, for several of whose plays he wrote commendatory verses, and of Drayton. He collaborated with John Fletcher in dramatic works from about 1606 to 1616 (for a list of the plays so produced see under Fletcher, J.). 'The Woman-Hater' (1607), a comedy showing the influence of Jonson and based on the 'humour' of the principal character, is probably the work of his sole pen. Dryden states that Beaumont was 'so accurate a judge of plays that Ben Jonson, while he lived, submitted all his writings to his censure, and 'tis thought used his judgement in correcting, if not contriving, all his plots'. And this superior faculty for the construction of plots is discernible in some of the plays that he wrote in collaboration with Fletcher.

BEAUMONT

Beaumont was buried in Westminster Abbey, near Chaucer and Spenser.

Beauty and the Beast, a fairy tale of which the best-known version appears in the French 'Contes' of Mme de Villeneuve (1744). A somewhat similar story is included in the 'Piacevoli Notti' of Straparola 1550).

Beauty ('la Belle') is the youngest and favourite daughter of a merchant, who suffers reverses. He sets out on a journey in the hope of restoring his shaken fortunes. Unlike her sisters, Beauty asks him to bring her back only a rose. The journey proves a failure, but on his return, in the beautiful garden of an apparently uninhabited palace, he plucks a rose for Beauty. The Beast, an ugly monster, to whom the palace belongs, threatens him with death as the penalty for his theft unless he gives him his youngest daughter. Beauty sacrifices herself and goes to the Beast's palace and lives there. She is gradually filled with pity and affection for the Beast and finally consents to marry him, whereupon he turns into a beautiful prince, having been released from a magic spell by her virtue and courage.

Beaus' Stratagem, The, a comedy by Farquhar (q.v.), produced in 1707.

Aimwell and Archer, two friends who have run through their estate, arrive at the inn at Litchfield, in search of the adventure that will rehabilitate their fortunes. Archer for the nonce passes as Aimwell's servant. There is much speculation as to who they are, and Boniface the landlord concludes that they are highwaymen. This curiosity is shared by Dorinda, daughter of the wealthy Lady Bountiful, who has fallen in love with Aimwell at first sight—in church, and Mrs. Sullen, wife of Lady Bountiful's son, a drunken sot. Aimwell, thinking Dorinda a suitable prey, gets admission to Lady Bountiful's house on a pretext, with Archer, between whom and Mrs. Sullen a mutual attraction has sprung up. An attack by rogues on the house is the occasion of the rescue of the ladies by Aimwell and Archer, and they both press the advantage thus gained. But Aimwell, who has passed himself off as his elder brother, Lord Aimwell, smitten with remorse in presence of the trustfulness of Dorinda, confesses the fraud. At this moment Mrs. Sullen's brother opportunely arrives, to rescue his sister from the brutality of Sullen. He brings news of the death of Aimwell's elder brother and of the accession of Aimwell to title and fortune. Sullen at the same time willingly agrees to the dissolution of his marriage, so that Mrs. Sullen is free to marry Archer, and all ends happily.

Beaver State: Oregon, see United States.

Beazeley, OLD TOM and YOUNG TOM, characters in Marryat's 'Jacob Faithful' (q.v.).

Beck, MADAME, a character in Charlotte Brontë's 'Villette' (q.v.).

BEDDOES

Becket, a tragedy by A. Tennyson (q.v.), published in 1884.

The subject of the play is the bitter quarrel that arose between Henry II and Thomas à Becket when the king had appointed the latter, already his chancellor, to be archbishop of Canterbury against his wish, culminating in the words of the king which authorized the four knights to seek out Becket at Canterbury and kill him in the Cathedral. With this is woven the story of the love of Henry for Fair Rosamund, whom he entrusts to Becket's protection; of Queen Eleanor's finding her way to Rosamund's bower with intent to kill her; and of Rosamund's rescue by Becket and relegation to Godstow nunnery.

Becket, THOMAS à, see Thomas à Becket.

BECKFORD, PETER (1740–1811), master of foxhounds and scholar, was author of the famous 'Thoughts upon Hare and Fox Hunting' and 'Essays on Hunting' (1781), which marked an era in the history of hunting. Beckford also wrote 'Familiar Letters from Italy' (1805).

BECKFORD, WILLIAM (1759–1844), son of William Beckford (1709–70) the alderman and lord mayor in the days of Wilkes, was a man of great wealth, M.P. successively for Wells and Hindon, who spent large sums in collecting works of art and curios, and in the building and extravagant decoration of his mansion of Fonthill, where he lived in almost complete and somewhat mysterious seclusion from 1796. He is remembered chiefly as the author of the fantastic oriental tale 'Vathek' (q.v.). But many readers will derive more pleasure from his two books of travel, 'Dreams, Waking Thoughts, and Incidents' (1783, revised 1834), and 'Recollections of an Excursion to the Monasteries of Alcobaca and Batalha' (1835).

Bed of Ware, THE GREAT, an oak bed 10 ft. 9 in. in length and breadth, with a richly carved headboard, columns, and canopy, of the 16th cent., whose first home may have been Ware Park. It was transferred to the Saracen's Head Inn at Ware, apparently before the end of the 16th cent. It is referred to by Shakespeare ('Twelfth Night', III. ii); Jonson ('Epicuræ', v. i); and Farquhar ('The Recruiting Officer', I. i). It is now in the Victoria and Albert Museum.

BEDDOES, THOMAS LOVELL (1803–49), educated at Charterhouse and Pembroke College, Oxford, went abroad to study medicine and settled at Zürich in 1835, living thereafter mostly abroad. He published in 1821 'The Improvisatore' and in 1822 'The Bride's Tragedy'. His most important work, 'Death's Jest-Book' (q.v.), a play in the Elizabethan spirit, was begun in 1825 and repeatedly altered at various times, not being published until 1850, after his death by suicide. Beddoes showed in his work, besides a taste for the macabre and supernatural, a capacity for occasionally fine blank verse, and more especially a poignant lyrical gift, displayed in his dirge for Wolfram in 'Death's Jest-Book', in his beautiful 'Dream Pedlary' ('If there were dreams to sell, What would you buy?'), and in many other short pieces. His poetical works were edited by Gosse in 1890 and 1928. See also H. W. Donner, 'T. L. Beddoes' (1935).

BEDÉ or BÆDA (673-735), historian and scholar, was when young placed under the charge of Benedict Biscop, abbot of Wearmouth. Thence he went to the monastery of Jarrow, where he spent the greater part of his life. He appears from his writings to have been wise, learned, and humble. He was a diligent teacher, and a Latin, Greek, and Hebrew scholar, and found many pupils among the monks of Wearmouth and Jarrow. He was buried at Jarrow, but his bones were taken to Durham during the first half of the 11th cent. The epithet 'Venerable' was first added to his name in the century following his death. His 'Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum' (q.v.) was brought to an end in 731, and by that year he had written nearly forty works, chiefly biblical commentaries. The treatise 'De Natura Rerum', one of his earliest works, contains such physical science as was then known, and has the merit of referring phenomena to natural causes.

BEDÉ, CUTHBERT, see BRADLEY (E.).

Bedford Coffee-house, THE, stood at the north-east corner of Covent Garden. It was frequented by actors and others, including Garrick, Foote, Sheridan, Hogarth, and Fielding.

Bedivere, SIR, in Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur', one of Arthur's knights. He and his brother Sir Lucan, with Arthur, alone survived the last battle, and it was he who at Arthur's bidding threw Excalibur into the water, and bore the king to the barge that carried him away to Avalon.

Bedlam, a corruption of Bethlehem, applied to the Hospital of St. Mary of Bethlehem, in Bishopsgate, London, founded as a priory in 1247, with the special duty of receiving and entertaining the clergy of St. Mary of Bethlehem, the mother church, as often as they might come to England. In 1330 it is mentioned as 'an hospital', and in 1402 as a hospital for lunatics. In 1346 it was received under the protection of the City of London, and on the dissolution of the monasteries, it was granted to the mayor and citizens. In 1547 it was incorporated as a royal foundation for the reception of lunatics. In 1675 a new hospital was built in Moorfields, and this in turn was replaced by a building in the Lambeth Road in 1815. The hospital has now been transferred to Monks Orchard, Eden Park, Beckenham.

From Bedlam are derived such expressions as TOM O' BEDLAM (q.v.) and BESS O' BEDLAM, for wandering lunatics, or mendicants posing as lunatics.

Beef Steaks, THE SUBLIME SOCIETY OF, was founded in 1735 by John Rich, the manager of the Covent Garden Theatre. The society, which included many eminent persons, used to meet and dine in a room at the theatre, the name being derived from the beef-steaks served. When Covent Garden Theatre was burnt, the Society moved to the Bedford Coffee-house (q.v.), and later to the Lyceum Theatre.

Beef-steak Club, THE, was founded about 1876; the members used to dine in a room at 'Toole's' Theatre, and moved, when this was demolished, to Green Street, Leicester Square. There was an earlier club of the same name. These are not to be confused with the 'Sublime Society of Beef Steaks'.

Beefeater, an eater of beef, a popular appellation of the Yeomen of the Guard in the household of the Sovereign, instituted at the accession of Henry VII in 1485; also of the Warders of the Tower, who were named Yeomen Extraordinary of the Guard in the reign of Edward VI. (The conjecture that the word has some connexion with the French buffet is historically baseless.) [OED.]

Beefington, a character in 'The Rovers' (see Anti-Jacobin).

Beelzebub, adapted from the Latin word used in the Vulgate to render both the Greek βελζεβούλ of the received text of the N.T., and the Hebrew 'baal-z'ebub', 'fly-lord', mentioned in 2 Kings i. 2 as 'God of Ekron'. The word βελζεβούλ represents the Assyrian for 'lord of the high house', but was understood in N.T. times as 'lord of the underworld'. In Matt. xii. 24 Beelzebub is spoken of as 'prince of the devils'. Milton gives the name to one of the fallen angels, next to Satan in power ('Paradise Lost', l. 79).

BEERBOHM, SIR MAX (1872-1956), educated at Charterhouse and Merton College, Oxford, a critic, essayist, and caricaturist, published his first book, 'The Works of Max Beerbohm', in 1896. A master of wit, irony, and satire, and of a polished and incisive style, he directs his criticism at literary mannerisms and social pretences. He succeeded Bernard Shaw as dramatic critic of the 'Saturday Review' in 1898. One of the best known of his critical works is 'A Christmas Garland' (1912), a series of parodies of contemporary authors, Wells, Bennett, Conrad, Chesterton, &c. 'Zuleika Dobson' (1911) is an amusing story of the devastating effect on the youth of Oxford of a beautiful adventuress. His other principal works are: 'More', 'Yet Again', 'And Even Now' (essays); 'Seven Men' (stories); also volumes of caricatures, among others—'The Poet's Corner' (1904), 'A Book of Caricatures' (1907), 'Rossetti and his Circle' (1922).

BEES

Bees, Fable of the, see Mandeville (B. de).

Beethoven, LUDWIG VAN (1770–1827), born at Bonn in Rhenish Prussia, of Dutch descent, the famous German musical composer. He studied under Haydn. He became afflicted with deafness in 1802, which increased until it became complete, but did not arrest his creative genius. Beethoven died in Vienna. His principal achievement was the introduction into the art of music of something other than the mere development of musical themes. His musical conceptions have an intellectual and moral quality that was previously unknown. He perfected the symphony. His compositions included one opera ('Fidelio'), two masses, nine symphonies, and a large number of concertos, sonatas, quartets, and trios.

BEETON, Mrs. ISABELLA MARY (1836–65), née Mayson, author of a famous book of cookery and domestic economy, first published in 1859–61 in 'The Englishwoman's Domestic Magazine' and in book form in 1861 ('The Times', 3 Feb. 1932).

Befana, an Italian corruption of EPIPHANIA, Epiphany, an Italian female Santa Claus, who fills children's stockings on Twelfth Night. Her name is also used as a bogey to frighten children.

Beggar's Bush, according to Ray's 'Proverbs' (p. 244, ed. 1768), 'a tree notoriously known on the London Road from Hunting-ton to Caxton', frequented by beggars.

Beggars Bush, The, a drama by J. Fletcher (q.v.), and perhaps Massinger, probably produced in 1622.

Florez, the rightful heir of the earldom of Flanders but ignorant of his rights, and living as a rich merchant at Bruges, is in love with Bertha, who is heiress of Brabant, but has been stolen away and placed with the Burgomaster of Bruges and is equally ignorant of her rights. Gerrard, father of Florez, who has been driven from Flanders, has concealed himself among the beggars near Bruges, is their king, and watches over the interests of Florez. Wolfort, the usurper, proposes to marry Bertha and restore her to her rights, thus obtaining possession of Brabant. He sends Hubert, one of his nobles, who is in love with Jacqueline, Gerrard's daughter, to effect his purpose. Hubert, however, joins the beggars, among whom Jacqueline is living, and plots with Gerrard to get Wolfort into their power. In this they are successful. The identity of Florez and Bertha is revealed and they are married. The play is interesting by reason of its examples of early thieves' cant, and its realistic picture of vagabond life.

Beggar's Daughter of Bednall Green, The, a ballad written in the reign of Elizabeth and included in Percy's 'Reliques'.

Beesee is the fair daughter of a blind beggar, employed at the inn at Romford and courted by four suitors, a knight, a gentleman of good birth, a merchant of London, and the innkeeper's son. They all withdraw their suit on being referred by her to her father, except the knight. The old beggar gives her as dowry three thousand pounds, two pounds for every one the knight puts down. It now appears that the beggar is Henry, son of Simon de Montfort, who has assumed the disguise of a beggar for safety.

The story forms the basis of Chettle and Day's 'Blind Beggar of Bednall Green' (1600, printed 1659). J. S. Knowles (q.v.) also wrote a comedy called 'The Beggar's Daughter of Bethnal Green'; and R. Dodsley (q.v.) wrote a musical play, 'The Blind Beggar of Bethnal Green'.

Beggar's Opera, The, a musical play by J. Gay (q.v.), produced in 1728.

The play arose out of a suggestion by Swift to Gay that a Newgate pastoral 'might make an odd pretty sort of thing'. The principal characters are Peachum, a receiver of stolen goods, who also makes a living by informing against his clients; his wife, and his pretty daughter, Polly; Lockit, warder of Newgate, and his daughter Lucy; and Captain Macheath, highwayman and lighthearted winner of women's hearts. Polly falls desperately in love with Macheath, who marries her. Her father, furious at her folly, decides to place her in the 'comfortable estate of widowhood' by informing against Macheath, who is arrested and sent to Newgate. Here he makes a conquest of Lucy's heart, and there is a spirited conflict between Polly and Lucy, the rival claimants to his affection ('How happy could I be with either, Were t'other dear charmer away!'). In spite of her jealousy, Lucy procures the escape of Macheath. The play was a great success and Gay is said to have made £800 by it. (It was said to have made Gay rich, and Rich—the producer—gay.)

Beghard, a name derived like BÉGUINE (q.v.) from the surname of Lambert Bègue, given to members of certain lay brotherhoods which arose in the Low Countries early in the 13th cent. in imitation of the béguine sisterhoods. From the 14th cent. the begwards were denounced by Popes and Councils and persecuted, and such as survived in the 17th cent. were absorbed in the Tertiaries of the Franciscans. [OED.]

Béguines, a name derived from the surname of Lambert Bègue or le Bègue ('the stammerer'), a priest of Liège in the 12th cent., given to the members of certain lay sisterhoods which began in the Low Countries in the 12th cent.; they devoted themselves to a religious life, but were not bound by strict vows. They were protected by Pope John XXII when he persecuted the Beghards (q.v.), and are still represented by small communities in the Netherlands. [OED.]

Behemoth, an animal mentioned in Job xl. 10, probably a hippopotamus. Used in modern literature as a general expression for one of the largest and strongest animals.

Behémóth, biggest born of earth.

(Milton, 'Paradise Lost', vii. 471.)

The might of earth-convulsing behémóth. (Shelley, 'Prometheus Unbound', iv. i. 310.)

The OED. supports Milton's accentuation.

Behistun Inscription, THE, a cuneiform inscription in the three languages of the Persian empire, on a lofty rock between Hamadan and Kirmanshah, recounting the events of the reign of Darius. It was copied and deciphered by Sir Henry Rawlinson.

Behmenism, see Boehme.

BEHN, MRS. AFRA, APHRA, APHARA, or AYFARA (1640-89), daughter of John and Amy Amis, lived as a child in Surinam, Guiana. She returned to England in 1658, and married Behn, a city merchant. She was employed by Charles II as a spy in Antwerp on the outbreak of the Dutch war. Between 1671 and 1689 she produced fifteen plays, of which the most popular was 'The Rover' (in two parts, 1677-81), dealing with the amorous adventures in Naples and Madrid of a band of English cavaliers during the exile of Charles II. 'The City Heiress' (q.v.), 1682, is one of her typical coarse comedies of contemporary London life. She also wrote poems (including the beautiful 'Love in fantastic triumph sat'), and novels, of which her 'Oroonoko, or the History of the Royal Slave' (q.v.) is the best known. It is the first English philosophical novel containing dissertations on abstract subjects, such as the religion of humanity. Afra Behn was buried in the east cloister of Westminster Abbey.

Bel and the Dragon, one of the apocryphal books of the O.T., detached from the Book of Daniel. Bel was an idol worshipped by the Babylonians (the word is equivalent to Baal), and the story tells how Daniel convinced King Astyages that it was a mere image of brass. The dragon was a living animal, which was also worshipped. Daniel disproved its divine character by giving it lumps of pitch, fat, and hair to eat, so that it burst asunder.

Belarius, a character in Shakespeare's 'Cymbeline' (q.v.).

Belch, SIR TOBY, in Shakespeare's 'Twelfth Night' (q.v.), a roistering humorous knight, uncle to Olivia.

Belcher, a neckerchief with blue ground and large white spots having a dark blue spot or eye in the centre, named after the celebrated pugilist Jim Belcher (1781-1811).

Bellal, adapted from the Hebrew words b'li-ya'al, means literally 'worthlessness' and 'destruction', but in Deut. xiii. 13, and elsewhere, in the phrase 'sons of Belial', it is retained untranslated in the English version, as a proper name. It has thus come to mean the spirit of evil personified, and is used from early times as a name for the Devil or one of the fiends, and by Milton ('Paradise Lost', i. 490) as the name of one of the fallen angels.

Belinda, (1) the heroine of Pope's 'The Rape of the Lock' (q.v.); (2) a character in Vanbrugh's 'The Provok'd Wife' (q.v.); (3) the title of a novel by Maria Edgeworth (q.v.); (4) the niece of Mr. John Jorrock, who promised her (on her marriage) £1,000 every time she should have twins.

Belinus, the name of a Celtic sun-god, and of a legendary British king (perhaps the same as Cassibelaunus) who built a tower and made a haven for ships at what was afterwards London. Billingsgate (q.v.) is thought by some to be connected with his name.

Bellsarius, the great military commander in the reign of Justinian (505?-565), was a native of Illyria and of humble birth. After successful campaigns against the Vandals, Goths, and Bulgarians, he was in 563 accused of conspiring against the emperor. His eyes, according to tradition, were put out, and he was reduced to wandering, a beggar, about the streets of Constantinople. But, in fact, he appears to have been only imprisoned for a year.

Bell, ALEXANDER GRAHAM (1847-1922), born at Edinburgh and educated at Edinburgh and London Universities, went to Canada in 1870, and thence to Boston, U.S.A., where he became professor of vocal physiology. He exhibited in 1876 his invention of the means of transmitting sound by electricity, which, when perfected, became the telephone.

BELL, CURRER, ELLIS, and ACTON, see Brontë (C., E., and A.).

Bell, JOHN, see Egan.

Bell, LAURA, the heroine of Thackeray's 'Pendennis' (q.v.).

Bell-the-Cat, Archibald Douglas, fifth earl of Angus (1449?-1514), who earned the nickname by declaring to his confederates that he would 'bell the cat', i.e. kill Robert Cochrane, earl of Mar, the hated favourite of James III. He figures in Scott's 'Marmion' (q.v.).

Bell's Life in London, see Egan.

Bella Wilfer, a character in Dickens's 'Our Mutual Friend' (q.v.).

Bellafront, in Dekker's 'The Honest Whore' (q.v.), the repentant courtesan and exemplary wife of the worthless Matheo.

Bellaïr, a character in Etherege's 'The Man of Mode' (q.v.).

Bellamira, a comedy by Sir C. Sedley (q.v.), produced in 1687.

It is a coarse but lively play, founded on the 'Eunuchus' of Terence, reflecting the licentious manners of Sedley's day. Dangerfield, a braggart and a bully, whose cowardice is exposed in an adventure similar to that of Falstaff at Gadshill, is an amusing character.

BELLAMY, EDWARD (1850-98), American author, born near Springfield, Mass., whose fame rests upon his popular Utopian romance, 'Looking Backward' (1888).

The hero of 'Looking Backward' falls asleep in 1887 and awakes in Boston, in the year 2000, to find great social changes. Private capitalism has been replaced by public capitalism, and all work is done for public benefit rather than private gain. Few 'Utopias' have been thought out more logically, or in more detail, than Bellamy's. His communistic ideas gave rise to a new political party; but it is in Russia that his theories have been most closely approached in practice.

Bellarlo, (1) the name assumed by the heroine of Beaumont and Fletcher's 'Philaster' (q.v.) when disguised as a page; (2) in Shakespeare's 'The Merchant of Venice', Portia's lawyer cousin.

BELLARMINE, ROBERTO FRANCESCO ROMOLO (1542-1621), an Italian cardinal and a powerful defender of the Roman cause against the Protestants, was author of 'Disputationes de Controversiis Christianae Fidei adversus hujus temporis haereticos' (1581-93).

The name 'Bellarmine' was given to a large glazed drinking-jug with capacious belly and narrow neck, originally designed by the Protestant party in the Netherlands as a burlesque likeness of their great opponent, the cardinal. [OED.]

Bellaston, LADY, a character in Fielding's 'Tom Jones' (q.v.).

Belle or ISOPEL Berners, a character in Borrow's 'Lavengro' (q.v.), a sturdy wandering lass, who acts as second to Lavengro in his fight with the Flaming Tinman.

Belle Dame sans Merci, La, a ballad by Keats (q.v.), written in 1819.

The knight-at-arms, enthralled by an elf, wakes from the dream of his lady, not to find his dream realized, but the cold hill's side, where 'no birds sing'. The poem is, says Oliver Elton, 'a touchstone' for this kind of composition. 'La Belle Dame sans Merci' is also the title of a poem, in rhyme royal and octaves, translated from Alain Chartier, attributed at one time to Chaucer, but now thought, on manuscript authority, to be the work of Sir Richard Roa.

Belle Sauvage, or BELL SAVAGE, Inn, THE, stood on Ludgate Hill, and dated at least from the 15th cent. In a deed of 1453 it is described as 'Savages Inn' or the 'Bell-on-the-Hoop'; and the name 'Bell Savage' perhaps arose from the association of the name of the proprietor with the sign of the Bell. Dramatic performances and bull-baiting took place in its yard in the 16th and 17th cents., and it was a starting-place for coaches in the 18th cent. Sir Thomas Wyatt's march on London came to an end there. The site is now occupied by the publishing house of Cassell, whose publisher's design interprets the name as meaning 'the beautiful savage woman'.

BELLISANT

Belle's Stratagem, The, a comedy by Mrs. H. Cowley (q.v.), produced in 1780.

Doricourt returns from his travels to marry Letitia Hardy, whom he has not seen since his childhood, the match having been arranged by their parents. He finds her beautiful but lacking in animation; she falls in love with him at once. Distressed by his cold reception, she determines to win him by first disgusting him through the assumption of the manners of a country hoyden, and then conquering his heart by her sprightliness at a masquerade, and this scheme she successfully accomplishes. The sub-plot is concerned with Sir George Touchwood, a doting husband, who brings his wife, Lady Frances, to London for the first time in her life; the attempt of Courtall to seduce her at the masquerade by assuming the same disguise as her husband; and the defeat of the plot by her old admirer, Saville.

BELLENDEN, or BALLENDEN, JOHN (fl. 1533-87), Scottish poet and translator into Scots of Livy.

Bellenden, LADY MARGARET, EDITH, and MAJOR, characters in Scott's 'Old Mortality' (q.v.).

Bellêrôphon, son of Glaucus, king of Corinth. He was banished for a murder, and fled to the court of Proetus, king of Argos, where Antea, the king's wife, fell in love with him. As he alighted her passion, she accused him to her husband of an attempt on her virtue. Proetus, unwilling to violate the laws of hospitality by killing Bellerophon under his roof, dispatched him to his father-in-law, Iobates, bearing a letter signifying that he should be killed (whence the expression Bellerophontis litterae). Iobates accordingly sent Bellerophon against the monster Chimaera (q.v.); but Bellerophon, with the aid of the winged horse Pegasus (q.v.), overcame it. He afterwards destroyed assassins sent by Iobates, and was successful in an expedition against the Amazons. Thereupon Iobates, despairing of killing the hero, gave him his daughter to wife and the succession to his throne. Other legends relate that he attempted to fly to heaven on Pegasus, but that Zeus by means of a gadfly caused the horse to throw its rider.

Bellerophon, H.M.S., the ship (Captain Maitland) on board of which Napoleon surrendered himself in 1815.

Bellerus, the name of a fabulous person introduced by Milton in his 'Lycidas' to account for Bellerium or Bolerium, the Roman name of Land's End, in Cornwall.

Bellisant or BELLISANCE, in the tale of 'Valentine and Orson' (q.v.), the sister of king Pepin, and wife of the emperor of Constantinople, mother of Valentine and Orson.

BELLISANT

BELLOC, JOSEPH HILAIRE PIERRE (1870-1953), born in France, educated at the Oratory School, Edgbaston, and Balliol College, Oxford, is a versatile writer of essays, novels, verse, travels, history, biography, and criticism. Among his best works is 'The Path to Rome' (1902), the description of a tramp from Toul in the north of France, through Switzerland and northern Italy, to Rome, with divagations on innumerable subjects. His other best-known writings include: 'Hills and the Sea' (1906), 'The Bad Child's Book of Beasts', 'More Beasts for Worse Children', 'The Modern Traveller', 'Cautionary Tales' (all light verse); 'The Girondin', 'The Green Overcoat', 'Mr. Clutterbuck's Election', 'A Change in the Cabinet' (novels); 'The Four Men' (fantastic travel); 'Marie Antoinette' (history); 'The Servile State' (sociology); 'British Battles'; 'History of England'; and books of essays on 'Nothing', 'Something', 'Everything', &c.

Bellona, the Roman goddess of war.

Bells, The, a dramatic adaptation by L. Lewis of 'The Polish Jew' of Erckmann-Chatrian, the story of a burgomaster haunted by the consciousness of an undiscovered murder that he has committed. It provided Sir H. Irving with one of his most successful parts.

Bells and Pomegranates, the title under which a series of poems was published by R. Browning (q.v.) between 1841 and 1846, including 'Pippa Passes', 'Dramatic Lyrics' ('The Pied Piper', 'Waring', &c.), 'The Return of the Druses', 'A Blot in the 'Scutcheon', 'Colombe's Birthday', 'Dramatic Romances' ('How they brought the good news', &c.), and 'Luria' (qq.v.). The entire series was then issued in one volume under the above title (1846).

Bellyn, in 'Reynard the Fox' (q.v.), the name of the ram.

Belmont, Portia's house in Shakespeare's 'The Merchant of Venice' (q.v.).

Belmont, SIR JOHN, the heroine's father in Miss Burney's 'Evelina' (q.v.).

Belphegor, the LXX and Vulgate form of the Moabitish 'Baal-Peor' mentioned in Num. xxv.

In Machiavelli's 'Novella' (1469), Belphegor is the name of an archdevil sent by Pluto to the world to investigate the truth of the complaints made by many souls reaching hell, that they have been sent there by their wives. Belphegor has orders to take a wife, arrives in Florence well provided with money and a retinue of devils as servants, and marries. But he is unable to put up with his wife's insolence, and prefers to run away from her and return to hell. We have echoes of this legend in one of the stories of Barnabe Rich's 'Farewell to the Military Profession' (1581), and in Jonson's 'The Devil is an Ass' (1616). John Wilson (? 1627-96) produced a tragic-comedy, 'Belphegor, the Marriage of the Devil', in 1690.

Belpheobe, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', the chaste huntress, daughter of the nymph Chrysogone, and twin sister of Amoret (q.v.); she symbolizes Queen Elizabeth. Belpheobe puts Braggadochio (q.v.) to flight (II. iii), finds herbs to heal the wounded Timias ('whether it divine Tobacco were, or Panachea, or Polygony', III. v), and rescues Amoret from Corflambo (q.v., IV. iii).

Belshazzar's Feast, the feast made by Belshazzar, the son of Nebuchadnezzar and the last king of Babylonia, at which his doom was foretold by writing on the wall, as interpreted by Daniel (Dan. v). Belshazzar was killed in the sack of Babylon by Cyrus (538 B.C.). He is the subject of dramas by Hannah More and Milman, of Robert Landor's 'Impious Feast', and of a poem by Lord Byron (qq.v.).

Beltane, the Celtic name of the first of May, the beginning of summer, used for old May Day in Scotland, where anciently it was one of the quarter-days. It is also the name of an ancient Celtic anniversary celebration on May Day, in connexion with which great bonfires were kindled on the hills. Cormac's Glossary explains belltaine as 'two fires which the Druids used to make, and they used to bring the cattle [as a safeguard] against the diseases of each year to those fires' [OED.].

Beltenebros, the name assumed by Amadis of Gaul (q.v.) when he retired to the wilderness to do penance, being in disgrace with Oriana.

Beltham, SQUIRE and DOROTHY, characters in Meredith's 'Harry Richmond' (q.v.).

Belton Estate, The, a novel by A. Trollope (q.v.), first published in 'The Fortnightly Review' in 1865, and reprinted separately in 1866.

The Belton property in Somerset, belonging to Mr. Amedroz, is entailed, in default of any son of his own, on a distant cousin, Will Belton. Charles, the son of Mr. Amedroz, commits suicide, and Clara his sister is menaced with destitution when her father shall die. Will Belton, a warm-hearted, self-confident young farmer, hardly known to the Amedroz family, comes forward on the death of Charles with offers of assistance, wins the affection of the feckless Mr. Amedroz, forcefully puts his affairs in order, and is welcomed as a brother by Clara. He promptly proposes to her and is rejected, because Clara is already in love with Captain Aylmer, her cold-blooded, mean-spirited relative, whose true character she has not gauged. In compliance with a promise that he has given to his aunt on her death-bed, Aylmer proposes to Clara and is accepted. But his meanness and tyrannical disposition soon come to light, as also those of his odious mother and sister, and arouse the resentment of Clara. She breaks off her engagement and is finally married to Will Belton.

Belvedere Apollo, see Apollo.

Belvidera, the heroine of Otway's 'Venice Preserv'd' (q.v.).

Belvoir Hunt, THE (pron. bëvër), one of the most celebrated in the Shires, dates from about 1756 and was established in the days of the third duke of Rutland, the owner of Belvoir Castle, near Grantham, from which the hunt is named.

Bembo, PIETRO (1470-1547), Italian humanist, became bishop of Bergamo, a cardinal, and historiographer of Venice. He wrote in Latin and Italian, in prose and verse. He was a devoted admirer of Lucrezia Borgia (q.v.), and figures prominently in the 'Cortegiano' of Castiglione (q.v.).

Ben, BIG, the great bell in the Clock Tower of the Houses of Parliament at Westminster, named after Sir Benjamin Hall, Chief Commissioner of Works (1855-8), during whose term of office it was cast.

Ben Hur: A Tale of the Christ, by Lew Wallace, published in 1880.

Ben trovato, from the Italian phrase 'se non è vero, è ben trovato' (if it is not true it is well invented), sometimes used as an epithet of a good story, &c.

BENAVENTE Y MARTINEZ, JACINTO (1866-1954), Spanish playwright and critic, who was awarded the Nobel Prize in 1922. He is the author of many light and pleasant comedies of which the following are the best known in English translations: 'Saturday Night' (1903), 'Rose of Autumn' (1905), 'Vested Interests' (1907), 'Brute Force' (1908).

Benbow, JOHN (1653-1702), a gallant British admiral, master of the fleet in the battle off Beachy Head (1690) and at Barfleur and La Hogue (1692), and commander of the bombarding flotilla at Saint Malo and Dunkirk (1693-4-5). He was later commander-in-chief in the West Indies, where, badly supported by the ships of his squadron, he endeavoured to bring Du Casse, the French admiral, to an engagement off Santa Marta. He here had his right leg shattered by a chain shot, but after having had the wound dressed, returned to the quarter-deck. He died of his wounds at Port Royal.

Benedick, a character in Shakespeare's 'Much Ado about Nothing' (q.v.). The name is used (also erroneously in the form 'Benedict') of an apparently confirmed bachelor who marries.

Benedict Biscop, ST. (628?-690), a thegn of Oswiu, king of Northumbria, who after making two pilgrimages to Rome retired to the Isle of Lérins, where he adopted the monastic life. After two years he again went to Rome, and was directed by the pope, Vitalian, to accompany Theodore of Tarsus from Rome to Canterbury. He was then appointed abbot of St. Peter's, Canterbury (669), resigning the dignity two years later to visit Rome once more. During this journey he collected and brought back many volumes and relics. On his return he founded (in 674) the monastery of St. Peter at the mouth of the river Wear, importing workmen to build a church of stone and to glaze the windows. Once more he went to Rome, bringing back a further store of books and relics. After this he founded the sister monastery of St. Paul at Jarrow. He was buried in his church at Wearmouth, having left directions for the careful preservation of his library. He is regarded as one of the originators of the artistic and literary development of Northumbria in the next century. He is commemorated on 12 Feb.

Bénédictine, the name of a liqueur made at Fécamp, near Havre, in France; formerly (before the French Revolution) by the monks of the Benedictine abbey there, each bottle bearing the inscription D.O.M. (Deo Optimo Maximo).

Benedictines, the order of monks, also known from their dress as 'Black Monks', established by St. Benedict (480-543) about the year 529, when he founded the monastery on Monte Cassino in Campania; the first in time, as in fame, of the great Western Church orders. It became noted for its wealth and for the learning of its members. Among its offshoots were the Cluniacs and Cistercians. Battle Abbey in Sussex was built for them by William I where the battle of Hastings was fought. As regards their valuable literary work see Maurists.

Benengell, see Cid Hamet Benengeli.

BENÉT, STEPHEN VINCENT (1898-1943), American writer, born in Pennsylvania. His chief works are: 'Five Men and Pompey' (1915), 'Young Adventure' (1918), 'Tiger Joy' (1925), 'John Brown's Body' (1928), a chronicle drama in verse dealing with the Civil War).

Benicia Boy, nickname of John Heenan (1835-73), an American pugilist, who fought Thomas Sayers, the champion of England, in 1860. Heenan was a much bigger and stronger man than Sayers, but the latter was more skilful. The desperate fight between them was interrupted, and a silver belt awarded to each.

Benjamin, used of a youngest and favourite son, in allusion to the youngest son of Jacob (Gen. xxxv. 8; xlii, &c.).

Benjamin, A. in the first half of the 19th cent., was an overcoat of a particular shape (according to Brewer from the name of a tailor).

BENJAMIN, RENÉ (1885-1948), French writer, author of 'La Prodigieuse Vie de H. de Balzac' (1925), 'Les Justices de paix' (1913), 'Les Plaisirs du hasard' (comedy, 1922), &c.

BENJAMIN OF TUDELA

BENJAMIN OF TUDELA (f. c. 1150), a Spanish Jew and traveller in the East, whose itinerary 'Masaoth', printed at Constantinople in 1543 and at Ferrara in 1556, was translated into English in 1840 by A. Asher. Benjamin visited Constantinople, the Aegean, Damascus, Jerusalem, Bagdad, Basra, Aden, Assuan, and Egypt, of which Saladin was then vizier.

Bennet, Mr., Mrs., Jane, Elizabeth, Mary, Kitty, and Lydia, characters in Jane Austen's 'Pride and Prejudice' (q.v.).

BENNETT, (ENOCH) ARNOLD (1867-1931), born near Hanley in Staffordshire, spent his childhood in modest surroundings, and was educated locally and at London University. He became a solicitor's clerk in London and in 1893 assistant editor and subsequently editor of the periodical 'Woman'. After 1900 he devoted himself exclusively to writing, theatre journalism being among his special interests.

His fame as a novelist rests chiefly on 'The Old Wives' Tale' (q.v., 1908) and the 'Clayhanger' series ('Clayhanger' (1910), 'Hilda Lessways' (1911), 'These Twain' (1916), reprinted as 'The Clayhanger Family' (1925)). The 'Five Towns' which figure prominently in these works are Tunstall, Burslem, Hanley, Stoke-upon-Trent, and Longton, centres of the pottery industry; and the features, often ugly and sordid, of this background are skilfully woven into stories of lives which he presents dispassionately, with an infinite delight in significant detail, but without comment or protest. 'Riceyman Steps' (1923) is another of Bennett's pictures of life in drab surroundings in which the novelist is seen at his best. It is the story of a miser, a second-hand bookseller in Clerkenwell, who not only starves himself to death, but infects his wife with his passion for economy and brings her also to an untimely end. Among Bennett's other best-known works are: 'The Grand Babylon Hotel' (1902), 'The Grim Smile of the Five Towns' (short stories, 1907), 'Milestones' (play, with E. Knoblock), and 'The Matador of the Five Towns' (short stories, 1912).

Bennett, James Gordon (1795-1872), born in Scotland, became celebrated as the founder of the American newspaper the 'New York Herald' (now 'New York Herald-Tribune' by amalgamation). He sent Stanley to Africa as explorer in 1871-2.

BENOÎT DE SAINTE-MAURE, a 12th-cent. trouvère, born probably at Sainte-Maure in Touraine and patronized by Henry II of England, for whom he composed a verse history of the dukes of Normandy. His best-known work is the 'Roman de Troie', based on the writings of Dares Phrygius and Dictys Cretensis (qq.v.). The 'Roman' was translated into Latin prose by Guido de Colonna (q.v.), and thus served as a source on which many subsequent writers drew, including

BENTHAM

Boccaccio, followed by Chaucer and Shakespeare, in the story of 'Troilus and Cressida'. Bensalem, the name of the imaginary island in Bacon's 'New Atlantis' (q.v.).

BENSON, EDWARD FREDERIC (1867-1940), noted as the author of the popular novel 'Dodo' (1893), and many other stories.

BENTHAM, JEREMY (1748-1832), educated at Westminster and Queen's College, Oxford, was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn, but never practised, and turned his mind to physical science and political speculation. He published anonymously in 1776 his 'Fragment on Government', in form a criticism of Blackstone's 'Commentaries', in which he first sketches his theory of government. While in Russia, during 1785-8, he wrote his 'Defence of Usury' (1787) and a series of letters on a 'Panopticon' (1791), a scheme for improving prison discipline. In 1789 he published his 'Introduction to Principles of Morals and Legislation' (which had been first printed in 1780). Besides these he produced a number of works on ethics, jurisprudence, logic, and political economy, his influence proving greatest in the first two of these spheres. In the dissemination of his views, Bentham was greatly assisted by his devoted disciple, Étienne Dumont of Geneva, who compiled a number of treatises based on Bentham's manuscripts and published them, between 1802 and 1825, in French. A considerable part of Bentham's published works are retranslations of Dumont.

It is in the 'Fragment on Government' and more fully in the 'Principles of Morals and Legislation' that we have enunciated the political and ethical theory (rather than philosophical doctrine) of 'Utility' by which Bentham is principally remembered. 'It is the greatest happiness of the greatest number that is the measure of right and wrong.' Pain and pleasure are the 'sovereign masters' governing man's conduct; 'it is for them alone to point out what we ought to do'. Pleasures and pains can be quantitatively measured according to their intensity, duration, certainty, and propinquity. When the pleasures and pains resulting from any act to all the members of the community affected have been measured by these standards, we are in a position to determine the moral quality of the act. The criterion of the goodness of a law is this principle of Utility, the measure in which it subserves the happiness to which every individual is equally entitled. The motive of an act being always self-interest, it is the business of law and education to make the sanctions sufficiently strong to induce the individual to subordinate his own happiness to that of the community. Bentham worked out the quantitative value of pains and pleasures as motives of action with extraordinary minuteness, with the object of giving scientific accuracy to morals and legislation.

Bentham did not share the theoretical views of the French Revolutionists, and he criticized the 'Declaration of the Rights of Man' in his 'Anarchical Fallacies' (included in his collected works). His democratic views are expressed in his 'Constitutional Code' (1830). His 'Chrestomathia', a series of papers on education, appeared in 1816. He also propounded a number of valuable reforms in the administration of English justice, which have since his time been applied. In 1824 Bentham, with the assistance of James Mill (q.v.), founded the 'Westminster Review', the organ of the philosophical radicals, which lasted until 1907.

Bentley, the name of a well-known make of English motor-car, expensive and capable of high speed.

BENTLEY, RICHARD (1662-1742), born at Oulton in Yorkshire, was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, and appointed by Stillingfleet, bishop of Worcester, tutor to his son, remaining six years in his household. He was brought into great repute as a scholar by his 'Epistola ad Millium' in 1691, a critical letter in Latin on the Greek dramatists, contributed to John Mill's edition of Malela, a medieval chronicler. In 1692 Bentley delivered the first Boyle lectures, entitled 'A Confutation of Atheism', seeking for part of his argument the assistance of Isaac Newton (q.v.). He became keeper of the king's libraries in 1694. During 1697-9 he was engaged in the famous controversy relating to the 'Epistles of Phalaris' (see Phalaris, Epistles of), which he proved to be spurious. In 1699 he was appointed Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, which he ruled with such despotic power that he was brought before the bishop and nominally, though not effectually, deprived of his mastership. Among his greatest critical works were his bold revisions of the text of Horace and Manilius. His arbitrary revision of Milton's 'Paradise Lost', on the other hand, was a venture in a field unsuited to his genius. Bentley is caricatured by Pope in the 'Dunciad' (Bk. IV. 201 et seq.). His son Richard (1708-82) was a correspondent of Horace Walpole (q.v.). Jebb (q.v.) wrote a life of Bentley (1882).

Bentley, RICHARD (1794-1871), publisher, the founder of 'Bentley's Miscellany' (1837) with Charles Dickens as editor. His issue at a low price of 127 volumes of 'Standard Novels' was not only a successful but, from the public standpoint, a beneficial venture. He was succeeded in the business by his son GEORGE BENTLEY (1828-95), who introduced many notable novelists to the public, including Wilkie Collins, Mrs. Henry Wood, and Miss Rhoda Broughton.

Benvolio, in Shakespeare's 'Romeo and Juliet' (q.v.), a cousin and friend of Romeo.

Beowulf, the name given to an Old English poem of some 3,200 lines, perhaps the earliest considerable poem in any modern language. The manuscript, of the late 10th cent., formed part of the collection of Sir Robert Bruce

BEOWULF

Cotton, whence it passed into the British Museum.

The poem opens with praise of the deeds of the Danes, Scyld their king, and his descendants. One of these, Hrothgar, builds a great hall, Heorot. The monster Grendel enters the hall at night and carries off thirty of Hrothgar's thanes, and haunts the hall for twelve years, accomplishing more murders. Beowulf, the nephew of Higelac, king of the Geats (a tribe living in the south of Sweden), hearing of the trouble, comes with fourteen companions across the sea to give assistance, and is welcomed by Hrothgar, but taunted by Unferth, one of Hrothgar's followers, for his defeat by Breca in a swimming-match. Beowulf tells the true story and retorts on Unferth for not facing Grendel. Beowulf and his men sleep in the hall; Grendel breaks in and devours Hondscio, one of these, and seizes Beowulf, who unarmed wrestles with him and tears out his arm. Grendel, mortally wounded, makes off to his lair. Hrothgar rewards Beowulf, and Unferth is silenced. The minstrel sings the tale of Finn, a Frisian king, who had carried off Hildeburh, and was attacked by her brothers Hnaef and Hengest, and of the recovery of Hildeburh by Guthlaf and Oslaf. Grendel's mother, a water-hag, enters the hall to revenge her son, and carries off Aeschere, the counsellor of Hrothgar. Beowulf prepares to attack her. Unferth, recognizing the greater prowess of Beowulf, lends him his sword. Beowulf dives into the mere, and reaches a cave where the witch's lair is, and fights with her, but the sword fails to wound her. She nearly kills him, but his woven armour, with God's assistance, saves him. He sees an old sword, made by giants, among the armour in the cave, and with this cuts off the witch's head, and also the head of Grendel, who is lying in the cave. But their blood melts the sword, of which only the hilt remains. With this and the head of Grendel, Beowulf returns to Heorot. Hrothgar praises him, but warns him against pride. Beowulf and his Geats return to their own land. Beowulf surrenders the gifts he has received to Higelac, his king, and receives in return the sword of Hrethel, seven thousands in money, and a part of the kingdom.

After the death of Higelac and Heardred his son, Beowulf succeeds to the kingdom, where he reigns for fifty years. A dragon which has been guarding a treasure finds that it has been robbed, and devastates the country. Beowulf and eleven companions go out to meet it. The dragon issues from its mound breathing out fire. All the companions, save Wiglaf, fly to a wood. Beowulf's sword breaks, and the dragon sets its teeth in Beowulf's neck. Wiglaf wounds it, and its strength wanes. Beowulf kills it, but is mortally wounded. He bids Wiglaf bring the treasure out of the mound, that he may see it. He directs that a barrow be built for him on the Whale's Headland, and dies. Wiglaf rebukes his companions and sends word of Beowulf's death. The messenger warns the people of coming troubles. Beowulf's body is burnt on a pyre, with his armour and the treasure.

BEOWULF

Many of the persons referred to in Beowulf are known to us from other sources, and it is possible to fix the date of the historical events in the first part of the 6th cent. The date of the composition of the poem is more uncertain, for it includes religious elements both of a Christian and a heathen character.

There is a good edition of the poem by F. Klaeber (1922) and a number of translations, one of them by William Morris in collaboration with A. J. Wyatt (1892).

Beppo: A Venetian Story, a poem by Lord Byron (q.v.), published in 1818.

The poem tells, in the mock-heroic style, with much gaiety and gentle irony, the story of a Venetian carnival, at which a lady's husband, Beppo (short for Giuseppe), who has been absent for many years, returns in Turkish garb, and confronts her and the cavaliere servente whom she has taken to herself. No tragedy follows, but reconciliation over a cup of coffee.

BÉRANGER, PIERRE JEAN DE (1780–1857), French poet, the author of cheerful trivial songs of Parisian bourgeois life, whose natural and unconventional form, a reaction from the classical rigidity, gained them much popularity.

Berchtesgaden, on the Obersalzberg in Bavaria, where Hitler bought his famous house after his release from detention in 1924 (see Hitler).

Berenicē, the wife of Ptolemy III Euergetes. When her husband invaded Syria to avenge the death of his sister (also named Berenice) who had been murdered by her husband Antiochus, king of Syria, she dedicated a lock of her hair as a votive offering for his safe return. This lock mysteriously disappeared and was said to have become the constellation Coma Berenices (near the tail of Leo). Callimachus wrote a poem in celebration of it, which Catullus translated. Berenice was put to death by her son, Ptolemy IV Philopator, in 221 B.C.

Berenicē, daughter of Agrippa I (grandson of Herod the Great), and wife of her uncle Herod, king of Chalcis. After his death in A.D. 48, she lived with her brother Agrippa II. She is the Bernice of Acts xxv. Titus during his campaigns in Judaea fell in love with her and she accompanied him on his return to Rome. But the Romans disapproved of the connexion and he dismissed her. The rupture of their relations is the subject of Racine's 'Bérénice' and of Otway's 'Titus and Berenice'.

Bergamask or BERGOMASK, the name of a dance 'framed in imitation of the people of Bergamo (a province in the state of Venice), ridiculed as clownish in their manners and dialect' (Nares), referred to in Shakespeare's 'Midsummer Night's Dream', v. 360.

BERGERAC, CYRANO DE (1619–55), a French soldier and duellist, whom a wound in the Spanish War turned into a dramatist and novelist. He is the subject of a highly successful play by the French dramatist, Edmond Rostand (1898).

BERGSON, HENRI (1859–1941), French philosopher, the son of a Jewish father (a musician) and an English mother, taught philosophy at various schools and universities in France and was elected in 1900 to a professorship in the Collège de France. His principal works appeared as follows: 'Essai sur les données immédiates de la conscience' (Engl. transl. entitled 'Time and Free Will') in 1888; 'Matière et mémoire' in 1896; 'L'Évolution créatrice' in 1907; and 'Les Deux Sources de la morale et de la religion' in 1932. 'Le Rire, essai sur la signification du comique' appeared in 1900.

Bergson's importance lies in the fact that he stated the problem of philosophy afresh. Whereas Kant thought of science as mathematical physics, Bergson examined the non-mathematical sciences (biology, physiology, and psychology) and sought in them a fresh approach to metaphysical problems. He observed that philosophers in describing change have taken time into account only in the sense of a conventional measure, spatial in character, and have ignored real duration, what each of us is conscious of, the indivisible continuity of change, and that this must be recognized as a reality. He saw in psychical life, besides various causal elements, an element of spontaneity or freedom (a subject treated in his first work), which expresses itself in action, introducing something new and unpredictable amid the general laws of nature. Mind thus acts on matter, and does so in a mysterious way, which Bergson examined in 'Matière et mémoire'.

The body, he contends, and particularly the brain, is solely an instrument of action. The brain, in perception, receives certain impulses from without and places these in relation with motor mechanisms selected with more or less freedom. Above all, memories are not stored in the brain. Pure memory (as distinct from habit-memory) is a psychical, not a physiological, function. The past has not ceased to exist and past psychical states have the same sort of independent survival as the material world. In relation to pure memory the function of the brain is to shut out from consciousness the greater part of our past, only letting through that small segment of it which is relevant to the practical activity of the moment; and it is at this point of connexion between memory and perception that spirit influences matter.

Proceeding from this, by a survey of the field of biology, Bergson was led to consider various theories of evolution. This is the theme of 'L'Évolution créatrice'. Having shown reason for thinking that evolution cannot be wholly due to the preservation and accumulation of chance variations, he finds in an original impulse of life, l'élan vital, a common effort on the part of individual organisms, that psychological factor in evolution which is the profound cause of transmitted variations.

Bergson's conception of the world as a whole, set out in the same work, is of the existence of two opposing currents: on the one hand inert matter pursuing its downward course; on the other, organic life striving upwards, overcoming the obstacles that matter places in its way, displaying a single original impulse, but following divergent lines of development.

Bergson was interested in scientific psychical research. He was president of the London Society for Psychical Research in 1913, and his presidential address (published in the Society's proceedings for that year) is perhaps the most interesting of his shorter writings.

Berinthla, a character in Vanbrugh's 'The Relapse' and Sheridan's 'A Trip to Scarborough' (qq.v.).

Berkeley, The Old Woman of, a poem by Southey (q.v.).

BERKELEY, GEORGE (1685-1753), philosopher, was born at Dysert Castle, in Kilkenny county, and educated at Kilkenny and Trinity College, Dublin. He came to England in 1713, and became associated with Steele, Addison, Pope, Swift, and others. He travelled abroad and in 1728 went for three years to America in connexion with his abortive scheme for a missionary college in Bermuda. He was dean of Derry in 1724 and bishop of Cloyne in 1734, where he remained till 1752. He then retired to Oxford, where he died.

His chief works were the 'Essay towards a New Theory of Vision' (1709) on the independence of the ideas derived from sight and feeling and their 'arbitrary' though constant connexion; the 'Principles of Human Knowledge' (1710); and the 'Dialogues between Hylas and Philonous' (1713). These embody his earlier system of philosophy. He published his dialogues of 'Alciphron' (q.v.) in 1732, his 'Theory of Vision' in 1733, and 'Siris', a miscellany on the virtues of tar-water for the body and of a more mystical philosophy than that of his earlier years for the soul, in 1744. In 1713 he contributed to the 'Guardian' (q.v.) essays against the free-thinkers; in 1734 he published the 'Analyst', a criticism of the new mathematical positions; and in 1735-7 the 'Querist', dealing with questions of social reform. His 'Common-place Book' was discovered and published in 1871.

Berkeley takes up the evolution of English philosophy where Locke left it (see Essay concerning the Human Understanding), and his work is primarily a destructive criticism of Locke's external, material reality. Only particular things exist, and since these are only a complex of sensations, if we abstract from them that of which we have perception, nothing remains. The 'support' of ideas or sensations is percipient mind. The esse of material things is percipi. Locke's distinction between the primary and secondary qualities of objects has no validity. Both are exclusively mental. Locke's dualism of spirit and matter, like that of Descartes, leads, in Berkeley's view, to scepticism and atheism (of which Hobbes (q.v.) is the prominent example), and these Berkeley was specially concerned to combat. According to him, spirit is the only real cause or power. Of the existence of our own percipient mind we have knowledge from experience. The existence of other finite spirits is at least probable, principally because they speak to us. For the same reason we believe in the existence of God, who speaks to us in the whole system of nature, through the sense-experiences produced in our minds in a regular and uniform manner.

In his 'Alciphron' Berkeley, through the medium of pleasant Platonic dialogues, combats the views that he attributes to the deists, discusses the nature of virtue, finds proof of the existence of God in the theory of vision, &c. In his last work, 'Siris', his idealism takes a more transcendental form, and the intellectual processes are exalted at the expense of the senses. Berkeley was a master of English prose; he is remarkable for his lucidity, grace, and dignity of expression.

During his stay in America he wrote, besides 'Alciphron', a set of 'Verses on the prospect of planting arts and learning in America', in which occurs the often quoted line, 'Westward the course of empire takes its way'.

Berlin or BERLINE, an old-fashioned four-wheeled covered carriage, with a seat behind covered with a hood, introduced by an officer of the Elector of Brandenburg, c. 1670. Berlin Decree, see Orders in Council.

Bermoothes, THE, in Shakespeare's 'The Tempest', i. ii, are the Bermuda islands, discovered by Juan de Bermudez, a Spaniard, in 1515, and rediscovered by English explorers in 1609.

Bermudas, The, see Marvell.

'THE BERMUDAS', also called 'The Straights' (Straits), was a cant term for certain obscure courts and alleys near St. Martin's Lane, frequented by thieves, debtors, knights of the post, &c.

BERNARD, ST. (1091-1153), a great French ecclesiastic, founder of the abbey of Clairvaux, one of the four 'Latin Fathers', the glory of the Cistercian Order, and practically dictator of Christendom. In the schism of 1130 between Anacletus and Innocent II, Bernard vigorously supported Innocent. He preached the second Crusade. He was an adversary of Abelard (q.v.). He left some remarkable letters and theological treatises, and was one of the founders of Latin hymnody.

BERNARD OF MORLAIX, a Benedictine monk of the monastery of Cluny in Burgundy, lived in the 12th cent., and was author of the beautiful Latin poem, 'De Contemptu Mundi', of which Archbishop Trench (q.v.) published extracts in his 'Sacred Latin Poetry', and which inspired the hymn, 'Jerusalem the Golden', by Neale (q.v.).

Bernardine, see Cistercian.

Bernardo del Carpio, a semi-legendary hero of Spanish chivalry, the son of a secret marriage between the Count de Saldaña and the sister of Alfonso the Chaaste. His father was imprisoned by the king, and Spanish ballads deal with Bernardo's attempts to get his release, his rebellion after the Count's death in prison, and his other achievements. He lived in the 9th cent., but according to one legend he pressed Roland to death in his arms at Roncesvalles (see 'Don Quixote', I. xxvi). The legend of Bernardo del Carpio is a kind of rejoinder by the Spaniards to the chansons of French prowess associated with Charlemagne and Roland.

Berners, BELLE or ISOPEL, see Belle Berners.

BERNERS, JOHN BOURCHIER, second Baron (1467-1533), statesman and author. He was chancellor of the exchequer in 1516 and attended Henry VIII at the Field of the Cloth of Gold. He translated the 'Chronicles' of Froissart (q.v., 1523-5); 'Huon of Bordeaux' (q.v., probably printed in 1534); Guevara's 'El Relox de Principes' under the title of the 'Golden Boke of Marcus Aurelius' (1535); and another Spanish work, the 'Castell of Love' (printed 1540).

BERNERS, JULIANA, see Book of St. Albans.

Bernhardt, SARAH (ROSINE BERNARD) (1844-1923), a celebrated French actress, partly of Jewish descent. Her earliest successes, during the period 1867-77, were in Victor Hugo's 'Ruy Blas', as Zanetto in Coppée's 'Le Passant', as Doña Sol in Hugo's 'Hernani', and as Phèdre in Racine's tragedy. They were largely due to her beautiful voice and magnetic personality. She was frequently seen in London. The loss of a leg, late in her life, owing to an accident, did not diminish her activity, and she acted at the front during the war of 1914-18.

BERNI, FRANCESCO (1490-1536), an Italian poet of the mock-heroic school, which took from him the name of Bernesque. It is this school on which Byron modelled his 'Don Juan' and 'Beppo'. Berni wrote a rifacimento or recast of Boiardo's 'Orlando Innamorato', which ousted the original in the estimation of his countrymen.

Bernateln, BARONESS, see Virginians (The).

Berosus (BAR-OSBA), a priest at Babylon in the reign of Antiochus Soter (280-262 B.C.), author of chronicles of Chaldea, known to us only through 'quotations at second or third hand' (Sayce).

The 'Berosi Antiquitatum libri quinque', forged by Anniius, a monk of Viterbo (15th cent.), were long accepted as genuine.

Berowne or Blron, in Shakespeare's 'Love's Labour's Lost' (q.v.), one of the three lords attending on the king of Navarre.

Berserk, BERSERKER, from an Icelandic word of disputed etymology, a wild Norse warrior of great strength and ferocious courage, who fought in the battle-field with a frenzied fury known as the 'berserker rage'. It often means a lawless bravo or freebooter. [OED.] The word is sometimes explained as equivalent to 'baresark', one who fought without armour, in his bare shirt.

Bertha, BIG, the German gun that during the war of 1914-18 fired on Paris at a range of 70 (?) miles; the term was used generically for all big German guns.

Berthe au grand pled (d. 783), the wife of Pépin le Bref and mother of Charlemagne. She is the subject of an early French chanson de geste.

Bertram; or the Castle of St. Aldobrand, a play by Maturin (q.v.), produced in 1816, highly successful in its time, but rendered unreadable to-day by its overwrought sentiment and passion.

Bertram, COUNT OF ROUSILLON, a character in Shakespeare's 'All's Well that Ends Well' (q.v.).

BERTRAM, CHARLES (1723-65), sometimes self-styled CHARLES JULIUS, literary forger, English teacher in a school for naval cadets at Copenhagen. He produced between 1747 and 1757 an alleged transcript of a manuscript work on Roman antiquities by Richard of Cirencester (q.v.), together with a copy of an ancient itinerary of Britain, at many points supplementing and correcting the itinerary of Antoninus. He also published works of Gildas and Nennius, with the text of his forgery and a commentary on it, at Copenhagen, 1757, and several philological works. His imposture was finally exposed by B. B. Woodward in the 'Gentleman's Magazine', 1866-7.

Bertram, HARRY, a character in Scott's 'Guy Mannering' (q.v.).

Bertram, SIR THOMAS and LADY, and their sons and daughters, characters in Jane Austen's 'Mansfield Park' (q.v.).

Bertram Risingham, a character in Scott's 'Rokeby' (q.v.).

Besant, MRS. ANNIE (1847-1933), née Wood, an ardent supporter of Liberal causes, became a pupil of Mme Blavatsky and a member of the Theosophical Society (q.v.) in 1889. She was President of the Society in 1907. In 1917 she was President of the Indian National Congress and was active in the cause of Indian self-government.

BESANT

BESANT, SIR WALTER (1836-1901), was educated at King's College, London, and Christ's College, Cambridge. He published 'Early French Poetry' in 1868 and 'The French Humourists' in 1873, was secretary to the Palestine Exploration Fund, 1868-86, and with E. H. Palmer wrote 'Jerusalem' (1871). As a contributor to 'Once a Week', he became acquainted in 1869 with James Rice, with whom he collaborated in several novels, including 'Ready-Money Mortiboy' (1871), 'The Golden Butterfly' (1876), 'By Celia's Arbour' (1878), and 'The Chaplain of the Fleet' (1881). From 1882 he continued to write fiction without collaboration, chiefly based on historical incident, e.g., 'Dorothy Forster' (1884) and 'For Faith and Freedom' (1888). 'The Revolt of Man' (1882) is a satirical romance, in which Besant shows himself a critic of women's claims to political power. In 'All Sorts and Conditions of Men' (1882) and 'Children of Gibeon' (1886), he called attention to social evils in East London, and stimulated the foundation of 'The People's Palace', Mile End, for intellectual improvement and rational amusement (1887). He helped to found the Society of Authors (1884), and edited 'The Author' (1890). He defined the financial position of authors in 'The Pen and the Book' (1899). In 1894 Besant commenced the 'Survey of London', which he unfortunately left unfinished (the work appeared in 1902-12), but published 'London' in 1892, 'Westminster' in 1895, and 'South London' in 1899. His other works include 'The Eulogy of Richard Jefferies' (1888), 'Captain Cook' (1889), and (with W. J. Brodribb) 'Constantinople' (1879). His 'Autobiography' appeared in 1902.

Bess o' Bedlam, see Bedlam.

Bess of Hardwick, Elizabeth Talbot, countess of Shrewsbury (1518-1608), daughter and co-heir of John Hardwick of Hardwick, Derbyshire. She is described as 'a woman of masculine understanding and conduct, proud, furious, selfish, and unfeeling' (Lodge). To her care and to that of her husband, the sixth earl of Shrewsbury, Mary Queen of Scots was entrusted in 1569 at Tutbury. She married her daughter to Charles Stuart, younger brother of Darnley (Arabella Stuart was the issue of the marriage), and was imprisoned in the Tower in consequence. She was herself four times married and inherited the fortunes of her four husbands, her income being estimated at £60,000. She built Chatsworth (not the present building) and Hardwick Hall.

Bessus, in Beaumont and Fletcher's 'A King and no King' (q.v.), a cowardly braggart.

The historical Bessus was Satrap of Bactria under Darius III. After the defeat of the latter by Alexander the Great at Arbela, Bessus murdered Darius, assumed the title of king, was betrayed to Alexander, and put to death.

Bessy, the name given to one of the stock characters, a man dressed as a woman, in the medieval sword-dance (q.v.) and in the Mummer's Play (q.v.).

Bestiaries, allegorical poems, popular from the 5th cent. to the Middle Ages, in which human beings are satirized under the form of beasts, birds, and fishes, and often in the later periods, 12th-14th cents., richly illustrated with miniatures. The chief example is the romance of Reynard (q.v.) the fox. They have their origin in ancient times, notably in the fables of Aesop in Greece, and in those of Phaedrus and Babrius in Rome. Later came the Physiologi, in which natural history was combined with Christian religious instruction. There is an Old English 'Physiologus', which has been attributed to Cynewulf, the animals presented being the panther, the whale, and the partridge; and a 'Bestiary' of the period 1150-1250, based on the Latin 'Physiologus' of Thetbaldus. 'The Owl and the Nightingale' (q.v.) contains kindred elements. The name Bestiaries is also applied to early popular treatises on natural history.

Bethgeleert, meaning 'grave of Geleert'. According to a story traditional in the village at the foot of Snowdon, where Llewelyn the Great had his abode, Geleert was a hound given by King John to Llewelyn. On one occasion this favourite hound was missing when Llewelyn went to the chase. On his return he found the hound smeared with blood, his child's bed in disorder, while the child was not to be seen. Thinking that the hound had devoured the child, the father killed Geleert with his sword. The child, awakened by the hound's dying yell, cried out from under a heap of coverings, and under the bed was found a great wolf which the hound had slain.

The story is the subject of a ballad by W. R. Spencer (1811). Similar stories are found in other places and in the 'Gesta Romanorum', and Baring-Gould ('Curious Myths') traces their origin to Indian sources.

Bethnal Green, see Beggar's Daughter of Bednal Green. Bethnal Green was a hamlet separated from London by fields when Pepys drove there by coach to dine at Sir W. Rider's (16 June 1663), at the house said to have been built by the 'Blind Beggar'.

Betrothed, The, a novel by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1825.

Though styled one of the 'Tales of the Crusaders', it has in fact little to do with these. The scene is laid in the Welsh Marches, in the reign of Henry II. Eveline Berenger, the sole child of a Norman baron, finds herself in grave peril when the fierce Welsh prince, Gwenwyn, besieges her father's castle of Garde Douleureuse, and the old warrior himself is killed in an imprudent sally. She is rescued by Hugo de Lacy, Constable of Chester, and under the influence of gratitude and of a vow made in the moment of danger, consents to be affianced to him, though his age commands her respect rather than her love, and he is under pledge moreover to set off immediately to the Crusade. Left to the care of his nephew, the gallant Damian, whom she secretly loves, and exposed not only to malicious tongues but to the machinations of Randel, another de Lacy kinsman, Eveline spends the years of his absence in a position of much difficulty and danger. Hugo's return is only just in time to extricate Eveline and Damian from a position of the utmost peril; for they are charged with high treason, and accused moreover of taking a disloyal advantage of his absence to indulge their mutual love. The old Constable clears up the situation, releases Eveline from her pledge to him, and places her hand in that of Damian.

Betteredge, GABRIEL, in Wilkie Collins's 'The Moonstone' (q.v.), steward in Lady Verinder's house and narrator of parts of the story.

BETTERTON, THOMAS (1635?-1710), actor and dramatist, joined Sir John D'Avenant's company at Lincoln's Inn Fields in 1661, and was associated in the management of the Dorset Garden Theatre from 1671. He opened a 'theatre in Little Lincoln's Inn Fields' in 1695, producing Congreve's 'Love for Love', and in 1705 the theatre erected by Sir John Vanbrugh in the Haymarket. His impersonations included Hamlet, Mercutio, Sir Toby Belch, Macbeth, Bosola (in the 'Duchess of Malfi'), and Heartwell (in Congreve's 'The Old Bachelor'). His dramas include the 'Roman Virgin', acted 1670, adapted from Webster's 'Appius and Virginia'; the 'Prophetess', 1690, an opera from the 'Prophetess' of Beaumont and Fletcher; 'King Henry IV', 1700 (in which he played Falstaff), from Shakespeare; the 'Amorous Widow', c. 1670, from Molière's 'George Dandin'; and the 'Bondman', printed in 1719, from Massinger. He was a man of high character, and was much esteemed as an actor by his contemporaries.

Betterton, MRS. (d. 1711), the wife of Thomas Betterton (q.v.), at first known on the stage as Mrs. Saunderson, the first notable actress on the English stage (until 1660 female parts were taken by men or boys). Mrs. Betterton was the first woman to act a series of Shakespeare's great female characters, such as Lady Macbeth, Ophelia, and Juliet.

Betty, Miss, in Fielding's 'Amelia' (q.v.), the spiteful and rapacious sister of the heroine.

Betty, WILLIAM HENRY WEST (1791-1874), actor, called the 'Young Roscius'. He played Romeo at Belfast, and Hamlet and Prince Arthur at Dublin in 1803, when only twelve. He appeared in London in 1804-5. He subsequently went to Christ's College, Cambridge, returned to the stage in 1812, and finally retired in 1824.

Betty Martin, ALL MY EYE AND, a colloquial expression meaning 'all humbug', occurs in Grose's 'Classical Dictionary of the Vulgar Tongue' (1785). The shorter form, 'all my eye', occurs in Goldsmith, 'The Good-natured Man' (1768). The fanciful derivation, from an imaginary Latin prayer, 'Ah, mihi, beate Martine', has no authority.

Beulah, LAND OF, see Isaiah lxii. 4. In Bunyan's 'Pilgrim's Progress', it lies 'beyond the valley of the Shadow of Death and also out of the reach of Giant Despair'. Here the pilgrims were in sight of the Heavenly City, 'they heard continually the singing of birds and saw every day the flowers appear in the earth'.

Beuves de Hanstone, a 12th-cent. French chanson de geste, of which Bevis of Hampton (q.v.) is the subject.

Beverly of Graustark, see under Graustark.

Bevis of Hampton, a popular verse romance of 4,000 lines, of the early 14th cent. The mother of Bevis, wife of Guy, earl of Southampton, having procured the murder of her husband by Mordure, son of the emperor of Germany, marries the murderer. Bevis is sold as a slave and given to the king of Armenia, who offers him his daughter Josian as wife. Bevis, as a Christian, at first refuses the union, but saves Josian from an unwelcome suitor, Brademond; and finally accepts Josian on her promise to become a Christian. The king, misled as to the lovers' relations, sends Bevis with a sealed letter to Brademond, who imprisons him for seven years. Josian is married first to Yvor, king of Mombrant, then to Earl Miles, whom she hangs on the wedding night. Bevis rescues her from the stake, and takes her to England. He defeats and slays the emperor and Yvor. After various adventures, in the course of which he converts the giant Ascapart or Asclopard, he and Josian return to the East.

The story is told in Drayton's 'Polyolbion' (ii. 259). The sword of Bevis was called 'Morglay'.

Bewick, THOMAS (1753-1828), wood-engraver, apprenticed to, and subsequently partner of, Ralph Beilby. He engraved blocks for Gay's 'Fables' (1779), 'Select Fables' (1784), 'General History of Quadrupeds' (1790), 'History of British Birds' (1797 and 1804) and 'Fables of Aesop' (1818). The text of the 'British Birds' was by the Rev. Mr. Cotes, of the 'Quadrupeds' by R. Beilby.

BEYLE, HENRI, see Stendhal.

Bezae, CODEX, see Bible (The).

Bezonian, from Italian bisogno, Spanish bisño, a raw recruit, a needy beggar, base fellow, knave, rascal. 'Under which king, Bezonian? speak or die' (Shakespeare, 'a Henry IV', v. iii. 116).

BIANCA

Blanca, (1) a character in Shakespeare's 'The Taming of the Shrew' (q.v.); (2) in his 'Othello' (q.v.), the mistress of Cassio.

Bianchi and Neri, 'White' and 'Black', the name of two factions formed by the citizens of Florence after the expulsion of the Ghibellines in the 13th cent. The Bianchi, refusing to submit to the directions of Pope Boniface, and threatened by the approach of Charles of Valois, fled from the city (among them Dante and the father of Petrarch) in 1301, and ultimately joined the Ghibellines.

BIATHANATOS [Biathanatos], A Declaration of that Paradoxe or Thesis that Self-Homicide is not so Naturally Sinne that it may never be otherwise, by John Donne (q.v.), published in 1624.

Bible, THE. (1) THE OLD TESTAMENT. The oldest Hebrew text that we possess of this (Codex Babylonicus Petropolitanus) is comparatively recent, dating only from 916 A.D. It is a Masoretic text, i.e. one prepared by the guild of scholars called Masoretes (see Masora). Of much earlier date (5th cent. B.C.) is the Samaritan text of the Pentateuch. We have also the Targums or Aramaic paraphrases, written at various times subsequent to the date when Aramaic superseded Hebrew as the language spoken by the Jews (shortly before the Christian era). The Greek version, known as the Septuagint (q.v.), of the 3rd cent. B.C. is of far greater importance. Other translations into Greek were made in the 2nd cent. A.D. and were collected in parallel columns, together with the current Hebrew text and a revised text of the Septuagint, by Origen in his Hexapla. This has perished with the exception of the revised Septuagint, of most of which we possess an 8th-cent. copy. In addition to the above, there was an old Latin version (known as Vetus Italica) of an early Greek translation, of which fragments alone remain, and which was superseded by Jerome's Latin text, known as the Vulgate (q.v.).

(2) THE NEW TESTAMENT. Of this we possess manuscripts in Greek, and manuscripts of translations from the Greek into Latin, Syriac, and Coptic. The most important of these are the Greek, of which the chief are the Codex Vaticanus and the Codex Sinaiticus, uncial manuscripts of the 4th cent.; the Codex Bezae, containing the Greek text on the left-hand page and the Latin on the right, probably earlier than the 6th cent.; and the Codex Alexandrinus, an uncial of the 5th cent. Of the Latin versions there were, before Jerome undertook their revision in the Vulgate, two main types current respectively in Africa and Europe. Several manuscripts of these survive. Of the Vulgate text there are a large number of manuscripts, of which the best are Northumbrian (based on Italian originals), Irish, and Spanish. (See in this connexion Amiatinus Codex and Lindisfarne Gospels.)

Bible, THE ENGLISH. Apart from paraphrases attributed to Cædmon (q.v.) and the translation by Bede (q.v.) of part of the Gospel of St. John, the earliest attempts at translation into English of the Holy Scriptures are the 9th- and 10th-cent. glosses and versions of the Psalms, followed by the 10th-cent. glosses and versions of the Gospels (the 'Durham Book' or 'Lindisfarne Gospels', q.v., and the 'West-Saxon Gospels'), and Ælfric's translation of the O.T. at the close of the same century. After this little was done until the time of Wycliffe (q.v.), to whom and his followers we owe the two 14th-cent. versions associated with his name, the first complete renderings into English of the Scriptures. Of these two versions, taken from the Latin text, which appeared about 1382 and 1388, it is doubtful how much was Wycliffe's own work. The second, or revised version, was a great improvement on the first, and is a readable and correct translation.

William Tyndale (q.v.) was the first to translate the N.T. into English from the Greek text; this he probably did in Wittenberg, the translation being printed first at Cologne, and when this was interrupted, at Worms (1525-6). In 1530 his translation of the Pentateuch was printed at Marburg, followed by a translation of the Book of Jonah. These translations were made from the Hebrew, with reference also to the Vulgate, Erasmus's Latin version, and Luther's Bible. Our Authorized Version (see below) is essentially the text of Tyndale. The complete English Bible that bears the name of Miles Coverdale (q.v.) was printed in 1535. It is not a translation from the original texts, but probably from Luther's version, the Zurich Bible, and the Vulgate, with assistance from Tyndale's version. A second edition was issued in 1537. The Prayer Book text of the Psalms is largely Coverdale's version.

'Matthew's Bible' was issued in 1537, under the pseudonym of John Matthew, by John Rogers (1500?-55). He was a friend of Tyndale, was converted to Protestantism, and prepared and annotated his version for publication. Rogers was burnt at Smithfield in Mary's reign.

'Taverner's Bible', prepared by Richard Taverner (1505?-75), was a revision of Matthew's. It appeared in 1539. Richard Taverner was a religious author who was patronized by Wolsey and Cromwell, was sent to the Tower on the latter's fall, but subsequently obtained the favour of Henry VIII.

The 'Great Bible', also called 'Cranmer's Bible', was brought out in 1539 under the auspices of Henry VIII; Coverdale was placed by Cromwell in charge of its preparation. The printing of it was begun in Paris and finished in London.

Towards the end of Henry VIII's reign, there were interdictions on the use of the Bible. During Mary's reign, the reformers took refuge, some in Frankfort-on-the-Main, some in Geneva, where in 1560 appeared the Genevan or 'Breeches' (q.v.) Bible. It had a marginal commentary which proved agreeable to the Puritans.

BIBLE

In 1568 was published the 'Bishops' Bible', an edition promoted by Archbishop Parker to counteract the popularity of the Calvinistic Genevan Bible; while Romanists made a translation, known as the Rheims and Douai version, which appeared, the New Testament in 1582, the Old Testament in 1609-10. It is characterized by the frequent use of Latinisms.

The 'Authorized Version' arose out of a conference at Hampton Court, convened by James I in 1604, between the High Church and Low Church parties. The undertaking was proposed by Dr. Reynolds, president of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and was supported by the king. The revisers were forty-seven in number, divided into companies dealing with various sections of the Bible, and were drawn from the most eminent scholars and divines of the day. They were instructed to follow the text of the 'Bishops' Bible' wherever they could. The work of revision and retranslation occupied three years and a half, and the so-called 'Authorized Version' (it was not authorized by any official pronouncement) appeared in 1611. It is practically the version of Tyndale with some admixture from Wycliffe. Two issues of it were made in 1611, known respectively as the 'He Bible' and the 'She Bible', because in the first the words in Ruth iii. 15 read 'and he went into the cite', and in the second 'and she went into the cite'. Modern bibles are based with slight variations on the 'She Bible'. Various editions of the Bible are named after eccentricities of wording or mistakes in the printed text; a few of the more important of these, such as 'Breeches Bible' and 'Vinegar Bible', are dealt with under their respective names.

In 1870 the Convocation of Canterbury appointed a committee to consider the question of revision, and as a consequence of their report two companies were constituted to revise the authorized versions of the O.T. and N.T. respectively. The Revised Text was published, of the N.T. in 1881, of the O.T. in 1885. That of the N.T. was unfavourably received, owing to many irritating and apparently unnecessary alterations of familiar passages. The Revised Version of the O.T., though not altogether free from these, was in many respects an improvement on the Authorized text. In 1922 the Rev. James Moffatt, Washburn Professor of Church History in the Union Theological Seminary, produced a 'New Translation of the New Testament', and in 1924 'The Old Testament, a new Translation', both of which caused some controversy.

Bible in Spain, The, a narrative of travel, by Borrow (q.v.), published in 1843.

BIEDERMEIER

Borrow travelled in Spain as colporteur of bibles for the British and Foreign Bible Society from 1835 to 1840, and this book purports to be an account of the adventures that he met with in that country, at a time of great disturbance owing to the Carlist troubles. It is impossible to say how far the various incidents recounted actually occurred; but the vivid picture that the author gives of Spain is unquestionably true, and the work is one of the best of English books of travel.

Bibliographical Society, THE, founded in 1892. Its 'Transactions' were first published in 1893 (merged with 'The Library' (q.v.) in 1920). The Society publishes also separate monographs, and in 1926 issued the invaluable 'Short-Title Catalogue of English Books, 1475-1640.'

Bibliography, WORKS OF, see under Bohn, Brydges, Dewey, Dibdin (T. F.), Hazlitt (W. C.), Lang, Lowndes, McKerrow, Quaritch, Watt (R.), and previous entry.

Bicester, THE, a famous pack of fox-hounds, whose country lies round the town of Bicester in Oxfordshire.

Bickerstaff, ISAAC, a fictitious person invented by Swift (q.v.). A cobbler, John Partridge, claiming to be an astrologer, had published predictions in the form of an almanac. Swift in the beginning of 1708 produced a parody entitled 'Predictions for the ensuing year, by Isaac Bickerstaff', in which he foretold the death of Partridge on 29 March. On 30 March he published a letter giving an account of Partridge's end. Partridge indignantly protested that he was still alive, but Swift retorted in a 'Vindication' proving that he was really dead. Other writers took up the joke, and Steele, when he launched 'The Tatler' in 1709, adopted the name of Bickerstaff for the supposed author.

BICKERSTAFFE, ISAAC (d. 1812?), an Irish playwright, who produced many successful comedies and opera libretti, including the popular comic opera 'Love in a Village' (1762), 'The Maid of the Mill' (1765), 'The Padlock' (q.v., 1768). 'The Hypocrite' (1769, adapted from Molière's 'Tartuffe' and Cibber's 'The Non-Juror') contains the well-known character of a hypocrite, 'Mawworm'. His 'Lionel and Clarissa', successfully produced in 1768, later appeared as 'The School for Fathers'. Bickerstaffe fled the country in 1772 suspected of a capital crime.

Bidpai or Pilpay, The Fables of, or Kalilah and Dimnah, is the title of the Arabic version of a lost original of the 'Panchatantra', a celebrated Sanskrit collection of fables, the source of much European folk-lore. 'Bidpai' is a corruption of 'bidbah', the appellation of the chief scholar at the court of an Indian prince.

Biedermeier, a German style of furniture, showing the pseudo-classical taste of the late French 'Empire'. It takes its name from a political caricature in 'Fliegende Blätter', and was in vogue from about 1815 to 1848.

Biederman, ARNOLD, a character in Scott's 'Anne of Geierstein' (q.v.).

BIERCE, AMBROSE (1842-1914?), American short-story writer, born in Ohio. He served throughout the Civil War. In 1913 he went to Mexico to join the staff of the rebel general, Villa, and disappeared mysteriously.

His best stories are in 'Tales of Soldiers and Civilians' (1891)—the title of which was later changed to 'In the Midst of Life'. His greatest single tale is 'An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge'.

Bifröst, in Scandinavian mythology, the bridge by which the gods cross from heaven to earth, the rainbow. It is guarded by Heimdal, and at its summit sit the Norns (qq.v.).

Big-endians and Little-endians, see Gulliver's Travels.

Biglow Papers, see Lowell (J. R.).

Bilbo, apparently from Bilbao in Spain (long called in English Bilboa), a sword noted for its elasticity and temper. 'Bilbow blades' could be bent till point met hilt.

Bilboes, of uncertain derivation, but, like the preceding, usually referred to Bilbao on the alleged ground that many of these instruments were manufactured there, were a long iron bar with sliding shackles to confine the ankles of a prisoner, and a lock by which to fix one end of the bar to the floor. [OED.]

Bildad, one of the three friends of Job (q.v.).

Bill of Rights, see Rights, Bill of.

Billickin, MRS., in Dickens's 'Edwin Drood' (q.v.), a cousin of Mr. Bazzard, who lets lodgings in Bloomsbury.

BILLINGS, JOSH, see Shaw (H. W.).

Billingsgate, the name of one of the gates of London on the river side, and hence of the fish market there established. It is perhaps derived from a personal name, Billing (cf. Billingshurst), and according to fable from Belinus (q.v.), a legendary British king. There are frequent references in 17th-cent. literature to the abusive language of the Billingsgate market; hence foul language is itself called 'billingsgate'.

Bills of Mortality, official returns of the deaths in a certain district, which began to be published weekly by the London Company of Parish Clerks in 1592 for 109 parishes in and around London. Hence this district (the precise limits of which were often modified) became known as 'within the bills of mortality' [OED.].

Billy Taylor, the subject of an old song. He is pressed and sent to sea and followed by his true love, disguised as a sailor, who shoots him when she finds him unfaithful to her, and is made first lieutenant of the 'Gallant Thunderbomb'. The text is in Oliver's 'Comic Songs' (and ed. 1825?), according to B.M. Cat.).

BIRRELL

Bingen, BISHOP OF, otherwise known as Bishop Hatto (q.v.).

BINGHAM, JOSEPH (1668-1723), fellow of University College, Oxford. He withdrew from the university, being unjustly charged with preaching heretical doctrine. He was author of 'Origines Ecclesiasticae, or the Antiquities of the Christian Church' (1708-22), a very learned work, which long retained its authoritative character.

Bingley, CHARLES, a character in Jane Austen's 'Pride and Prejudice' (q.v.).

Binks, SIR BINGO AND LADY, characters in Scott's 'St. Ronan's Well' (q.v.).

BINYON, LAURENCE (1869-1943), poet, for forty years (until 1933) an official in the British Museum, where he became Keeper of prints and drawings, noted as an authority in many branches of art, especially Oriental painting. He was the author of many volumes of poems, of which the first was 'Lyric Poems' (1894), and of some plays. Among his publications may be mentioned 'Auguries' (1913), 'The Anvil and other Poems' (1916), the drama 'Arthur' (1923), and the poem 'For the Fallen' (1914).

Biographia Literaria, a literary autobiography by S. T. Coleridge (q.v.), published in 1817.

The autobiographical thread is slender. The work consists in the main of a discussion of the philosophy of Kant, Fichte, and Schelling, and a criticism of Wordsworth's poetry. (For Coleridge's philosophical doctrines see under Aids to Reflection.)

BION (c. 100 B.C.?), a pastoral poet of Smyrna, who ended his life in Sicily, where he was poisoned. He is best known for his lament for Adonis, on which Shelley partly modelled his 'Adonais'. Moschus (q.v.) called himself the pupil of Bion.

Birch, HARVEY, the mysterious pedlar and spy in J. Fenimore Cooper's novel of the American Revolution, 'The Spy'.

Birdcage Walk, in St. James's Park, London, so called from the cages for birds and beasts kept there for the amusement of Charles II.

Birds of America, see Audubon, John James.

Birnam Wood, see Macbeth.

Biron or BEROWNE, in Shakespeare's 'Love's Labour's Lost' (q.v.), one of the three lords attending on the king of Navarre.

Biron, a character in Southerne's 'The Fatal Marriage' (q.v.).

BIRRELL, AUGUSTINE (1850-1933), President of the Board of Education, 1905-7; chief secretary for Ireland, 1907-16; author of 'Obiter Dicta' (1884, 1887, 1924), 'William Hazlitt' (1902), 'Andrew Marvell' (1903).

BISHOP BLOUGRAM'S APOLOGY

Bishop Blougram's Apology, a poem by R. Browning (q.v.), included in 'Men and Women', published in 1855.

The poem is a casuistical apology for the position of a beneficed priest whose belief does not extend to all the doctrines of the Roman Catholic religion. Though a monologue in form, it is in fact an argument between the bishop and Mr. Gigadibs, his critic, in which the bishop succeeds, at least, in silencing the critic. But Browning has the last (crushing) word. Cardinal Wiseman was the model from whom Bishop Blougram was drawn.

Bishop Hatto: a legend of the 10th cent. relates that Hatto, archbishop of Mainz, at a time of famine (970) assembled a company of poor people in a barn and burnt them to death, that there might be more food for the rich. He was pursued by an army of mice, took refuge in a tower on the Rhine still known as the Mäuseturm, and was there devoured by them. The legend is told in 'Coryat's Crudities', and in a poem by Southey (q.v.).

The historical Bishop Hatto was not guilty of this atrocity, and the Mäuseturm was in fact erected for the collection of tolls on river traffic. The legend is said to arise from an erroneous derivation of Mäuseturm from Mäuse (mice). Similar legends of men devoured by mice or rats are widely prevalent among northern nations; Baring-Gould ('Curious Myths') attributes their origin to the heathen practice of human sacrifice in times of famine.

Bishopsgate, the principal north gate of the ancient city of London. It is mentioned as porta episcopi in Domesday, but the particular bishop with whom it was connected is unknown. Loftie thinks it may have been Erkenwald or St. Botolph. Burbage's first theatre was just outside Bishopsgate.

Bismarck, OTTO EDUARD LEOPOLD, PRINCE VON (1815-98), afterwards duke of Lauenburg, known as 'The Iron Chancellor', born at Friedrichsruh in Prussia, became Prussian prime minister in 1862, and under his administration were fought the war against Denmark of 1864 and the war against Austria of 1866. Bismarck became chancellor of the North German Federation in 1867, and in 1870-1 ensued the war with France, in which the southern states co-operated with Northern Germany. The German Empire was constituted in 1871 and Bismarck was its first chancellor. He presided at the Congress of Berlin in 1878 and concluded the Triple Alliance in 1883. Having incurred the displeasure of the Emperor William II, he resigned in 1890.

BLACK, WILLIAM (1841-98), a native of Scotland, war correspondent of the 'Morning Star' during the Franco-Prussian War, and subsequently sub-editor of the 'Daily News', is remembered for some of his novels: 'A Daughter of Heth' (1871), 'A Princess of

BLACK DWARF

'Thule' (1873), 'Macleod of Dare' (1879), stories of his native country; and 'The Strange Adventures of a Phaeton' (1872), which combines romance with descriptions of English localities.

Black Agnes, Agnes, countess of Dunbar (1312?-69), daughter of the first earl of Moray and wife of the tenth earl of Dunbar, remembered for her spirited defence of Dunbar Castle against the English (1339).

Black Beauty, see Sewell.

Black Bess, the celebrated mare of Dick Turpin (q.v.).

Black Book of Carmarthen, THE, a Welsh manuscript of the 12th cent., containing a collection of ancient Welsh poetry, interesting among other things for references to King Arthur.

Black Book of the Admiralty, an ancient code of rules for the government of the navy, said to have been compiled in the reign of Edward III.

Black Brunswickers, a military mounted force raised by Frederick William, duke of Brunswick (1771-1815, killed at Quatre Bras), for service against the French in the Napoleonic wars. There is a famous picture by Millais representing 'The Black Brunswicker'. See also Hussars.

Black Death, THE, the name now commonly given to the Great Pestilence or visitation of the Oriental Plague, which devastated most countries of Europe near the middle of the 14th cent., and caused great mortality in England in 1348-9; sometimes also including the recurrences of the epidemic in 1360 and 1379. The epithet 'black' is of uncertain origin and not known to be contemporary. It is first found in Swedish and Danish 16th-cent. chroniclers. [OED.]

Black Douglas, see Douglas (The Black).

Black Dwarf, THE, a novel by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), the first of the 'Tales of My Landlord', published in 1816.

The principal character in the story, who gives it its title, is a dwarf of extraordinary ugliness and strength who takes up his abode in a lonely spot in southern Scotland at the beginning of the 18th cent., builds himself a hovel of mighty stones, and acquires a reputation for supernatural powers. He is called Elshender the Recluse, or Elshie of the Mucklestones, and his acrimonious speech suggests an excessively misanthropical disposition. Yet the story, of which the plot is slender, tells of his beneficent influence on events in his neighbourhood. A robber carries off Grace Armstrong, to the distress of her lover, the young farmer Hobbie Elliot, but she is immediately restored on the dwarf's intervention. His intervention prevents the marriage of Isabella Vere with Sir Frederick Langley, to which her unwilling consent has been wrung by her father, the laird of Ellieslaw, for his own ends. It turns out that the

BLACK DWARF

Dwarf is the rich Sir Edward Manley, the near kinsman of Isabella, a man embittered by his deformity and by his unhappy love for Isabella's mother; he has long been supposed dead, and Elleslaw is deeply indebted to him.

Black Friars, members of the order of the Dominicans, founded at the beginning of the 13th cent. by St. Dominic, so called from the colour of their dress. They had a convent in the part of the City of London that still bears their name. The buildings were surrendered to the Crown in Henry VIII's reign, and the case for his divorce from Queen Catherine was heard there by the papal legate. For Burbage's theatre in the precincts of the old monastery, see Blackfriars Theatre.

Black Hole of Calcutta, the punishment cell of the barracks in Fort William, Calcutta, into which, by order of Suraja Dowlah, 146 Europeans were thrust for a whole night in 1756, of whom only twenty-three survived till the morning.

Black Hussars, see Hussars.

Black Letter, a name (which came into use about 1600) for the form of gothic type used by the early printers, as distinguished from the 'Roman' type which subsequently prevailed. A form of it is still in use in Germany.

Black Maria, popular name for a prison van.

Black Michael, nickname of Sir Michael Hicks Beach (1837-1916, chancellor of the exchequer, 1885 and 1895-1902), from Black Michael, the king's wicked brother in 'The Prisoner of Zenda' (q.v.).

Black Monks, the Benedictines (q.v.), so called from the colour of their dress.

Black Prince, THE, a name given (apparently by 16th-cent. chroniclers) to Edward, the eldest son of Edward III (1330-76). The origin of the appellation is a matter of conjecture, and published sources, says the OED., afford no evidence. It was perhaps due to 'his dreaded acts in battle', or to his wearing black armour.

Black Rod, short for 'Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod', so called from his black wand of office, is the Chief Gentleman Usher of the Lord Chamberlain's department of the royal household, who is also usher to the House of Lords and to the Chapter of the Garter.

Black Watch, THE, the 42nd (Highland) Regiment of the British Army, so called from the colour of their uniform, a dark tartan.

Blackacre, THE WIDOW, a character in Wycherley's 'The Plain Dealer' (q.v.).

Blackfriars Theatre, THE, an apartment in the dissolved monastery of the Black Friars (q.v.) purchased by James Burbage (q.v.) in 1596 and adapted for a play-house. Owing to local opposition, it was handed over to the Children of the Chapel (q.v.) but reverted to Richard Burbage (q.v.) in 1608. Shakespeare had a share in the theatre and his company acted there. Its site is marked by Playhouse Yard near 'The Times' office (Loftie).

BLACKMAN, BLAKMAN, or BLAKE-MAN, JOHN (fl. 1436-48), fellow of Merton College, Oxford, chaplain and contemporary biographer of Henry VI, our main authority for his piety, &c.

Blackmoor Vale, THE, a celebrated pack of hounds in the west country (Dorset). Its praises were sung by Whyte-Melville (q.v.).

BLACKMORE, SIR RICHARD (d. 1729), physician to Queen Anne, produced some indifferent poems of great length, heroic and epic, and 'The Creation, a philosophical poem demonstrating the existence and providence of God' (1712), which was warmly praised by Dr. Johnson.

BLACKMORE, RICHARD DODDRIDGE (1825-1900), educated at Blundell's School, Tiverton, and Exeter College, Oxford, published some volumes of verse and a number of novels, of which the most famous was 'Lorna Doone' (q.v., 1869). Among the others were 'Clara Vaughan' (1864), 'Cradock Nowell' (1866), 'The Maid of Sker' (1872), 'Alice Lorraine' (1875), 'Cripps the Carrier' (1877), 'Christowell' (1881), and 'Springhaven' (1887). The last is a pleasant tale of adventure and romance centring in a small southern port in the days of the Napoleonic wars, and presenting Wellington, Napoleon, and George III.

Blackstick, FAIRY, see Rose and the Ring.

BLACKSTONE, SIR WILLIAM (1723-80), educated at Charterhouse School and Pembroke College, Oxford, was a fellow of All Souls and the first Vinerian professor of English law at Oxford. His fame rests on his 'Commentaries on the Laws of England' (1765-9), a comprehensive picture of the English law and constitution as a single organic structure. The work was criticized by Bentham ('Fragment on Government') and others, but exercised a powerful influence. It was translated into French, German, Italian, and Russian. Blackstone published a collection of 'Law Tracts' in 1762. He was made a judge in 1770.

Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine, a monthly periodical started in 1817 by William Blackwood (1776-1834) the publisher, as a rival to the 'Edinburgh Review' (q.v.), of a less ponderous kind than the 'Quarterly' (q.v.). It had John Wilson, J. G. Lockhart, and James Hogg (qq.v.) on its staff. The number for October 1817 contained the famous satire on Edinburgh notabilities which took the form of a pretended 'Chaldee MS.' 'Blackwood's' was then Tory in politics, and the avowed enemy of the 'Cockney School' in literary matters, i.e. Lamb, Hazlitt, and in particular Leigh Hunt. In 1819 William Maginn

(q.v.) was added to the staff. He was perhaps the originator of the 'Noctes Ambrosianae' (q.v.), which shortly began to appear in 'Maga', as 'Blackwood's' was familiarly called. De Quincey was also among the early contributors.

Mrs. Oliphant's interesting 'Annals of a Publishing House: William Blackwood and his Sons' appeared in 1897.

Bladud, a legendary king of Britain, father of Lear, and founder of the city of Bath.

Blair, HUGH (1718-1800), Scottish divine and professor of rhetoric, is remembered for his famous sermons (5 vols., 1777-1801) and 'Lectures on Rhetoric'. He belonged to a distinguished literary circle which included Hume, A. Carlyle, Adam Smith, and Robertson.

BLAIR, ROBERT (1699-1746), educated at Edinburgh and in Holland, was ordained minister of Athelstaneford in East Lothian in 1731. He published in 1743 'The Grave', a didactic poem of some 800 lines of blank verse, in which he celebrates death, the solitude of the tomb, and the anguish of bereavement. The poem compares favourably with the somewhat similar 'Night Thoughts' (q.v.) of Edward Young, with which it was almost exactly contemporary. It was illustrated by William Blake (q.v.).

Blatze, Elegy on Mrs. Mary, a burlesque elegy by Goldsmith (q.v.), published in 'The Bee'.

Blatze, FARMER, in Meredith's 'The Ordeal of Richard Feverel', Lucy Feverel's uncle.

BLAKE, WILLIAM (1757-1827), the son of a London hosier, did not go to school, but was apprenticed to James Basire, engraver to the Society of Antiquaries. His earliest poems are contained in 'Poetical Sketches', published in 1783 at the expense of his friends, Flaxman and Mrs. Mathew. In 1789 he engraved and published his 'Songs of Innocence', in which he first showed the mystical cast of his mind. Their underlying theme is the all-pervading presence of divine love and sympathy, even in trouble and sorrow. 'The Book of Thel' appeared in the same year, and its theme is similar: the maiden Thel laments the vanity and transience of life, and is answered by the lily, the cloud, the worm, and the clod; they explain the principle of mutual self-sacrifice and that death means a new birth. 'Tiriel' belongs to the years 1788-9. It is the story of a tyrant and his rebellious children, the symbolic meaning of which is obscure. In 1790 Blake engraved his principal prose work, the 'Marriage of Heaven and Hell', in which, with vigorous satire and telling apologue, he takes up his revolutionary position, of which the main features are the denial of the reality of matter, the denial of eternal punishment, and the denial of authority. In 'The French Revolution' (1791), 'America' (1793), and the 'Visions of the Daughters of Albion' (1793), his attitude of revolt against authority is further developed. He creates a mythology of his own, with Urizen, the deviser of moral codes, and Orc, the arch-rebel, for central figures. The 'Songs of Experience' (1794) are in marked contrast with the 'Songs of Innocence'. The brightness of the earlier work gives place to a sense of gloom and mystery, and of the power of evil. We find again a protest against restrictive codes and an exaltation of the spirit of love. The 'Songs of Experience' include the famous 'Tiger! Tiger! burning bright'. In 'The Book of Urizen' (1794), 'The Book of Ahania', 'The Book of Los' (1795), Blake pursues, in mythological form, his exposure of the errors of the moral code. By an inversion of the Miltonic story, it is Urizen, the author of moral law, who is expelled from the abode of the Eternals, and obtains control over the human world. In 'Europe' (1794) and 'The Song of Los' (1795), Enitharmon is the giver of restrictive morality, on behalf of Urizen, to the sons of men; Los, a changing and perplexing character, appears to be the personification of Time, a champion of light, but held in bondage; Orc rises in rebellion, a symbol of the French Revolution. In 'Vala' (1797), subsequently in great part re-written and re-named 'The Four Zoas', the symbolism is exceptionally difficult to follow, but we still have the opposition of Urizen and Orc, representing authority and anarchy; the condemnation of the oppressive code of morality; the ultimate triumph of Orc and of liberty. In the later version (the 'Four Zoas') there is a new element, the revelation of forgiveness through Jesus Christ. In 1804 Blake began to engrave his final symbolic works, 'Milton' and 'Jerusalem'. Milton returns from eternity to correct the error to which he had given currency, and enters into Blake, who preaches the doctrine of Jesus, of self-sacrifice and forgiveness. In 'Jerusalem' we have expounded Blake's theory of Imagination, 'the real and eternal world of which the Vegetable Universe is but a faint shadow'; 'the world of imagination is the world of eternity. It is the divine bosom into which we shall all go after the death of the vegetated body.' In 'The Ghost of Abel' (1822), a short dramatic dialogue, Blake, referring to Byron's 'Cain', combats the view that the curse of Cain was uttered by Jehovah, and attributes it to Satan. His later minor poems include some beautiful lyrics, such as 'The Morning' and 'The Land of Dreams'; also the fragmentary 'The Everlasting Gospel', his own interpretation of the Gospel of Christ.

Blake made, and sometimes engraved, designs in illustration of many works besides his own poems, notably Young's 'Night Thoughts', Blair's 'Grave', Gray's Poems, the Book of Job, and the 'Divina Commedia', designs which reveal his greatness as an artist. There is a good edition of 'The Poetical Works of William Blake' by John Sampson, Oxford, 1904. A 'Life of Blake' by Alexander

BLAKE

Gilchrist was published in 1863 (2nd ed., 1880; new ed., 1906).

Blarney, a village near Cork. In the Castle of Blarney there is an inscribed stone in a position difficult of access. The popular saying is that any one who kisses the 'Blarney stone' will ever after have 'a cajoling tongue and the art of flattery or of telling lies with unblushing effrontery' (Lewis, 'Topographical Dictionary of Ireland', quoted in OED.).

Blarney, Lady, in Goldsmith's 'Vicar of Wakefield' (q.v.), one of the fine ladies introduced to the Primroses by Squire Thornhill.

Blatant Beast, THE, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene' (vi. xii), a monster, the personification of the calumnious voice of the world, begotten of Envy and Detraction. Sir Calidore (q.v.) pursues it, finds it despoiling monasteries and defiling the Church, overcomes it and chains it up. But finally it breaks the chain, 'and now he raungeth through the world again'. Cf. Questing Beast, below.

Blattergowl, Dr., in Scott's 'The Antiquary' (q.v.), the minister of Trotcosey and a neighbour of Mr. Oldbuck.

Blavatsky, Madame Helena Petrovna (1831-91), a Russian, who in 1873 became connected with spiritist research in New York, and there, with Col. H. S. Olcott and W. Q. Judge, founded the Theosophical Society. In 1879 she transferred her activities to India, where the Theosophical Society was organized on a new basis (see Theosophy).

Blazed Trail, The, a popular novel of the Michigan lumber camps, published in 1902, by the American writer, Stewart Edward White.

BLEAK HOUSE

Bleak House, a novel by Dickens (q.v.), published in monthly parts in 1852-3.

The book contains a vigorous satire on the abuses of the old court of Chancery, the delays and costs of which brought misery and ruin on its suitors. The tale centres in the fortunes of an uninteresting couple, Richard Carstone, a futile youth, and his amiable cousin Ada Clare. They are wards of the court in the case of Jarndyce and Jarndyce, concerned with the distribution of an estate, which has gone on so long as to become a subject of heartless joking as well as a source of great profit to those professionally engaged in it. The wards are taken to live with their kind elderly relative John Jarndyce. They fall in love and secretly marry. The weak Richard, incapable of sticking to any profession and lured by the will-o'-the-wisp of the fortune that is to be his when the case is settled, sinks gradually to ruin and death, and the case of Jarndyce and Jarndyce comes suddenly to an end on the discovery that the costs have absorbed the whole estate in dispute.

When Ada goes to live with John Jarndyce, she is accompanied by Esther Summerson, a supposed orphan, one of Dickens's saints, and the narrative is partly supposed to be from her pen.

Sir Leicester Dedlock, a pompous old baronet, is devotedly attached to his beautiful wife, Lady Dedlock. The latter hides a dreadful secret under her haughty and indifferent exterior. Before her marriage she has loved a certain Captain Rawdon and has become the mother of a daughter, whom she believes dead. Rawdon is supposed to have perished at sea. In fact the daughter lives in the person of Esther Summerson, and Rawdon in that of a penniless scrivener. The accidental sight of his handwriting in a legal document discovers to Lady Dedlock the fact of his existence, and its effect on her awakens the cunning old lawyer Tulkinghorn to the existence of a mystery. Lady Dedlock's inquiries bring her, through the medium of a wretched crossing-sweeper, Jo, to the burial-ground where her former lover's miserable career has just ended. Jo's unguarded revelation of his singular experience with this veiled lady sets Tulkinghorn on the track, until he possesses all the facts and tells Lady Dedlock that he is going to expose her next day to her husband. That night Tulkinghorn is murdered. Bucket, the detective, presently reveals to the baronet what Tulkinghorn had discovered, and arrests a former French maid of Lady Dedlock, a violent woman, who has committed the murder. Lady Dedlock, learning that her husband knows her secret, flies from the house in despair, and is found dead near the grave of her lover, in spite of the efforts of her husband and Esther to save her.

Much of the story is occupied with Esther's devotion to John Jarndyce; her acceptance of his offer of marriage from a sense of duty and gratitude, though she loves a young doctor, Woodcourt; Jarndyce's discovery of the state of her heart; and his surrender of her to Woodcourt.

There are a host of interesting minor characters, among whom may be mentioned Harold Skimpole (drawn 'in the light externals of character' from Leigh Hunt), who disguises his utter selfishness under an assumption of childish irresponsibility; Mrs. Jellyby, who sacrifices her family to her selfish addiction to professional philanthropy; Jo, the crossing-sweeper, who is chivied by the police to his death; Chadband, the pious, eloquent humbug; Turveydrop, the model of deportment; Krook, the 'chancellor' of the rag and bone department, who dies of spontaneous combustion; Guppy, the lawyer's clerk; Guster, the poor slavey; the law-stationer Snagsby; Miss Flite, the little lunatic lady who haunts the Chancery courts; and Jarndyce's friend, the irascible and generous Boythorn (drawn from Walter Savage Landor).

The case of 'Jarndyce and Jarndyce' was suggested by the celebrated proceedings arising from the intestacy of one William Jennings, who died in 1798, leaving property at Birmingham worth many millions.

Bleeding Heart Yard, London, in Dickens's 'Little Dorrit' (q.v.), the abode of Pancks, the Plornishes, &c. It stood on the south side of Charles Street, Hatton Garden. The author of the 'Ingoldsby Legends' (q.v.) tells in 'The House-Warming' of the carrying off of Lady Hatton, wife of Sir Christopher, by the Devil, with whom she had a compact, and of the finding of her heart in this locality.

Blefuscu, in Swift's 'Gulliver's Travels' (q.v.), an island separated from Lilliput by a narrow channel.

Bleise or BLEYS, in Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur' and Tennyson's 'Coming of Arthur' (qq.v.), is described as the master of Merlin. He dwelt in Northumberland.

Blemmyes, a people of Africa, who, according to fable (Herodotus, iv. 85), had no heads, but eyes and mouth placed in the breast.

Blenheim, BATTLE OF (sometimes called battle of Hochstedt), in Bavaria, in 1704, in which Marlborough, having marched to the Upper Danube and joined Prince Eugene, defeated the French and Bavarians under Marshal Tallard. For poems on the battle see Addison and Southey.

Blenheim Palace, the mansion near Woodstock, Oxfordshire, erected by the nation for the duke of Marlborough after the victory of Blenheim (1704). It was built on the designs of Sir John Vanbrugh (q.v.), and the park comprises part of the old Royal 'Chase'.

Blessed Damozel, The, a poem by D. G. Rossetti (q.v.), of which the first version appeared in 'The Germ' (q.v., 1850); many revised versions appeared subsequently.

BLOODY ASSIZES

In this poem the maiden, 'one of God's choristers', leans out from the rampart of heaven, sees the worlds below and the souls mounting up to God, and prays that she may be united once more with the lover whom she has left on earth and whose own comments are introduced parenthetically into the poem.

BLESSINGTON, MARGUERITE POW-ER, Countess of (1789-1849), after an unhappy first union, married the earl of Blessington, and travelled on the Continent with him and Alfred, Count d'Orsay, with whom she ultimately lived. She published 'A Journal of Conversations with Lord Byron' in 1832, 'The Idler in Italy' and 'The Idler in France', and a number of novels.

Bliff, in Fielding's 'Tom Jones' (q.v.), a character representing the extreme of cunning hypocritical meanness.

Bligh, WILLIAM (1754-1817), the commander of H.M.S. 'Bounty' (q.v.) who was cast adrift by her mutinous crew. He was appointed governor of New South Wales (1805), and was forcibly deposed and imprisoned by disaffected military officers. He became vice-admiral of the Blue.

Blondel de Nesle, French poet, in legend a friend of Richard Cœur de Lion. Richard, on his return from the Holy Land in 1192, was imprisoned by the duke of Austria. According to Favine's 'Theatre of Honour and Knighthood' (translated from the French, London, 1623), Blondel set out to find him, for no news of him had reached England for a year. Coming to a certain castle in Austria he heard that a single prisoner was detained there, but could not learn his name. Accordingly he sat under a window of the castle, and sang a song in French that he and the king had composed together: half-way through the song he paused, and Richard took up the other half and completed it. So Blondel returned to England and reported where the king was.

Blood, THOMAS (1618?-80), an adventurer who, among other exploits, headed an unsuccessful attempt to take Dublin Castle from the Royalists in 1663, and tried to steal the Crown jewels from the Tower in 1671. He figures in Scott's 'Peveril of the Peak' (q.v.).

Bloody Assizes, THE, the name given to the assizes held in 1685 in the west of England by Judge Jeffreys (q.v.) for the trial of the supporters of the duke of Monmouth after his defeat at Sedgemoor. Some 300 persons are said to have been executed and 1,000 sent as slaves to the American plantations.

BLOODY BROTHER

Bloody Brother, The, or Rollo, Duke of Normandy, a play by J. Fletcher (q.v.), Jonson (q.v.), and perhaps other collaborators, produced about 1616.

The duke of Normandy has bequeathed his dukedom to his two sons Rollo and Otto. Rollo, the elder, a resolute and violent man, in order to secure the whole heritage, kills his brother and orders to immediate execution all who refuse to further his ends, including his old tutor Baldwin. The latter's daughter, Edith, pleads for his life, and her beauty captivates Rollo, but his order to stay the execution comes too late. Edith determines to avenge her father's death, and prepares to kill Rollo when he comes to woo her. His apparent repentance shakes her determination. While she hesitates, the brother of another of Rollo's victims enters and kills the tyrant. The scene between Latorch, Rollo's favourite, and the Astrologers was probably written by Jonson, as also part of Act IV, sc. i.

Bloomer, a form of female attire that originated in America about 1850, being adopted for a time by some of the American pioneers of the movement for women's rights. 'It was invented by Mrs. Elizabeth Smith Miller, the daughter of Gerrit Smith, a prominent abolitionist, a great landowner in western New York. . . . Mrs. Miller wanted a dress in which she could easily take long walks about her country home. It consisted of a small jacket, a full skirt descending a little below the knee, and trousers down to the ankle. It was not beautiful, but was very comfortable and convenient and entirely modest. Mrs. Amelia Bloomer, editor of the "Lily", the first woman's paper, was much pleased with it, and advocated it warmly in her paper, and thus it became associated with her name.' (A. S. Blackwell, 'Lucy Stone: Pioneer of Woman's Rights', Boston, 1930.)

BLOOMFIELD, ROBERT (1766-1823), of humble origin, worked as an agricultural labourer and then as a shoemaker under his brother George in London, enduring extreme poverty. He is remembered as author of the poem, 'The Farmer's Boy', published in 1800, of which it is said that 26,000 copies were sold in less than three years. The similarity of his circumstances to those of John Clare (q.v.) leads to their being frequently compared, but the talent of Bloomfield was inferior to that of Clare.

Bloomsbury Square, near the British Museum, was one of the first squares to be laid out in London (by the earl of Southampton in 1665). Bloomsbury, part of the old manor of Rugmere, was so called from one Blemund, owner of the land in the time of King John. Sir Charles Sedley, Steele, Disraeli, and other notable persons lived there.

Blossom's Inn or Bosom's INN, an inn in Lawrence Lane, Cheapside, occasionally referred to by Elizabethan writers.

'Our jolly clothiers kept up their courage and went to Blossom's Inn, so called from a greasy old fellow who built it, who always went nudging with his head in his bosom winter and summer, so that they called him the picture of old Winter.' (Deloney, 'History of Thomas of Reading', c. ii; in the rest of the tale the name is given as 'Bosom's Inn'.)

Blot in the 'Scutcheon, A, a tragedy in three acts, by R. Browning (q.v.), performed at Covent Garden Theatre in 1843.

The events take place in the 18th cent. Lord Henry Mertoun loves Mildred, the sister and ward of Lord Tresham, but delays to ask her hand of him until he has already become intimate with her. Lord Tresham willingly gives his consent, but, warned by a retainer that some man has access to Mildred's chamber, obtains from her an admission of her guilt, but not a confession of her lover's name. Lord Tresham surprises Mertoun and kills him, but is filled with despair by the youth's story of his love, error, and remorse, and the sense that he has ruined his sister's happiness. Mildred dies of a broken heart and Lord Tresham takes poison.

Blougram, BISHOP, see Bishop Blougram's Apology.

Blount, MARTHA (1690-1762), the friend of Pope to whom he dedicated his 'Epistle on Women' ('Moral Essays') and his Epistles 'To a Young Lady with the Works of Voiture' and 'To the same on her leaving the Town' (in which occurs the character of Zephalinda).

Blouzelinda, a shepherdess in 'The Shepherd's Week' of J. Gay (q.v.).

Blue and the Gray, THE, familiar names for the armies of the North and South during the American Civil War, referring to the fact that the first wore blue uniforms and the second gray.

Blue and Yellow, The, the 'Edinburgh Review' (q.v.), so called from the colours of its cover, which were the election colours of the Whig party when the Review was started.

Blue Beard, a popular tale in an oriental setting, from the French of Perrault (q.v.), translated by Robert Samber (1729?).

A man of great wealth, but disfigured by a blue beard, and of evil reputation because he has married several wives who have disappeared, asks for the hand of Fatima, the younger of the two daughters of a neighbouring lady of quality. At last she is prevailed on to marry him. Blue Beard, called away on business, leaves the keys of all his treasures to his young wife, but strictly enjoins her not to make use of the key of a particular room. Overcome by curiosity, she opens this room and finds in it the bodies of Blue Beard's previous wives. Horror-struck, she drops the key, which becomes indelibly stained with blood. Blue Beard returns, discovers her disobedience, and orders her to death. She begs for a little delay, 'Sister Anne' sees her brothers arriving, and Blue Beard is killed before he can execute the sentence.

Andrew Lang, in his 'Perrault's Popular Tales', discusses the many parallel stories found in other countries. Blue Beard is identified by local tradition in Brittany with Gilles de Retz (q.v.).

Blue Grass State: Kentucky, see United States.

Blue Stocking, a woman having or affecting literary tastes. The origin of the term is to be found in the evening parties held about 1750 in the houses of Mrs. Vesey, Mrs. Montagu, and Mrs. Ord, who endeavoured to substitute for card-playing, which then formed the principal recreation, more intellectual modes of spending the time, including conversations on literary subjects in which eminent men of letters often took part. Many of those who attended eschewed 'full dress', among them Benjamin Stillingfleet, who habitually wore blue worsted, in lieu of black silk, stockings. In reference to this, Admiral Boscawen is said to have dubbed the coterie the 'Blue Stocking Society' [OED.]. There is an account of the 'Blue-stocking Clubs' in Boswell, under the year 1781, and Hannah More (q.v.) wrote a poem 'Bas Bleu, or Conversation' on the same subject. Mrs. Chapone (q.v.) was another member of the coterie.

Blue-coat School, a charity school of which the pupils wear the almoner's blue coat. Of these schools there are many in England, the most noted being Christ's Hospital (q.v.), formerly in London, founded by Edward VI, whose uniform is a long dark blue gown fastened at the waist by a belt, and bright yellow stockings.

Bluemantle, one of the four Pursuivants (officers ranking below Heralds) attached to the English College of Arms (see Heralds' College).

Blue-nose, a nickname for a native of Nova Scotia (the term frequently occurs in Haliburton's 'Sam Slick'); also applied to Nova Scotian ships.

Blues, THE, the Regiment of Royal Horse Guards, originally the Royal Regiment of Horse, one of the New Model regiments disbanded in 1660 and immediately raised afresh, so called from the colour of its uniform.

Bluffe, CAPTAIN, a character in Congreve's 'The Old Bachelor' (q.v.).

Blumine, in Carlyle's 'Sartor Resartus' (q.v.), the lady with whom Herr Teufelsdröckh falls in love.

BLUNDEN, EDMUND CHARLES (1896–), poet and scholar, educated at Christ's Hospital and Queen's College, Oxford. He served with the Royal Sussex during the war of 1914–18, and his 'Undertones of War' (1928) is an outcome of this experience. After his own poetry (collected edition, 1930; later poems, 1940), his greatest service to poetry has been the researches into and discovery and publication of the hitherto unpublished poems of John Clare (q.v.). He has also published the first adequate biography of Leigh Hunt.

Blunderbore, a giant in the tale of 'Jack the Giant-killer' (q.v.).

BLUNT, WILFRID SCAWEN (1840–1922), poet and publicist, author of 'The Love Sonnets of Proteus' (1880) and other volumes of poetry (complete edition, 1914). His political life and writings were all in defence of nationalism, Irish, Egyptian, and Indian.

Boadicea, BONDUCA, misspellings for BOUDICCA, queen of the Iceni in the east of Britain, who led a revolt against the Romans, but was finally defeated by Suetonius Paulinus in A.D. 61 and took her own life.

'Boadicea' is the title and subject of a poem in galliambs by Tennyson; also of a fine ballad by W. Cowper. See also Bonduca.

Boanerges, 'sons of thunder', the name given by Jesus Christ to James and John (Mark iii. 17), because they offered to call down fire from heaven to consume the inhospitable Samaritans (Luke ix. 54).

Boar of the Ardennes, THE WILD, William Count de la Marck, who figures in Scott's 'Quentin Durward' (q.v.).

Boar's Head Inn, THE, celebrated in connexion with Falstaff (Shakespeare's 'Henry IV'), was in Eastcheap, where the statue of William IV now stands. The inn was in existence until 1831. It is the subject of a paper in Washington Irving's 'Sketch Book'. One of the best of Goldsmith's essays is his 'Reverie in the Boar's Head Tavern at Eastcheap'.

Boaz and Jachin, the names of the two pillars set up by Solomon in the porch of the Temple (1 Kings vii. 21).

Bob and wheel: in prosody the wheel is a set of short lines forming the concluding part of a stanza, usually five in number, varying in form and length, but generally having the first line rhyming with the last, and often the intervening lines rhyming with each other; the first line in some types is very short, and is then called the bob [OED.].

Bob Logic, in 'Life in London', by Egan (q.v.), the Oxonian associate of Jerry Hawthorn and Corinthian Tom.

Bobadill, CAPTAIN, a character in Jonson's 'Every Man in his Humour' (q.v.), an old soldier, vain, boastful, and cowardly, notable among the braggarts of comedy for his gravity and decorum.

FRANCESCO BOBADILLA was the Spanish governor of Hispaniola, appointed in 1499, who put Columbus and his brother in chains, and sent them back to Spain.

BOABDIL, a corruption of Abou Abdullah, was the last Moorish king of Granada (1482–92), a pathetic figure in Washington Irving's 'Conquest of Granada'.

BOBBY

Bobby, a slang nickname for a policeman, probably an allusion to the name of Mr. (afterwards Sir) Robert Peel, who was home secretary when the new Metropolitan Police Act was passed in 1828. Cf. Peelers.

BOCCACCIO, GIOVANNI (1313?-75), Italian novelist, poet, and humanist, was born in Paris, the son of a Florentine merchant and a Frenchwoman named Jeanne. He was brought up in Florence, and fell in love with Maria d'Aquino, illegitimate daughter of King Robert of Naples, and wife of a Count d'Aquino, who inspired many of his works, and is the Fiammetta of his novel of that name. In 1351 Boccaccio carried to Petrarch (q.v.) a letter from the Florentine authorities announcing to him the restoration of his family property and inviting him to return to Florence. Boccaccio was a friend and admirer of Dante and endeavoured, apparently with little success, to interest Petrarch in his fellow poet. He wrote a Life of Dante which is one of our principal sources of knowledge on the subject. Boccaccio's chief works, apart from the 'Decameron' (q.v.), were: the 'Filocolo' a prose romance, embodying, with adaptations to his own love-affair, the story of 'Flores and Blanche fleur' (q.v.); the 'Amorosa Visione', a long poem describing the poet's visit, in a dream, to the realms of Love, Fame, &c.; the 'Filostrato', a poem on the story of Troilus and Cressida; and the 'Teseide', a poem on the story of Theseus, Palamon, and Arcite, which was translated by Chaucer. Boccaccio also wrote a Latin treatise, 'De Genealogia Deorum'.

Boccaccio is an important figure in the history of literature, and particularly of the novel, and among the poets who found inspiration in his works were Chaucer, Shakespeare, Dryden, Keats, Longfellow, and Tennyson.

Boche, abbreviation of Alboche (= Allemand), a French popular and contemptuous name for a German (Larousse), which came into vogue in England in 1914-18.

Bodle, a Scottish copper coin of the value of two pennies Scots or (c. 1600) one-sixth of an English penny. The name is reputed to be derived from the name of a mint-master Bothwell, but no documentary evidence is cited. [OED.]

Bodleian Library, see Bodley.

Bodley, Sir Thomas (1545-1613), was educated at Geneva, whither his parents had fled during the Marian persecution, and subsequently at Magdalen College, Oxford. After being for some time a lecturer in that university, he travelled abroad, and from 1588 to 1596 was English diplomatic representative at The Hague. He devoted the rest of his life and most of his resources to founding at Oxford the great library that bears his name. It was opened in 1602. In 1609 Bodley endowed it with land in Berkshire and houses in London, and in 1610 the Stationers' Company undertook to give to the library a copy of every book printed in England. It received also important gifts of books, in its early days, from Laud, Oliver Cromwell, and Robert Burton (author of the 'Anatomy of Melancholy'). Among other considerable accessions may be mentioned the library of Bishop Jerome Osorius (q.v.), seized on the occasion of the descent of Essex on Faro in Portugal (1596) and subsequently given to the Bodleian; also John Selden's library, given in 1659, and the Rawlinson MSS. in more recent times. The Canonici MSS. were purchased in 1817 and the Oppenheimer Collection of Hebrew books in 1829. The Bodleian shares with the Cambridge University Library, the National Library of Scotland (see Advocates' Library), the Library of Trinity College, Dublin, and (with limitations) the National Library of Wales, the right, under the Copyright Act (1911), to receive on demand a copy of every book published in the United Kingdom. Macray's 'Annals of the Bodleian' (1868, 1890) is a standard work on the history of the Library.

BOËTHIUS

BOECE, see Boëthius.

BOECE or BOËTHIUS, HECTOR (1465?-1536), a native of Dundee and a student in the University of Paris, where he became a professor. He published Latin lives of the bishops of Mortlach and Aberdeen (1522), and a Latin history of Scotland to the accession of James III (1526), the latter including many fabulous narratives, among others that of Macbeth and Duncan, which passed into Holinshed's chronicles and thence to Shakespeare.

Boehme or BEHMEN, JACOB (1575-1624), a peasant shoemaker of Górlitz in Germany, a mystic. The essential features of his doctrine (known as Behmenism) were that will is the original force, that all manifestation involves opposition (that good can only be known through contrast with evil), that existence is a process of conflict between pairs of contrasted principles, and that these are ultimately resolved into some new unity. The doctrine of Boehme strongly influenced W. Law (q.v.). English translations of Boehme's works, by various hands, appeared in 1645-62. A reprint of the works in English, ed. C. J. Barker, has appeared (1910-24).

Boeotia (pron. Bē-ō'shia), a country in central Greece, surrounded by mountains, containing the valleys of the Cephissus and Asópus, and having Thebes for its capital. Its inhabitants were proverbial for dullness of intellect, but the country gave birth to many illustrious men, such as Hesiod, Pindar, Plutarch, and Democritus (qq.v.). 'Boeotian' has come to be used as a derogatory adjective, synonymous with boorish, dull-witted.

BOËTHIUS, ANICIUS MANLIUS SEVERINUS, frequently referred to as 'Boece' in the Middle Ages, born at Rome between A.D. 470 and 475, was consul in 510 and in favour with Theodoric the Great; but incurring his suspicion of plotting against the Gothic rule, was imprisoned and put to death in 525. In prison he wrote the celebrated work, 'De Consolatione Philosophiae', which was translated by King Alfred (q.v.). Two versions of the translation exist, in one of which the metrical portions of the original are rendered in prose, in the other in verse. The 'De Consolatione' was also translated by Chaucer under the title 'Boethius', by Queen Elizabeth, and by others.

Boffin, Mr. and Mrs., characters in Dickens's 'Our Mutual Friend' (q.v.).

Boggley Wallah, THE COLLECTOR OF, Jos Sedley, a character in Thackeray's 'Vanity Fair' (q.v.).

Bogle, The Rhyme of Sir Lancelot, see Bon Gaultier Ballads.

Bogomils, a sect which arose in the 13th cent. in Bulgaria, holding heretical views on the divine birth of Christ, on the sacraments, and on other points of dogma. They held Manichaean (q.v.) opinions on the dual origin of good and evil.

Bohème, Scènes de la vie de, a well-known romance of Paris student life, by Murger (q.v.), published in 1848; Puccini's opera 'Bohème' was founded on it.

Bohemia, SEA COAST OF: in Shakespeare's 'The Winter's Tale', III. iii, Antigonus says, 'our ship hath touched upon the deserts of Bohemia'. Sometimes quoted as one of the rare instances where Shakespeare failed in general knowledge, since Bohemia is an entirely inland country.

Bohemia, Story of the King of, told by Corporal Trum in vol. viii of Sterne's 'Tristram Shandy' (q.v.).

Bohemian is frequently used in the sense of a gipsy of society, especially an artist, literary man, or actor, who leads a free, vagabond, or irregular life, and despises conventionalities. In this sense the term was adopted from French, in which bohème, bohémien, have been applied to the gipsies since their first appearance in the 15th cent., because they were thought to come from Bohemia. The word, with this meaning, was introduced into English by Thackeray. [OED.]

BOHN, HENRY GEORGE (1796-1884), publisher, and author of the 'Guinea Catalogue' of old books (1841), a valuable early bibliographical work. Among Bohn's many publications ('Standard Library', 'Classical Library', 'Scientific Library', &c.) may be especially mentioned his 'Antiquarian Library' (1847 onwards).

BOIARDO, MATTEO MARIA (1441?-94), an Italian poet of the old chivalry, who drew on the legends of Arthur and Charlemagne for his materials. His principal work was the unfinished 'Orlando Innamorato' (q.v.).

BOILEAU (DESPRÉAUX), NICOLAS

BOLINGBROKE

(1636-1711), French critic and poet, the friend of Molière, La Fontaine, and Racine, who by his 'Satires', 'Épîtres', and 'Art Poétique', remarkable for discrimination and good sense, did much to form French literary taste, previously vitiated by Spanish and Italian influences. He was known as the légiſlateur du Parnasse.

Bois-Gullbert, SIR BRIAN DE, the fierce Templar in Scott's 'Ivanhoe' (q.v.).

Boke of the Duchesse, The, a poem of some 1,300 lines by Chaucer, written in 1369. It is an allegorical lament on the death of Blanche of Lancaster, first wife of John of Gaunt. In a dream the poet joins a hunting party of the Emperor Octovien. He comes upon a knight in black who laments the loss of his lady. The knight tells of her virtues and beauty and their courtship, and in answer to a question declares her dead. The hunting party reappears, a bell strikes twelve, and the poet awakes, with the story of Ceyx and Halcýone, which he had been reading, in his hand.

Bold, JOHN, a character in Trollope's 'The Warden' (q.v.). Mrs. Bold, his widow, figures prominently in its sequel, 'Barchester Towers' (q.v.), and in 'The Last Chronicle of Barset', where she is the wife of Dean Arabin.

Bold Stroke for a Wife, A, a comedy by Mrs. Centlivre (q.v.), produced in 1718. Colonel Fainall, to win the consent of Obadiah Prim, the Quaker guardian of Anne Lovely, to his marriage with the latter, impersonates Simon Pure, 'a quaking preacher'. No sooner has he obtained it than the true Quaker arrives and proves himself 'the real Simon Pure', a phrase that has become proverbial.

BOLDREWOOD, ROLF, pseudonym of T. A. BROWNE (q.v.).

Boldwood, FARMER, a character in Hardy's 'Far from the Madding Crowd' (q.v.).

Bolingbroke, son of John of Gaunt, the future Henry IV, figures in Shakespeare's 'Richard II' (q.v.).

BOLINGBROKE, HENRY ST. JOHN, first Viscount (1678-1751), educated at Eton and perhaps Christ Church, Oxford, a supporter of Harley and the Tory party in parliament, became secretary of state in 1710, was created Viscount Bolingbroke in 1712, and was in charge of the negotiations which led to the treaty of Utrecht (1713). He founded the 'Brothers' Club' (q.v.) in 1711. He was dismissed from office on the accession of George I, was attainted, and his name was erased from the roll of peers. He fled to France and was secretary of state to James the Pretender, from whose service he was dismissed in 1716. His 'Letter to Sir William Wyndham' (q.v.) was written in 1717. He was pardoned and returned to London in 1723, and settled at Dawley near Oxford. It is to the following period that his principal political and philosophical writings belong. He contributed to the 'Craftsman' (q.v.) from 1727 to 1733 a number of virulent attacks on the Whig government under Walpole and Townshend, notably in the 'Remarks on the History of England' (1730-1) and in 'A Dissertation upon Parties' (1735). In 1735 he retired to Chanteloup in Touraine, and there wrote his 'Letters on the Study and Use of History' (1752), in which he points out the failure of English historical literature to produce either a general history, or particular histories, comparable to those of foreign nations. In 1736 he wrote 'A Letter on the Spirit of Patriotism' (q.v.), and in 1738 'The Idea of a Patriot King' (q.v., published 1749). In 1749 he issued 'Some Reflections on the Present State of the Nation', dealing principally with the question of the public debt.

Bolingbroke's chief strength lay in oratory. His policy was a kind of democratic Toryism, anticipating that of Disraeli. He can hardly claim to be a philosopher, but some occasional writings of his, of a deistic tendency, were published as his 'Philosophical Works' in 1752. The influence of these is seen in Pope's 'Essay on Man' (q.v.). Bolingbroke's collected works were published by David Mallet in 1752.

Bolívar, SIMÓN (1783-1830), 'The Liberator', the leader of the revolution of Venezuela against Spain. He founded the republic of Colombia, uniting Venezuela, New Granada (the modern Colombia), and Ecuador; became dictator of Peru; and formed the republic of Bolivia. Peru and Bolivia turned against him in 1826, and the republic of Colombia broke up soon after his death.

Bollandists, Belgian Jesuits who publish the 'Acta Sanctorum', legends of saints arranged according to the days of the calendar. The work was begun at Antwerp by John Bolland, a Flemish Jesuit of the 17th cent., the first volume appearing in 1643, and the last volume of the original series in 1786 after the dispersal of the Jesuits. The Bollandists were re-established in Brussels in 1837 and continue their hagiographic studies, but in a more historical spirit. Their quarterly review ('Analecta Bollandiana') was founded in 1882.

Bolshevik, the Russian name for a member of the revolutionary party led by Lenin, which seized power in Russia in 1917, professing to act in the name of the proletariat, confiscated the property of the landowners and distributed it among the peasants, and in general attacked the bourgeoisie and the capitalistic system. The word (colloquially 'Bolshie') is frequently used in England and America to signify any advocate of a radical reform of the social and economic system.

Bolt Court, Fleet Street, contained the home of Dr. Johnson from 1776 to 1784. Cobbett (q.v.) published his 'Political Register' there.

Bolton, FANNY, a character in Thackeray's 'Pendennis' (q.v.).

BONDUCA

Bomba, KING, Ferdinand II (of the Bourbon dynasty) of Naples, whose treacherous and tyrannical reign extended from 1830 to 1859, so called on account of his bombardment of Messina in 1848.

Bombastes Furioso, a burlesque by William Barnes Rhodes (1772-1826), published in 1810, with illustrations by G. Cruikshank. The name is applied to a person who talks in a bombastic way. ('The word 'bombast' originally means cotton-wool, hence cotton-wool used as padding, and so inflated language.)

The characters in the burlesque are King Artaxominous, Fusbos, his minister, General Bombastes, and Distaffina. The king is divided in his affections between his queen Griskinissa and Distaffina, who is beloved by Bombastes. He is discovered in Distaffina's cupboard by Bombastes and prepares to hang himself, but decides to hang up his boots instead. Bombastes fights with and kills the king, and is in turn wounded by Fusbos:

Here lies Bombastes, stout of heart and limb,
Who conquer'd all but Fusbos—Fusbos him.

Fortunately the dead revive and all join hands and dance.

Bombastus, in Butler's 'Hudibras' (II. iii, q.v.), refers to Paracelsus (q.v.).

Bon Gaultier Ballads, a collection of parodies and light poems by W. E. Aytoun (q.v.) and Sir T. Martin (q.v.), published in 1845. Among the authors parodied are Tennyson (notably his 'Locksley Hall', in the 'Lay of the Lovelorn'), Macaulay, Lockhart, and Mrs. Browning (in 'The Rhyme of Sir Lancelot Bogle').

'Bon Gaultier' was the pseudonym under which Sir Theodore Martin (q.v.) contributed to 'Tait's' and 'Fraser's' magazines. It is taken from Rabelais (Prologue to 'Gargantua'), who uses the words in the sense of 'good fellow' or 'good companion' ('Gaultier' is a proper name generalized).

Bond Street, London, named after Sir Thomas Bond, who began its construction about 1688. Sterne, Sir T. Lawrence, and Boswell (qq.v.) lived there at various times. It has long been famous for its shops.

Bonduca (Boadicea), a tragedy by J. Fletcher (q.v.), produced some time before March 1619 (the date of the death of Richard Burbage, who acted in it).

The tragedy is based on the story of Boadicea (q.v.) as given by Holinshed. But the principal character in the tragedy is Caratach (Caractacus), the sagacious and patriotic soldier, a generous enemy, and a wise counsellor to the impetuous British queen. The play presents the battles in which Boadicea is defeated and killed, her daughters take their lives, and Caratach is taken prisoner. Incidents worked into the general action are the love of the Roman officer Junius for Bonduca's daughter, and her treachery; and the disobedience of Poenius Postumus to his general's orders, expiated by his suicide.

Boniface, the landlord of the inn in Farquhar's 'The Beaux' Stratagem' (q.v.); whence taken as the generic proper name of inn-keepers.

Boniface, ABBOT, in Scott's 'The Monastery' (q.v.), the abbot of Kennaquhair.

Boniface, ST. (680-755), the apostle of Germany, born at Kirton or Crediton in Devonshire, was educated in a monastery at Exeter and at Nursling, near Winchester. He went to Rome in 718, and with authority from Pope Gregory II, proceeded to Germany, where he preached, established monasteries, and organized the Church. He was slain with his followers by pagans at Dokkum on the Bordau. He is commemorated on 5 June. His original name is said to have been Wynfrith.

Bonivard, see Prisoner of Chillon.

Bonny Dundee, Graham of Claverhouse (q.v.).

Bontemps, ROGER, the subject of a song by P. J. de Béranger (q.v.), the type of cheerful contentment.

Bonthron, ANTHONY, in Scott's 'Fair Maid of Perth' (q.v.), a villainous cut-throat, employed by Sir John Ramorny to murder Henry Smith and the duke of Rothsay.

Booby, SIR THOMAS and LADY, and SQUIRE BOOBY, characters in Fielding's 'Joseph Andrews' (q.v.).

Boojum, in Lewis Carroll's 'The Hunting of the Snark', an imaginary creature, a dangerous variety of the snark.

Book of Kells, see Kells.

Book of Martyrs, see Actes and Monuments.

Book of Mormons, see Mormons.

Book of St. Albans, The, was the last work issued (1486) by the press that was set up at St. Albans about 1470, soon after Caxton had begun to print at Westminster. It contains treatises on hawking, hunting, and heraldry, and its authorship is attributed to a certain Juliana Berners, whom tradition represents as prioress of the nunnery of Sopwell in Hertfordshire. The book is a compilation and probably not all by one hand. An edition printed by Wynkyn de Worde in 1496 also included a treatise on 'Fishing with an Angle'.

Book of Snobs, The, see Snobs of England.

Book of the Duchess, The, see Boke.

Booksellers' Row, a name that was given to the old Holywell Street, which ran parallel to the Strand between St. Clement Dane's and St. Dunstan's, before the formation of Aldwych at the end of the 19th cent.; so called from the number of second-hand booksellers that had shops there.

Boone, DANIEL (1735-1820), American pioneer, explorer, and Indian fighter, who played a notable part in the opening up and settlement of Kentucky and Missouri. His name is a synonym for pioneering courage, sagacity, and endurance. Byron devotes to him seven stanzas in the eighth canto of 'Don Juan'.

Boötes, from the Greek word meaning ploughman, wagoner; a northern constellation, 'the Wagoner', situated at the tail of the Great Bear and containing the bright star Arcturus. See Icarus.

BOOTH, CHARLES (1840-1916), a successful shipowner, was author of a monumental inquiry into the condition and occupations of the people of London, of which the earlier part appeared as 'Labour and Life of the People' in 1889, and the whole as 'Life and Labour of the People in London' in seventeen volumes (1891-1903). Its object was to show 'the numerical relation which poverty, misery, and depravity bear to regular earnings and comparative comfort, and to describe the general conditions under which each class lives'. The passing of the Old Age Pensions Act in 1908 was largely due to Booth's advocacy of this reform.

After an interval of forty years a 'New Survey of London Life and Labour' on the lines of Booth's inquiry has recently been undertaken by the London School of Economics.

Booth, WILLIAM (1829-1912), popularly known as 'General' Booth, famous as the founder of the Salvation Army (q.v.), was born in a suburb of Nottingham, the son of a speculative builder. He joined the Methodists, and became a travelling preacher of Methodism, but broke with his Church and turned independent revivalist. He started his Christian Mission in Whitechapel, the nucleus of the Salvation Army, in 1865. Though entirely ignorant of theology, and a man of narrow prejudices, he became, by his sympathy for the degraded poor, by his fervour, and by his gift for advertisement, a considerable force in the religious life of the country.

Booth, WILLIAM, the hero of Fielding's 'Amelia' (q.v.).

Bör or Borr, in Scandinavian mythology, the son of Buri (the first man, made by the cow Audhumla licking the salt stones), and father of Odin (q.v.).

Borachio, a large leather bottle or bag used in Spain for wine or other liquors; hence a drunkard, a mere 'wine-bag'. Shakespeare used the word as the name of one of the characters in his 'Much Ado about Nothing' (q.v.), and it occurs in Congreve, Middleton, &c., to signify a drunkard.

Borak, AL, the winged horse of Mohammed, on which he was, in a vision, borne to Jerusalem and to heaven.

BORDEAUX WINE

Bordeaux wine, see Claret.

Borderers, The, a tragedy by Wordsworth (q.v.), composed in 1795-6.

The gentle Marmaduke, leader (in the reign of Henry III) of a band of Borderers whom he has collected to protect the innocent, is induced by the perfidy of the villainous Oswald to cause the death of the blind old Baron Herbert, whose daughter Idonea he loves, being led to believe that her father intends to sell her into infamy.

Boreas, the North wind, regarded as a divine being by the ancient Greeks, and brother of the other winds, Zephyrus and Notus. Identified with the Aquilo of the Romans.

Borgia, CESARE (1476-1507), favourite son of Pope Alexander VI, notorious for his violence and crimes, at the same time a man of great military capacity, and one of the early believers in the unity of Italy. He perhaps murdered his brother Giovanni, duke of Gandia, and he instigated the murder of Alfonso of Aragon, his sister Lucrezia's husband. He conquered Romagna, but his position was shaken by a conspiracy of the dispossessed or threatened nobles (the Orsini, Baglioni, &c.). Borgia decoyed them to his house, had them arrested, and two of them strangled. His power came to an end after the death of his father. Julius II had him arrested, but he was released on condition of surrendering his castles in Romagna. Borgia fled to the court of Navarre (he had married Charlotte, sister of the king of Navarre), and was killed in the service of the king. He is, to a considerable extent, the 'hero' of Machiavelli's 'Il Principe'.

Borgia, LUCREZIA (1480-1519), daughter of Pope Alexander VI and sister of Cesare Borgia (q.v.). She was married when very young to Don Gasparo de Procida, but the marriage was annulled by her father, and she was betrothed to Giovanni Sforza. This engagement was also cancelled by her father for political reasons, and Lucrezia was married to Alfonso of Aragon, a relative of the king of Naples. Alfonso was murdered by direction of Cesare Borgia, and Lucrezia then married Alfonso d'Este, heir to the duke of Ferrara, being at the time 22. Her life henceforth was peaceful, and when her husband reached the throne, her court became a centre for artists, poets, and men of learning, such as Ariosto, Titian, and Aldus Manutius (qq.v.).

Borgia, RODRIGO (1431-1503), Pope Alexander VI, a Spaniard by birth, the father of Cesare and Lucrezia Borgia (qq.v.), elected to the pontificate in 1492. His policy was mainly directed to the recovery of the Papal States and the unscrupulous promotion of the interests of his family. The tradition that the Borgias possessed the secret of a mysterious and deadly poison, which they used against their enemies, has not been substantiated by historical research. It may be accounted for by the hostility of contemporary chroniclers and by the tendency to attribute to poison any unexplained and sudden death.

BORON or BORRON, ROBERT DE, a 12th-13th-cent. French poet, who composed a trilogy—'Joseph d'Arimathie', 'Merlin', and 'Perceval', in which he developed the early story of the Holy Grail (q.v.) and linked it with the Arthurian tradition. Of the trilogy only the first poem and part of the second survive.

Borough or Burrough, STEPHEN (1525-84) and his brother William (1536-99), navigators, remembered especially for their exploratory voyages to Russia round the North Cape.

Borough, THE, London, signifies Southwark (q.v.).

Borough, The, a poem by Crabbe (q.v.), published in 1810, in twenty-four 'Letters' describing life and character as seen by the poet in Aldeburgh. Among the most striking of the tales are those of 'Peter Grimes', 'Ellen Orford', and 'Clelia' (qq.v.).

Borr, see Bör.

BORROW, GEORGE (1803-81), was educated at Edinburgh High School and at Norwich and articled to a solicitor, but adopted literature as a profession. He assisted in compiling the 'Newgate Calendar' (q.v.), and then travelled through England, France, Germany, Russia, Spain, and in the East, studying the languages of the countries he visited. In Russia and Spain he acted as agent for the British and Foreign Bible Society, and in the latter country as correspondent for 'The Times'. Finally he settled near Oulton Broad in Suffolk, where he became celebrated for his promiscuous hospitality. He published a number of books based in part on his own life, experiences, and travels: 'The Zingali, or an account of the Gypsies in Spain' (1841), 'The Bible in Spain' (q.v., 1843), 'Lavengro' (q.v., 1851), 'The Romany Rye' (q.v., 1857), and 'Wild Wales' (1862). His novels have a peculiar picaresque quality, graphically presenting a succession of gipsies, rogues, strange characters, and adventures of all kinds, without much coherence, the whole permeated with the spirit of the 'wind on the heath' and of the unconventional. 'Lavengro' and 'The Romany Rye' are largely autobiographical, but the border-line between autobiography and fiction in them is hard to trace.

Bors de Ganis, SIR, in Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur', one of the knights of the Round Table, and cousin of Sir Launcelot. He takes part in the quest of the Holy Grail.

BOSCAN, JUAN (c. 1490-1542), a Spanish poet born at Barcelona, who did much to introduce Italian verse forms into the poetry of his country. He was an intimate friend of another Spanish poet, Garcilasso (q.v.) de la Vega, and the two are mentioned together by Byron in 'Don Juan' (i. 95).

Boscobel, a farm near Shifnal in Shropshire, where Charles II lay in hiding after the battle of Worcester. The 'royal oak', which stood near it, has now disappeared. See also Pendrell.

Bosola, a character in Webster's 'The Duchess of Malfi' (q.v.).

Bosom's Inn, see Blossom's Inn.

Bosphorus, or more correctly BOSPORUS, the channel between the Black Sea and the Sea of Marmora, said to be so called from the legend of Io (q.v.).

BOSSUET, JACQUES BÉNIGNE (1627-1704), French divine and famous preacher, one of the leading figures at the court of Louis XIV, of whose son, the Dauphin, he was tutor, and bishop of Meaux. His fame rests principally on his eloquent funeral orations on great personages of the reign. His 'Discours sur l'histoire universelle' (1681) is a summary of history in which the divine intervention is traced at each stage. He also wrote a 'Histoire des variations des Eglises protestantes' (1688). Bossuet was a rigidly dogmatic theologian; he entered into controversy with Fénelon (q.v.) on the subject of Quietism (q.v.) and secured the condemnation of his adversary's doctrines by the court of Rome.

Boston Tea Party, the name given to the act of violence by which the American colonists in 1773 manifested their objection to the tea duty imposed by parliament. A large quantity of tea shipped to Boston was on arrival seized and thrown into the harbour by a number of young men disguised as Red Indians.

Bostonians, The, a novel by Henry James (q.v.), published in 1866.

BOSWELL, JAMES (1740-95), born at Edinburgh, the son of Alexander Boswell, Lord Auchinleck, a Scottish judge who took his title from the family estate in Ayrshire. He was educated at Edinburgh High School and University, and reluctantly studied law at Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Utrecht, his ambition being directed to literature or politics. He made the acquaintance of Samuel Johnson (q.v.) in London in 1763. After his sojourn at Utrecht (1763-4) he travelled on the Continent until 1766, and was introduced to General Paoli in Corsica. As a result he became absorbed in Corsican affairs, and published 'An Account of Corsica' in 1768, and 'Essays in Favour of the Brave Corsicans' in 1769. Boswell paid frequent visits to Johnson in London (from Edinburgh, where he practised at the bar) between 1772 and 1784, and made a tour in Scotland and the Hebrides with Johnson in 1773. He was elected a member of the Literary Club in 1773, succeeded to his father's estate in 1782, was called to the English bar in 1786, and was recorder of Carlisle in 1788-90. In 1789 he came to reside in London. His 'Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides' appeared in 1785. He had been storing up materials for his great work, the 'Life of Samuel Johnson', since 1763, and after Johnson's death in 1784 he applied himself to the task under pressure from Malone. The book appeared in 1791, and proved Boswell's extraordinary aptitude and talent as a biographer. While Johnson owes much to Boswell, Boswell's devotion to Johnson was the source of his own fame. Much information concerning his life may be obtained from his letters to the Rev. W. J. Temple, published in 1857 (new ed., with other letters of Boswell, by C. B. Tinker, Oxford, 1924). Boswell's voluminous journals, recently discovered, are now in process of publication. See also under Zélide.

BOTTICELLI

Bosworth, BATTLE OF, in Leicestershire, the last battle of the Wars of the Roses, fought in 1485, when Richard III was defeated by the earl of Richmond (Henry VII) and killed.

Botanic Garden, The, see Darwin (E.).

Botany Bay, a bay on the eastern coast of New South Wales, where a penal settlement was established in 1787-8.

Botany Bay Eclogues, early poems by Southey (q.v.), written at Oxford in 1794. They take the form of monologues and dialogues by transported felons.

Bothie of Tober-na-Vuolich, The, a poem in English hexameters by Clough (q.v.), published in 1848 as 'The Bothie of Tober-na-Fuochich'.

The poem, described as 'A Long-vacation Pastoral', tells the story of the love of Philip Hewson, a young Oxford radical on a reading-party in Scotland, for Elspie, the daughter of a Highland farmer.

(A 'bothie' is a hut or cottage.)

Bothwell, JAMES HEPBURN, fourth earl of (1536?-78), husband of Mary Queen of Scots, is the subject of an historical poem by W. E. Aytoun (q.v., 1856), and of a tragedy by Swinburne (q.v., 1874).

Bothwell, SERGEANT, in Scott's 'Old Mortality', a soldier in Claverhouse's force, who claims the name of Francis Stewart.

Botolph or BOTULF, ST. (d. 680), an Englishman who studied in Germany and became a Benedictine monk. He founded a monastery at Ikenho (perhaps near the present town of Boston), which was destroyed by the Danes. He died, with a high reputation for sanctity, at Botolphstow (Boston). Four churches in London are dedicated to him, and he is also commemorated in Botolph's Lane and Botolph's wharf.

Bo-tree, the figus religiosa or pipal tree (from bodhi, 'perfect knowledge'), the sacred tree of the Buddhists. It was under a tree of this kind that Gautama attained the enlightenment which constituted him 'the Buddha'. It is regarded as the embodiment of universal wisdom and in some sort identified with Buddha himself.

Botticelli, SANDRO (1447-1510), a Florentine painter, whose family name was Filipepi (Sandro is short for Alessandro, Botticelli the name of the goldsmith who was his first instructor). He was a pupil of the painter Filippo Lippi. Abandoning the simple religion that had occupied Giotto and his followers, he sought inspiration in the works of Dante and Boccaccio or the classics, and treated religious subjects with a peculiar sympathetic humanity. His paintings (among them the famous 'Birth of Venus') are marked by the freshness of the early Renaissance. In 1491 he came under the influence of Savonarola and became one of his ardent supporters.

Bottom, Nick, the weaver in Shakespeare's 'Midsummer Night's Dream' (q.v.).

A 'droll', 'The Merry Conceits of Bottom the Weaver', adapted from Shakespeare's play, was printed in 1646.

BOUCICAULT (originally BOURCAULT), DIONYSIUS ('DION') LARDNER (1820?-90), educated at London University, was a skilful adapter of plays from plays or novels by other hands. He produced 'London Assurance' in 1841, 'The Corsican Brothers' (from the French) in 1848, 'The Colleen Bawn' in 1859, 'Arrah-na-Pogue' in 1864, and 'The Shaughraun' in 1875.

Bouillabaisse, see Ballad.

Bouillon, Godefroi de, duke of Lower Lorraine, leader of the 1st Crusade and proclaimed 'Protector of the Holy Sepulchre' in 1099. He died in 1100. He figures in Scott's 'Count Robert of Paris' (q.v.).

Boule, André Charles, a wood-carver in France in the reign of Louis XIV, who gave the name to Boule-work, less correctly Buhl-work, brass, tortoiseshell, or other material, worked into ornamental patterns for inlaying.

Bouncer, Mr., a character in 'The Adventures of Mr. Verdant Green'; see Bradley (E.).

Bounderby, Josiah, a character in Dickens's 'Hard Times' (q.v.).

Bountiful, Lady, a character in Farquhar's 'The Beaux' Stratagem' (q.v.).

Bounty, The Mutiny and Piratical Seizure of H.M.S., a narrative by Sir J. Barrow (q.v.), published in 1831.

H.M.S. 'Bounty', a ship of about 215 tons, which had been sent to the South Sea Islands to collect breadfruit trees, left Tahiti early in 1789 for the Cape of Good Hope and the West Indies. On April 28 of that year, Fletcher Christian, Alexander Smith (the John Adams of Pitcairn Island), and others seized Lt. Bligh, the commander, and placed him and 18 of the crew in an open boat and cast them adrift. These eventually reached Timor. The 'Bounty' then sailed east with 25 of the crew to Tahiti, where 16 were put ashore. These were subsequently arrested and many of them were drowned in H.M.S. 'Pandora'. Fletcher Christian and 8 others with some Tahitians went on and settled at Pitcairn Island. There they founded a colony, of which John Adams became the leader, and which was subsequently taken under the protection of the British government. These events form in part the basis of Lord Byron's poem 'The Island' (q.v.).

Bourbons, The, a branch of the royal family of France, the descendants of Robert de Clermont, sixth son of Louis IX, who in 1272 married Béatrix de Bourbon, in the Bourbonnais, one of the old provinces in the centre of France. The Bourbons ascended the throne in the person of Henri IV in 1589, and retained it, apart from the Revolutionary and Napoleonic periods, until 1830, or indeed, taking Louis Philippe (Bourbon-Orléans) into account, until 1848. The Bourbons also furnished kings to Naples, and to Spain, through the duke of Anjou, grandson of Louis XIV.

Bourdaloue, Louis (1632-1704), a celebrated French divine and preacher of the reign of Louis XIV.

BOURGET, PAUL (1852-1935), French novelist, whose works are notable for their psychological analysis. Among the best known of these are 'Le Disciple' (1889), 'Cruelle Énigme' (1885), 'Mensonges' (1888), 'André Cornélis' (1887), and 'L'Étape' (1902).

Bouts-rimés, 'The bouts-rimez were the favourites of the French nation for a whole age together. . . . They were a List of Words that rhyme to one another, drawn up by another Hand, and given to a Poet, who was to make a poem to the Rhymes in the same Order that they were placed upon the list.' Addison, 'Spectator', No. 60.

Bovary, Madame, the chief work of Flaubert (q.v.).

Bow Bells, the bells of Bow Church, i.e. St. Mary-le-Bow, formerly 'Seyn Marie Chyrche of the Arches', in Cheapside, London, so called from the 'bows' or arches that supported its steeple. This church having long had a celebrated peal of bells, and being nearly in the centre of the City, the phrase 'within the sound of Bow-bells' has come to be synonymous with 'within the City bounds' [OED.].

Bow Street, a street in London near Covent Garden, in which the principal Metropolitan police court is situated. Hence 'Bow Street Runner' was used in the first half of the 19th cent. for a police officer. Henry Fielding (q.v.) was magistrate here. Will's Coffee-house (q.v.) was at No. 1 Bow Street. Waller, Wycherley, Garrick, Mrs. Woffington, at various times lived in this street.

BOWDLER, THOMAS (1754-1825), M.D. of Edinburgh, published his 'Family Shakespeare', an expurgated edition of the text, in 1818; and prepared on similar lines an edition of Gibbon's 'History'. His works gave rise to the term, 'to bowdlerize'.

BOWDLER

Bower of Bliss, THE, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', II. xii, the home of Acrasia (q.v.), demolished by Sir Guyon.

Bowery, THE, a street in the lower (southern) part of New York, said to have been so called because it ran through Peter Stuyvesant's houwerie or farm (see W. Irving's 'Knickerbocker's History of New York'). It was formerly notorious as a haunt of the criminal classes. Its present population is cosmopolitan.

Bowge of Court, THE, an allegorical poem in seven-lined stanzas by Skelton (q.v.), satirizing court life. The word 'bowge' is a corrupt form of 'bouche', meaning court-rations, from the French 'avoir bouche à cour', to have free board at the king's table.

BOWLES, WILLIAM LISLE (1762-1850), educated at Winchester and Trinity College, Oxford, was vicar of Bremhill in Wiltshire from 1804 to 1850, and a canon of Salisbury. He is remembered chiefly for his 'Fourteen Sonnets' published in 1789, the first of any merit that had appeared for a long period. They stimulated Coleridge and Southey, and the former made many manuscript copies of them for his friends. In 1806 Bowles published an edition of Pope, which aroused a controversy, with Byron and Campbell as participants, about the value of Pope's poetry.

Bowling, LIEUTENANT TOM, in Smollett's 'Roderick Random' (q.v.), Roderick's generous uncle and protector.

Bowling, TOM, the subject of a well-known song by C. Dibdin (q.v.), included in his 'Oddities' performed at the Lyceum in 1788-9, is said to represent his brother Tom Dibdin, who died at Cape Town on his way home from India in 1780.

Bows, MR., in Thackeray's 'Pendennis' (q.v.), the first fiddler in the orchestra of Mr. Bingley's company, and instructor of Miss Fotheringay in acting.

BOWYER, WILLIAM (1699-1777), 'the learned printer', was printer of votes of the House of Commons (1729), printer to the Royal Society (1761), and to the House of Lords (1767). He published his 'Origin of Printing' in 1774.

Bowzybeus, a drunken swain, the subject of the last pastoral in the 'Shepherd's Week' of J. Gay (q.v.).

Box and Cox, a farce by J. M. Morton (q.v.), adapted from two French vaudevilles, and published in 1847. Box is a journeyman printer, Cox a journeyman hatter. Mrs. Bouncer, a lodging-house keeper, has let the same room to both, taking advantage of the fact that Box is out all night, and Cox out all day, to conceal from each the existence of the other. Discovery comes when Cox unexpectedly gets a holiday. Indignation follows, and complications connected with a widow to whom both have proposed marriage; and finally a general reconciliation. See also Cox and Box.

Boxers, THE, the name (a translation of Chinese words meaning 'fist of harmony') of a secret Chinese association in which popular discontent took an anti-foreign form at the end of the 19th cent. The Boxers besieged the legations at Peking early in 1900. The latter were relieved by an international force in August of that year.

Boxiana, see Egan.

Boy and the Mantle, THE, a ballad included in Percy's 'Reliques', which tells how a boy visits King Arthur's court at 'Carleile', and tests the chastity of the ladies there by means of his mantle, a boar's head, and a golden horn. Sir Cradock's (Caradoc's) wife alone successfully undergoes the ordeal.

Boy Bishop, THE, one of the choir-boys formerly elected at the annual 'Feast of Boys' in certain cathedrals, to walk in a procession of the boys to the altar of the Innocents or of the Holy Trinity, and perform the office on the eve and day of the Holy Innocents, the boys occupying the canons' stalls in the cathedral during the service. Provision for this is made in the Sarum Office (see E. K. Chambers, 'The Mediaeval Stage', App. M). This custom dates from the 13th cent. and lasted until the Reformation. There is an effigy of a Boy Bishop in Salisbury Cathedral. Boy Bishops were appointed also in religious houses and in schools.

BOYCOTT, CHARLES CUNNINGHAM (1832-97), agent for Lord Erne's estates in co. Mayo, came into conflict with the Irish Land League and suffered annoyances which in 1880 gave rise to the word 'boycott'.

BOYER, ABEL (1667-1729), a French Huguenot who settled in England in 1689. He published a yearly register of political and other occurrences (1703-13) and a monthly periodical, the 'Political State of Great Britain' (1711-29). He also brought out an English-French and French-English Dictionary, a 'History of William III' (1702), and a 'History of Queen Anne' (1722). He translated into English the 'Memoirs of Gramont' (q.v.) and Racine's 'Iphigénie'.

Boyg, THE, in Norwegian folk-lore and in Ibsen's 'Peer Gynt' (q.v., II. vii), a vague, impalpable, ubiquitous, and invulnerable troll-monster.

Boyle, CHARLES, fourth earl of Orrery (1676-1731), editor of the spurious Epistles of Phalaris which led to the Phalaris (q.v.) controversy.

BOYLE, ROGER, first earl of Orrery (1621-79), author of 'Parthenissa' (1654-65), a romance in the style of La Calprenède and Mlle de Scudéry (qq.v.), which deals with the prowess and vicissitudes of Artabanes, a

BOYLE

Median prince, and his rivalry with Surena, an Arabian prince, for the love of Parthenissa. Boyle also wrote a 'Treatise on the Art of War' (1677) and some rhymed tragedies.

Boyle Lectures, THE, (1) BOYLE LECTURE SERMONS, on religion, established in 1691 under the terms of the will of the Hon. Robert Boyle (1627-91), son of the first earl of Cork, natural philosopher and chemist, one of the founders of the Royal Society. He was also deeply interested in theology, and studied Hebrew, Greek, Chaldee, and Syriac. (2) BOYLE LECTURES, founded by the Oxford University Junior Scientific Club in 1892. Both series of lectures are described, listed, and dated in the Oxford Bibliographical Society's 'Proceedings and Papers', iii. 1.

Boyne, BATTLE OF THE, fought in 1690 on and across the river Boyne in Ireland. William III and the Protestant army defeated James II, who fled to Kinsale and escaped to France.

Boythorn, a character in Dickens's 'Bleak House' (q.v.).

BOZ, the pseudonym used by Dickens (q.v.) in his contributions to the 'Morning Chronicle' and in the 'Pickwick Papers', 'was the nickname of a pet child, a younger brother, whom I had dubbed Moses, in honour of the Vicar of Wakefield; which being facetiously pronounced . . . became Boz'. (Dickens, Preface to 'Pickwick Papers', ed. 1847.)

Bozzy and Piozzi, see Wolcot.

Brabançonne, THE, the national anthem of Belgium, composed by F. Campenhout at the time of the revolution of 1830.

Brabantio, in Shakespeare's 'Othello' (q.v.), the father of Desdemona.

Bracegirdle, ANNE (1663?-1748), a famous and enchanting actress, the friend of Congreve, to the success of whose comedies on the stage she largely contributed. She also created Belinda in Vanbrugh's 'Provok'd Wife', and played Portia, Desdemona, Ophelia, Cordelia, and Mrs. Ford, in Shakespearean adaptations. She was finally eclipsed by Mrs. Oldfield in 1707 and retired from the stage in consequence.

Bracidas, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', v. iv, the brother of Amidas, whose dispute over their inheritance from their father Milesio is settled by Sir Artegall.

BRACKENRIDGE, HUGH HENRY (1748-1816), American writer, born in Scotland, whose satirical novel 'Modern Chivalry' (1792-1815) gives a good description of men and manners during the early days of the American Republic.

Brackyn, see Parnassus Plays and Ignoramus.

BRAXTON, BRATTON, or BRETTON, HENRY DE (d. 1268), a judge and ecclesiastic, was author of the famous treatise 'De Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliæ', the first attempt at a complete treatise on the laws and customs of England. He also left a 'Note-book' containing some two thousand legal cases with comments.

Bracy, SIR MAURICE DE, in Scott's 'Ivanhoe' (q.v.), one of Prince John's knights, a suitor for the hand of Rowena.

Bradamante, in the 'Orlando Innamorato' and 'Orlando Furioso' (qq.v.), a maiden warrior, sister of Rinaldo. She fights with the great Rodomont (q.v.). Rogero (q.v.) comes to her assistance, and falls in love with her. For the sequel see under Rogero.

BRADDON, MARY ELIZABETH (MRS. MAXWELL) (1837-1915), became famous by her novel 'Lady Audley's Secret', first published in 'The Sixpenny Magazine' and issued separately in 1862. She contributed to 'Punch' and 'The World', wrote plays, and edited magazines, including 'Temple Bar' and 'Belgravia'. But she is best known by her novels, which, though criticized on the score of their sensationalism, have merits which commend them to good judges.

BRADLAUGH, CHARLES (1833-91), famous as an advocate of free thought, was a private soldier in the army, 1850-3, then a solicitor's clerk, and proprietor of the 'National Reformer' from 1862. He was elected M.P. for Northampton in 1880, but unseated, having been refused the right to affirm instead of swearing on the bible. He was re-elected in 1881 and a prolonged struggle ensued, ending in 1886, when he was at last allowed to take his seat. Bradlaugh engaged in several lawsuits to maintain the freedom of the press, published pamphlets on various subjects, and during 1874-85 was associated with the work of Mrs. Besant (q.v.).

BRADLEY, ANDREW CECIL (1851-1935), brother of F. H. Bradley (q.v.), and literary critic, especially noted for his contributions to Shakespearean scholarship. His best-known works are 'Shakespearean Tragedy' (1904) and 'Oxford Lectures' (1909). He was professor of poetry at Oxford, 1901-6.

BRADLEY, EDWARD (1827-89), educated at University College, Durham, and rector of Stretton, Rutland, is remembered as the author of the 'Adventures of Mr. Verdant Green, an Oxford Freshman' (1853-7). Under the pseudonym 'Cuthbert Bede' he contributed extensively to periodicals, and published works in verse and prose, some of which he illustrated himself. He also drew for 'Punch'.

BRADLEY, FRANCIS HERBERT (1846-1924), brother of A. C. Bradley (q.v.), and fellow of Merton College, Oxford, published 'Ethical Studies' in 1876, and 'Principles of Logic' in 1883. His 'Appearance and Reality' (1893), a work of profound criticism of current metaphysical thought, is one of the most important philosophical works produced in England in recent times. Bradley's 'Essay on Truth and Reality', a book less negative in character than its predecessors, appeared in 1914.

BRADLEY, DR. HENRY (1845-1923), philologist, is principally remembered for his work on the 'Oxford English Dictionary' (q.v.). He first gave help, while still in London, with the letter B; then undertook in 1889 the independent editing of the letter E, and removed to Oxford in 1896. He succeeded Sir James Murray (q.v.) as chief editor. He also wrote a successful book on 'The Making of English' (1904). A memoir on him by R. Bridges (q.v.) is prefixed to 'Collected Papers of Henry Bradley' (1928).

BRADSHAW, HENRY (1831-86), educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, scholar and antiquary, was librarian of his university, 1867-86. He published treatises on typographical and antiquarian subjects, some containing original discoveries.

Bradshaw's Railway Guide was first published in 1839 in the form of 'Railway Time Tables' by George Bradshaw (1801-53), a Quaker, engraver and printer. These developed into 'Bradshaw's Monthly Railway Guide' in 1841.

BRADSTREET, ANNE (1612-72), American poet, was born in England but emigrated to Massachusetts in 1630. Her volume of poems, published in England in 1650, under the title of 'The Tenth Muse, Lately Sprung Up in America', and in Boston in 1678, was the first literary work of any significance to be produced in the New England colony.

Bradwardine, THE BARON OF, and ROSS, characters in Scott's 'Waverley' (q.v.).

Braes of Yarrow, THE, see Yarrow.

Braggadochio, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', the typical braggart. His adventures and final exposure and humiliation occur in Bks. II. iii; III. viii; and V. iii.

Bragi, in Scandinavian mythology, son of Odin, and god of poetry and eloquence. It is he who welcomes the heroes as they enter Valhalla. He is the husband of Iduna (q.v.).

Bragwalne or BRANGWAINF, in the Arthurian legend, the maid-attendant of Isoud of Ireland. See Tristram.

Brahe, TYCHO (pron. Teeko Brah'è) (1546-1601), a famous Danish astronomer, who built for Frederick II of Denmark the great observatory on the island of Hven, known as the Uraniborg. He made important astronomical discoveries, but did not accept the Copernican system.

Brahma, the supreme God of post-Vedic Hindu mythology, and in the later pantheistic systems, the Divine reality, of which the entire universe of matter and mind is only a manifestation. 'The personal god Brahma, the creator, is evolved from the above abstraction, and with Vishnu, the preserver, and Siva, the destroyer, forms the TRIMURTI, the great Hindu triad. Brahma is now less worshipped by Hindus than the other members of the triad.

A BRAHMIN or BRAHMAN is a member of the highest or priestly caste among the Hindus.

Brahms, JOHANNES (1833-97), born at Hamburg, a great composer of the classic type, author of many beautiful songs, of examples of every kind of chamber music, and of four symphonies.

Brain Trust, the name popularly applied to the group of American intellectuals who helped President F. D. Roosevelt to organize the 'New Deal' (q.v.) of his administration (from 1933), holding posts in various departments.

BRAINARD, JOHN G. C. (1796-1828), author of 'Occasional Pieces of Poetry' (1825), born at New London, Connecticut, U.S.A. His literary remains, with a biographical sketch by John Greenleaf Whittier, appeared in 1832.

Brainworm, a character in Jonson's 'Every Man in his Humour' (q.v.).

Bramble, MATTHEW and TABITHA, characters in Smollett's 'Humphry Clinker' (q.v.).

Brambletye House, see Smith (Horatio).

Bramine, see Draper.

Bran, in Macpherson's Ossianic poem 'Temora', Fingal's dog, which is found lying on the broken shield of Fillan, before the cave where the hero lies dead.

Bran, the Blessed, a son of Llyr (q.v.). His tale is told in the 'Mabinogion' (q.v.). In Celtic mythology he was a god of the underworld, who later assumed the character of a hero, and finally was made the father of Caractacus, a convert to Christianity, and an introducer of that religion to Britain.

Bran, The Voyage of, an early Irish work, partly in prose, partly in verse, originally written, according to Kuno Meyer, in the 7th cent. and copied in the 10th.

Bran, son of Febal, is summoned by a woman bearing a silver apple-tree branch to Emain, the 'Happy Otherworld', a distant island in the western ocean. He sets out upon the sea with three companies of nine men. They first touch at the Island of Joy, then at the Land of Women. The chief of the Women draws Bran ashore with a magic clew and keeps him with her for, it seems, a year. Longing seizes one of the band to return. All accompany him, and on their arrival in Ireland they find they have been absent so long that their departure is forgotten save in the ancient stories. Bran tells his adventures and disappears again from mortal ken; his companion who touches the Irish soil is reduced to ashes. (See Alfred Nutt, 'The Voyage of Bran'.)

Brand, a lyrical drama by Ibsen (q.v.), published in 1866.

Brand, a young Norwegian clergyman, filled with contempt for the timorous practical compromising spirit of the religion of his countrymen, and an ardent conviction that 'all or nothing' should be the principle of faith, goes at the call of duty to a town on a distant sunless fiord. Unbendingly he practises his principle and enforces it on others, though it costs him the life of his child and of his wife. Finally the people whom he has sacrificed himself to elevate turn against him and drive him out into the snow, and he is reduced to despair. An avalanche overwhelms him as he makes his last appeal to the Deity, and receives the answer, 'He is the God of Love'.

BRAND

Brandan, St., see Brendan.

Brandon, COLONEL, a character in Jane Austen's 'Sense and Sensibility' (q.v.), who marries Marianne Dashwood.

Brandon, MRS., the 'Little Sister' in Thackeray's 'The Adventures of Philip' (q.v.), who had previously figured in his 'A Shabby Genteel Story'.

Brandon, RICHARD (d. 1649), the executioner of Charles I and various distinguished Royalists. He was the son of Gregory Brandon, common hangman of London.

Brandt, see Gertrude of Wyoming.

Brandt, MARGARET, the heroine of Reade's 'The Cloister and the Hearth' (q.v.).

Braughtons, THE, in Miss Burney's 'Evelina' (q.v.), the heroine's vulgar relations.

Brangwaine, see Bragwaine.

BRANTÔME, PIERRE DE BOURDEILLES, Abbé and Seigneur de (c. 1534-1614), French author of memoirs, a soldier who fought in many countries and was for a time chamberlain to Henri III. An excellent witness to the vices of his age, being moved neither by shame nor indignation, he left a series of memoirs, much of them of a scandalous character, which were not published until after his death. These include: 'Les Grands Capitaines français', 'Les Grands Capitaines étrangers', 'Vies des dames illustres françaises et étrangères', and 'Vie des dames galantes', titles given by the booksellers, for Brantôme left two great collections, named respectively 'Des Hommes' and 'Des Femmes'.

Branwen, see Mabinogion.

Brasenose College, Oxford, was founded in 1509, replacing an earlier Brasenose Hall. In 1344 a part of the students of Oxford migrated for a time to Stamford, where they occupied a house known as Brasenose Hall, on the door of which was a brass knocker shaped like a nose. The knocker remained at Stamford until 1890, when it was acquired by the College. It was this knocker which probably gave its name to the Hall, although it has been maintained that the origin of Brasenose is to be sought in 'brasinium', a brewery.

Brasidas, a famous Spartan general in the Peloponnesian War, killed in 422 B.C. For the story of Brasidas sparing the mouse that bit his finger, for its show of fight, see Bridges, 'Testament of Beauty', l. 531.

BRENDAN

Brasil, see Brazil.

Brass, a character in Vanbrugh's 'The Confederacy' (q.v.).

Brass, MAN OF, see Talus.

Brass, SAMPSON, and his sister SALLY, characters in Dickens's 'Old Curiosity Shop' (q.v.).

Brawne, FANNY, the lady whom Keats (q.v.) met in 1818 and with whom he fell in love. She was young and lively, and was kind and constant to her lover, but appears to have little understood what manner of man he was. His passion is reflected in one or two of his sonnets, notably 'The day is gone', and 'I cry your mercy'. His letters to her were published in 1878 (ed. H. B. Forman) and in the collected edition (1935). Her letters to his sister were published in 1937.

Bray, MADELINE, a character in Dickens's 'Nicholas Nickleby' (q.v.).

Bray, Vicar of, see Vicar of Bray.

Brazen, CAPTAIN, a character in Farquhar's 'The Recruiting Officer' (q.v.).

Brazil, a word of unknown origin, perhaps a corruption of an oriental name of the dye-wood originally so called. On the discovery of an allied species, also yielding a dye, in S. America, the territory where it grew was called terra de brasil 'red-dye-wood land', afterwards abbreviated to Brasil, 'Brazil'.

The name Brasil figures in connexion with the legendary 'Island of the Blest' in the Western Ocean ('O'Brazil, the Island of the Blest' is a poem by Gerald Griffin).

Bread and Cheese Club, THE, a New York literary society founded by James Fenimore Cooper.

Bread Street, off Cheapside, was at one time the chief bread market in the City of London. In the time of Stow (q.v.) it was 'wholly inhabited by rich merchants, and divers fair inns be there'. John Milton was born in Bread Street.

Breck, ALAN, a character in R. L. Stevenson's 'Kidnapped' (q.v.) and 'Catriona'.

Breeches Bible, THE, a name given to the edition of the English Bible printed at Geneva in 1560 (see Bible, the English), in allusion to the version adopted therein of Gen. iii. 7, 'They sewed fig leaves together, and made themselves breeches'.

Breitmann, HANS, see Leland (C. G.).

Brendan, BRANDAN, or BRENAINN, St. (484-577), of Clonfert in Ireland, perhaps made a journey to the northern and western isles which formed the basis of the medieval legend of the 'Navigation of St. Brendan'. The legend, of which the oldest extant version dates from the 11th cent., has been repeated in many languages at various times, and recently by Matthew Arnold and Sebastian Evans. The saint, sailing in search of the earthly Paradise, which at last he reaches, meets with fabulous adventures. Of these the best known is his meeting with Judas on a lonely rock on Christmas night, where the traitor is allowed once a year to cool himself, in recompense for a single act of charity in his lifetime. (Cf. the stories of the 'Voyage of Bran' and 'Maeldun', qq.v.) St. Brendan visited Brittany between 520 and 530, and is said to have accompanied St. Malo there. He is commemorated on 16 May.

(There was another St. Brendan, almost contemporary, of Birr, a disciple of St. Finnian of Clonard, to whom the voyage to Brittany is by some attributed.)

Brengwaine, see Bragwaine.

Brennus, the Gaulish chief who in 390 B.C. defeated the Romans at the Allia and took Rome, all but the Capitol, holding the city to ransom. See Vae Victis.

Brentford, TWO KINGS OF, see Rehearsal.

Brer Fox and Brer Rabbit, the chief characters in 'Uncle Remus'. See Harris (J. C.).

BRETON, NICHOLAS (1545?-1626?), educated at Oxford, was author of a miscellaneous collection of satirical, religious, romantic, and pastoral writings in verse and prose. His best work is to be found among his short lyrics in 'England's Helicon' (q.v.), and in his pastoral volume 'The Passionate Shepherd' (1604). His other writings include (in verse) 'The Pilgrimage to Paradise' and 'The Countess of Penbrooke's Love' (1592), 'Pasquil's Mad-cappe' (earliest known copy, 1626), 'The Soules Heavenly Exercise' (1601), 'The Honour of Valour' (1605); and (in prose) an angling idyll entitled 'Wits Trenchmour' (1597), 'The Wil of Wit, Wit's Will or Wil's Wit' (1599), 'Crossing of Proverbs' (1616), 'The Figure of Foure' (first published c. 1597), 'A Mad World, my Masters' (1603, a dialogue), and 'The Fantasticks' (1626, a collection of observations on men and things arranged calendar-wise according to seasons, days, and hours).

Breton Lays, in English literature of the ME. period, are short stories in rhyme like those of Marie de France (q.v.), taken from Celtic sources. For examples see Orfeo and Launfal.

Bretton, MRS. and JOHN, characters in Charlotte Brontë's 'Villette' (q.v.).

Bretwalda, a title given in the Old English Chronicle to King Egbert, and (retrospectively) to seven earlier kings of various Old English states, said to have held superiority, real or titular, over their contemporaries; also occasionally assumed by later Old English kings. Its sense can only be 'lord (or ruler) of the Britons' or 'of Britain' [OED.].

BRIDE OF LAMMERMOOR

Brewer's Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, first published in 1870, a useful work containing explanations of English phrases, cant and slang terms, characters of fiction and romance, &c., by the Rev. Ebenezer Cobham Brewer (1810-97).

Brian Boru (926-1014), having become king of Munster, started on a career of conquest, in which he defeated the Danes, and gradually extended his dominion to the whole of the island, becoming chief king of Ireland in 1002. He gained a great victory over the Danes at Clontarf in 1014, but was slain in his tent after the battle.

Briana, in Spencer's 'Faerie Queene', vi. i, the mistress of a castle who takes a toll of ladies' locks and knights' beards to make a mantle for her lover Crudor.

Briarēūs (also known as Aegēon), according to Greek mythology, one of three hundred-handed giants, sons of Uranus and Gē. He is generally represented as, with his brothers (Cottus and Gyes), helping the gods in their war with the Titans.

Bridal of Triermain, The, a poem by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1813. It is a romance of love and magic, telling of the quest of Roland de Vaux, lord of Triermain, for the maid Gyneth, daughter of King Arthur and the fay Guendolen, and her rescue from the spell that Merlin has laid on her.

Bride of Abydos, The, a poem by Lord Byron (q.v.), published in 1813.

Zuleika, daughter of the Pasha Giassir, is, by her father's order, to be the reluctant bride of the rich bey of Karasman, whom she has never seen. She confesses her grief to her beloved brother Selim. The latter reveals to her that he is not her brother, but her cousin, the son of her father's brother, murdered by her father. Moreover he is a pirate chief, and he asks Zuleika to share his lot. At this moment Giassir, waving his sabre, comes upon them. Selim is killed and Zuleika dies of grief.

Bride of Lammermoor, The, a novel by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1819 (third series of the 'Tales of My Landlord').

Lord Ravenswood, deprived of his title for the part he had taken in the Civil War of 1689, and dispossessed of his estate in East Lothian by the legal chicanery of Sir William Ashton, a clever upstart lawyer who has attained the office of Lord Keeper, dies in a fit of fury against the man whom he regards as the author of his ruin. His son, the fiery sombre Master of Ravenswood, inherits his hatred, and, as sole possession, the ruinous tower of Wolf's Crag. Chance leads to his saving the life of his enemy, Sir William Ashton, and of Lucy Ashton, his daughter, and he falls deeply in love with the latter and she with him. Political changes raise the friends of Ravenswood to power, and the timid Sir William thinks it advisable to conciliate Ravenswood, which he does so effectually that the latter overcomes his desire for vengeance and becomes secretly betrothed to Lucy Ashton. Lady Ashton, a woman of violent and domineering character, who has hitherto been absent from her home, now returns, learns the state of affairs, and contemptuously dismisses Ravenswood, who proceeds on a foreign mission after having renewed his pledge to Lucy. Lady Ashton now sets about breaking her daughter's spirit and obliging her to marry a husband of her own choice, the Laird of Bucklaw, by a course of cruel oppression. To this the gentle Lucy appears at last to yield, only stipulating that she shall write to Ravenswood and obtain his release from her pledge. The letter is intercepted by her mother, and Lucy in despair consents to the fixing of the wedding day, convinced that her lover has abandoned her. Immediately after the ceremony Ravenswood, at last apprised of what is going forward, appears, and challenges Lucy's brother and her husband to duels on the morrow. The same night, Lucy stabs her husband and is found insane and shortly after dies. Ravenswood, galloping furiously along the shore to meet his antagonists, is swallowed up in a quicksand.

One of the characters in the book is Caleb Balderstone, the old butler of Ravenswood, determined to maintain in the eyes of the world the fallen dignity of the family, who resorts for this purpose to the most absurd devices.

Bride of the Sea, Venice, see Adriatic.

Bridehead, Suz, a character in Hardy's 'Jude the Obscure' (q.v.).

Bridewell, originally the name of a royal palace in London, which stood on the bank of the Thames at the mouth of the river Fleet and near a well of St. Bride. This palace was rebuilt by Henry VIII for the reception of the Emperor Charles V. It is the scene of the third act of Shakespeare's 'Henry VIII'. It was given by Edward VI for a hospital, and afterwards converted into a house of correction. It was in great part destroyed in the Fire of London.

Bridge of Sighs, THE, at Venice, the bridge connecting the Palace of the Doge with the State prison, across which prisoners were conducted from judgement to punishment.

Bridge of Sighs, The, a poem by T. Hood (q.v.), published in 1846.

This was one of Hood's most popular works and shows his power of pathos at its highest. Its subject is the finding of the drowned body of a woman, an outcast of society, who has sought refuge from life in the gloomy river.

Bridgenorth, MAJOR and ALICE, characters in Scott's 'Peveril of the Peak' (q.v.).

BRIDGES, ROBERT (1844-1930), born at Walmer, was educated at Eton and Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and studied, and for a time practised, medicine. His reputation as a poet was made by the successive volumes of his 'Shorter Poems', published in 1873, 1879, 1880, 1890, and 1893. He also published some longer poems: 'Prometheus, the Firegiver' (1884), 'Eros and Psyche' (1894), and 'Demeter' (1905). 'Eden', an oratorio, appeared in 1891. An edition of the 'Poetical Works of Robert Bridges' appeared in 1898-1905, which contained in addition the sonnet sequence 'The Growth of Love' (first form 1876), the Purcell Commemoration ode, some reprints of poems from magazines, and his eight plays (published between 1885 and 1893): 'Nero' (two parts), 'Palicio', 'The Return of Ulysses', 'The Christian Captives', 'Achilles in Scyros', 'The Humours of the Court', and 'The Feast of Bacchus' (partly from the 'Heautontimorumenos' of Terence). The Oxford Press edition of the 'Poetical Works' (1912) first made the author known to the world in general. In 1913 Bridges was appointed poet laureate. In 1914 he issued privately 'October, and other Poems', subsequently published, with some war poems added, in 1920. In 1916 he published 'The Spirit of Man', a collection of prose and verse extracts from various authors, having special bearing on the spiritual needs of the time, and in 1925 a volume of 'New Verse'. Bridges also wrote much prose, including essays on 'Milton's Prosody' (1893), 'John Keats' (1895), and on 'The Influence of the Audience on Shakespeare's Drama'. He was one of the founders of the Society for Pure English (q.v.) and edited its series of Tracts.

The author of many beautiful lyrics and a remarkable metrist, Bridges was perhaps too subtle and severe a poet to appeal to a very wide public. But his great philosophical poem in 'loose Alexandrines', 'The Testament of Beauty' (1929), a compendium of the wisdom, learning, and experience of an artistic spirit, went through fourteen editions or impressions in its first year.

Bridges was intimately associated with the Oxford University Press, taking an active interest in questions of type, spelling, and phonetics, and did much to encourage taste and accuracy in printing. He was also interested in Church music, and collected 'Chants for the Psalter' (privately printed in 1899) and the Yattendon Hymnal.

BRIDGET or BRIGIT or BRIDE, ST. (453-523), a patron saint of Ireland. She was born, it is said, at Faugher, near Dundalk, the daughter of Dubhtach by his bondmaid Brotsach. She took the veil and was probably invested with rank corresponding to that of bishop. She was the founder of the church of Kildare, and is commemorated on 1 Feb. Other authorities see in her a survival of Birgit, the Gaelic goddess of fire, an origin attested by the sacred flame in her shrine at Kildare, and other attributes (C. Squire, 'Mythology of the British Islands').

Brigewater Treatises: the Revd. Francis Henry, 8th earl of Brigewater (1756-1829), left £8,000 for the best work on 'The Goodness of God as manifested in the Creation', which was divided among the eight authors of the 'Bridgewater Treatises' (Sir Charles Bell, Dr. T. Chalmers, Dr. John Kidd, Dean Buckland, Dr. William Prout, Dr. Peter M. Roget, Dr. William Whewell, and the Revd. William Kirby).

Bridlegoose, in Rabelais, III. xxxix, et seq., the judge who decided causes by throw of dice.

BRIEUX, EUGÈNE (1858-1932), French dramatist, author of plays on social themes, 'Les trois filles de M. Dupont' (1897), 'Les Avariés' ('Damaged Goods', 1901), 'Les Hannelons' (1906), 'Blanchette' (1892), 'La Robe Rouge' (1900), &c. He was made known to English readers in general by G. B. Shaw (q.v.), in an introduction to a translation by his wife of three of Brieux's plays (1911).

Brigadore, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', the horse of Sir Guyon, stolen by Braggadochio (v. iii. 34).

Brigantes, THE, a powerful British tribe, who occupied most of the country from the Humber to the Roman Wall. Their capital was Eboracum (York). They were not thoroughly subdued by the Romans until the reign of Hadrian.

Briggs, a character in Miss Burney's 'Cecilia' (q.v.), drawn in some respects from the sculptor Nollekens.

Briggs, Miss, a character in Thackeray's 'Vanity Fair' (q.v.).

Bright, JOHN (1811-89), son of a Rochdale miller, famous as a leading agitator against the Corn Laws, and as an orator. He was M.P. successively for Durham (1843), Manchester, and Birmingham, and held various posts in Mr. Gladstone's governments (1868 onwards). Bright and Cobden (q.v.) were the two leading representatives of the emergence of the manufacturing class in English politics after the Reform Act of 1832.

Brigliadoro, the horse of Orlando (q.v.).

Brigs of Ayr, THE, the Old and New Bridges across the river Ayr at Ayr, celebrated by Burns in his poem of that name.

BRILLAT - SAVARIN, ANTHELME (1755-1826), French magistrate and writer, author of the famous gastronomic work, 'La Physiologie du Goût'.

Briséis, daughter of Brises of Lyrnessus, fell into the hands of Achilles (q.v.) when her country was conquered by the Greeks, but was taken from him by Agamemnon when the latter was obliged to surrender Chryseis (q.v.). This was the occasion of the wrath of Achilles and of his prolonged withdrawal from the Trojan War.

Brisk, FASTIDIOUS, a character in Jonson's 'Every Man out of his Humour' (q.v.).

Brisk, a voluble coxcomb in Congreve's 'The Double Dealer' (q.v.).

BRITOMART

Bristol Boy, THE, Chatterton (q.v.).

Bristol-diamond or BRISTOL STONE, a kind of transparent rock-crystal, found in the Clifton limestone near Bristol, and alluded to by Spenser in the 'Faerie Queene' (IV. xi. 31):

But Avon marched in a more stately path, Proud of his Adamants with which he shines
And glisters wide.

Bristol Milk, Sherry wine shipped to Bristol, or, according to Macaulay ('Hist. of England', I. iii), 'a rich beverage made of the best Spanish wine'.

Britannia, the Latin name of Britain, and a poetic name for Britain personified. For the figure of Britannia on the copper coinage of 1672, the earliest modern coin on which it appears, Frances Teresa Stuart or Stewart, duchess of Richmond, was probably the model.

Britannia, or according to the sub-title, 'a chorographical description of the flourishing Kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland from the earliest antiquity', by W. Camden (q.v.), was published in Latin in 1586, the sixth (much enlarged) edition appearing in 1607. It was translated in 1610 by Philemon Holland (q.v.). It is in effect a guide-book of the country, county by county, replete with archaeological, historical, physical, and other information.

Britannia's Pastorals, see Browne (W.).

British Academy, see Academy.

British Association for the Advancement of Science, THE, held its first meeting at York in 1831. Its object is the promotion and diffusion of science, and the encouragement of intercourse of scientists of the British Empire with one another and with foreign philosophers.

British Magazine, The, founded in 1759 by Newbery (q.v.), with Smollett (q.v.) for editor, and Goldsmith (q.v.) among its contributors.

British Museum, THE, Bloomsbury, occupies the site of the old Montagu House, which was acquired in 1753 to house the library and collection of curiosities of Sir Hans Sloane (q.v.). These were from time to time enormously increased, notably by the purchase of the Harleian MSS., the gift by George II and George IV of royal libraries, the purchase of the Elgin Marbles (q.v.), and the acquisition of Egyptian antiquities (including the Rosetta Stone, q.v.) and of the Layard Assyrian collections. The new buildings were erected in 1823-47, and the great reading-room, designed by Antonio Panizzi, the librarian, was opened in 1857.

Britomart, the heroine of Bk. III of Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', the daughter of King Ryence of Brittany and the female knight of chastity. She has fallen in love with Artegall (q.v.), whose image she has seen in a magic mirror, and the poet recounts her adventures in her quest for him.

Britomartis, in classical mythology, was a Cretan goddess, probably of fertility; known also as Dictynna, goddess of nets, and in Aegina, whither she was said to have fled from the pursuit of Minos (q.v.), as Aphaea.

Briton, The, a weekly periodical conducted in 1762 by Smollett (q.v.) in Lord Bute's interest. Wilkes's 'North Briton' (q.v.) was started in opposition to it.

Broad Stone of Honour, The, a work by Kenelm Henry Digby (1800-80), first published in 1822 (re-written and enlarged 1826-7).

It is a study of chivalry, which is defined as 'that general spirit and state of mind which disposes men to heroic and generous actions and keeps them conversant with all that is beautiful and sublime in the intellectual and moral world', and is considered historically, in its relation to Christianity, knighthood, women, &c. In the preface to the work the author says: 'I have enterprized . . . to frame and imprint a book . . . which I call The Broad Stone of Honour, seeing that it will be a fortress like that rock upon the Rhine where coward or traitor never stood, which bears this proud title, and is impregnable.' The reference is to the fortress of Ehrenbreitstein, of the name of which the title is the English translation.

Broadside, a sheet of paper printed on one side only, forming one large page; a term generally used of ballads, &c., so printed.

Broddingnag, see Gulliver's Travels.

Brocellande, in the Arthurian cycle, a legendary region, adjoining Brittany, where Merlin lies enchanted by Vivien. There is a forest of Brécilieu in Brittany, in which a legendary tomb of Merlin is shown.

Brocken, SPECTRE OF THE, a natural phenomenon, first observed in 1780 on the Brocken in the Harz mountains (North Germany), in which an enlarged shadow of the spectator is thrown by the rays of the evening sun on a bank of cloud opposite him. Goethe uses the Brocken as the scene, in 'Faust', of the Witches' Sabbath.

Brodie, WILLIAM (d. 1788), deacon of the Incorporation of Edinburgh Wrights and Masons, and a town councillor, became the head of a gang of burglars which operated in Edinburgh, 1787-8. One of the gang turned king's evidence; Brodie fled, but was at last found in Amsterdam. He was executed on 1 Oct. 1788. He is the subject of a play by R. L. Stevenson and W. E. Henley (qq.v.), 'Deacon Brodie, or the Double Life'.

Broken Heart, The, a tragedy by J. Ford (q.v.), printed in 1633.

The scene is Laconia. Penthes, who was betrothed to Orgilus, whom she loved, has been forced by her brother Ithocles to marry the jealous and contemptible Bassanes, who makes her life so miserable that presently she goes mad and dies. Ithocles returns, a successful general, from the conquest of Messene and is honourably received by the king. He falls in love with Calantha, the king's daughter, and she with him, and their marriage is sanctioned by the king. Orgilus, to avenge the fate of Penthea, of which he has been the witness, entraps Ithocles and kills him. During a feast, Calantha hears in close succession the news of the death of Penthea, of her father, and of Ithocles. She dances on, apparently unmoved. When the feast is done, she sentences Orgilus to death, and herself dies broken-hearted.

BROME, RICHARD (d. 1652?), was servant or perhaps secretary to Jonson, whose friendship he afterwards enjoyed and in conjunction with whose son he wrote a comedy, 'A Fault in Friendship' (1623), which has not survived. 'The Northern Lass' (q.v.), his first extant play, was printed in 1632. 'The Sparagus Garden' (a place to which more or less reputable persons resorted to eat asparagus and otherwise amuse themselves), a comedy of manners, was acted in 1635. 'The City Witt' (q.v.) was printed in 1653. 'The Joviall Crew' (q.v.), his masterpiece and latest play, was acted in 1641. His other plays (fifteen in all of his plays have survived) include 'The Queen's Exchange' (printed 1657) and 'The Queen and Concubine' (printed 1659), romantic dramas. Some of the plays, particularly 'The City Witt', show the marked influence of Jonson, others that of Dekker.

BRONTË, ANNE (1820-49), sister of Charlotte and Emily Brontë (qq.v.), was part author with her sisters of 'Poems, by Currer, Ellis, and Acton Bell', and author, under the pseudonym Acton Bell, of 'Agnes Grey' (q.v., 1847), and of 'The Tenant of Wildfell Hall' (q.v., 1848).

BRONTË, CHARLOTTE, afterwards NICHOLLS (1816-55), daughter of Patrick Prunty or Brontë, an Irishman, perpetual curate of Haworth, Yorkshire, from 1820 till his death in 1861. Charlotte's mother died in 1821, leaving five daughters and a son. Four of the daughters were sent to a clergy daughters' boarding-school (of which Charlotte gives her recollection in the Lowood of 'Jane Eyre'), an unfortunate step which may have hastened the death of Charlotte's two elder sisters. In 1831-2 Charlotte was at Miss Wooler's school at Roehead, whither she returned as a teacher in 1835-8. She was subsequently a governess, and in 1842 went with her sister Emily to study languages at a school in Brussels, where during 1843 she was employed as teacher. In the next year Charlotte was back at Haworth, and in 1846 appeared a volume of verse entitled 'Poems by Currer, Ellis, and Acton Bell', the pseudonyms of Charlotte, Emily, and Anne. 'The Professor', Charlotte's first novel, was refused by Messrs. Smith Elder and other publishers, and was not published until 1857; while Emily's 'Wuthering Heights' (q.v.) and Anne's 'Agnes Grey' were accepted by J. Cantley Newby in 1847 and published in 1848. Charlotte's 'Jane Eyre' (q.v.) was published by Smith Elder in 1847 and achieved immediate success. Fresh sorrows now descended on the author: her brother, whose vicious habits had caused the sisters much distress, died in September 1848, Emily before the end of the same year, and Anne in the following summer, and Charlotte alone survived of the six children. She produced 'Shirley' (q.v.) in 1849, and 'Villette' (q.v.), founded on her memories of Brussels, in 1853; both stories, as well as 'Jane Eyre', appeared under the pseudonym Currer Bell. 'Emma', a fragment, appeared in the 'Cornhill Magazine' in 1860, after her death. Charlotte married in 1854 the Rev. A. B. Nicholls, her father's curate, but died a few months later.

BRONTË, EMILY (1818-48), sister of Charlotte and Anne Brontë (qq.v.), was part author with her sisters of 'Poems by Currer, Ellis, and Acton Bell' (1846), and author, under the pseudonym of Ellis Bell, of 'Wuthering Heights' (q.v.). 'Last Lines' and 'Remembrance' are among her finest poems. She was, at her best, a great poet.

Brontë, (PATRICK) BRANWELL (1817-48), the brother of Charlotte, Anne, and Emily. He was a clerk on the Leeds and Manchester railway, and was dismissed for culpable negligence. He was subsequently tutor to a family. He took to opium and died of consumption.

Brontë, DUKE OF, see Nelson.

Brooke, DOROTHEA and MR., characters in G. Elton's 'Middlemarch' (q.v.).

BROOKE, HENRY (1703-83), born in Ireland and educated at Trinity College, Dublin, lived most of his life in Ireland. He is principally remembered as the author of the curious novel 'The Fool of Quality' (q.v., 1760-72). His other novel 'Juliet Grenville' (1774) is of less importance. He published in 1739 a tragedy entitled 'Gustavus Vasa', on the delivery of the Swedes from the Danish yoke in 1521 by the valour of Gustavus. The performance of this play was prohibited, owing to the fancied resemblance of the villain in it to Sir Robert Walpole. Brooke publicly advocated the relaxation of the penal laws against Roman Catholics. His philosophical poem, 'Universal Beauty', was published in 1735.

BROUGH

BROOKE, RUPERT (1887-1915), the son of a Rugby master, was educated at Rugby School and King's College, Cambridge. He began to write poetry while at Rugby, and his first volume of verse was published in 1911. During 1913-14 Brooke travelled in America and the South Seas. When war broke out in 1914, he took part in the unsuccessful defence of Antwerp, and early in 1915 was sent to the Mediterranean. He died and was buried at Scyros on 23 April of that year. His 'Collected Poems' (1918), including the '1914' group of sonnets (published in 1915), show that he was a poet of exceptional promise. His 'Letters from America' appeared in 1916, with an introduction by Henry James.

Brooks of Sheffield, in Dickens's 'David Copperfield' (q.v.), an imaginary person invented by Mr. Murdstone to indicate David to his friend Quinion.

Brooks's, a club founded by Almack (q.v.) in the middle of the 18th cent. It was originally in Pall Mall, and the present club-house dates from 1778. In its early days it was a noted gambling centre, and was much associated with the names of C. J. Fox and Sheridan. Horace Walpole writes of it to Sir Horace Mann on 2 Feb. 1770, 'The young men of the age lose five, ten, fifteen thousand pounds in an evening there'.

Brother Jonathan, the nickname of the American nation, as John Bull is of the British. The origin is unknown. It is attributed by some, without historical evidence, to Jonathan Trumbull (1710-85), Governor of Connecticut during the American war of independence, a friend and counsellor of Washington, to whom Washington is said to have referred familiarly as 'Brother Jonathan'.

Brothers, The, a comedy by Cumberland (q.v.), produced in 1769.

The younger Belfield has been dispossessed of his estate by his brother, and driven from his sweetheart, Sophia, whom that brother is now courting, having forsaken his wife Violetta. A privateer is wrecked on the coast, on board of which are the younger Belfield and Violetta. Their unexpected arrival frustrates the designs of the elder brother.

Brothers' Club, THE, founded by St. John (Bolingbroke) in 1711 at the inspiration of Swift 'to advance conversation and friendship' and assist deserving authors and wits. It was composed of members of the Tory Ministry and some of their supporters, and included Swift, Prior, Arbuthnot, Harley's son, Lord Orrery, and others.

Brou, CHURCH OF, at Bourg-en-Bresse, near Lyons, a beautiful church built (1511-36) by Margaret of Austria, wife of Philibert II, duke of Savoy. It contains exquisite tombs of Philibert, his wife, and his mother, Margaret of Bourbon. It is celebrated in a poem by M. Arnold (q.v.).

Brough, the swindling philanthropist in

BROUGH

Thackeray's 'The Great Hoggarty Diamond' (q.v.).

Brougham, a one-horse closed carriage, with two or four wheels, named from the following.

BROUGHAM, HENRY PETER, BARON BROUGHAM AND VAUX (1778-1868), educated at Edinburgh High School and University, rose to be Lord Chancellor. Best known as a parliamentary orator and the advocate of Queen Caroline, in the history of literature he is remembered principally as one of the founders, with Jeffrey and Sydney Smith, of the 'Edinburgh Review' (q.v.) in 1802. He also wrote 'Observations on the Education of the People' (1825), 'Historical Sketches of Statesmen in the time of George III' (1839-43), 'Demosthenes upon the Crown, translated' (1840), and 'Life and Times of Lord Brougham', published posthumously in 1871. Brougham is said to have been the author of the article on 'Hours of Idleness' in the 'Edinburgh Review' (January 1808) which provoked Byron's 'English Bards and Scotch Reviewers'. He was a man of amazing activity, effected considerable improvements in the court of chancery, took an important part in founding London University (1828), and sat constantly in the supreme court of appeal and judicial committee of the privy council. His features lent themselves to caricature in 'Punch'. Of the many squibs written on him the most famous is the description of him in Peacock's 'Crotchet Castle' (q.v., in the chapter 'The March of Mind'), where he figures as 'the learned friend'.

Brougham Castle, Song at the Feast of, a poem by Wordsworth (q.v.), composed in 1807. See under Shepherd (Lord Clifford, the).

BROUGHTON, RHODA (1840-1920), novelist. When Miss Broughton started to write she had a reputation for audacity of which a younger generation deprived her—much to her private amusement. She once said of herself, 'I began my career as Zola, I finish it as Miss Yonge'. Her best-known books are: 'Cometh up as a Flower' (1867), 'Not Wisely but too Well' (1867), 'Doctor Cupid' (1886), 'A Waif's Progress' (1905).

Browdie, JOHN, in Dickens's 'Nicholas Nickleby' (q.v.), a bluff kind-hearted Yorkshireman, who befriends Nicholas and Smike.

Brown, CAPTAIN and JESSIE, characters in Mrs. Gaskell's 'Cranford' (q.v.).

Brown, FATHER, in G. K. Chesterton's detective stories, a Roman Catholic priest, highly successful in the detection of crime by intuitive methods.

BROWN, CHARLES BROCKDEN (1771-1810), born in Philadelphia, was one of the earliest American novelists. His most powerful novel, 'Wieland' (1798), was based upon the true story of a religious fanatic. Other works are: 'Arthur Mervyn' (1799, written under the influence of William Godwin's 'Caleb Williams'), 'Ormond' (1799), 'Edgar Huntly' (1799).

Brown, JOHN, 'of Osawatomie' (1800-59), the anti-slavery leader commemorated in the well-known marching song 'John Brown's body lies a-mouldering in the grave', migrated in 1855 from Ohio to Kansas, where he became a leader of the anti-slavery movement. On the night of 16 October 1859, at the head of a small party of his followers, he seized the arsenal of Harper's Ferry, Virginia, intending to arm the negroes and start a revolt. He was quickly captured, tried by the authorities of Virginia, and hanged at Charlestown, Virginia.

The author of the song is unknown; it was set to an old Methodist hymn-tune and became the most popular marching-song of the Federal forces. See also Battle Hymn of the Republic.

BROWN, DR. JOHN (1810-82), educated at Edinburgh High School and University, practised as a physician in Edinburgh with success, and was author of essays published under the title 'Horae Subsecivae' ('odd hours', 1858-61), including in the second series the beautiful dog story 'Rab and his Friends', 'a flawless example of pathos in a brief compass' (Elton); and of an essay on Marjorie Fleming (q.v.).

Brown, JOHN (1826-83), for over thirty years a favourite and devoted Scotch attendant of Queen Victoria, who enjoyed a singularly privileged position, and became 'almost a State personage'. (See Lytton Strachey, 'Queen Victoria', pp. 272-3.)

Brown, LANCELOT (1715-83), 'Capability Brown', the reviver of a natural style of landscape-gardening. He laid out the gardens at Kew and Blenheim, and was architect of many country houses.

BROWN, THOMAS (1663-1704), satirist, educated at Christ Church, Oxford, where he wrote the famous 'I do not love thee, Dr. Fell' (see Fell). He afterwards settled in London as a hack writer and translator. His 'Amusements Serious and Comical' (1700) contain entertaining sketches of London life. His collected works appeared in 1707.

BROWN, THOMAS EDWARD (1830-97), born in the Isle of Man and educated at King William's College, Isle of Man, and Christ Church, Oxford, was a fellow of Oriel College, and second master at Clifton from 1864 to 1893. He published 'Betsy Lee, a Foc's'le Yarn' in 1873, 'Foc's'le Yarns' in 1881, and other books of verse. His collected poems were issued in 1900, and there is a selection of the best of them in the 'Golden Treasury' series. The greater part of his poems are in the Manx dialect and deal with the life of the humble inhabitants of the island. They have found very warm admirers, who rank Brown high among the English poets of the 19th cent.

BROWN BESS

Brown Bess, the name familiarly given in the British army to the old flint-lock musket. BROWN MUSKET was in earlier use; both names existed long before the process of 'browning' the barrel, and apparently referred to the brown walnut stock. [OED.]

Brown, Jones, and Robinson, THE PLEASURE TRIPS OF, a series of drawings with descriptive underlines, by R. Doyle (q.v.), setting forth the experiences of B., J., and R. at various places and functions in England (and including two sets of pictures dealing with the Rhine), appeared in 'Punch' from July to November 1850. In 1854, after Doyle had (in 1850) severed his connexion with 'Punch', a further series of drawings appeared as a separate publication, under the title of 'The Foreign Tour of Brown, Jones, and Robinson', satirizing the manners of English travellers on the Continent.

BROWNE, CHARLES FARRAR (1834-67), born in Maine, U.S., an American humorous moralist, who wrote under the pseudonym of ARIEMUS WARD. He purports to describe the experiences of a travelling showman, and like 'Josh Billings' (H. W. Shaw, q.v.) uses his own phonetic spelling. He contributed to 'Punch' and died in England.

Browne, HABLOT KNIGHT (1815-82), under the pseudonym 'Phiz', illustrated some of the works of Dickens, Surtees, Smedley, &c.

Browne, ROBERT, see Brownists.

BROWNE, SIR THOMAS (1605-82), was born in London and educated at Winchester and Broadgates Hall, Oxford. He studied medicine at Montpellier, Padua, and Leyden, and graduated at this last university as doctor. In 1637 he settled at Norwich, where he practised physic. He was knighted in 1671 on the occasion of a royal visit to Norwich. His 'Religio Medici' (q.v.) appeared in 1643, though written some years earlier; his 'Pseudodoxia Epidemica', better known as 'Vulgar Errors' (q.v.), appeared in 1646; 'Urn Burial' (q.v.) and 'Garden of Cyrus' in 1658; his 'Christian Morals' was not published till 1716, after his death, and was later (1750) edited by Samuel Johnson. The best edition of his collected works is by G. Keynes (Faber and Faber, 1931).

BROWNE, THOMAS ALEXANDER (1826-1915), best known under his pseudonym 'Rolf Boldrewood', an Australian squatter and police magistrate, and a warder of goldfields, was author of the very popular 'Robbery under Arms' (1888), the story of a bushranger, Captain Starlight; also of 'The Miner's Right' (1890). 'The Squatter's Dream' and 'A Colonial Reformer' appeared in the same year, giving excellent pictures of the life of the Australian squatter.

BROWNE, WILLIAM (1591-1643), was a Devonshire man educated at Exeter College, Oxford. He published 'Britannia's Pastorals', a fluent but desultory narrative poem, dealing with the loves and woes of Marina, Celia, and the like, in couplets interspersed with lyrics, Bk. I in 1613, Bk. II in 1616; but Bk. III remained in manuscript till 1852. His 'Shepherd's Pipe', written in conjunction with Wither (q.v.), appeared in 1614. Among various epitaphs he wrote the well-known lines on the dowager countess of Pembroke, 'Sidney's sister, Pembroke's mother' (attributed however to Ben Jonson in Whalley's edition of that poet, 1756). His poetry is characterized by a genuine love of nature, and influenced Milton, Keats, and Mrs. Browning. His works were collected by W. C. Hazlitt in 1868.

Brownie, a benevolent spirit or goblin, of shaggy appearance, supposed to haunt old houses, especially farmhouses, in Scotland, and sometimes to perform useful household work while the family were asleep. [OED.]

BROWNING, ELIZABETH BARRETT (1806-61), whose father's name Moulton was changed to Barrett on succeeding to an estate, married Robert Browning in 1846. Her 'Essay on Mind; with other Poems' appeared in 1826; 'Prometheus Bound, translated from the Greek of Aeschylus; and Miscellaneous Poems' in 1833; 'The Seraphim and other Poems' (including 'Cowper's Grave') in 1838; a volume of 'Poems' (including 'The Cry of the Children') in 1844; 'Sonnets from the Portuguese' in 1850; 'Casa Guidi Windows' (recording political events in Italy and manifesting Mrs. Browning's enthusiasm for the cause of Italian liberty) in 1851; 'Aurora Leigh' (q.v.) in 1857; and 'Poems before Congress' in 1860. 'Last Poems' appeared posthumously in 1862. After her marriage Mrs. Browning lived mostly in Italy, and died at Florence. Her best work is contained in the 'Sonnets from the Portuguese', where the form restricted her tendency to prolixity. Mrs. Browning's romance is the subject of 'Miss Barrett's Elopement' by Mrs. Carola Lenanton (Oman), 1929, and of the successful play 'The Barretts of Wimpole Street', by Rudolf Besier, 1930.

BROWNING, ROBERT (1812-89), the son of a clerk in the Bank of England, was privately educated. His first poem, 'Pauline' (q.v.), appeared in 1833 and he first visited Italy in 1834. 'Paracelsus' (q.v.), which attracted the friendly notice of Carlyle, Wordsworth, and other men of letters, appeared in 1835. He next published 'Strafford' (q.v.), a tragedy, which was played at Covent Garden in 1837. 'Sordello' (q.v.) followed in 1840. 'Bells and Pomegranates' (including 'Pippa Passes', 'The Return of the Druses', 'A Blot in the 'Scutcheon', 'Colombe's Birthday', 'Luria', 'A Soul's Tragedy', qq.v., and other pieces) appeared during 1841-6. In 1846 he married Elizabeth Barrett (see under Browning, E. B.), and lived with her mainly in Italy at Pisa, Florence, and Rome, until her death in 1861, after which Browning settled in London. In 1850 he published 'Christmas Eve and Easter Day' (q.v.), and in 1855 'Men and Women' (q.v.). 'Dramatis Personae' (q.v.) appeared in 1864, and in 1868-9 the long poem 'The Ring and the Book' (q.v.). His chief remaining works appeared as follows: 'Balaustion's Adventure' (q.v.) and 'Prince Hohenstiel-Schwangau' (q.v.) in 1871, 'Fifine at the Fair' (q.v.) in 1872, 'Red Cotton Nightcap Country' (q.v.) in 1873, 'Aristophanes' Apology' (q.v.) and 'The Inn Album' (q.v.) in 1875, a translation of the 'Agamemnon' of Aeschylus in 1877, 'Dramatic Idyls' in two series in 1879-80, 'Jocoseria' (containing the fine dramatic monologue 'Cristina and Monaldeschi') in 1883, 'Ferishtah's Fancies' in 1884, and 'Parlevings with certain People' in 1887. His last volume of poems, 'Asolando' (q.v.), was published on the day of his death. He was buried in Westminster Abbey. Two volumes of his correspondence with Mrs. Browning have been published.

Brownists, adherents of the ecclesiastical principles of Robert Browne (1550?-1633?), who preached c. 1578 denouncing the parochial system and ordination, whether by bishops or by presbytery. About 1580 he, with Robert Harrison, collected a congregation at Norwich, which they called 'the church', but which was familiarly known as 'the Brownists'. He finally submitted to the bishop of Peterborough and became for forty years rector of Achurch in Northamptonshire. He is regarded as the founder of congregationalism.

Brownlow, Mr., a character in Dickens's 'Oliver Twist' (q.v.).

BRUCE, JAMES (1730-94), educated at Harrow, African traveller, was author of an interesting narrative of his 'Travels to discover the source of the Nile' (he discovered that of the Blue Nile), and of his visit to Abyssinia, published in 1790. His veracity was long doubted, but established by Burton, Speke, and Baker.

Bruce and the Spider: according to legend, Bruce while lying concealed from the English in the island of Rathlin, one day watched a spider making repeated attempts to fix its web to a beam of the ceiling, and at last succeeding. Encouraged by this example, he left the island in 1307, landed at Carrick with a small band of followers, and gradually drove the English from Scotland.

Bruce, The, an epic poem by Barbour (q.v.), written about 1375.

The author relates the story of King Robert the Bruce and James Douglas, and of the war of independence, mingling anecdote with substantially accurate history. It contains some good descriptive passages, notably of the Battle of Bannockburn, and a frequently quoted outburst on freedom, beginning

'Al Fredome is a noble thing!'

Brugglesmith, the title of a short story by Kipling (q.v.), included in 'Many Inventions', of an amusing midnight adventure in the streets of London with a drunken man. (He gives his address as 'Brugglesmith', interpreted by a policeman as 'Brook Green, Hammersmith'.)

BRUNO

Bruin, meaning 'brown', the name of the bear in 'Reynard the Fox' (q.v.), whence it has come to signify a bear in general.

Brumaire, from French brume, mist, the name of the second month of the year in the French revolutionary calendar. It extended from 22 Oct. to 20 Nov. The 18th Brumaire of the year VIII (9 Nov. 1799) was the day on which the French Directory fell and the supreme power was entrusted to Napoleon Buonaparte, as first Consul, with Sieyès and Roger-Ducos as his associates.

Brummagem, a local vulgar form of the name of the town of Birmingham, hence (contemptuously) an article of Birmingham manufacture; used especially of cheap jewellery and the like. The old spelling of 'Birmingham', e.g. in Clarendon, is often 'Bromwicham', which would naturally be pronounced 'Brummagem'.

Brummel, GEORGE BRYAN (1778-1840), generally called BEAU BRUMMEL, a friend of the prince regent (George IV) and leader of fashion in London. He died in poverty at Caen.

Brunanburh, a poem in Old English, included in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (q.v.) under the year 937, dealing with the battle fought in that year at Brunanburh between Æthelstan with an English army and the Northmen supported by the forces of Scotland and Wales. The site of the battle is unknown. It is a song of triumph recounting the deeds of Æthelstan and his brother Eadmund, and the rout and slaying of the invaders. J. H. Frere (q.v.) and A. Tennyson wrote translations of the poem.

Brunehaut, BRUNHALT, see Thierry and Theodoret.

Brunel, SIR MARC ISAMBARD (1769-1849), born in Normandy and educated for the Church, served in the French navy and emigrated to America in 1793. There he practised as a surveyor and engineer. He came to England in 1799, where he had a distinguished career as an inventor and engineer, having charge, among other important works, of the construction of the Thames tunnel (1825-43).

His son ISAMBARD KINGDOM BRUNEL (1806-59), also a distinguished engineer, designed Clifton suspension bridge (1831), built the Great Western Railway (1833 onwards), and did much marine building, e.g. the 'Great Eastern' (1852-8) and other steamships. He was also concerned in the buildings for the Great Exhibition of 1851.

Brunhild, see Brynhild.

Bruno, GIORDANO (1548-1599), Italian philosopher (who saw God as the unity reconciling spirit and matter), born at Nola. He was in early life a Dominican friar, but broke from his order and wandered about Europe teaching his philosophical doctrines, which are obscure, or embodying them in dialogues and verse (some of them dedicated to Sir P. Sidney, under whose auspices he visited Oxford) of great fire and vigour. He finally quarrelled with one of the Mocenigos, by whom he was employed at Venice, was denounced to the Inquisition, arrested, condemned to death, and burnt (whether in reality or in effigy is not quite certain).

BRUNO

Brut, meaning 'chronicle', is a transferred use of Brut = Brutus, the legendary founder of Britain, as in the French title, 'Roman de Brut', and in the 'Brut' of Layamon (q.v.).

Brut of Layamon, see Layamon.

Brute or BRUTUS, legendary founder of the British race. Geoffrey of Monmouth (q.v.) states that Walter Archdeacon of Oxford gave him an ancient book in the British tongue, containing an account of the kings of Britain from Brutus to Cadwallader. This Brutus was son of Sylvius, grandson of Ascanius and great-grandson of Aeneas. Having had the misfortune to kill his father, he collected a remnant of the Trojan race and brought them to England (uninhabited at the time 'except by a few giants'), landing at Totnes. He founded Troynovant or New Troy (later known as London) and was the progenitor of a line of British kings including Bladud, Gorboduc, Ferrex and Porrex, Lud, Cymbeline, Coel (Cole, the 'merry old soul'), Vortigern, and Arthur. The name 'Troynovant' is a back-formation from 'Trinovantes', the name of the powerful British tribe that lived north and east of London. Drayton, in his 'Polyolbion' (l. 312), relates the legend, and Selden, in his 'Illustrations' to that work, discusses its probability.

Brute, SIR JOHN and LADY, characters in Vanbrugh's 'The Provok'd Wife' (q.v.).

Brutus, DECIUS, a character in Shakespeare's 'Julius Caesar' (q.v.).

Brutus, LUCIUS JUNIUS, the legendary first consul of Rome. His brother was murdered by Tarquinius Superbus, and he escaped the same fate only by simulating idiocy—whence the name Brutus. After the death of Lucretia (q.v.), he stirred the Romans to expel the Tarquins and was elected to the consulship. He put to death his two sons for conspiring to restore the Tarquins.

Brutus, MARCUS JUNIUS (85–42 B.C.), joined Pompey in the civil war (49), but after the battle of Pharsalia was pardoned by Caesar. He nevertheless joined the conspirators who assassinated Caesar, in the hope of restoring republican government. On the occasion of Caesar's murder, the dying man uttered the famous words, 'Et tu, Brute'. In the subsequent war between Brutus and Cassius on the one hand and Octavian and Antony on the other, the former were defeated at Philippi (42), and Brutus took his own life. His wife was Porcia, daughter of Cato of Utica.

BRYAN, SIR FRANCIS (d. 1550), poet, soldier, and diplomatist, was Henry VIII's permanent favourite, held various court posts, and was sent on diplomatic missions. He behaved discredibly in the matter of the execution of his cousin, Anne Boleyn, and accepted a pension vacated by one of her accomplices. Cromwell, in writing of this circumstance to Gardiner and Wallop, calls him 'the vicar of hell', which became a popular nickname. It is to this, no doubt, that Milton in the 'Areopagitica' refers when he writes, 'I name not him, for posterity's sake, whom Henry VIII named in his merriment his vicar of hell'. Bryan contributed to 'Tottel's Miscellany' and his poetry was highly valued in his day, but is now undiscoverable.

BRYANT, WILLIAM CULLEN (1794–1878), American poet, born at Cummington, Massachusetts, first a poor country lawyer, then a pioneer in the prairies of Illinois, and finally a New York editor (who raised 'The Evening Post' to a great position in America). His first volume of collected poems (including 'Thanatopsis') appeared in 1821, and further collections at various subsequent dates. His poetry reveals a very elementary philosophy, based on the O.T., a love of political freedom, and a strong and simple sense of the relation of man to nature.

BRYCE, JAMES (1838–1922), VISCOUNT BRYCE, educated at the High School and University of Glasgow, at Trinity College, Oxford, and at Heidelberg, was Regius professor of civil law at Oxford, 1870–93, and held a number of high political and diplomatic posts, including those of chief secretary for Ireland (1905–6) and ambassador at Washington (1907–13). His publications include two classical works: 'The Holy Roman Empire' (1864) and 'The American Commonwealth' (1888), besides a number of other writings on various subjects: 'Impressions of South Africa' (1897), 'Studies in History and Jurisprudence' (1901), 'Studies in Contemporary Biography' (1903), 'South America: Observations and Impressions' (1912), 'Modern Democracies' (1922).

BRYDGES, SIR SAMUEL EGERTON (1762–1837), bibliographer, published his valuable 'Censura Literaria' in 1805–9 and 1815, 'The British Bibliographer' in 1810–14, and 'Restituta: or Titles, Extracts, and Characters of old books in English Literature Revived' in 1814–16.

Brynhild or BRUNHILD, one of the principal characters in the 'Volsunga Saga' (see under Sigurd the Volsung) and in the 'Nibelungenlied' (q.v.).

Brythons, a Welsh name used to distinguish the branch of the Celtic race which was ultimately driven into Wales and Cornwall, from the Goidels (q.v.).

BUBASTIS

Bubastis, the Greek name of the Egyptian goddess PASHT, identified by the Greeks with Artemis (q.v.), and represented under the form of a cat. The town of Bubastis, on the Pelusiac branch of the Nile, was the chief seat of the worship of this goddess.

Buccaneer, from the French boucanier, originally 'one who hunts wild oxen' (Littre) from boucan (a S. American name for a hurdle on which meat was roasted or smoked over a fire), a barbecue, boucaner, to dry meat on a barbecue. Thus the word was used to mean one who dries and smokes flesh on a boucan after the manner of the Indians. The name was first 'given to the French hunters of St. Domingo, who prepared the flesh of the wild oxen and boars in this way'. Hence it was extended to 'piratical rovers who formerly infested the Spanish coasts in America' (E. B. Tylor, quoted in OED.). See Esquemeling.

Bucentaur, see Adriatic.

Bucephalus, the horse of Alexander the Great.

BUCHAN, JOHN, 1ST BARON TWEEDSMUIR (1875-1940), author. Private secretary to the high commissioner of S. Africa, 1901-3; on H.Q. staff of British Army, France, 1916-17; director of information under the prime minister, 1917-18; governor-general of Canada, 1935-40. Among his writings are: 'Montrose' (1913, 1928), 'Sir Walter Scott' (1932), 'Julius Caesar' (1932), 'Oliver Cromwell' (1934). His novels include: 'Thirty-Nine Steps' (1915), 'Greenmantle' (1916), 'Mr. Standfast' (1919), 'Midwinter' (1923), 'Dancing Floor' (1926), 'The Blanket of the Dark' (1931), 'Gap in the Curtain' (1932).

BUCHANAN, GEORGE (1506-82), born at Killearn in Stirlingshire, studied at St. Andrews and Paris, and became tutor to a natural son of James V. He satirized the Franciscans, thus provoking Cardinal Beaton, and was imprisoned at St. Andrews. Escaping thence he went to the Continent, became a professor at Bordeaux, where he had Montaigne among his pupils, and in 1547 was invited to teach in the university of Coimbra, but was imprisoned by the Inquisition, 1549-51. After some years in France he returned to Scotland and professed himself a protestant. He became a bitter enemy of Mary, in consequence of the murder of Darnley, and vouched that the Casket Letters were in her handwriting. He wrote his 'Detectio Mariae Reginae' in 1571. He was tutor to James VI and I during 1570-8. Chief among his many writings are his Latin poem 'De Sphaera', an exposition of the Ptolemaic system as against that advocated by Copernicus, and his Latin 'Rerum Scotticarum Historia' (1582), which for long was regarded as a standard authority. His first elegy 'Quam misera sit conditio doctentium literas humaniores Lutetiae', describes the hard lot of the student at Paris.

BUCHANAN, ROBERT WILLIAMS (1841-1901), poet and novelist, the son of a socialist and secularist tailor who owned several socialistic journals in Glasgow. He came to London in 1860, and made his reputation by 'London Poems' in 1866, 'Master Spirits' (1874), and 'Ballads of Life, Love, and Humour' (1882). He satirized Swinburne and others in 'The Session of the Poets' in the 'Spectator' (1866), and attacked the Pre-Raphaelites (q.v.) in the 'Contemporary' (1871) in a pseudonymous article entitled 'The Fleshly School of Poetry', which led to a prolonged controversy. Of his novels (all now forgotten) the principal are 'The Shadow of the Sword' (1876) and 'God and the Man' (1881). He wrote many plays, of which the chief successes were 'Alone in London' (1884), 'A Man's Shadow' (1889), 'The Charlatan' (1894), 'The Strange Adventures of Miss Brown' (1895).

Buchanan and Targe, in J. Moore's 'Zeluco' (q.v.), the Scotsmen who quarrel about Mary Queen of Scots.

Bucket, INSPECTOR, the detective in Dickens's 'Bleak House' (q.v.).

Buckeye State, Ohio, see United States.

BUCKHURST, LORD, see Sackville (T.) and Sackville (C.).

Buckingham: the line, 'Off with his head! So much for Buckingham', occurs, not in the Shakespearian text, but in Colley Cibber's version of 'Richard III' (III. 1).

Buckingham, Complaint of, see Complaint of Buckingham.

Buckingham, GEORGE VILLIERS, first duke of (1592-1628), the favourite of James I, by whom he was familiarly known as 'Steenie', figures in Scott's 'Fortunes of Nigel' (q.v.). He was assassinated by John Felton.

Buckingham, GEORGE VILLIERS, second duke of (1628-87), a prominent figure in the reign of Charles II and an influential member of the Cabal, was the Zimri of Dryden's 'Absalom and Achitophel' (q.v.). He was author of the burlesque 'The Rehearsal' (q.v.), 1671, and of other verses and satires. He figures in Scott's 'Peveril of the Peak' (q.v.).

BUCKINGHAM, JAMES SILK (1786-1855), architect and traveller, and founder of the 'Athenaeum' (q.v.).

Buckingham Palace, in London, stands on the site of an old mulberry garden planted in 1609 by order of James I, which became a favourite place of popular resort. It was bought in 1703 by the duke of Buckingham, who built, or rebuilt, a house in the garden. It was bought in 1762 by George III (and then known as 'Queen's House'), and the house was rebuilt in 1825 by John Nash the architect, whose large gateway, known as the 'Marble Arch', was in 1851 transferred to its present position. Queen Victoria made Buckingham Palace the most usual royal residence in London.

BUCKLAND

BUCKLAND, FRANCIS TREVELYAN (1826-80), naturalist, educated at Winchester and Christ Church, Oxford, published 'Curiosities of Natural History' and kindred works, and started 'Land and Water' in 1866.

Bucklaw, THE LAIRD OF, Frank Hayston, a character in Scott's 'The Bride of Lammermoor' (q.v.).

BUCKLE, HENRY THOMAS (1821-62), received no school or college training and devoted himself to travelling on the Continent, where he acquired the principal languages. The first volume of his 'History of Civilization in England' appeared in 1857 and the second in 1861. These were only to be introductory portions of a far larger work, which the author's premature death at Damascus prevented him from executing. Buckle criticized the methods of previous historians and sought to adopt a more scientific basis, with special regard to the physical conditions of various countries, such as their climate and soil. In the second volume he illustrated his method by applying it to the history of Spanish civilization from the 5th to the 19th, and of Scottish civilization to the 18th cent.

Bucklersbury, a street off Cheapside, in the City of London. Stow says that its western end was 'possessed of Grocers and Apothecaries', which explains the following:

'Like a many of these lispng hawthorn-buds, that come like women in men's apparel, and smell like Bucklersbury in simple-time.'

(Shakespeare, 'Merry Wives', III. iii. 87.)

The name was originally BUKERELSBURY, from the name of an old city family.

Bucolic, from Greek βουκόλος, herdsman, means pastoral; and the plural, BUCOLICS, pastoral poems.

Buddha, 'the Enlightened', the title given by the adherents of one of the great Asiatic religions, thence called BUDDHISM, to the founder of their faith, Sakyamuni, Gautama, or Siddhartha, who flourished in northern India in the 5th cent. B.C. Sakyamuni is regarded as only the latest of a series of Buddhas or infallible religious teachers, which is hereafter to be continued indefinitely. [OED.] He was the son of the king of Kapilavastu (at the foot of the mountains of Nepal). Finding salvation neither in the teaching nor in the austerities of the Brahmins, he developed by long meditations his own religion, which he expounded at various places in India, making many disciples. The principal doctrines of Buddhism are, that suffering is inseparable from existence, which is an evil; that the principal cause of suffering is desire; that the suppression of suffering can be obtained by the suppression of desire, and this in turn by Buddhist discipline, of which nirvana is the reward. Nirvana is the extinction of individual existence and absorption into the supreme spirit.

BULBUL

BUDGE, EUSTACE (1686-1737), a cousin of Addison, a miscellaneous writer who contributed to the 'Spectator' and is alluded to by Pope in the 'Dunciad'.

Buffalo Bill, the name under which William Cody (1846-1917) obtained a world-wide fame. He was born in Iowa, worked as a herder in the western plains, and served as hospital orderly in the Civil War. His fame as a scout, slayer of Indians, and terror of bandits was largely fictitious, the result of the works of the American novelist Ned Buntline and of the press campaign of John Burke. He achieved great success in Europe with his 'Wild West Show' and was lionized in England in consequence of his spurious fame and striking appearance. But the tide of prosperity passed away, and though Cody struggled on gamely to the last, he died in poverty and comparative obscurity. The T.L.S. of 17 Oct. 1929 contains an interesting article on the 'Legend of Buffalo Bill', from which the above facts are taken.

Buffle, SIR RAFFLE, a character in Trollope's 'Small House at Allington' and 'Last Chronicles of Barset', John Eames's blustering official chief.

BUFFON, GEORGES LOUIS LECLERC DE (1707-88), French naturalist, was keeper of the king's botanical garden, and author of a remarkable 'Histoire Naturelle' in thirty-six volumes (1749-88), a pioneer work, in which he deals not only with natural history, but with mineralogy and such questions as the origin of the earth.

Buffone, CARLO, in Jonson's 'Every Man out of his Humour' (q.v.), 'a public scurrilous profane jester', perhaps intended to designate John Marston (q.v.).

Our word BUFFOON is derived through the French 'bouffon' from the Italian 'buffone', a jester (buffa, a jest, buffare to puff, either in the sense of something light and frivolous, or with reference to puffing out the cheeks as a comic gesture).

Bufs, THE, the East Kent Regiment, the old 3rd Foot regiment of the line, so called from the buff facings of its uniform.

Bufo, a character in Pope's 'Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot' (q.v., ll. 230-48). It is uncertain whom it represents.

Bug Bible, a name given to versions of the English Bible (Coverdale's and Matthew's) in which the words in Psalm xci. 5 are translated 'thou shalt not be afraid for any bugs by night'.

Buhl, see Boule.

Bukton, a friend of Chaucer, to whom he addressed an 'Envoy', of some interest for the light it throws on the author.

Bulbo, PRINCE, a character in Thackeray's 'Rose and the Ring' (q.v.).

Bulbul, a bird of the thrush family, much admired in the East for its song; hence sometimes called the 'nightingale' of the East.

BULL

Bull, from Latin bullā, the leaden seal attached to the Pope's edicts, and hence a papal or episcopal edict. The word is applied to a non-episcopal edict in 'the Golden Bull', a decree issued by Charles IV in 1356 to regulate the election and coronation of an emperor.

Bull, an expression containing a manifest contradiction in terms or involving a ludicrous inconsistency unperceived by the speaker. The origin of the term is unknown. No foundation appears for the guess that it originated in a contemptuous allusion to papal edicts or for the assertion of the 'British Apollo' (1708, no. 22) that 'it became a Proverb from the repeated Blunders of one Obadiah Bull, a Lawyer of London, who lived in the reign of K. Henry the Seventh' (OED.). Often associated with the Irish.

Bull, JOHN, see John Bull.

Bull, DR. JOHN (1563?–1628), composer, singing-man of the Chapel Royal (1585), and professor of music at Gresham College (1597–1607). He was subsequently (1617–28) organist of Antwerp Cathedral. See National Anthem.

Bull Run, the name of a small river or creek in eastern Virginia, the scene of two important battles in the American Civil War, in 1861 and 1862. The Federals were severely defeated in both battles.

Bull-dogs, the colloquial name of the 'University Police', the Proctors' attendants at the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge Bulls of Basan, see Bashan.

Bully Bluck, see Magog Wrath.

Bulstrode, MR., a character in George Eliot's 'Middlemarch' (q.v.).

Bultitude, MR. and DICK, characters in F. Anstey's 'Vice Versa' (q.v.).

Bumble, the beadle in Dickens's 'Oliver Twist' (q.v.), a type of the consequential, domineering parish official.

Bumby, MOTHER, a fortune-teller frequently alluded to by the Elizabethan dramatists. Lyly (q.v.) wrote a play entitled, 'Mother Bombie' (1594), which is, says Hazlitt, 'very much what its name would import, old, quaint, and vulgar', 'little else than a tissue of absurd mistakes, arising from the confusion of the different characters one with another, like another Comedy of Errors, and ends in their being (most of them) married . . . to the persons they most dislike'.

Bumper, SIR HARRY, in Sheridan's 'School for Scandal' (q.v.), one of Charles Surface's convivial companions, who sings the famous song:

'Here's to the maiden of bashful fifteen.'

Bumppo, NATTY, see Cooper (J. Fenimore).

Bunbury, an imaginary character introduced by Wilde (q.v.) in his play 'The Importance of being Earnest', where Bunbury serves as an excuse for visits to various places.

BUNBURY, HENRY WILLIAM (1750–1811), a Norfolk squire, is remembered as a great caricaturist, and as the author of the 'Academy for Grown Horsemen . . . by Geoffrey Gambado', 'Master of the Horse to the Doge of Venice', a humorous work illustrated by his own comic plates, and an early example of the literature of sport.

Bunce, JACK, alias ALTAMONT, ex-actor and pirate in Scott's 'The Pirate' (q.v.).

Bunce, PETER, one of the bedesmen in Trollope's 'The Warden' (q.v.).

Bunch, MOTHER, an ale-wife of London, well known in the 16th cent. There is a reference to her in Nash's 'Pierce Penniless', in Dekker's 'Satiromastix' (l. 1178), and in 'The Weakest goeth to the Wall' (attributed to Webster). The name of 'Mother Bunch' was adopted in the title of many 17th-cent. books of anecdotes and jests.

Buncle, John, see John Buncle.

Bungay and Bacon, the rival publishers in Thackeray's 'Pendennis' (q.v.). Bungay is there proprietor of the (fictitious) 'Pall Mall Gazette'.

Bungay, THOMAS, known as 'Friar Bungay' (fl. 1290), a Franciscan, who was divinity lecturer of his order in Oxford and Cambridge. He was vulgarly accounted a magician and is frequently referred to in that capacity. See Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay. FRIAR BUNGEY, an astrologer, figures in Lytton's 'The Last of the Barons' (q.v.).

Bungay Castle, in Suffolk. When Hugh Bigot in Henry II's reign added fortifications to his Castle of Bungay, he gave out this rhyme, therein vaunting it impregnable:

Were I in my castle of Bungay
Upon the river of Waveney
I would ne care for the King of Cockney.'
Ray's 'Proverbs', p. 251 (ed. 1768).

Bunlon, ROSA, in Thackeray's 'Mrs. Perkins's Ball' (q.v.), poetess, author of 'Heart-strings', 'Passion Flowers', &c., who loves waltzing even beyond poesy, and lobster salad as much as either.

Bunker's Hill, more correctly Breed's Hill, a height near Boston in America, where in 1775 an English force, after severe fighting, compelled the withdrawal of the American insurgents.

Bunkum, BUNCOMBE, empty clap-trap oratory, from Buncombe, the name of a county in N. Carolina, U.S. The use of the word originated near the close of the debate on the 'Missouri Question' in the 16th congress, when the member for this district rose to speak, and persevered in spite of impatient calls for the 'Question', declaring he was bound to make a speech for Buncombe. [OED 1]

BUNSBY

Bunby, CAPTAIN JOHN, a character in Dickens's 'Dombey and Son' (q.v.), a friend of Captain Cuttle.

Bunthorne, REGINALD, the principal male character in Gilbert and Sullivan's comic opera 'Patience', 'a fleshly poet' in whose person the 'Aesthetic Movement' of the eighties was caricatured.

BUNYAN, JOHN (1628-88), born at Elstow, near Bedford, the son of a tinsmith, learned reading and writing at the village school and was early set to his father's trade. On completing his sixteenth year he was drafted into the parliamentary army and was stationed at Newport Pagnell from 1644 to 1646 under the command of Sir Samuel Luke, an experience perhaps reflected in his 'The Holy War'. In 1653 he joined a Nonconformist church in Bedford, preached there, and came into conflict with the Quakers, against whom he published his first writings, 'Some Gospel Truths opened' (1656), and 'A Vindication' thereof (1657). He had profited by two religious books belonging to his first wife (who died c. 1656, leaving four young children) and devoted himself to reading the Bible. 'I was never out of the Bible either by reading or meditation.' He married his second wife, Elizabeth, c. 1659, and was arrested in November 1660 for preaching without a licence. Refusing to comply with the law, he was kept in prison for twelve years, until Charles II's Declaration of Indulgence. During the first half of this period he wrote nine of his books, the principal of which was his 'Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners' (q.v., 1666). In the same year appeared 'The Holy City, or the New Jerusalem', inspired by a passage in the book of Revelation. After this he wrote no more until, in 1671, he published 'A Confession of my Faith, and a Reason of my Practice'. After his release in 1672 he was appointed pastor to the same church in Bedford, but was again imprisoned for a short period, during which he wrote the first part of 'The Pilgrim's Progress from this World to that which is to come' (q.v.). The second part, with the whole work, was published in 1678. His other principal works are 'The Life and Death of Mr. Badman' (q.v., 1680), and 'The Holy War' (q.v., 1682). Bunyan preached in many places, but was not further molested. He was buried in Bunhill Fields, London.

Burana Carmina, see Carmina Burana.

Burbage, JAMES (d. 1597), actor, was a joiner by trade. He was one of the earl of Leicester's players in 1574. He leased land in Shoreditch (1576), on which he erected, of wood, the first building in England specially intended for plays. In 1596 he acquired a house in Blackfriars, and converted it into the 'Blackfriars Theatre' (q.v.). He lived in Halliwell Street, Shoreditch, 1576-97. The first English playhouse is mentioned in an order of council, August 1577, and was known as 'The Theatre'; the fabric was removed, c. December 1598, to the Bankside and set up as the Globe Theatre (q.v.).

Burbage, RICHARD (1567?-1619), actor, was son of James Burbage (q.v.), from whom he inherited a share in Blackfriars Theatre and an interest in the Globe Theatre. He acted as a boy at the Theatre in Shoreditch and rose to be an actor of chief parts, 1595-1618, in plays by Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, and Beaumont and Fletcher. He excelled in tragedy. Burbage lived in Halliwell Street, Shoreditch, 1603-19. He is known also as a painter in oil-colours.

Burbon, SIR, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', v. xi, represents Henry of Navarre.

Burchell, MR., in Goldsmith's 'Vicar of Wakefield' (q.v.), the name assumed by Sir William Thornhill.

Burden of a song, from the Romanic bourdon, the continuous bass or 'drone' of a bagpipe, is the refrain or chorus, a set of words recurring at the end of each verse.

In the English Bible (e.g. Isa. xiii. 1, 'The burden of Babylon') 'burden' is used to render the Hebrew massa, which Gesenius would translate 'lifting up (of the voice), utterance, oracle'. But it is generally taken in English to mean a 'burdensome or heavy lot or fate' [OED].

BURGOYNE, SIR JOHN (1722-92), nicknamed 'Gentleman Johnny', remembered principally as the general who was forced to capitulate to the Americans at Saratoga in 1777, was the author of a clever and successful comedy 'The Heiress' (1786), in which the vulgarity of the rich Alscip family is contrasted with the native good breeding of Clifford, Lord Gayville, and his sister; while the temporary humiliation of the virtuous heroine, Miss Alton, who is driven to take service in the Alscip family, until she is discovered to be an heiress and Clifford's sister, provides a sentimental interest. He also wrote 'The Maid of the Oaks' (1774), a cheerful little comedy of country life. He figures in G. B. Shaw's play 'The Devil's Disciple' (1900).

Burgundy, at one time a kingdom, then an independent duchy, united to France in 1477 as one of its provinces (capital, Dijon). There was also a 'County' of Burgundy, Franche-Comté, ceded to France in 1678. Burgundy gives its name to a red wine of high quality and considerable potency. The best burgundies are produced along a narrow strip of the Côte d'Or, on the right as one drives from Dijon to Beaune and beyond. Famous among the best are Clos Vougeot, Romanée, Richebourg, and Chambertin (Napoleon's favourite wine). Corton, Beaune, and Pommard are sound, less eminent burgundies. The finest of the white burgundies is Montrachet. There is a reference to burgundy wine in England as early as Wycherley's 'Love in a Wood', l. ii (1672).

BURIAL OF SIR JOHN MOORE

Burial of Sir John Moore, The, see Wolfe.

Buridan, a French scholastic philosopher of the end of the 12th cent. to whom is attributed the sophism of the ass equally pressed by hunger and thirst and placed between a bundle of hay and a pail of water, who must die of hunger and thirst, having no determining motive to direct him to one or the other. 'Like Buridan's ass between two bundles of hay' is said of a person undecided between two courses of action, who adopts neither. According to tradition Buridan was thrown into the Seine in a sack (Villon, 'Ballade').

Burke, 'A Genealogical and Heraldic History of the Peerage and Baronetage of the United Kingdom', first compiled by John Burke and published in 1826. Since 1847 it has been published annually.

BURKE, EDMUND (1729-97), the second son of a Dublin attorney, who was a Protestant married to a Catholic wife. He was brought up as a Protestant, and educated at Trinity College, Dublin. He entered the Middle Temple in 1750. His first published works, 'A Vindication of Natural Society' (q.v.) and 'A Philosophical Inquiry into the Sublime and the Beautiful' (q.v.), appeared in 1756. In the same year he married Jane Nugent. He started the 'Annual Register' in 1759, and contributed to it till 1788. He became private secretary to the marquis of Rockingham in 1765, who from time to time helped him by advances of money and at his death directed that the bonds should be destroyed. Burke entered parliament as member for Wendover in the same year, and first spoke in the House in 1766 on the American question. During the following years he vehemently attacked the Tory government. He participated in stock-jobbing operations and remained in consequence involved in financial difficulties for the rest of his life, but bought an estate at Beaconsfield in 1768, before the crash came. He published his 'Observations on "The Present State of the Nation"' (q.v.) in 1769, and 'Thoughts on the Present Discontents' (q.v.) in 1770. He became M.P. for Bristol on the invitation of the citizens in 1774, and made his speeches 'On American Taxation' and 'On Conciliation with the Colonies' in 1774 and 1775. His 'Letter to the Sheriffs of Bristol' (q.v.) was written in 1777, and his great speech against employing Indians in the war was made in 1778. His speech on economical reform was made in February 1780. His championship of free trade with Ireland and of Catholic emancipation lost him his seat at Bristol in 1780, and his 'Two Letters . . . to Gentlemen in the City of Bristol' (1778) and his 'Speech at the Guildhall, in Bristol' (1780), form a noble vindication of his attitude. He became M.P. for Malton in Yorkshire in 1781. By his attacks on the conduct of the American War he contributed powerfully to North's resignation of office. He became paymaster of the forces in 1782 but retired from the ministry with Fox, returning to the same post in 1783 under the coalition government. His sympathy with the Irish Catholics is shown by his letters 'To a Peer of Ireland on the Penal Laws' (1782) and 'To Sir Hercules Langrishe' (1792). He took an active part in the investigation of the affairs of the East India Company and became the relentless enemy of Warren Hastings (q.v.). His famous speeches on the East India Bill and 'On the Nabob of Arcot's Private Debts' were delivered in 1783 and 1785. He opened the case for the impeachment of Warren Hastings in 1788, and supported Wilberforce in advocating the abolition of the slave-trade in 1788-9. His 'Reflections on the French Revolution' (q.v.) appeared in 1790, followed by 'A Letter . . . to a Member of the National Assembly' (1791), and by 'An Appeal from the New to the Old Whigs' in 1791, a defence against the charge of inconsistency between his attitude towards the American colonies and his denunciation of the French Revolution. In the same year appeared 'Thoughts on French Affairs'; 'Remarks on the Policy of the Allies' in 1793; and the 'Letters on a Regicide Peace' (q.v.) in 1795-7. He retired from parliament in 1794 and received a pension from the ministry, for which he was criticized, chiefly by the duke of Bedford and earl of Lauderdale. He defended himself in his 'Letter to a Noble Lord' (q.v.) in 1796. His collected works were published in 1792-1827.

Burke's political life was devoted to five 'great, just, and honourable causes': the emancipation of the House of Commons from the control of George III and the 'King's friends'; the emancipation (but not the independence) of the American colonies; the emancipation of Irish trade, the Irish parliament, and the Irish Catholics; the emancipation of India from the misgovernment of the East India Company; and opposition to the atheistical jacobinism displayed in the French Revolution. An historical study of Burke was published by Lord Morley in 1867, and a life by him in the English Men of Letters series in 1879.

Burke, WILLIAM, the name of a notorious criminal executed at Edinburgh in 1829 for smothering many persons in order to sell their bodies for dissection (his accomplice was William Hare). Hence 'to burke' is to murder as Burke did, and, figuratively, to smother, 'hush up', suppress quietly.

Burleigh or Burghley, WILLIAM CECIL, LORD (1520-98), lord treasurer under Queen Elizabeth and her chief minister. He had previously been secretary to Lord Protector Somerset; secretary of state, 1550-3; and employed in negotiations by Queen Mary. He is introduced in Sheridan's 'The Critic' (q.v.), where, in Puff's tragedy, he comes on the stage and shakes his head, being too much occupied with cares of state to talk, whence the expression, 'Burleigh's nod'.

BURLESQUE

Burlesque, from Italian burla, ridicule, mockery, literary composition or dramatic representation which aims at exciting laughter by the comical treatment of a serious subject or the caricature of the spirit of a serious work. Notable examples of burlesque in English literature are Butler's 'Hudibras', and 'The Rehearsal' (q.v.).

Burlington House, London, was begun by the 1st earl of Burlington about 1664, and rebuilt in the Palladian style by the 3rd earl, the architect, about 1731. It was bought by the government in 1854. It houses the Royal Academy and various learned societies, including the British Academy. The name is often used to signify the Royal Academy.

Burman, Mrs., in Meredith's 'One of our Conquerors' (q.v.), Victor Radnor's wife.

BURNABY, FREDERICK GUSTAVUS (1842-85), cavalry officer and traveller, commanded the 3rd household cavalry, 1881-5; killed in the attempt to relieve Khartoum. He was author of 'A Ride to Khiva' (1876).

BURNAND, SIR FRANCIS COWLEY (1836-1917), educated at Eton and Trinity College, Cambridge, had a vocation for the stage which manifested itself in the production of a large number of burlesques, notably 'Black-eyed Susan' (1866), 'Cox and Box' (1867), and 'The Colonel' (1881). He contributed to 'Punch' from 1863 and joined the staff; his 'Happy Thoughts' (1866) proved one of the most popular series in that periodical. He was editor of 'Punch', 1880-1906.

Burne-Jones, Sir Edward Coley (1833-98), an eminent painter of the romantic school, a friend of D. G. Rossetti and W. Morris (q.v.); famous for his pictures ('King Cophetua', &c.), designs for stained-glass windows, and other decorative work.

Burnell the Ass, the hero of the 'Speculum Stultorum' of Wireker (q.v.). Burnell, an ass who wishes to acquire a larger tail, goes to Salerno and to Paris to study, meets with various adventures, and finally loses his tail altogether. In the course of these travels he hears the story to which Chaucer alludes in the 'Nun's Priest's Tale' (l. 492):

I have read well in Dan Burnell the Ass,
Among his verse, how that there was a cock,
For that a priest's son gave him a knock
Upon his leg, while he was young and nice,
He made him for to lose his benefice.

The story is that Gundulf, driving some chicks from the granary, struck a cockerel and broke its leg. The cock bided its time. On the day on which Gundulf was to receive his father's benefice, he was to start at cock-crow for the town where the installation was to take place. But the cock that day failed to crow; Gundulf was late, and lost his benefice. In the main narrative, the Ass represents the monk who is discontented with his lot.

BURNET, GILBERT (1643-1715), educated at Marischal College, Aberdeen, was a popular preacher and was offered four bishoprics before he was twenty-nine. These he refused, and in 1674 was dismissed from the post of king's chaplain for remonstrating with Charles II for his profligacy. He was chaplain to Mary when she was still Princess of Orange. He became Bishop of Salisbury in 1689 under William III. He published his account of the death-bed repentance of Rochester (q.v.), 'Some passages in the Life and Death of the right honourable John Earl of Rochester', in 1680, and his 'History of the Reformation in England', vol. i in 1679, vol. ii in 1681, vol. iii in 1714. His 'Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles' appeared in 1699, and his best-known work, 'The History of My Own Times', posthumously (1724-34). Other notable works by Burnet were the 'Memoires of the . . . Dukes of Hamilton' (1677), the 'Life of Sir Matthew Hale' (1682), and the 'Journal of Lord Russell's last week' (first published in the 'General Dictionary', 1739, and subsequently in the 'Life of William Lord Russell', 1819).

BURNET, THOMAS (1635?-1715), a Yorkshire divine and master of the Charterhouse. He was the author of 'The Sacred Theory of the Earth' (1684-90), an imaginative and romantic cosmogony, suggested to him by a voyage across the Alps. It contains, particularly in the third book, descriptive passages that are highly sonorous and magnificent. The work was much praised by Addison in No. 146 of the 'Spectator'.

BURNETT, FRANCES ELIZA HODGSON (1849-1924), writer of popular stories, born in Manchester, emigrated to the United States in her youth. Best known as the author of 'Little Lord Fauntleroy'.

BURNEY, FRANCES, MADAME D'ARBLAY (1752-1840), daughter of Dr. Burney, the historian of music, lived during her youth in the midst of that literary society which included Dr. Johnson and Burke. In 1778 she published her first novel 'Evelina' (q.v.) anonymously, but the revelation of its authorship brought her into prominence, and she was appointed second keeper of the robes to Queen Charlotte (1786). Being broken in health, she with difficulty obtained permission to retire. In 1793 she married General D'Arblay, a French refugee in England. From 1802 to 1812 she was interned by Napoleon and lived in France. The last part of her life was spent in England. Her second novel 'Cecilia' (q.v.) was published in 1782, 'Camilla' (q.v.) in 1796, 'The Wanderer' in 1814. She edited her father's 'Memoirs' in 1832. Her 'Early Diary' (1768-78), with pleasant sketches of Johnson and Garrick, was published in 1889, and her later 'Diary and Letters' (1778-1840), which gives an interesting account of her life at court, in 1842-6. Miss Burney was the originator of the simple novel of home life, taking as her theme the entry into the world of a young girl of virtue and understanding, but inexperienced, and exposing her to circumstances and incidents that develop her character, and display the various droll persons with whom she comes in contact.

Burning Babe, The, see Southwell.

BURNS, ROBERT (1759-96), born at Alloway in Ayrshire, was the son of a cottar, and was educated by his father. Set to work as a farm labourer, he early developed an inclination for literature, and also a tendency to dissipation. From 1784 to 1788 he farmed 118 acres in partnership with his brother Gilbert at Mossgiel, and during this period wrote some of his best work: 'The Cotter's Saturday Night', 'The Twa Dogs', 'Hallow-eeen', 'The Jolly Beggars' (a cantata descriptive of a vagabonds' festival), 'To a Mouse', 'To a Mountain Daisy', and some of his keenest satires, 'Death and Dr. Hornbook' (against a village apothecary) and 'Holy Willie's Prayer' (against a self-righteous elder of Mauchline). In 1786, in order to obtain the passage-money for a voyage to Jamaica, where a post on a plantation had been offered him, he published the Kilmarnock edition of his early poems. It made him famous, and took him for a time to Edinburgh, where his modesty, the charm and ease of his conversation, and his conviviality, made him very popular. The second edition of his poems (published by William Creech) brought him £500 and enabled him to settle down on a small farm at Ellisland and to marry Jean Armour, one of his many loves (another had been Alison Begbie, 'Mary Morison', who rejected him; and another Mary Campbell, a Glasgow skipper's daughter, who died, and was the subject of his 'To Mary in Heaven'). Burns also received an exciseman's place, which after the failure of his farm was his principal means of support. Apart from songs, he now wrote little of importance ('Tam o' Shanter', q.v., and 'Captain Matthew Henderson' are the chief exceptions). He contributed some 200 songs, new or adapted, to the successive volumes of James Johnson's 'Scots Musical Museum' (1787-1803), among others the famous 'Auld Lang Syne' (q.v.), 'Scots wha hae', 'A Red, Red Rose', and 'It was a' for our Richtfu' King'. In 1792 he also accepted an invitation from George Thomson to supply songs for his 'Scottish Airs with Poetry'. Among his many beautiful lyrics may be mentioned 'John Anderson, my Jo', 'Comin' thro' the Rye', 'The Banks of Doon', and 'Mary Morison'. In a different category fall the humorous vernacular 'Address to the Deil', 'To a Louse', and 'The Auld Farmer's New Year Salutation to his Mare Maggie', a delightful retrospect of a long association between man and beast.

The sympathy that Burns had at first manifested for the French revolutionaries brought him into bad odour with the authorities and nearly cost him his place; while his inclination to convivial living undermined his health.

BUSIRANE

In the last two years of his life he began to see through the aims of France. His last ballad, 'Does haughty Gaul invasion threat?' shows his patriotic spirit; he joined the Dumfriesshire Volunteers in 1794 and was buried with military honours. See also Sylvander.

Burrough, STEPHEN and WILLIAM, see Borough.

BURTON, JOHN HILL (1809-81), educated at Aberdeen, wrote much for Edinburgh booksellers, reviews, and newspapers, and made his mark by a life of David Hume (1846). He published a 'History of Scotland' (1853, 1867-70), 'The Book-hunter' (1862), 'The Scot Abroad' (1864), and many other treatises and editions, chiefly historical.

BURTON, SIR RICHARD FRANCIS (1821-90), matriculated at Trinity College, Oxford, but joined the Indian Army in 1842 without graduating. His Indian experiences are recorded in 'Scinde, or the Unhappy Valley' (1851); his experiences in Africa, where he travelled with Speke, in 'First Footsteps in East Africa' (1856) and 'The Lake Region of Central Africa' (1860). He was one of the first Englishmen to visit Mecca, making the pilgrimage in disguise, and published his narrative thereof in 1855-6. After many other travels in Africa and America, recorded in various volumes, he devoted himself to literature and published his translation of the 'Arabian Nights' (q.v.) in 1885-8. Burton also wrote a translation of the 'Lusiads' of Camoens (q.v., 1881). He was consul at Damascus, 1869-71; and at Trieste (1872), where he died.

BURTON, ROBERT (1577-1640), educated at Nuneaton and Sutton Coldfield schools, and at Brasenose College and Christ Church, Oxford, became vicar of St. Thomas's, Oxford, and rector of Segrave, Leicestershire. He was author of the 'Anatomy of Melancholy' (q.v.).

BURY, RICHARD DE (1281-1345), named from his birthplace, Bury St. Edmunds, was tutor to Edward III when Prince of Wales, became bishop of Durham, and is celebrated as a patron of learning. He was an ardent collector of books, employing for this purpose members of the mendicant orders. He founded a library in Durham College, Oxford, and was author of 'Philobiblon', the autobiographical sketch in Latin of a lover of letters, first printed in 1473. An English translation was published in 1832.

Busby, RICHARD (1606-95), educated at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford, was a famous head master of Westminster School from 1638 to 1695. Among his pupils were Dryden, Locke, Atterbury, and Matthew Prior.

Busirane, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', III. xi and xii, the 'vile Enchaunter' symbolizing unlawful love. He is stricken down by Britomart in his castle and forced to release

Amoret. On the door of one of the rooms of the castle was written:

'Be bolde, be bolde, and everywhere, Be bold';

but on another iron door,

'Be not too bold.'

Busiris, a mythical king of Egypt, son of Poseidon, who sacrificed all strangers who came to the country. He was slain by Hercules. There was a city of Busiris (Abousir) in the Delta. Milton attributes the name Busiris to the Pharaoh of the Exodus ('Paradise Lost', i. 306).

Busiris, King of Egypt, a tragedy by Edward Young (q.v.).

Buskin, a word existing in many European languages, whose ultimate derivation is unknown. The special source of the English word is likewise uncertain. It is the word used for the high thick-soled boot (cothurnus) worn by actors in ancient Athenian tragedy, frequently contrasted with the 'sock' (soccus) or low shoe worn by comedians. Hence it is applied figuratively to the style or spirit of tragedy, the tragic vein. To put on the buskins, to write tragedy. [OED]

Bussy D'Ambois, a tragedy by Chapman (q.v.), published in 1607, and the most famous of the author's plays. It was severely criticized by Dryden.

Bussy D'Ambois (in real life, Louis de Bussy-d'Amboise), a man of insolence and fiery courage, is introduced to the court of Henri III of France by Monsieur, brother of the king, his protector. He quarrels with the king's courtiers, of whom he kills three in an encounter, and even with the Duc de Guise. He wins the favours of the wife of the count of Montsurry (Montsoreau), and this fact becoming known to Monsieur, who is also enamoured of the lady, is by him from jealousy revealed to Montsurry. The latter forces his wife by torture to send a letter summoning Bussy to her. On his arrival, Bussy is overpowered and killed.

The story is the same as that told by Dumas in 'La Dame de Montsoreau'. It is interesting that both writers make the same alteration of the actual fact, which was that, not Monsieur, but the king, who detested Bussy, revealed Bussy's amour to Montsoreau.

Bussy D'Ambois, The Revenge of, a tragedy by Chapman (q.v.), composed in 1610 or 1611, printed in 1613. The play is a sequel to the tragedy 'Bussy D'Ambois' (q.v.).

Clermont D'Ambois, brother of Bussy, a courageous stoical gentleman, close friend of the Duc de Guise, being urged by the ghost of his dead brother to avenge his murder, will only do so by the honourable method of a duel, for which he sends a challenge to the cowardly Montsurry, who evades it. Urged again by the ghost, he introduces himself to Montsurry's house, forces him to fight, and kills him. He then learns the assassination of his patron Guise, and refusing to live amid 'all the horrors of the vicious time', kills himself. The similarity of the play in certain respects to Shakespeare's 'Hamlet' is evident.

Busybody, The, a comedy by Mrs. Centlivre (q.v.), produced in 1709.

Sir George Airy and Miranda are in love with one another, but her guardian, Sir Francis Gripe, has the design of marrying her himself and believes that she loves him. The devices by which his intentions are defeated, and those by which Charles, Gripe's son, secures the hand of Isabinda, whom her father intends for a Spanish merchant, occupy the play. The character of Marplot, whose well-meant but misdirected interference constantly endangers the course of true love, has enriched the language with a name for the blundering busybody.

Butades, a sculptor of Sicyon, the reputed inventor of sculpture in relief.

Butcher, THE BLOODY, a term applied to the duke of Cumberland, second son of George II, on account of the cruelty with which, after Culloden, he suppressed the rebellion of 1745.

BUTLER, ALBAN (1711-73), educated at Douai, where he was subsequently professor of philosophy and divinity. In 1746 he was sent to England and became chaplain to the duke of Norfolk. He was president of the English college at St. Omer, 1768-73. He was author of 'The Lives of the . . . Principal Saints' (1756-9).

BUTLER, JOSEPH (1692-1752), was son of a Presbyterian linen-draper at Wantage, and was educated at Oriel College, Oxford. He was made rector of Haughton-le-Skerne in Durham in 1722, and in 1725 of Stanhope in the same county. In 1736 he was brought into prominence by being appointed clerk of the closet to the queen, and in 1738 bishop of Bristol, from which he was translated to Durham in 1750. In 1726 he published 'Fifteen Sermons' preached at the Rolls Chapel, in which he defines his moral philosophy, affirming an intuition theory of virtue. While recognizing benevolence and a due degree of self-love as elements in virtuous conduct, he regards conscience as governing and limiting them by considerations, not of happiness or misery, but of right and wrong. In 1736 appeared his 'Analogy of Religion' (q.v.), a defence of the Christian religion against the Deists by showing that their natural religion is open to the same objections as revelation. To this was added his essay, 'Of the Nature of Virtue'.

Butler, THE REV. REUBEN, in Scott's 'The Heart of Midlothian' (q.v.). Jeanie Deans's lover and husband.

BUTLER, SAMUEL ('Hudibras' Butler) (1612-80), born at Strensham in Worcestershire, the son of a farmer, and educated at the King's School, Worcester. As attendant on Elizabeth, countess of Kent, he became acquainted with Selden (q.v.). Nothing further is known of his life until 1661, when he was employed by the earl of Carbery. About 1673 he enjoyed the patronage of George Villiers, second duke of Buckingham, who, however, is satirized in his 'Characters' (on the model of those of Theophrastus, q.v., published in his 'Genuine Remains' in 1759) and his 'Hudibras' (q.v.). Of the latter work, Pt. I was published in 1663, Pt. II in 1664, and Pt. III in 1678. It was highly approved by Charles II, who gave the author £300 and later a pension of £100 a year; but Butler was perhaps for a time neglected, and was said to have died in penury. This is commemorated in the epigram on the monument erected to his memory in Westminster Abbey:

BUTLER

The Poets Fate is here in emblem shown:
He asked for Bread and he received a Stone.

Butler's verse also includes 'The Elephant in the Moon', a satire directed against Sir Paul Neale, of the Royal Society. The elephant turns out to be a mouse, which has got into the telescope. Butler's 'Genuine Remains in Verse and Prose' were edited in 1759 by Robert Thyer, and more completely by A. R. Waller and R. Lamar in 1908-28.

BUTLER, SAMUEL ('Erewhon' Butler) (1835-1902), the grandson of Dr. Samuel Butler (1774-1839), the great head master of Shrewsbury School and bishop of Lichfield, was educated at Shrewsbury and St. John's College, Cambridge. He abandoned the intention of taking holy orders and went to New Zealand in 1859, where he succeeded as a sheep-breeder, as recounted in his 'A First Year in Canterbury Settlement' (1863). He returned to England in 1864 and settled in Clifford's Inn. In 1872 he published 'Erewhon' (q.v.) and in 1873 'The Fair Haven', an ironic defence of Christian evidences. 'A Psalm of Montreal', a short satirical presentation of the conflict between Greek art and modern gospels, evoked by the discovery of a plaster cast of the Discobolus in a Montreal lumber-room, was written in Canada in 1875 and published in 1884. He next wrote a series of works of scientific controversy, 'Life and Habit' (1877), 'Evolution Old and New' and 'God the Known and God the Unknown' (1879), 'Unconscious Memory' (1880), 'Luck or Cunning' (1887), and 'The Deadlock in Darwinism'. His general attitude in these was one of protest against the Darwinian banishment of mind from the universe; and he maintained the transmissibility, by heredity, of acquired habits. He published in 1881 'Alps and Sanctuaries of Piedmont and the Ticino', a delightful travel-book combining wit and humour with a keen appreciation of beauty of scenery and the character of the people; and in 1888 'Ex Voto', on the Sacro Monte of Varallo-Sesia. In 1896 appeared his 'Life and Letters of Dr. Samuel

BYRON

Butler', his grandfather. Meanwhile Butler had developed a keen interest in Homer, which led to his theory of the feminine authorship of the 'Odyssey' and its origin at Trapani in Sicily. On the latter subject he published an article in 1893; 'The Authoress of the Odyssey' appeared in 1897, and translations of the 'Iliad' and the 'Odyssey' into a vigorous homely prose in 1898 and 1900. 'Shakespeare's Sonnets Reconsidered' appeared in 1899, and 'Erewhon Revisited' (q.v.) in 1901. Butler's autobiographical novel, 'The Way of All Flesh' (q.v.), was published posthumously in 1903, and selections from his note-books in 1912, under the title, 'The Note-books of Samuel Butler'.

Butler was pre-eminently a satirist, who waged war against the torpor of thought, the suppression of originality, the hypocrisies and conventions, that he saw around him.

Button's Coffee-house, the rival of Will's (q.v.), stood in Russell Street, Covent Garden. It was frequented by Dryden, Addison, Steele, and Pope. Button was an old servant of Addison's.

By-Ends, MR., in Bunyan's 'Pilgrim's Progress' (q.v.), 'a very arch fellow, a downright hypocrite; one that would be religious, which way ever the world went: but so cunning, that he would be sure never to lose or suffer for it'.

Byng, ADMIRAL JOHN (1704-57), was sent in 1756 to relieve Port Mahon in Minorca, which was threatened by a French fleet. He was repulsed, sentenced by court-martial for neglect of duty, and shot at Portsmouth. Voltaire wrote, in 'Candide' (1759), 'Il est bon de tuer de temps en temps un amiral pour encourager les autres'.

BYROM, JOHN (1692-1763), educated at Merchant Taylors' School and a fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. He taught shorthand in Manchester, where he chiefly lived, and elsewhere, and wrote, besides a quantity of religious verse, a pleasant anapaestic 'Pastoral' celebrating the daughter of Richard Bentley (q.v.), with whom he fell in love. He was a Jacobite and an enthusiastic admirer of W. Law (q.v.) and turned some of his teaching into verse, introducing the anapaest with strange effect. His 'Private Journal and Literary Remains' throw much light on Law's character. Byrom wrote the hymn, 'Christians, awake! Salute the happy morn'.

BYRON, GEORGE GORDON, 6th Baron (1788-1824), son of Captain John Byron, a profligate, and Catherine Gordon of Gight, was born in London and came into the title

BYRON

when ten years old. He had unexpectedly become heir-presumptive in 1794, in consequence of the fifth baron's grandson falling in action in Corsica. He was educated at Harrow and Trinity College, Cambridge. While at Cambridge he printed his 'Hours of Idleness' (at first named 'Juvenilia'), published in 1807, which were severely criticized in the 'Edinburgh Review'. To this criticism he replied, in 1809, in 'English Bards and Scotch Reviewers' (q.v.). From 1809 to 1811 he travelled abroad, visiting Portugal, Spain, Greece, and the Levant, and addressing 'Maid of Athens' to Theresa Macri. On his return he took his seat in the Lords, and in 1812 published the first two cantos of 'Childe Harold' (q.v.). During the next four years appeared 'The Giaour', 'The Bride of Abydos', 'The Corsair', 'Lara', 'Parisina', 'The Siege of Corinth', and 'Hebrew Melodies' (all dealt with under their titles), also 'The Dream', a beautiful visionary poem in blank verse. In 1815 Byron married Anne Isabella Milbanke, an heiress, from whom he was separated in 1816. He thereupon left England, never to return, embittered by the strictures of what he regarded as a hypocritical society. In company part of the time with the Shelleys, he travelled to Switzerland and Venice, which, with Ravenna, Pisa, and Genoa, became his head-quarters. Canto iii of 'Childe Harold' appeared in 1816, canto iv in 1818. In 1817 appeared 'The Lament of Tasso', a dramatic soliloquy, expressing the poet's passionate love and regret, as he lies in prison, for Leonora d'Este. Byron wrote the first five cantos of 'Don Juan' (q.v.) in 1818-20; 'Beppo' (q.v.) appeared in 1818. In 1819 began his connexion with Teresa, Countess Guiccioli, who lived with him for a time at Venice, and whom he followed to Ravenna. While there and subsequently at Pisa he wrote his dramas, the principal of which are 'Manfred', 'Cain', 'Marino Faliero', 'The Two Foscari', 'Sardanapalus', 'Heaven and Earth' (dealt with under their titles); also 'Mazeppa' (q.v.), 'The Prophecy of Dante' (a dramatic soliloquy embodying the poet's vision of the future liberation of Italy), and the later cantos of the unfinished 'Don Juan'. In 1822 Byron and Leigh Hunt joined in the production of 'The Liberal' magazine. The first number contained Byron's 'The Vision of Judgment' (q.v.), an outcome of his feud with Southey. The second contained 'Heaven and Earth'; and the fourth, Byron's translation of the first canto of Pulci's 'Morgante Maggiore'. No further numbers appeared. In 1823 Byron set out to join the Greek insurgents, and died of fever at Missolonghi in April 1824. His last works include the tragedy 'Werner' (q.v., 1823), the beautiful romantic verse tale 'The Island' (q.v., 1823), 'The Age of Bronze' (1823), a satirical poem inspired by the Congress of Verona, and 'The Deformed Transformed' (q.v.), an unfinished drama (1824). Byron's body was brought home from Greece and buried at Hucknall Torkard, in Nottinghamshire, near his family seat.

Byron's poetry, though much criticized on moral grounds, was immensely popular at home, and also abroad, where it exerted great influence on the Romantic movement. This popularity it owed to the author's persistent attacks on 'cant political, religious, and moral', to the novelty of his oriental scenery, to the romantic character of the Byronic hero (constantly reappearing in successive works), and to the ease and fluency, and (very frequently) the real beauty, of his verse.

Byron, HARRIET, the heroine of Richardson's 'Sir Charles Grandison' (q.v.).

BYRON, JOHN (1723-86), as a midshipman on the 'Wager', one of the ships of Lord Anson's squadron in his famous voyage, was wrecked on an island off the coast of Chile in 1741. His 'Narrative' of the shipwreck, published in 1768, was used by his grandson, Lord Byron, in his description of the storm and wreck in 'Don Juan'.

Byron, The Conspiracy and Tragedy of Charles Duke of, a double play by Chapman (q.v.), published in 1608.

The play deals with the intrigues of Charles Gontaut, Duc de Biron, a brave soldier who had fought successfully and been nobly rewarded by Henri IV of France, but whose overweening ambition made him disloyal to the king. His plots are discovered, he asks forgiveness and is pardoned. But his restless ambition makes him prepare a new conspiracy, which is revealed to the king. He is arrested and condemned to death. He professes his innocence and is reduced to frenzy and despair when he realizes that he is to die.

Byronic, characteristic of or resembling Lord Byron (q.v.) or his poetry, that is to say, contemptuous of and rebelling against conventional morality, or defying fate, or possessing the characteristics of Byron's romantic heroes, or imitating his dress and appearance; 'posturing statuesque pathetic', as Meredith describes it; 'a man proud, moody, cynical, with defiance on his brow, and misery in his heart, a scorner of his kind, implacable in revenge, yet capable of deep and strong affection' (Macaulay, 'Byron').

BYWATER, INGRAM (1840-1914), educated at University College School and King's College School, London, and at Queen's College, Oxford, and a fellow of Exeter College, was an eminent Greek scholar. He succeeded Jowett as Regius professor of Greek in 1893. He had acquired a European reputation by his edition (1877) of the Fragments of Heraclitus. His monumental edition of the 'Poetics' of Aristotle appeared in 1909. He made important contributions to the OED., and guided the critical methods of the editors of the long series of Oxford Classical Texts.

Byzantine, the word used to designate the art, and especially the architecture, developed in the Eastern division of the Roman Empire.

BYZANTINE

This Eastern division endured from the partition of the Empire between the two sons of Theodosius in A.D. 395 to the capture of Constantinople, its capital, formerly known as Byzantium, by the Turks in 1453. The Byzantine architecture is distinguished by its use of the round arch, cross, circle, dome, and rich mosaic ornament. St. Mark's at Venice is a prominent example.

CADENUS AND VANESSA

The 'Byzantine historians' are those who lived in the Eastern Empire from the 6th to the 15th cents.

Ça ira, the name of a celebrated French revolutionary song, of which the refrain is Ah! ça ira, ça ira!

Les aristocrates à la lanterne!

It is said to have originated in the hopeful reply, 'Ça ira', of Benjamin Franklin to a question about the prospects of the American republic in the War of Independence.

Caaba, see Kaaba.

Cabal, from the Hebrew word qabbalah (see Cabbala), a secret intrigue of a sinister character formed by a small body of persons, or a small body of persons engaged in such an intrigue; in British history applied specially to the five ministers of Charles II who signed the treaty of alliance with France for war against Holland in 1672; these were Clifford, Arlington, Buckingham, Ashley, and Lauderdale, the initials of whose names thus arranged happened to form the word cabal. [OED.]

Cabbala, from the Hebrew qabbalah, tradition, a Jewish tradition of the mystical interpretation of the Scriptures, a reaction from the rationalism of the school of Maimonides (q.v.), developed between the 9th and 13th cents., comprising the 'Sepher Yezirah' ('Book of Creation') and the 'Zohar' ('Splendour'). These mystic doctrines included the existence of 'Sephiroth', realized abstractions or emanations, by which the infinite entered into relations with the finite; and the belief that the letters of the biblical text, converted into numbers, may be manipulated in such a way as to reveal hidden truths. There is perhaps a trace of this in the number of the Beast in Rev. xiii. 18.

CABELL, JAMES BRANCH (1879-), American novelist, born at Richmond, Virginia. His chief works are: 'The Rivet in Grandfather's Neck' (1915), 'Jurgen' (1919), 'Figures of Earth' (1921), 'The High Place' (1923), 'The Silver Stallion' (1926), 'Something about Eve' (1927).

CABLE, GEORGE WASHINGTON (1844-1925), American novelist, author of some charming stories of the old Creole society of Louisiana, including 'Old Creole Days' (1879), 'The Grandissimes' (1880), and 'Madame Delphine' (1881).

Cabot, JOHN (Giovanni Caboto), Italian navigator in the English service. In 1497, accompanied by his sons (see below), he sailed from Bristol to try to find a north-west passage to India, discovering Cape Breton Island and Nova Scotia. He made further expeditions in the following years.

Cabot, SEBASTIAN (1474-1557), son of the above, born at Bristol, a celebrated navigator, who sailed with his father in the expedition of 1497. He was pilot-major to the Emperor Charles V, 1519-26 and 1533-44, in which position he made important explorations in South American seas. He returned to Bristol in 1547 and was pensioned by Edward VI. He promoted the Company of Merchant Adventurers for the discovery of the North-East Passage to China and supervised the north-east expeditions to China of 1553 and 1556.

Cacodemon, from the Greek word meaning an evil spirit, in which sense it is used in Shakespeare's 'Richard III', I. iii. In astrology the name is applied to the Twelfth House in a figure of the Heavens, so called from its baleful influence.

Cacus, in Roman legend, a monster or brigand who lived in a cave on the Aventine (q.v.) hill. As Hercules was driving home the oxen of Geryon (q.v.), Cacus stole some of them, and dragged them backwards into his cave to escape discovery. Hercules departed without perceiving the theft, but the howling of his other oxen was answered by those in the cave. Hercules thereupon attacked Cacus, slew him, and recovered his oxen.

Cade, JACK, REBELLION OF, a political movement in 1450 by the men of Kent against the misrule of Henry VI and his council. It was headed by Jack Cade, an Irish adventurer who took the name of Mortimer. With a large mob he marched on London, entered the city in triumph and beheaded Lord Say, the lord treasurer. After a fight on London Bridge, the insurgents deserted Cade, who was pursued into Sussex and slain.

Cadenus and Vanessa, a poem by Swift (q.v.), written in 1713 for Esther Vanhomrigh ('Vanessa', q.v.), and published after her death by her request. It is the narrative, in mock classical form, of the author's relations with 'Vanessa' and an apology for his conduct. 'Cadenus' is an obvious anagram of 'Decanus'. Miss Vanhomrigh evidently took no exception to his statement of the facts, since she preserved the poem and desired it to be published.

CADMEAN

Cadmēan victory, 'a victory involving one's own ruin' (Liddell and Scott), usually associated with some incident in the story of Thebes, of which Cadmus (q.v.) was the legendary founder. Cf. Pyrrhic Victory.

Cadmus, son of Agenor, king of Phoenicia, was sent by his father in search of his sister Europa (q.v.), whom Zeus had carried away. His companions were devoured by a dragon, which he attacked and overcame by the assistance of Athene. He sowed its teeth in the plain, upon which armed men sprang up. He threw a stone in the midst of them, whereupon they turned their arms against each other, till all perished except five, who helped Cadmus to found the city of Thebes in Boeotia. Cadmus married Harmonia, a daughter of Aphrodite. Owing to the misfortunes of their children (Ino, Semele, qq.v., &c.), whom Hera persecuted, Cadmus and Harmonia entreated the gods to relieve them of the miseries of life, and were turned into serpents. Cadmus was reputed the first to introduce the use of letters into Greece.

Cadogan, a mode of knotting the hair behind the head, said to be derived from the first earl of Cadogan (d. 1726). It was popular among French ladies in the 18th cent.

Cadoudal, GEORGES (1771-1804), a leader of the Chouans (q.v.), executed for plotting against the life of Napoleon Buonaparte.

Cadūcēus, the wand carried by an ancient Greek or Roman herald, and specially the fabled wand carried by Hermes (q.v.) as messenger of the gods. It is usually represented with two serpents twined round it. As Hermes was thought to have the power of bringing sleep to men, Milton ('Paradise Lost', xi. 132) speaks of 'the pastoral reed of Hermes, or his opiate rod'.

Cadwall, in Shakespeare's 'Cymbeline' (q.v.), the name borne by Arviragus while he lived in the woods.

Cadwallader, the son of Cadwallon and last king of the Britons, who reigned in the 7th cent. He defended Wales against the Saxons, and Merlin prophesied his return at some future time to expel them. He joined Penda, king of Mercia (an Angle), against Eadwine, the Angle king of Northumbria.

CADWALLADER is also the name of a character in Smollett's 'Peregrine Pickle' (q.v.), and a Mrs. Cadwallader figures in George Eliot's 'Middlemarch' (q.v.).

CÆDMON (corruptly CÆDMON) (fl. 670), entered the monastery of Streaneshalch (Whitby) between 658 and 680, when already an elderly man. He is said by Bede to have been an unlearned herdsman, who received suddenly, in a vision, the power of song, and later put into English verse passages translated to him from the Scriptures. The name Cædmon cannot be explained in English, and has been conjectured to be Celtic (an adaptation of the British Catumanus). In 1665

CAESAREAN

François Dujon (Franciscus Junius) published at Amsterdam from the unique Bodleian MS. Junius 11 (c. 1000) long scriptural poems, which he took to be those of Cædmon. It is now generally admitted that these poems are of at least two dates, the first portion (containing versions of Genesis, Exodus, Daniel) being earlier than the second portion (1, the fall of man; 2, Christ's descent into hell, ascension, and second advent; 3, Christ's temptation), and all of them later than Cædmon. The only authentic fragment of his work that survives is his first Hymn, which Bede quotes.

Caelestina, a character in Dekker's 'Satiromastix' (q.v.). See also Celestina.

Caella, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene' (q.v.), i. x, the Lady of the House of Holiness, mother of Fidelia, Speranza, and Charissa (Faith, Hope, and Charity).

Caerleon, see Carlion.

Caermarthen, Black Book of, a Welsh MS. of the 12th cent., containing poems attributed to the great traditional bards of Wales.

CAESAR, the name of a patrician family of Rome, which GAIUS JULIUS CAESAR (102?-44 B.C.), the conqueror of Gaul and dictator, raised to the highest eminence. He was not only a great general and statesman, but an orator and historian. The only work of his that has come down to us is his 'Commentarii', the history of the first seven years of the Gallic War, and of part of the Civil War. The name Caesar was assumed by his adopted son, Octavianus, on whom the Senate conferred the title 'Augustus', and by Tiberius as the adopted son of Augustus. Both names were used by successive emperors, whether of the family of Caesar or not. 'Caesar' survived as a title in Kaiser and Tsar.

Caesar's Wife: Julius Caesar divorced his wife Pompeia, who was accused of an intrigue with Clodius, not because he thought her guilty, but because Caesar's wife must be above suspicion.

Caesar and Cleopatra, a play by G. B. Shaw (q.v., 1901).

Caesar and Luath, Burns's 'Two Dogs'.

Caesar and Pompey, a Roman tragedy by Chapman (q.v.), published 1631, but written at an earlier date.

It deals with the contention of Caesar and Pompey, the events leading up to the battle of Pharsalus (48 B.C.), the murder of Pompey, and the suicide of Cato of Utica. The latter is the real hero of the play, of which the motto is 'Only a just man is a free man'.

Caesūra, in Greek and Latin prosody, the division of a metrical foot between two words, especially in certain recognized places near the middle of the line; in English prosody, a pause about the middle of a metrical line, generally indicated by a pause in the sense.

Cagliostro, COUNT ALESSANDRO (1743-95), whose real name was Giuseppe Balsamo, was a charlatan born at Palermo. After a dissolute and criminal youth, he travelled in the East and studied alchemy. He then wandered about Europe selling drugs and philtres, and acquired a great reputation. He visited London several times and was received in the best society, but finally underwent a period of imprisonment in the Fleet. In 1785 he was implicated in the affair of the 'Diamond Necklace' (q.v.). He was acquitted in this connexion, but imprisoned on other grounds. He was arrested in Rome in 1789 as a heretic (on the denunciation of his wife, Serafina) and sentenced to death, but this was commuted to perpetual imprisonment.

Cahors, in the S. of France, a famous seat of Italian money-changers and financiers in the Middle Ages; whence the name CAORSIN for a money-dealer from Cahors. The Caorsins were expelled from England by Henry III in 1240, readmitted on the intervention of the pope in 1250, and again proscribed and imprisoned in 1251 'on account of their unbounded and detestable usury' [OED.]. Dante couples Cahors with Sodom in 'Inferno' xi. 50.

Cain: A Mystery, a tragedy by Lord Byron (q.v.), published in 1821.

Cain, revolting against the toil imposed upon him as the consequence of another's fault, and puzzled to reconcile what he sees with what he has been taught of the Omnipotent God, becomes a pupil of Lucifer, and questions him about the problems of existence. Lucifer's teaching intensifies the revolt of Cain against the conditions he endures, and in a fit of passion at Abel's devotion to Jehovah, he strikes his brother and kills him. Remorse and punishment follow, and Cain goes out into exile. The audacity of the poem aroused intense indignation, and evoked many attacks on the author.

Cain, The Wanderings of, see Wanderings.

Cain-coloured, of the reputed colour of the hair of Cain, to whom, as to Judas Iscariot, a red or reddish-yellow beard was attributed.

He hath but a little wee face, with a little yellow beard, a Cain-coloured beard.

CAINE, SIR THOMAS HENRY HALL (1853-1931), of Manx and Cumberland parentage, was befriended by D. G. Rossetti

CALAIS

(q.v.), whom he first met in 1880. Caine was Rossetti's housemate from 1881 till the latter's death. He was author of a number of novels of wide popularity, many of them centred in the Isle of Man, including 'The Shadow of a Crime' (1885), 'The Deemster' (1887), 'The Bondman' (1890), 'The Scapegoat' (1891), 'The Manxman' (1894), 'The Christian' (1897), 'The Eternal City' (1901), 'The Prodigal Son' (1904), 'The White Prophet' (1909), 'The Woman Thou Gavest Me' (1913). Several of the above have been dramatized. 'My Story', a narrative of the early years of Caine's literary career, appeared in 1908.

Cairbar, in Macpherson's Ossianic poems, a lord of Connaught, who rebels against King Cormac, murders him and usurps the crown. It is he who slays, and is slain by, Oscar, son of Ossian.

CAIRD, EDWARD (1835-1908), educated at Greenock Academy, Glasgow and St. Andrews Universities, and Balliol College, Oxford, which he entered in 1860. An older man than his fellow undergraduates at Balliol, he found his most intimate associates among graduates, notably T. H. Green (q.v.). Jowett was his tutor. He became fellow and tutor of Merton College, and in 1866 professor of moral philosophy at Glasgow. In 1893 he succeeded Jowett as master of Balliol College. In his 'Philosophy of Kant' (1868), 'The Critical Philosophy of Immanuel Kant' (1889), and his monograph on Hegel (1883), he produced brilliant expositions and criticisms of the systems of these two philosophers. In 1893 he published his Gifford lectures on 'The Evolution of Religion'.

CAIRD, JOHN (1820-98), principal of the University of Glasgow, and elder brother of Edward Caird (q.v.); author of 'An Introduction to the Philosophy of Religion' (1880), in which he discusses the evolution of religion, and shows ground for thinking that the organic development of Christianity is not inconsistent with its divine or supernatural origin.

Caius (pron. 'Keys') College, Cambridge (full title, Gonville and Caius College), was formerly Gonville Hall, which was founded by Edmund Gonville in 1348. John Caius or Kay (1510-73), scholar and physician to Edward VI and Mary, who was educated at Gonville Hall, refounded and enlarged it as Caius College in 1557, and was master, 1559-73.

Caius, DR., a character in Shakespeare's 'Merry Wives of Windsor' (q.v.).

Calais was taken by Edward III in 1347, the lives of the principal burgesses being spared at Queen Philippa's intercession. It was recaptured in Mary's reign by the duke of Guise (1558), to the deep mortification of the queen. During her last illness she told a lady-in-waiting, 'When I am dead and opened, you shall find Calais lying upon my heart' (Holinshed).

CALANDRINO

Calandrino, a foolish credulous fellow, to whom many ludicrous misfortunes happen in the Decameron (q.v.) of Boccaccio (e.g. viii. 3, viii. 6, ix. 3).

Calantha, the heroine of Ford's 'The Broken Heart' (q.v.).

CALDERÓN DE LA BARCA, PEDRO (1600–81), a great Spanish dramatist, and the successor of Lope de Vega (q.v.). Eight of his plays were translated into English by Fitzgerald (q.v.). The best known is 'La Vida es Sueño'. Dryden, Goethe, Shelley, Bridges, among others, were under obligations to him. Besides some 120 plays, Calderón wrote more than 70 autos, dramatic presentations of the Mystery of the Holy Eucharist, in which his genius is said to be seen at its best (Magnus, 'Dict. of European Literature').

CALDERON, GEORGE (1868–1915), English dramatist, was educated at Rugby and Trinity College, Oxford. His plays include: 'The Fountain' (1909), 'The Little Stone House' (1911), 'Revolt' (1912), and a tragedy in blank verse, 'Cromwell: Mall o' Monks' (in his collected plays, 1921–2).

Caleb Balderstone, a character in Scott's 'The Bride of Lammermoor' (q.v.).

Caleb Williams, Adventures of, a novel by W. Godwin (q.v.), published in 1794.

This work is interesting as an early example of the propagandist novel and the novel of crime and its detection. It was designed to show 'the tyranny and perfidiousness exercised by the powerful members of the community against those who are less privileged than themselves'. The first part of the book deals with the misdeeds of Tyrrel, an arrogant and tyrannical country squire, who ruins a tenant on his estate, Hawkins, for refusing to yield to one of his whims, and drives to the grave his niece, Miss Melville, for refusing to marry a boor of his selection. In the course of these doings he comes into conflict with Falkland, a neighbouring squire of high-minded and benevolent disposition, knocks him down in public, and is shortly after found murdered. Suspicion falls on Falkland as the murderer, but is diverted to Hawkins and his son, who are tried and executed. From this time Falkland becomes eccentric and solitary. Caleb Williams, the self-educated son of humble parents, is appointed his secretary, and presently becomes convinced that Falkland is in fact the murderer of Tyrrel. The remainder of the book is taken up with the unrelenting persecution of Williams by Falkland, in spite of Williams's devotion to his employer, and his refusal to betray the latter's secret. By Falkland's cunning dispositions, Williams is imprisoned on a charge of robbing his employer. He escapes from prison, but is tracked from concealment to concealment by Falkland's agents, until, driven to desperation, he lays a charge of murder against Falkland, is confronted with him, and although he has no proof to offer, by the generosity and sincerity of his statement, wins from the murderer a confession of his own guilt.

Caledonia, the Roman name for the northern part of Britain. Hence used poetically for Scotland.

Calendar, the system according to which the beginning and length of the year are fixed.

The JULIAN CALENDAR is that introduced by Julius Caesar in 46 B.C., in which the ordinary year has 365 days, and every fourth year is a leap year of 366 days, the months having the names, order, and length still retained. This was known as 'Old Style' when the Gregorian Calendar was introduced.

The GREGORIAN CALENDAR is the modification of the preceding, adapted to bring it into closer conformity with astronomical data and the natural course of the seasons, and to rectify the error already contracted by its use. This modification was introduced by Pope Gregory XIII in 1582, and adopted in Great Britain in 1752. It was known as 'New Style'. The error, due to the fact that the Julian year of 365½ days (allowing for leap years) was 11 minutes 10 seconds too long, amounted in 1752 to 11 days, and in order to correct this, 2 Sept. was in that year followed by 14 Sept., while for the future the years 2000, 2400, 2800, were to be reckoned as leap years, but the other hundredth years, 1800, 1900, 2100, &c., were to be ordinary years. See Year.

The FRENCH REPUBLICAN CALENDAR made the year begin at the autumnal equinox, and was in use in France from 22 Sept. 1792, date of the proclamation of the Republic, until 1 Jan. 1806. Its twelve months of thirty days (supplemented by five intercalary days) were Vendémiaire (Sept.–Oct.), Brumaire (Oct.–Nov.), Frimaire (Nov.–Dec.), Nivôse (Dec.–Jan.), Pluviose (Jan.–Feb.), Ventôse (Feb.–Mar.), Germinal (Mar.–Apr.), Floréal (Apr.–May), Prairial (May–June), Messidor (June–July), Thermidor (July–Aug.), Fructidor (Aug.–Sept.). The names were invented by Fabre d'Églantine (1755–94), the French poet, and the chronological arrangement devised by Gilbert Romme (1750–95).

The JEWISH Calendar combines solar years with lunar months, an additional month being intercalated in each of seven years in every cycle of nineteen years. It reckons from the creation of the world (3760 B.C.). The new year begins on the first day of the month Tishri. Thus A.D. 1932 = A.M. 5692–3, Tishri 1 of A.M. 5693 falling on 1 Oct. 1932.

In the MOHAMMEDAN CALENDAR the year consists of twelve lunar months dating from 16 July 622, the day of the Hegira (q.v.).

Calender or KALENDER, one of a mendicant order of dervishes in Turkey and Persia.

Calends or KALENDS, the first day of any month in the ancient Roman calendar. The Romans reckoned the days forward to the Calends, Nones, or Ides next following. Thus 27 May was described as the sixth day before the Calends of June.

Calenius, WALTER (d. 1151), a name used by John Bale (q.v.) for an undefined writer who was archdeacon of Oxford, 1115-38. This Walter, according to Geoffrey of Monmouth (q.v.), brought from Brittany the Celtic chronicle which Geoffrey professed to translate. 'Calena' being, in the bastard Latin of the 16th cent., used for Oxford, Bale by 'Calenius' meant only Walter of Oxford. He is sometimes confused with later archdeacons of Oxford, Walter of Coutances (1183) and Walter Map (q.v.).

CALEPINO, AMBROSIO (d. 1511), an Italian Augustinian monk, author of a Latin dictionary, whence the French word calepin (note-book). 'Calepin' occurs in English literature in the sense of 'book of reference'.

Cales, KNIGHT OF: 'Cales [Cadiz] knights were made in that voyage [1596] by Robert, earl of Essex, to the number of sixty; whereof (though many of great worth) some were of low fortunes: and therefore Queen Elizabeth was half offended with the Earl for making knighthood so common' (Fuller, Worthies (Kent), II. 121.)

Caliban, in Shakespeare's 'Tempest' (q.v.), the misshapen evil-natured monster, son of the witch Sycorax; 'an attempt to reduce to one common denominator the aboriginal type whom the dramatist had seen [brought to England from America by travellers and exhibited] or of whom he had heard or read' (Sir S. Lee).

Caliban upon Setebos, a poem by R. Browning (q.v.), included in 'Dramatis Personae' (q.v.).

Caliban (q.v.), lying in the mud in a cave, while Prospero and Miranda believe him at work, thinks out, from a savage's point of view, the problem of the creation of the world by his god Setebos (q.v.). He speaks in the third person. Setebos, dwelling 'in the cold of the Moon', himself subordinate to a higher deity 'The Quiet', has made the world as a plaything to amuse himself, just as Caliban himself would make a clay bird, and throw it in the air and laugh if its leg were broken. Setebos is like Caliban in other respects also, neither kind nor cruel, good in the main, but jealous. In the fancied security of his cave Caliban expresses a hope that Setebos may some day come to an end. But a thunder-storm brings him promptly to order: 'Lo! 'Lieth flat and loveth Setebos!'

Caliburn, see Excalibur.

Calidore, Sir, the Knight of Courtesy, the hero of Bk. VI of Spenser's 'Faerie Queene'. He pursues and chains the 'Blatant Beast' (q.v.).

Caligula, GAIUS CASSAR, son of Germanicus, so called from his wearing, when a boy, caligae or soldiers' boots, was Roman emperor A.D. 37-41. The cruelties and vices that marked his reign were perhaps due to his madness. He considered himself a god and erected a temple in his own honour. He proposed to raise his horse ('Incitatus') to the consulship, and committed other outrageous eccentricities. He was finally murdered. Horace Walpole, in his letters to Mann, II. 103, refers to the 'Caligulisms' of Frederick, Prince of Wales.

Caliphate, the rule of the Caliphs ('vice-regents') who succeeded Mohammed (q.v.). The first four were Abu Bakr, Omar, Othman, and Ali. These were followed by the Umayyad and the Abbasid (qq.v.) caliphs. The Abbasid dynasty came to an end with Mu'tasim, the last caliph of Bagdad, in 1258. The title of caliph was subsequently assumed by the Ottoman sultans. The caliphate practically ceased to exist after the abolition of the sultanate in 1922. There were also Fatimite caliphs in Egypt (see Fatima) in the 10th-12th cents. Various other Moslem dynasties have from time to time assumed the dignity of the Caliphate. The chief of these is perhaps that of the sultans of Morocco, who, under the title of Grand Sherifs, are still revered as caliphs by their subjects.

Callipolis, in Peele's 'Battle of Alcazar' (q.v.), the wife of Muley Muhamet, the Moorish king, frequently quoted as typical of a sweet-heart (e.g. Shakespeare, '2 Henry IV', II. iv). Sir W. Scott writes the name, 'Callipolis'.

Callista, the heroine of Rowe's 'The Fair Penitent' (q.v.), in which the 'gay Lothario' figures as her lover.

Callisto, see Callisto.

Some beauty rare, Calisto, Clymene.

Call of the Wild, The, the story of the dog Buck by Jack London (q.v.), published 1903.

CALLIMACHUS (b. c. 310 B.C.), a celebrated poet of Alexandria, who was perhaps chief librarian of the library of that city. Some of his poems survive and justify Ovid's comment, 'quamvis ingenio non valet, arte valet'. His epigram on his friend Heraclitus of Halicarnassus has been translated in a well-known poem by W. J. Cory (q.v.). He also wrote a poem on the 'Lock of Berenice' (q.v.), which Catullus translated.

Calliöppö, the muse (q.v.) of epic poetry.

Callipollis, see Calipolis.

Callirrhoe, the wife of Alcmaeon (q.v.), Callirrhoe is also the name of the heroine of the romance 'Chacreas and Callirrhoe' (q.v.).

Callista, a religious novel by J. H. Newman (q.v.), published in 1856.

CALLISTHENES

Callisthénēs, a nephew and pupil of Aristotle, who accompanied Alexander the Great on his expedition. He became obnoxious to the monarch, was accused of being privy to a plot against him, and was put to death in 327 B.C. Landor has an 'Imaginary Conversation' between Callisthenes and Aristotle.

Callisto, a nymph, the daughter of Lycaon (q.v.), the companion of Artemis and a huntress, was beloved by Zeus and became the mother of Arcas (the eponymous hero of Arcadia). She was metamorphosed into a she-bear by the design of the jealous Hera, and was on the point of being slain by her son in the chase, when both were turned into constellations, Callisto into the Great Bear.

Calpê, the modern Gibraltar, one of the Pillars of Hercules. The 'Calpe foxhounds' is a celebrated pack, hunting the country inland from La Linea.

CALPRENÈDE, GAUTIER DE COSTES DE LA, see La Calprenède.

Calvary (from Latin calvaria, skull, used to translate the Aramaic gulgôlê, Heb. gulgôlêp, which in Gk. N.T. becomes 'Golgotha'), the name of the mount of the Crucifixion, near Jerusalem. Hence 'a Calvary' is a life-size representation of the Crucifixion, in the open air, or a series of representations, in a church or chapel, of the scenes of the Passion.

CALVERLEY, CHARLES STUART (1831-84), educated at Harrow and Balliol College, Oxford, whence he migrated to Christ's College, Cambridge, became a barrister of the Inner Temple, but suffered grievously in health from an accident in 1867, which impaired his power of work. He published 'Verses and Translations' in 1862 and 'Fly Leaves' in 1866, becoming famous under the initials 'C. S. C.' for his parodies (of Browning, Macaulay, Tupper, among others) and for the wit and scholarship of his verse.

Calves' Head Club, an association formed at the end of the 17th cent. to ridicule Charles I, calves' heads being used to represent the monarch and his courtiers on the anniversary of his execution. The club was suppressed in 1735.

CALVIN (from Calvinus, the latinized form of the family name Cauvin), JEAN (1509-64), the great French theological writer and reformer, was born at Noyon in Picardy. He settled at Geneva in 1536, where he became dictator of a kind of theocracy, and caused Servetus (q.v.) to be burnt in 1553. His great work was the 'Institution de la religion chrétienne', written first in Latin (Basel, 1535) and afterwards in French, in which he expounded his doctrine of original sin, of predestination and election, and his anti-Roman views, and showed himself a master of prose. He was the spiritual father of John Knox and the originator of the dogma of Scottish Presbyterianism. Wherever Protestantism has had to fight for its life, it has

The 'Calvinistic Methodists' are the section of the Methodists who follow the calvinistic opinions of Whitefield (q.v.) as opposed to the Arminian (q.v.) opinions of J. Wesley (q.v.).

Calydon, an ancient town and district of Aetolia. See Meleager.

Calypso, one of the daughters of Atlas, a nymph who reigned in the island of Ogygia. When Ulysses (q.v.) was shipwrecked on her coasts, she received him hospitably and offered him immortality if he would remain with her. The hero refused, and after seven years' delay was allowed to depart.

Cam and Isle, the rivers on which Cambridge and Oxford stand, sometimes used to signify these universities. But there is no real river Isis: the Romans called the river Thamesis from source to sea. The corruption, as old as Leland's time, arose from the 'Thame stream' coming in at Dorchester. Hence 'Thame' and 'Isis' are bred out of the real name Thamesis.

Cama, see Kama.

Camacho, in 'Don Quixote' (q.v., II. xx, xxi), a rich farmer of La Mancha, who prepares a splendid feast in anticipation of his wedding with Quiteria; of whom, however, he is deprived, by means of a stratagem, by his rival Basilius.

Camaralzaman ('Moon of the Age'), in the 'Arabian Nights' (q.v.), the prince who marries Badoura, daughter of the king of China. They were brought together secretly one night by the intervention of the jinn, fell in love with one another and exchanged rings. Then the jinn separated them, and they were lost to one another, but were ultimately reunited.

Camarina, a town on the southern coast of Sicily, a colony of Syracuse. In its neighbourhood was a marsh which the inhabitants drained, in defiance of the advice of an oracle, thus opening a way for their enemies to attack them. In the 1st Punic War, Camarina was captured by the Romans and the inhabitants sold into slavery. Whence the proverb: μη κίλεις Καμαρίναν, ne moveas Camarinam (Don't disturb Camarina), quoted by Dominic Sampson in Scott's 'Guy Mannering', c. viii.

Cambal, CAMBALLO, one of the two sons of King Cambuscan, in Chaucer's 'Squire's Tale' (see Canterbury Tales; see also Cambell for the continuation of his story in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene').

Cambell or CAMBELLO, the name given by Spenser in 'The Faerie Queene', IV. iii, to Cambal (q.v.), whose tale he borrows from 'Dan Chaucer, well of English undefyled', and completes. Cambell is brother of Canace, for whom there are many suitors. It is arranged that the strongest of these, three brothers, shall fight with Cambell, and the lady be awarded to the victor. Two of the brothers are defeated; the contest between the third, Triamond, and Cambell is undecided, each wounding the other. They are reconciled by Cambina, Triamond's sister; Canace is awarded to Triamond and Cambell marries Cambina. The magic ring of Canace in the 'Squire's Tale' reappears in the 'Faerie Queene', with the power of healing wounds.

Camber, according to legend, one of the sons of Brute (q.v.), the legendary first king of Britain. Camber is supposed to have given his name to Cambria (Wales), but this is in fact a latinized derivative of Cymry (Welshmen).

Cambrai, THE ARCHBISHOP OF, a term used to designate Fénelon (q.v.).

Cambridge, in Old English Grantebrycg, was according to legend made the seat of a school by Sigebert, king of the East Angles, about 630. The first historical trace of Cambridge as a university (studium generale) is in 1209, its first recognition in a royal writ to the chancellor of Cambridge in 1230, the first papal recognition in 1233. The process of development of the prerogatives of the University was slow, the chancellor's jurisdiction reaching its full extension in 1383. (See H. Rashdall, 'Universities of Europe'.)

Cambridge University Press. Books were first printed at Cambridge in 1521-2 by John Siberch (John Lair of Siegburg), a friend of Erasmus. A charter was granted to the University by Henry VIII in 1534 authorizing the printing of books there, but not until 1583 was the first university Printer, Thomas Thomas, appointed. The undertaking was opposed by the Stationers' Company as an infringement of their privilege, but the University finally vindicated its rights. The activity of the Press was developed under the influence of R. Bentley (1662-1742, q.v.), and many notable books were produced by it in the 18th cent. Among these were four Prayer-books and a Bible printed by Baskerville (q.v.). The Pitt Press Building was erected early in the 19th cent. out of the surplus contributions for the statue to Pitt in Hanover Square.

Cambuscan, in Chaucer's 'Squire's Tale' (see Canterbury Tales), a king of Tartary.

Cambyses, KING, subject of a tragedy (1569) by Thomas Preston (q.v.), which illustrates the transition from the morality play to the historical drama. It is founded on the story of Cambyses (king of Persia) in Herodotus; its bombastic grandiloquence became proverbial, and is referred to in '1 Henry IV', II. iv: 'I must speak in passion, and I will do it in King Cambyses' vein'. Among the characters are three comic villains, Ruff, Huff, and Snuff, who figure again in the 'Martin Marprelate Controversy' (q.v.) in the course of Lyly's 'Pappe with an Hatchet'.

CAMERONIANS

CAMDEN, WILLIAM (1551-1623), antiquary and historian, was educated at Christ's Hospital, St. Paul's School, and Magdalen College and Christ Church, Oxford. He was appointed head master of Westminster School in 1593. He made tours of antiquarian investigation up and down England, and published his 'Britannia' (q.v.) in 1586, of which the sixth (greatly enlarged) edition appeared in 1607. He published in 1613 'Annales . . . regnante Elizabetha . . . ad annum 1580', largely a panegyric of Queen Elizabeth; the second part was printed posthumously in 1627. He founded a chair of history in Oxford University. He wrote principally in Latin, but his 'Britannia' was translated into English by Philemon Holland (q.v.) in 1610, and his 'Annales' in 1625, 1628, and 1633 by other hands.

Camden Society, founded in 1838 in honour of W. Camden (q.v.), for the purpose of publishing documents relating to the early history and literature of the British Empire.

The CAMBRIDGE CAMDEN SOCIETY was founded by Neale (q.v.) in 1839 for the study of ecclesiology. Its name was afterwards changed to 'The Ecclesiological Society'.

Cameliard, in Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur', the realm of King Leodogrance, father of Guinevere.

Camelot, in the Arthurian legend, the place where King Arthur held his court, is stated by Malory to be Winchester. But there was a Camelot in Somersetshire, which still survives in Queen's Camel, and Leland found traditions of Arthur there. Drayton, in the 'Polyolbion' (3rd Song, l. 395), refers as follows to the river Ivel in Somersetshire:

The nearest neighbouring place to Arthur's ancient seat,

Which made the Britons' name through all the world so great.

Like Camelot what place was ever yet renowned?

On which Selden (in his 'Illustrations' to the 'Polyolbion') observes: 'By South Cadbury is that Camelot, a hill of a mile compass at the top, four trenches circling it, and twist every of them an earthen wall.' There is something of the sort there.

Cameronians, the followers of Richard Cameron (d. 1680), a noted Scottish Covenantant and field preacher, who rejected the indulgence granted to nonconforming ministers and formally renounced allegiance to Charles II. His followers afterwards constituted the body called the 'Reformed Presbyterian Church of Scotland'. The Cameronians figure prominently in Scott's 'Old Mortality' (q.v.).

The CAMERONIAN REGIMENT (the old 26th Regiment of Foot, now the 1st battalion of the Scottish Rifles), was formed originally from the Cameronians and other Presbyterians who rallied to the cause of William III and fought at the battle of Killiecrankie.

Camilla, a Volscian princess, dedicated when young to the service of Diana. She was so fleet of foot that she could run over a field of corn without bending the blades, and over the sea without wetting her feet (Virg. 'Aen.' vii. 808 et seq.). She helped Turnus against Aeneas (q.v.) and died of a wound she received from Aruns.

Camilla, or a Picture of Youth, a novel by F. Burney (q.v.), published in 1796.

The story deals with the matrimonial concerns of a group of young people, Camilla Tyrold and her sisters, the daughters of a country parson, and her cousin Indiana Lynmere; and centres round the love-affair of Camilla herself and her eligible suitor, Edgar Mandlebert. Its happy consummation is delayed over five volumes by intrigues, contretemps, and misunderstandings. The book, especially in its earlier chapters, contains some of the comic situations and absurd characters in which Miss Burney excelled. Among the latter are Sir Hugh Tyrold, Camilla's good-natured but unpractical uncle; the grotesque tutor, Dr. Orkborne, so wrapt up in his own studies that he can give no attention to the duties for which he is engaged; and the fop Sir Sedley Clarendel. But the drollery soon gives place to overstrained romance.

Camillo, a character in Shakespeare's 'Winter's Tale' (q.v.).

Camliola, the heroine of Massinger's 'The Maid of Honour' (q.v.).

Camleard (from camisa, a shirt), a name given to the Calvinist insurgents of the Cevennes during the persecution (the 'dragonnades') which followed the revocation of the Edict of Nantes by Louis XIV in 1685.

Camlan, according to the 'Annales Cambriae' (q.v.) the scene of a battle in 539 'where Arthur and Medraut fell', is perhaps Slaughter or Bloody Bridge on the Camel near Camelford in Cornwall, or a site on the Cam near Cadbury. Malory places the last battle on a down beside Salisbury and not far from the sea.

CAMOENS, LUIS DE (1524-80), a Portuguese poet, who lost an eye in service against the Moors and suffered other misfortunes, including a shipwreck off the coast of Cochín China, in which he is said to have lost all his property, swimming to shore with one hand while he held his poems in the other. He died miserably in Lisbon. He was the author of 'Os Lusíadas', the 'Lusiads', an epic poem on the descendants of Lusus, the legendary hero of his country, and more particularly on the exploits of Vasco da Gama (q.v.), the great Portuguese navigator. This was published in 1572. There is a close translation in English Campaspe, Alexander and, a prose comedy by Lyly (q.v.), published in 1584. Alexander the Great, enamoured of his Theban captive Campaspe, gives her freedom and engages Apelles to paint her portrait. Apelles and Campaspe fall in love with each other, and when the portrait is finished, Apelles spoils it, so as to have occasion for further sittings. Alexander suspects the truth and by a trick makes him reveal it. He surrenders Campaspe to Apelles and returns to his wars, saying 'It were a shame Alexander should desire to command the world, if he cannot command himself'. The play includes the charming lyric, 'Cupid and my Campaspe playd, At cards for kisses . . .'. The story of Alexander, Campaspe, and Apelles is told in Pliny's 'Natural History', xxxv. 36.

Campbell, the family name of the earls of Argyle (q.v.), celebrated in the song 'The Campbells are coming'. The chief of the house is styled in Gaelic Mac Calain More, after its ancestor, Sir Colin Campbell, surnamed More or Great, for his achievements in war.

CAMPBELL, THOMAS (1777-1844), son of a Glasgow merchant, was educated at Glasgow University. He published 'The Pleasures of Hope' (q.v.) in 1799, 'Gertrude of Wyoming' (q.v.) in 1809, 'Theodric' and other poems in 1824, and 'The Pilgrim of Glencoe' and other poems in 1842. He is principally remembered for his splendid war-songs, 'Hohenlinden', 'The Battle of the Baltic', and 'Ye Mariners of England'; for 'The Soldier's Dream', 'Lord Ullin's Daughter', 'Lochiel's Warning', and 'Lines on Revisiting a Scene in Argyllshire'; and also for some single lines that have become proverbial, such as 'Like angel-visits, few and far between' ('Pleasures of Hope', Pt. II), taken from Blair's 'Like angels' visits, short and far between'.

Campeador, EL, a surname of the Cid (q.v.), meaning 'the Champion'.

Camperdown, a village on the coast of the Netherlands, off which in 1797 the British fleet under Duncan defeated the Dutch under De Winter, thereby preventing a projected invasion of Ireland.

CAMPION, THOMAS (d. 1619), mentioned as a 'doctor in phisicke', published in 1595 a volume of Latin 'Poemata', and in 1602 'Observations in the Art of English Poesie' directed 'against the vulgar and unartificial custom of riming'. He wrote masques for presentation at court, a treatise on music, a volume of songs on the death of Prince Henry, and four 'Books of Ayres' (1610-12), containing pleasant lyrics (some set to music by Campion himself), including the beautiful 'There is a garden in her face'.

Campo-Basso, COUNT OF, an Italian captain in the army of Charles the Bold of Burgundy, who figures in Scott's 'Quentin Durward' and 'Anne of Geierstein' (qq.v.).

Camulodunum, the Roman name of Colchester.

Canace (pron. Can'ās), the daughter of King Cambuscan (q.v.), in Chaucer's 'Squire's Tale' (see Canterbury Tales), and in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene' (Bk. IV).

Canaletto or Canale, ANTONIO (1697-1768), a Venetian painter, who painted many architectural pictures of his own city. He visited England in 1746-7 and painted views of Whitehall and the Thames.

Canary, a light sweet wine from the Canary Islands.

Canby, HENRY SEIDEL (1878-), American journalist, born in Delaware, editor (1924-36) of the 'Saturday Review of Literature', New York—the leading paper in America devoted to literature.

Cancel, in printing, a new page or sheet substituted for one cancelled or suppressed.

Cancer, (a) the zodiacal constellation of the Crab, lying between Gemini and Leo; (b) the fourth of the signs of the zodiac, which the sun enters on 21 June. The sign originally coincided with the constellation.

Candācē, (1) title of the queens of the Ethiopians in Hellenistic and Roman times. The treasurer of one of them was converted and baptized by Philip (Acts viii. 27-39). Another Candace invaded Egypt in 22 B.C. (2) A legendary queen of Tarsus who, in an episode of the legends attaching to Alexander the Great (q.v.), lures the conqueror by her fascination to a life of sloth.

Candaules, a legendary king of Lydia. See Gyges.

Candida, one of the 'pleasant' plays in G. B. Shaw's 'Plays, Pleasant and Unpleasant' (q.v.).

It deals with the conflict between 'a higher, but vaguer timider vision . . . an incoherent mischievous even ridiculous unpracticalness', represented by the poet Eugene Marchbanks, and 'the clear bold sure sensible benevolent salutarily shortsighted Christian Socialist ideal', represented by the Hackney parson Morell. Candida is Morell's wife.

Candide, a philosophical tale by Voltaire (q.v.), satirizing the optimism of Rousseau and Leibniz.

Candlemas, 2 Feb., the feast of the Purification of the Virgin Mary, celebrated with a great display of candles. Brand ('Popular Antiquities') quotes Becon ('Reliques of Rome') as tracing this ceremony of candle-bearing to an ancient Roman custom of carrying torches in honour of Juno Februsta. Candlemas Day is one of the quarter-days in Scotland.

Candor, see Public Advertiser.

Candour, Mrs., one of the scandal-mongers in Sheridan's 'School for Scandal' (q.v.), rendered peculiarly odious by her assumption of a love of truth.

Cane'phōrus, in ancient Greece, one of the 'maidens who carried on their heads baskets containing the sacred things used at the feasts of Demeter, Bacchus, and Athena' (Liddell and Scott); hence applied to figures of young persons carrying baskets on their heads.

Canfield, DOROTHY, see Fisher, Dorothy Canfield.

Canicular Days, the days immediately preceding and following the heliacal rising of the dog-star (either Sirius or Procyon), about 11 Aug.; the dog-days.

Canicular Year, the ancient Egyptian year, which was reckoned from one heliacal rising of Sirius to the next.

Canicular period, see Sothic Cycle.

Candida, a Neapolitan courtesan whom Horace once loved, and whom, after her desertion of him, he holds up to contempt as a sorceress. (Horace, Epodes v and xvii, also Satires, I. viii.)

Cannae, the site, in Apulia, of the memorable defeat of the Romans by Hannibal in 216 B.C.

CANNING, GEORGE (1770-1827), statesman and author, was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford. He was appointed foreign secretary in 1822 and premier in 1827. Apart from his political speeches (published in 1828), he is remembered in a literary connexion as founder of and contributor to 'The Anti-Jacobin' (q.v.); his 'Poems' were published in 1823.

Canon's Yeoman's Tale, The, see Canterbury Tales.

Canongate, Chronicles of the, see Chronicles of the Canongate.

Canonical Hours, stated times of the day appointed by the canon of the Catholic Church for prayer and devotion. The Canonical Hours have been fixed since the 6th cent. as follows: Lauds, Prime, Terce, Sext, None, Vespers, Compline (Mass is celebrated normally between Terce and Sext). Also the hours (now from 8 a.m. to 3 p.m.) within which marriage can legally be performed in a parish church in England.

Canopic Vase (from Canopus, a town of ancient Egypt), a vase used in Egypt, chiefly for holding the entrails of embalmed bodies. Its distinctive feature was that its lid was in the form of an emblematic head. The town CANOPUS was supposed to derive its name from Canopus, the helmsman of Menelaus, who died in Egypt on the return from Troy.

CANOPUS is also the name of the bright star α in the southern constellation Argo.

Canossa, in the district of Modena, a castle of Matilda, countess of Tuscany, where in 1077 the emperor Henry IV submitted to penance and humiliation imposed by Pope Gregory VII; hence 'to go to Canossa' implies a reconciliation, real or feigned, with the pope.

Cantab, an abbreviation of CANTABRIGIAN, of or belonging to the University of Cambridge.

Cantabrian (from Cantabri, a people who lived in the north of Spain), means Spanish or Biscayan.

Cantacuzene, a noble Byzantine family, a member of which, John, the historian, became emperor of the East in 1341.

Canterbury Pilgrims, THE, a name given to the Anglican settlers who founded Christ-church in New Zealand in 1851. See also next entry.

Canterbury Tales, The, Chaucer's greatest work, designed about 1387, and written for the most part in heroic couplets (about 17,000 lines). The main Prologue is especially interesting for the vivid picture it presents of contemporary life. A party of twenty-nine pilgrims are assembled at the Tabard Inn in Southwark, about to travel to the shrine of Becket at Canterbury, and of each of these the poet draws a striking portrait. They are:

¹ So the prologue states, but there are, including Chaucer himself, thirty-one. It has been suggested that the words and prestres three (Prol. 164) are not Chaucer's. But evidently Chaucer changed his mind as the work proceeded, and left it unfinished when he died.

CANTERBURY TALES

After supper the host proposes that they shall shorten the way by telling each two stories on the way out and two on the way back. The teller of the best stories shall have a free supper on his return. The host will accompany them and act as guide. The pilgrims agree and the tales follow, preceded each of them by a short prologue. But the plan by which each pilgrim would tell four tales was apparently curtailed. Even the reduced plan was not completed, and the work contains only twenty-three tales:

1. The Knight's Tale, a shortened version of the 'Teseide' of Boccaccio, the story of the love of Palamon and Arcite, prisoners of Theseus, king of Athens, for Emilia, sister of Hippolyta, queen of the Amazons, whom Theseus has married. The rivals compete for her in a tournament. Palamon is defeated, but Arcite, the favourite of Mars, at the moment of his triumph is thrown and injured by his horse through the interposition of Venus and Saturn, and dies. Palamon and Emilia, after prolonged mourning for Arcite, are united.

2. The Miller's Tale, a ribald story of the deception, first of a husband (a carpenter) through the prediction of a second flood, and secondly of a lover who expects to kiss the lady's lip and avenges himself for his disappointment with a hot coulter.

3. The Reeve's Tale, which resembles a French fabliau, 'Le Meunier et les deux Clercs', and the 'Decameron', D. ix, N. 6, an indecent story of two clerks who are robbed by a miller of part of their meal, and revenge themselves on the miller's wife and daughter. (The Reeve, who had been a carpenter, thus retorts upon the Miller.)

4. The Cook's Tale (another tale of 'harlotrie' as Chaucer calls it) is imperfect and omitted in some manuscripts. It is followed by the Cook's Tale of Gamelyn (not by Chaucer), for the substance of which see under Gamelyn.

5. The Man of Law's Tale, related to a story in Gower's 'Confessio Amantis', B. ii, is the story of Constance, daughter of a Christian emperor, married to the Soldan on condition that he shall become a Christian, and by the device of the Soldan's mother cast adrift on the sea. Her subsequent misfortunes are very similar to those told in the verse romance 'Emaré' (q.v.).

6. The Wife of Bath's Tale is preceded by a long prologue, in which Chaucer places in her mouth a condemnation of celibacy in the form of an account of her life with her five successive husbands. The Tale is like Gower's story of Florent in 'Conf. Amant.' B. i, but is transferred to the court of King Arthur. It relates how a knight who is required, in order to avoid execution, to answer correctly within a twelvemonth the question, what do women love most, is told the right answer—'sovereignty'—by a foul old witch on condition that he marries her. He reluctantly complies and finds the witch restored to youth and beauty.

CANTERBURY TALES

7. The Friar's Tale tells how a Summoner meets the devil dressed as a bailiff, who confides to him his methods in dealing with men. The Summoner attempts to extort a gift from a widow, who commends him to the devil. The devil thereupon hales him off to hell.

8. The Summoner, in retaliation, relates how the manoeuvres of a greedy and hypocritical friar by a sick-bed were unsavourily defeated.

9. The Clerk's Tale, which the poet states he learnt from Petrarch, was translated by the latter into Latin from the 'Decameron', D. x, N. 10. It tells how the Marquis of Saluces married the humble Griselda, and of her virtues and patience under trials. (The same story is treated in Dekker's 'Patient Grissil', q.v.)

10. The Merchant's Tale, of an old man and his young wife. The old man becomes blind; the wife and her lover take advantage of this in a pear-tree. Pluto suddenly restores the husband's sight, but Proserpine enables the wife to outwit him. The precise source of the story has not been traced.

11. The Squire's Tale, of Cambuscan, king of Tartary, to whom on his birthday an envoy from the king of Arabia brings magic gifts, including a ring for the king's daughter Canace, which enables her to understand the language of birds. A female falcon tells Canace the story of her own desertion by a tercelet. The poet promises the continuation of the tale, but it is incomplete. (See under Cambell for the continuation in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene'.) The tale is referred to by Milton in 'Il Penseroso':

Or call up him who left half-told
The story of Cambuscan bold,
Of Cambal and of Algarsife
And who had Canace to wife.

Cambal and Algarsife are Cambuscan's sons. The origin of the tale is unknown.

12. The Franklin's Tale, of a woman, Dorigen wife of Arveragus, who to escape the assiduity of her lover, the squire Aurelius, makes her consent depend upon an impossible condition, that all the rocks on the coast of Brittany be removed. When this condition is realized by the aid of a magician, the lover, from a generous remorse, releases her from her promise. Chaucer states that the tale is taken from a 'British Lay', but this is lost. Similar stories are found in Boccaccio's 'Filocolo', B. v, and 'Decameron', D. x, N. 5.

13. The Second Nun's Tale, in rhyme-royal, is perhaps translated from the life of St. Cecilia in the Golden Legend of Jacobus a Voragine. It describes the miracles and martyrdom of the noble Roman maiden Cecilia and her husband Valerian.

A certain canon and his yeoman having joined the party at Boughton-under-Blee, we next have

14. The Canon's Yeoman's Tale, an exposure of the follies and rogueries of the Alchemists.

CANTERBURY TALES

15. The Doctor's Tale, of the death of Virginia by her own wish at her father's hands, to save her from the designs of the wicked judge Apius, who has conspired to get possession of her. Chaucer quotes Livy as the source, but has followed fairly closely the version of the story in the 'Roman de la Rose'.

16. The Pardoner's Tale has an analogue in an Italian miscellany known as the 'Cento Novelle Antiche', N. lxxxii. The Pardoner discourses on the evils of Gluttony and Drunkenness, Gambling and Swearing. This theme is illustrated by the story of three revellers who in plague-time set out on a search for Death, who has killed one of their comrades. An old man tells them they will find him under a certain tree. There they discover a heap of gold. Each designs to get sole possession of the treasure, but they only succeed in killing one another.

17. The Shipman's Tale. There is a similar story in the 'Decameron', D. viii, N. 1. The wife of a niggardly merchant asks the loan of a hundred francs from a priest to buy finery. The priest borrows the sum from the merchant and hands it to the wife, and the wife grants him her favours. On the merchant's return from a journey the priest tells him that he has repaid the sum to the wife, who cannot deny receiving it.

18. The Prioress's Tale, the source of which is unknown, is the legend of a widow's child murdered by Jews because he sings 'O alma Redemptoris mater' when passing through the Ghetto at Lincoln on his way to school. He miraculously continues his song after his throat is cut and the body is in consequence discovered. This tale is in rhyme-royal.

19. Chaucer's own contribution follows, in the form of the Tale of Sir Thopas, in which he slyly ridicules the romances of knight-errantry by contemporary rhymers. It contains phrases from 'Isuabras', 'Li Beaus Desconus' (qq.v.), and refers to Sir Bevis, Sir Guy, &c. It is soon interrupted, and Chaucer then gives the Tale of Melibeus, a prose translation of a French romance, 'a moral tale vertuous'. It is a long and (to us) tedious disputation between Melibeus and his wife Prudence on the most judicious method of dealing with enemies who have done them grievous injuries.

20. The Monk's Tale is composed of a number of 'tragedies' of persons fallen from high estate, taken from different authors and arranged on the model of Boccaccio's 'De casibus virorum illustrium'. The tale is in eight-lined stanzas.

21. The Nun's Priest's Tale, perhaps developed from one of the episodes in the French story of Reynard the Fox, tells of a fox that beguiled a cock by praising his father's singing, and was beguiled in turn to let the cock escape.

22. The Manciple's Tale is the fable of the Crow, which had been treated by many authors from Ovid onwards. A certain Phebus has a crow that is white and can counterfeit any man's speech. It thus reveals to Phebus his wife's infidelity. Phebus in a fury kills his wife, and then, in remorse, plucks out the crow's white feathers, deprives it of its speech, and throws it out 'unto the devil', which is why crows are now black.

23. The Parson's Tale, a dissertation in prose on penitence, the character of each kind of sin, and the appropriate remedy. It is probably the raw material on which Chaucer proposed to work, rather than his finished tale.

Tyrwhitt's famous text of the 'Canterbury Tales', with introductory discourse, was published in 1773-8.

Canute or CNUT, a Dane, king of England, 1016-35. The old story of Canute and the sea is told in Holinshed, vii. xiii. Being on the seashore near Southampton, he sat down close to the rising tide and bade it go no farther. When it advanced and wetted him, he said to his courtiers that they called him king, but that he 'could not stay by his commandment so much as this small portion of water'. This he did to reprove their flattery. Cf. Thackeray's satirical ballad on the subject in 'Rebecca and Rowena' (q.v.).

Canute, The Song of, a famous early English ballad stated to have been composed and sung by the king as he rowed past Ely, and recorded by a monk of Ely in 1166. It begins:

Merie sungeu the muneches binnen Ely
Tha Cnut cning reu ther by.

Canute's or CANUTUS BIRD, the Knot. The derivation of the name of this bird from King Canute (mentioned by Camden and Drayton) is said by the OED. to be without historical or even legendary foundation.

Caorain, see Cahors.

Cap of Liberty or PHRYGIAN BONNET, the conical cap placed in Roman times on the head of a slave on his emancipation. It was adopted as a symbol of liberation (the bonnet rouge) by the French Revolutionary Jacobins in April 1792, when the Swiss survivors of the mutiny at Nancy of Aug.-Sept. 1791 were released from the galleys; for the red 'Phrygian bonnet' was the head-dress of the galley slaves at Marseilles, where these men had been confined.

'Capability' Brown, see Brown (L.).

Capanēus, one of the seven heroes who marched from Argos against Thebes (see under Eteocles). He was struck with a thunderbolt by Zeus when scaling the walls of Thebes, because he defied the god.

Cape of Storms, Cabo Tormentoso, the name given to the south-western cape of Africa by its discoverer, Bartholomew Diaz, in 1487; subsequently changed by John II of Portugal to Cape of Good Hope.

Capet, the name of the French dynasty founded by Hugo Capet in 987, which ruled until 1328, when it was succeeded by the House of Valois. Louis XVI was described as Louis Capet when tried before the Convention in 1793. The origin of the surname of Hugo I is unknown.

CAPUA

CAPGRAVE, JOHN (1393-1464), an Augustinian friar, who resided most of his life in the friary at King's Lynn. He wrote, in Latin, sermons, theological tracts, and commentaries on many books of scripture. His chief Latin historical works are 'Nova Legenda Angliæ', 'De illustribus Henricis', and 'Vita Humfredi Ducis Glocestriæ'. In English he wrote lives of St. Gilbert of Sempringham and of St. Catharine of Alexandria, also a chronicle of English history extending to A.D. 1417, of some importance as an early English prose work.

Capitol, THE, in ancient Rome, that summit of the Capitoline hill on which stood the magnificent temple of Jupiter. In this temple were kept the Sibylline books, and here the consuls took the vows on entering upon office. It was to this temple also that victorious generals were carried in triumph to render thanks to Jupiter.

In modern Rome the term is applied to the Piazza del Campidoglio, in the depression between the two summits of the Capitoline hill, where Brutus made his speech after the murder of Caesar. In the centre of the Piazza stands the bronze equestrian statue of Marcus Aurelius. On one side is the Palace of the Senator, where it is said that Petrarch (q.v.) was crowned and Rienzi (q.v.) ruled as tribune.

In Washington the Capitol is the seat of the National Congress. It is built in Renaissance style, and surmounted by a great dome. It was completed in 1830.

Capitolinus, MARCUS MANLIUS, see Manlius Capitolinus.

Capitulary, a collection of ordinances, especially those made by the Frankish kings.

Caponsacchi, CANON GIUSEPPE, one of the principal characters in Browning's 'The Ring and the Book' (q.v.).

Capricorn, (a) the zodiacal constellation of the He-goat, lying between Sagittarius and Aquarius; (b) the tenth of the signs of the zodiac, which the sun enters about 21 Dec. The sign originally coincided with the constellation.

Captain, THE GREAT, see Cordova.

Captain Kettle, see Kettle.

Captain Nemo, see Nemo.

Captain Singleton, Adventures of, see Singleton.

Capua, an ancient city of Campania, famous for its wealth. It is said that the soldiers of Hannibal were enervated by its luxury when moved to winter quarters there after the battle of Cannae.

CAPUCHIN

Capuchin, a friar of the order of St. Francis, of the new rule of 1528, so called from their sharp-pointed capuches or hoods.

Capulets, THE, in Shakespeare's 'Romeo and Juliet' (q.v.), the noble Veronese house (the Cappelletti) to which Juliet belongs, hostile to the family of the Montagues (the Montecchi).

Caput Mortuum ('dead head'), in alchemy, the residuum remaining after the distillation or sublimation of any substance, good for nothing but to be thrown away, all virtue having been extracted.

Carabas, MARQUESS OF, a character in the fairy tale of 'Puss in Boots' (q.v.); also in a song by Béranger (q.v.); in B. Disraeli's 'Vivian Grey' (q.v.); and in Thackeray's 'Book of Snobs'.

Caractacus or CARADOC, king of the Silures in the west of Britain during the reign of Claudius, was defeated by the Romans and fled to Cartimandua, queen of the Brigantes, who betrayed him. He was taken a prisoner to Rome in A.D. 51, where his noble spirit so pleased the emperor that he pardoned and released him. He figures as Caratach in Beaumont and Fletcher's 'Bonduca' (q.v.). W. Mason (1724-97), the friend of Gray, wrote a play 'Caractacus'.

Caradoc, see Caractacus.

Caradoc or CRADOCK, SIR, see Boy and the Mantle.

Caran d'Ache, adapted from a Russian word meaning 'pencil', the pseudonym of Emmanuel Poiré (1858-1909), a celebrated French humorous illustrator, who employed the method of silhouettes outlined by a single continuous line.

Carausius, see Caros.

Carbine, a famous horse, brought by the duke of Portland from Australia in 1895. He won thirty-three out of his forty-three races in Australia, and was only once unplaced.

Carbonari ('charcoal-burners'), the name of a secret political association formed in the kingdom of Naples, during the French occupation under Murat, with the design of introducing a republican government. It lasted during part of the 19th cent. Louis Napoleon was a Carbonaro in his youth.

Carbonek, in the legend of the Holy Grail, the enchanted castle where the Grail is found.

Cardan, JEROME (GIROLAMO CARDANO) (1501-76), a famous Italian mathematician, and writer on medicine and occult sciences.

Cardenio, in 'Don Quixote' (q.v.), the lover of Lucinda, who, driven mad by the loss of her, haunts the Sierra Moreña, and is finally reunited with her.

Cardinal's Snuff-Box, The, Henry Harland's most popular novel.

CAREW

Cardinall, The, a tragedy by James Shirley (q.v.), produced in 1641, and printed in 1652.

This is one of the best of Shirley's plays. The cardinal, urged by ambition, designs that the Duchess Rosaura, the widowed daughter-in-law of the king of Navarre, shall marry his nephew Columbo, general of the army, and obtains the support of the king. The duchess is betrothed to Columbo accordingly, although she loves the Count Alvarez. While Columbo is at the wars she obtains the king's consent to her marriage with Alvarez. On the wedding night, Columbo murders Alvarez. Hernando, a colonel who has been affronted by Columbo in the field, plots with the duchess to be revenged, she promising him her hand if he succeeds. Hernando kills Columbo in a duel. The cardinal, suspecting the complicity of the duchess, plans to ravish and kill her. Hernando, concealed behind the arras, kills the cardinal, but not before the latter by a trick has effected the poisoning of the duchess. Hernando takes his own life.

Cardolle, CARDUEL, in the Arthurian romances, perhaps Carlisle, but in the History of Merlin said to be in Wales.

CARDUCCI, GIOSUÈ (1835-1907), an eminent Italian poet, author of 'Odi Barbare', &c.

Careless, in Sheridan's 'School for Scandal' (q.v.), one of the companions of Charles Surface. Also a character in Congreve's 'The Double Dealer' (q.v.).

Careless Husband, The, a comedy by Cibber (q.v.), printed in 1715.

Sir Charles Easy, who neglects his wife and carries on an intrigue with her woman and with Lady Graveairs, is brought to contrition by discovering that his wife's gentle and friendly treatment of him is due not to ignorance of his infidelities, but to her virtue and sense of duty. The coquette, Lady Betty Modish, is led to accept the suit of her honourable lover, Lord Morelove (with whom is contrasted the boastful lady-killer, Lord Foppington), by a plot to excite her jealousy and to persuade her that Morelove, weary of her contempt, is about to give her up.

Carew, BAMFYLD MOORE (1693-1770?), son of a Devonshire rector, who ran away from Tiverton School, joined the gipsies and became a clever sharper. He went to Newfoundland, and on his return again joined the gipsies and was convicted of being an idle rogue. He was transported to Maryland, but escaped and returned to England. He followed Prince Charles Edward's army to Derby in 1745.

CAREW (pron. 'Carey'), THOMAS (1598?-1639?), a son of Sir Thomas Carew, a master in Chancery, was educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and became secretary to Sir Dudley Carleton at Venice and subsequently for a short time at The Hague. He won the favour of Charles I, was appointed to an office at court, and received an estate from him.

CAREW

He was, in poetry, a disciple of Ben Jonson, and wrote a fine elegy on Donne. His principal works are a masque, 'Coelum Britannicum' (1634), 'The Rapture' (a fine but licentious amatory poem), and numerous graceful songs and lyrics.

CAREY, HENRY (d. 1743), is remembered as the author of the burlesque 'Chrononhotonthologos' (q.v.), as the inventor of the nickname of Ambrose Philips (q.v.), and principally as the author of the words and music of 'Sally in our Alley'. He also wrote a burlesque opera, 'The Dragon of Wantley' (1734). See also National Anthem.

Carfax (Latin quadrifurcus, four-forked), a place where four roads meet, the intersection of two principal streets in a town, as at Oxford and Exeter. The crossing of the great streets of medieval London at Leadenhall (q.v.) market was called the 'Carfukes of Leadenhall' in 1357 (Lethaby).

Carinthia Jane, the heroine of Meredith's 'The Amazing Marriage' (q.v.).

Carker, JAMES, a character in Dickens's 'Dombey and Son' (q.v.).

Carleton, Memoirs of Captain, see Memoirs of Captain Carleton.

CARLETON, WILLIAM (1794-1869), born in Tyrone, the son of a poor peasant, was the author of a number of remarkable stories of Irish peasant life, of which he paints the melancholy as well as the humorous side. His 'Traits and Stories of the Irish Peasantry' were collected and published in 1832 (first contributed to 'The Christian Examiner'), a second series following in 1833, and 'Tales of Ireland' in 1834. The best of his longer stories was 'Fardorougha, the Miser' (q.v.), 1839.

Carlton, in Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur' (q.v.), the city where Arthur was crowned and held his court, probably Caerleon-upon-Usk, though in places Carlisle appears to be meant.

CARLISLE, FREDERICK HOWARD, fifth earl of (1748-1825), Chancery guardian to Lord Byron and attacked by him in 'English Bards and Scotch Reviewers'. His tragedy, 'The Father's Revenge', was praised by Johnson and Walpole.

Carlos, DON, the deformed son of Philip II of Spain. The marriage of the latter with Elizabeth of France, who had been affianced to Don Carlos, forms the subject of Otway's tragedy 'Don Carlos' (q.v.).

Carlovingians or CAROLINGIANS, the second royal dynasty of the Franks, of which Pepin, the father of Charlemagne, was the first king (751). It was succeeded by the Capetian line in 987.

Carlton Club, THE, was founded in 1831 by the duke of Wellington and his political friends. It is a political club for men of Conservative opinions. Its present house in Pall Mall, replacing an earlier one built in 1836, was opened in 1855.

CARLYLE

Carlton House, London, from which Carlton House Terrace is named, was built for Henry Boyle, Baron Carleton (d. 1725), and sold to the Prince of Wales in 1732. It became famous as the home of George IV when Prince of Wales.

CARLYLE, ALEXANDER (1722-1805), nicknamed 'Jupiter', educated at Edinburgh University, Glasgow, and Leyden, a minister and leader of the Scottish 'Broad Church' party, was author of an interesting autobiography which refers to various notable events and personalities of the period (printed in 1860).

Carlyle, JANE BAILLIE WELSH (1801-66), wife of Thomas Carlyle (q.v.). Collections of her letters were published in 1883, 1924, and 1931.

CARLYLE, THOMAS (1795-1881), was born at Ecclefechan, in Dumfriesshire, of peasant stock. He was educated at the parish school, then at Annan Academy, and at the age of 15 entered Edinburgh University. He was subsequently a schoolmaster at Annan and Kirkcaldy, but soon took to literary work, contributing to Brewster's 'Edinburgh Encyclopaedia', studying German literature, and writing his 'Life of Schiller', which appeared in the 'London Magazine' in 1823-4 and was separately published in 1825. His translation of 'Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship' appeared in 1824, followed by that of 'Wilhelm Meister's Travels' (included in 'German Romance', 1827). In 1826 he married Jane Welsh, a Scottish lady of strong character and shrewd wit, one of the best letter-writers in the English language, and retired to her farm at Craigenputtock, on the lonely moors of Nithsdale. He contributed essays on German literature to the 'Edinburgh' and other reviews, wrote 'Sartor Resartus' (q.v.), which was published by 'Fraser's Magazine' in 1833-4, and the first part of the 'French Revolution' (q.v.). He removed to Cheyne Row, Chelsea, in 1834. The manuscript of the first volume of the 'French Revolution' was accidentally burnt while in J. S. Mill's keeping, but Carlyle re-wrote it and the work finally appeared in 1837. In the same and following years he gave several courses of popular lectures, the most successful, that 'On Heroes, Hero-Worship, and the Heroic in History', being published in 1841. In his 'Chartism' (1839) and 'Past and Present' (1843) he turned his attention to political problems of the day, and the present and future of Labour, expressing his contempt for the teachings of political economy and democratic nostrums. Salvation, according to him, was to be sought in a return to medieval conditions and the rule of the strong just man, who was not to be got by popular election. The same views, in an exaggerated form, are to be found in his 'Last-Day Pamphlets' (1850). Carlyle's second great work, 'Oliver Cromwell's Letters and Speeches', was published in 1845, and the 'Life of John Sterling' in 1851. After this he spent fourteen years on the preparation of the 'History of Frederick the Great' (published 1858-65), of which, though it is the most entertaining of his works, the result is generally considered disproportionate to the labour spent on it. Mrs. Carlyle died in 1866, and after this he wrote little of importance. 'The Early Kings of Norway' appeared in 1875. His 'Reminiscences' appeared in 1881, and his 'Life' was written with more frankness than judgement by his friend and disciple, James Anthony Froude (q.v.). Several volumes of his letters have been published: editions by C. E. Norton (1886 and 1888), 'Correspondence of Carlyle and R. W. Emerson' (1883), 'Letters of T. Carlyle to his Younger Sister' (1899), 'New Letters of T. Carlyle' (1904), 'Love Letters of T. Carlyle and Jane Welsh' (1909), 'Letters to Mill, Sterling, &c.' (1923).

CARLYLE

Carmagnole, a kind of dress much worn in France from 10 Aug. 1792. It was the southern name for a long waistcoat worn by the Marseillais 'Fédérés' who came to Paris at that date and helped to storm the Tuileries. The name was extended to a lively song and dance popular among the revolutionists in 1793.

Carmathians, see Karmathians.

Carmelites, an order of mendicant friars (called also, from the white cloak which forms part of their dress, WHITE FRIARS) and nuns, who derive their origin from a colony founded on Mt. Carmel by Berthold, a Calabrian, in the 12th cent.

Carmilhan, a spectre ship, the subject of one of Longfellow's 'Tales of a Wayside Inn'. She brings disaster to whatever ship meets her. The captain of the 'Valdemar' derides the legend, but encounters the 'Carmilhan' (with Klaboterman, the Kobold of the sea, on board) in a storm, and the 'Valdemar' is sunk.

Carmina Burana, a collection of Goliardic (q.v.) poems from the Benedictine monastery of Benedictbeuern in Bavaria. The best edition is by A. Hilka and O. Schumann, of which the first two volumes were published in 1930.

Carnac, in the Morbihan, Brittany, famous for its stone circles and other megalithic monuments. The circles of Carnac differ from the British circles in that the stones nearly touch one another.

Carnegie, ANDREW (1835-1919), the son of a damask-linen weaver of Dunfermline, was taken when a child to America by his parents, who emigrated thither during the 'hungry forties'. At the age of 13 he began work in a cotton factory. Later, by his energy and shrewd speculative investments, he became enormously rich and one of the foremost iron-masters in the United States. In 1900 he published his 'Gospel of Wealth' maintaining that a 'man who dies rich dies disgraced', and in 1901, retiring from business, set about the distribution of his surplus wealth. The most important of his benefactions from a literary standpoint was his provision of public libraries in Great Britain and the United States, on condition that the local authorities provided site and maintenance. He also instituted a trust for the universities of Scotland, and several trusts for the advancement of research and education in the United States. In 1910 he founded the Carnegie Peace Fund for the promotion of international peace.

Carol, a word whose etymology is obscure, and of which the earliest meaning appears to be a round dance; thence a song, originally the song accompanying the dance, and especially a song of joy sung at Christmas time in celebration of the Nativity. The first collection of Christmas carols that we possess was printed by Wynkyn de Worde in 1521.

Carolina, American State, appears to have been named after Charles I and Charles II, under the latter of whom, in 1663, the final settlement was made. Cf. Maryland.

Caroline, a term applied to the dramatists, authors, &c., of the period of Charles I.

Caroline, QUEEN, (1) consort of George II, figures in Scott's 'The Heart of Midlothian' (q.v.) and is prominent in the memoirs of the time; (2) consort of George IV, figures in Byron's poems, &c.

Caroline Gann or BRANDON, see Brandon.

Caroline Minuscule, a style of writing developed at Tours under Charlemagne, and perpetuated in our modern hand.

Carolingians, see Carlovingians.

Caros, in Macpherson's Ossianic poem of that name, is the Carausius of history. He was the commander of a fleet charged to protect the coast of Gaul in the reign of Maximian, but becoming suspect to the emperor, crossed to Britain, assumed the title Augustus, and was finally acknowledged by Diocletian and Maximian as their colleague in Britain, where he continued to rule until murdered in 293. In the Ossianic poem he is attacked by Ocas and his troops put to flight.

Carpathan wizard, see Proteus.

CARPENTER, JOHN (1370?-1441?), town clerk of London, 1417-38, compiled the 'Liber Albus', a valuable collection of records of the city of London (printed in the Rolls Series, 1859, translated by Riley, 1861). He left lands for educational purposes, from which the City of London School was founded.

Carpet, MAGIC, see Ahmed for that described in the 'Arabian Nights'. According to Mohammedan legend Solomon had a carpet which transported him and his army, the wind carrying it wherever he wished to go. See Koran, c. xxi, and Sale's notes to c. xxvii.

Carpet-bagger, in U.S. political slang, a scornful term applied after the American Civil War of 1861-5 to immigrants from the northern to the southern states, whose 'property qualification' consisted merely of the contents of the carpet-bag which they had brought with them. Hence applied opprobriously to all northerners who went south and tried, by the Negro vote or otherwise, to obtain political influence; and generally to any one interfering in the politics of a locality with which he is thought to have no genuine or permanent connexion.

Carpio, BERNARDO DEL, see Bernardo del Carpio.

Carrasco, SAMSON, in 'Don Quixote' (q.v.), a bachelor of the University of Salamanca, a little mirth-loving man, who, in order to cure Don Quixote of his folly, disguises himself as the Knight of the Mirrors, overcomes him in combat, and requires him to return home and abstain from chivalric exploits for a year. He boasted to Don Quixote that he had fixed Giralda, the weathercock on the cathedral of Seville.

CARROLL, LEWIS, see Dodgson.

CARSON, KIT (1809-68), famous American trapper and guide, whose activities were mainly in the Rocky Mountains region.

Cartaphilus, see Wandering Jew.

CARTER, ELIZABETH (1717-1806), daughter of a Kent clergyman, and a member of the Blue Stocking (q.v.) circle, was a friend of Richardson and of Dr. Johnson, who had a high opinion of her abilities and to whose 'Rambler' she contributed two numbers. She published a translation of Epictetus in 1758. Her letters to Miss Talbot, Mrs. Vesey, and Mrs. Montagu were published after her death (1809-17).

Cartesianism, see Descartes.

Carthage, a famous city of the ancient world, situated about the centre of the coast of N. Africa, whose power in the latter part of the 3rd cent. B.C. under the leadership of Hannibal gravely threatened Rome. The Punic Wars (as the wars between Rome and Carthage were called¹), which lasted 265-242, 218-201, and 149-146 B.C., ended in the destruction of the latter city. Its restoration was begun by Julius Caesar, and it became an important post of the Roman province of Africa. For the phrase 'delenda est Carthago', see Cato the Censor. See also Marius among the ruins of Carthage.

Carthori, the title of one of Macpherson's Ossianic poems. Clessammor, the uncle of Fingal, being driven to Balclutha by a storm, has married Moira, daughter of a local chief, but has been driven away, and left his bride behind him, and she, after giving birth to Carthori, has died. Combal, father of Fingal, has burnt Balclutha. Carthori, who was carried off to safety by his nurse, when grown to man's estate invades Morven to revenge the destruction of Balclutha. He is slain in single combat by his own father, Clessammor, who does not know him, but dies from grief on discovering that he has killed his son.

Carthusians, an order of monks founded in the Dauphiné by St. Bruno in 1086, remarkable for the severity of their rule. The name is derived 'from Caturiani Montes, or from Catorissium, Chatrouse, a village in the Dauphiné, near which their first monastery was founded' [Litttré] (not from La Grande Chartreuse, which was named after the order). See also under Charterhouse.

Carton, SYDNEY, a character in Dickens's 'A Tale of Two Cities' (q.v.).

Caruso, ENRICO (1873-1921), the famous Italian operatic singer, a tenor, was born at Naples. He first came into prominence by his singing in 'La Bohème' in 1894, in which as Rodolfo he subsequently achieved one of his greatest successes. He sang only in Italian and French opera. From 1903 till his death he was the leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York.

Carvel, Hans, see Hans Carvel.

CARY, HENRY FRANCIS (1772-1844), educated at Christ Church, Oxford, was an assistant librarian at the British Museum from 1826 to 1837. He translated Dante's 'Divina Commedia' ('Inferno', 1805-6; 'Purgatorio' and 'Paradiso', 1814); and wrote a series of articles on the early French poets in the 'London Magazine' (collected 1846).

Carya'tids (a word meaning 'maidens of Caryae', a town in Laconia, where, at the annual festival of Artemis, it was customary for bands of girls to perform ritual dances), female statues in long drapery used instead of columns to support the entablature of a temple. One of the Caryatids from the Erechtheum in Athens is now in the British Museum.

CARYLL, JOHN (1625-1711), diplomatist, secretary to Mary of Modena, queen of James II, and author of 'Sir Solomon Single', a comedy. He was a friend and correspondent of Pope, to whom he suggested the subject of 'The Rape of the Lock' (q.v.).

Casabianca, LOUIS (1755-98), a Corsican who commanded the French vessel 'l'Orient' at the battle of Aboukir, where he is said to have blown up his ship to prevent its falling into the hands of the English, and perished with his little son. This incident is the subject of the well-known poem by Mrs. Hemans (q.v.).

CASANOVA DE SEINGALT, GIACOMO (1725-98), an Italian adventurer, whose Memoirs, written in an imperfect but lively French, describe, with shameless frankness, his rogueries, adventures, and amours in most countries of Europe, and provide an entertaining picture of 18th-cent. European society and of the very singular author. Casanova's veracity has been much questioned, and no doubt it is rather in the main outlines of the picture than in its details that he is to be trusted.

Casaubon, Mr., a leading character in G. Eliot's 'Middlemarch' (q.v.).

CASAUBON, ISAAC (1559-1614), a French Huguenot scholar and theologian, born in exile at Geneva, who resided in London from 1610 to 1614. His chief work was his criticism of the 'Annales Ecclesiastici' of Baronius, in his 'De rebus sacris et ecclesiasticis exercitationes' (1614). He published critical editions of a number of classical authors of the early Christian era. He was too learned and too critical a scholar to find rest in any of the churches of the day. A life of Casaubon was written by Mark Pattison (q.v., 1875).

Casby, CHRISTOPHER and FLORA, characters in Dickens's 'Little Dorrit' (q.v.).

Casca, one of the conspirators in Shakespeare's 'Julius Caesar' (q.v.).

Case is altered, The, a comedy by Jonson (q.v.), printed in 1609, but written before 1599.

Count Ferneze, who has lost an infant son, Camillo, when Vicenza was captured by the French general Chamont, sees his elder son Paulo go off to the wars against this same Chamont, under the special care of his general Maximilian. Paulo is taken prisoner, but on the other hand Maximilian brings back Chamont and his friend Gasper captive. It is agreed that Gasper shall return and effect an exchange between Paulo and Chamont, but Gasper personates Chamont, and Chamont himself departs. The trick is discovered, and Ferneze is on the point of executing Gasper, when Chamont returns with Paulo, and it is moreover discovered that Gasper is Ferneze's lost son Camillo. The other elements of the play are more amusing: the attempts made by various parties to secure the daughter and the treasure of the beggar Jaques de Prie (neither of them his by rights), and the fun made of Antonio Balladino, a character in which Anthony Munday (q.v.) is ridiculed.

Caseldy, a character in Meredith's 'The Tale of Chloe' (q.v.).

Cask of Amontillado, The, a tale by Edgar Allan Poe (q.v.).

Casket Letters, THE, letters supposed to have passed between Mary Queen of Scots and Bothwell, and to have established her complicity in the murder of Darnley. They were repudiated by the queen as forgeries (and some have suspected George Buchanan, q.v., as the forger), but it was threatened that they would be used as evidence against her. They disappeared before the end of the 16th cent. and have never been recovered.

Caslon, WILLIAM (1692-1766), a London type-founder, famous in the history of printing. His broadside showing specimens of roman and italic in no fewer than twelve different sizes was issued in 1734. Caslon type has been, in the late 19th and early 20th cents., perhaps the most popular in good book printing.

Cassandra, daughter of Priam, king of Troy, received the gift of prophecy from Apollo, who was enamoured of her. But as she slighted him, the god contrived that no trust should be placed in her predictions. After the fall of Troy she fell to the lot of Agamemnon, who took her back to Greece and to whom she foretold the calamities that awaited him. She was murdered by Clytemnestra (q.v.).

Cassandre, a romance by La Calprenède (q.v.). It was translated into English in the middle of the 17th cent. and is said to have been read by Charles I in prison.

Cassibellaun (CASSIBELAN in Shakespeare's 'Cymbeline'), or CASSIVELLAUNUS, the ruler of the country north of the Thames, who was given the chief command of the British forces that resisted Caesar's second invasion (54 B.C.). He was defeated and obliged to sue for peace. Legend makes him brother and successor of Lud (q.v.).

Cassim, the brother of Ali Baba (q.v.).

Cassio, MICHAEL, in Shakespeare's 'Othello' (q.v.), the Moor's lieutenant.

CASSIODORUS, MAGNUS AURELIUS (c. A.D. 480-575), of Scylacum in Bruttium (the modern Squillace in Calabria), a distinguished statesman who governed for many years the Ostrogothic kingdom under Theodoric the Great and his successors, and a man of exceptional learning for his period. He spent the last years of his life at the monastery at Viviers which he had founded. There he set his monks to copy classical (Latin) manuscripts; much would have been lost but for this. He was author of several works in Latin, of which the most important is a collection of state papers known as 'Variarum Epistolarum Libri XII'.

Cassîôpëa, wife of Cepheus, king of Ethiopia, and mother of Andromeda (q.v.). She boasted herself (or her daughter) more beautiful than the Nereids, thus incurring the wrath of Poseidon. She was changed into a northern constellation, the 'starr'd Ethiop queen' of Milton's 'Il Penseroso'.

Cassîtêrides, the 'tin islands' of the ancient Greeks; possibly Cornwall, where there are tin mines, or islands off the Spanish coast, near Finisterre.

Cassius, in Shakespeare's 'Julius Caesar', the friend of Brutus and leader of the conspiracy against Julius Caesar.

Castalia, the name of a spring on Mt. Parnassus, sacred to Apollo and the Muses, said to be so called from Castalia (daughter of Achelous), who plunged into it to escape the pursuit of Apollo.

CASTALIO

Castallo, a character in Otway's 'The Orphan' (q.v.).

Castara, see Habington.

CASTIGLIONE, BALDASSARE (1478-1529), Italian humanist, chiefly known for his prose dialogue, 'Il Cortegiano' (1528), translated in 1561 into English by Sir Thomas Hoby (1530-66). In this dialogue, which takes place at the court of Urbino, and is presided over by the duchess, all the qualifications of the ideal courtier, ethical and intellectual, as well as military, sporting, and elegant, are set out and discussed. The work had much influence on the literature of England, e.g. on Surrey, Wyatt, Sidney, and Spenser.

Castle Dangerous, a novel by Sir W. Scott (q.v.) published in 1832, as the last of the 'Tales of My Landlord'.

The story deals with the defence in 1306 of Douglas Castle by Sir John de Walton, assisted by the young knight Aymer de Valence, on behalf of the king of England, against the forces of Robert the Bruce and Sir James Douglas ('The Black Douglas'). The Lady Augusta of Berkeley, a noble and beautiful young Englishwoman, has offered her hand and fortune to the English knight who will hold it for a year and a day. In a spirit of light-hearted frolic she herself goes in disguise, with an aged minstrel, Bertram, to the neighbourhood of the castle. Here she is in danger of being treated as a spy by Sir John, before he discovers her identity, and then is captured by the Douglas, and is offered to Sir John in exchange for the castle. Sir John's embarrassment is solved by the arrival of orders to surrender the castle, and the lady is restored to her lover.

Castle of Indolence, The, a poem in Spenserian stanzas by J. Thomson (1700-48, q.v.), published in 1748.

This, the most polished and musical of Thomson's works, was begun in 1733. It consists of two cantos, of which the first describes the castle of the wizard Indolence, into which he entices the weary pilgrims of this earth. Once there, a torpor steals over them, and they sink into idleness amid delightful sights and sounds. With a light touch of caricature various real persons, including the poet himself, inhabitants of the castle, are sketched in. Presently, becoming diseased and loathsome, the inmates are thrown into a dungeon and left there to languish. The second canto describes the conquest of the wizard and the destruction of his castle by the knight of Arms and Industry.

Castle of Otranto, The, a Gothic Story, a novel by H. Walpole (q.v.), published in 1764.

This work purported in the first edition to be a translation from the Italian, but its authorship was acknowledged in the second edition. The events related are supposed to have occurred in the 12th or 13th cents.

CASTLEREAGH

Manfred, prince of Otranto, the villain of the story, is the grandson of a usurper of the realm, who had poisoned Alfonso, the rightful lord. It had been prophesied that the line of the usurper should continue to reign until the rightful owner had grown too large to inhabit the castle and as long as male issue of the usurper remained to enjoy it. When the story opens, Manfred is about to marry his only son to the beautiful Isabella, but on the eve of the wedding the son is mysteriously killed. Terrified lest he should be left without male descendants, Manfred determines to divorce his wife and marry Isabella himself. Isabella escapes with the assistance of Theodore, a young peasant, bearing a singular resemblance to the portrait of Alfonso, and already under suspicion of some connexion with the death of Manfred's son. Theodore is imprisoned, but is released by Matilda, Manfred's daughter, with whom he falls in love. Manfred, suspicious of an amour between Theodore and Isabella, and learning that Theodore and a lady from the castle are together by night at Alfonso's tomb, hurries there and stabs the lady, only to find that he has killed his daughter, Matilda. The supernatural element that has pervaded the story now brings it to an end. The ghost of Alfonso (a mysterious gigantic figure that haunts the castle), in accordance with the prophecy has grown too big for the edifice, and throws it down, and terror forces Manfred to reveal the usurpation. Theodore turns out to be the heir of Alfonso and the rightful prince, and marries Isabella.

Castle Perilous, in Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur' (the story of Beaumains or Sir Gareth), the castle of the Lady Lyones. See Gareth and Lynette.

Castle Rackrent, a novel by M. Edgeworth (q.v.), published in 1801.

Thady Quirk, steward to the Rackrent family, tells the story of the family since he has known it. He begins with the hard-drinking Sir Patrick who dies singing his favourite song:

He that goes to bed, and goes to bed sober,
Falls as the leaves do . . .

Next comes the litigious Sir Murtagh, who 'out of forty-nine suits which he had, never lost one but seventeen'. Then follows the quarrelsome Sir Kit, who marries a 'Jewish', and locks her up for seven years. Last comes Sir Condy, who tosses up whether he shall marry the rich Miss Moneygawl or the pretty Judy Quirk, and runs through the remainder of the Rackrent property, much of which passes into the hands of Attorney Quirk, Thady's son, a sharp-witted rascal. The book gives a vivid picture of the reckless living which in the 18th cent. brought many Irish landlords to ruin.

Castlereagh, ROBERT STEWART, second marquis of Londonderry, better known as Viscount Castlereagh (1769-1822), was chief secretary for Ireland 1799-1801, and secured the passing of the Act of Union by the Irish parliament. He was subsequently president of the board of control and in charge of the war and colonial offices. He sent Wellesley to Portugal and was responsible for the Walcheren expedition. He fought a duel with Canning in 1809, wounded him, and resigned office. He was foreign secretary from 1812 to 1822, and took a leading part in the European settlement at the Congress of Vienna and after Waterloo, restraining the allies from retaliation on France. His mind became affected by work and responsibility and he committed suicide. Shelley (q.v.) in his 'Masque of Anarchy' (provoked by the Peterloo, q.v., affair) wrote:

I met Murder on the way—
He had a face like Castlereagh.

Castlewood, THOMAS, third Viscount, and his wife ISABEL; FRANCIS, fourth Viscount, his wife RACHEL, and his daughter BEATRIX; FRANCIS, fifth Viscount; characters in Thackeray's 'Esmond' (q.v.). Also EUGENE, Earl of Castlewood, in Thackeray's 'The Virginians' (q.v.), son of the last named.

Castor and Pollux, twin brothers, known as the DIOSCURI, sons of Zeus by Leda (q.v.). They took part in the expedition of the Argonauts (q.v.), in the course of which Pollux defeated and slew Amycus in the combat of the cestus, and was thereafter reckoned the god of wrestling and boxing. Castor distinguished himself in the management of horses. The twins were also regarded as the friends of navigators, having the power to calm storms. They were made a constellation known as Gemini or the Twins.

Castor is a name given to the phenomenon known as a Corposant (see Elmo's Fire). When two corposants were seen together, they were called Castor and Pollux and were thought to portend the cessation of a storm.

Castriot, GEORGE, see Scanderbeg.

Castruccio Castracani, The Sword of, a poem by E. B. Browning. He was a famous soldier of the 14th cent. and a leader of the Ghibellines. His sword, which had been kept till some patriot should arise and free Italy, was offered to Victor Emmanuel, who exclaimed, 'Questa è per me'.

Catachrêsis, application of a term to a thing it does not properly denote; misuse of words.

Catacomb, a word of uncertain etymology, (a) representing the Latin catacumbus, used as early as the 5th cent. in connexion with the subterranean cemetery under the Basilica of St. Sebastian on the Appian Way near Rome, in or near which the bodies of the apostles Peter and Paul were said to have been deposited: this is the only sense in which the word is used in English before the 17th cent. (b) In later times applied (in the plural) to all the subterranean cemeteries lying around Rome (some of which, after having long been covered up and forgotten, were accidentally discovered in 1578). The word is also extended to similar subterranean works elsewhere. Scott in 'Old Mortality', c. ix, uses it for a compartment in a cellar.

Catalan, variant of CATHAIAN, a man of Cathay or China; 'used also to signify a sharper, from the dexterous thieving of those people' [Nares], and so used by Shakespeare in 'Merry Wives', II. i.

Catalectic, said of a verse whose last foot is truncated and has only one syllable, or is altogether cut off; e.g. 'Best and brightest, come away'. Cf. acatalectic.

Caterans, Highland irregular fighting men, marauders.

Catharine of Alexandria, St., a princess in the 3rd cent., who embraced the Christian religion by divine inspiration, and converted all with whom she came in communication, including the wife of the Emperor Maxentius and his general Porphyrius. She was beheaded in 307, after other methods of putting her to death, including that of the wheel which bears her name (a diabolical engine consisting of four wheels armed with knives and teeth turning different ways), had failed owing to divine interposition. Her body was conveyed by angels to Mount Sinai, where the convent of St. Catharine was founded to commemorate the spot.

A CATHERINE WHEEL is a kind of firework which rotates while burning; or a lateral somersault.

CATHARINE OF GENOA, ST. (b. 1447), born at Genoa of an illustrious family. She felt an early vocation to a convent life, but was refused on account of her youth. Her marriage to Giuliano Adorno was unhappy. She became an outstanding mystic, and wrote 'Dialogues of the Soul and Body' and a 'Treatise on Purgatory'.

Catharine of Siena, St. (1347-80), an Italian saint. Her holiness of life and gift of diplomacy were so famous that she was called upon to mediate between Pope Urban VI and the Florentines in 1378. It was through her persuasion that Gregory XI returned from Avignon to Rome. Her extensive correspondence with popes and princes, instinct with religious fervour, was published in 1860.

Cathay ('Khitai'), the name under which China was known under the Mongol dynasty, the Khitans being a people of Manchu race to the NE. of China who established an empire over north China during two centuries ending in 1123. See 'Cathay, and the way thither, or the medieval geography of Asia' by Sir Henry Yule (1866), which includes the narratives of the voyages of Friar Odoric of Pordenone early in the 14th cent., of Ibn Batuta of Tangier (1325-55), and of Benedict Goës, a Jesuit born about 1561 in the Azores, who was one of the missionaries sent to Akbar in 1594; he proceeded from India to China early in the 17th cent.

CATHER

CATHER, WILLA SIBERT (1876–), American novelist, born in Virginia. Her chief books are: 'My Antonia' (1918), 'Youth and the Bright Medusa' (1920), 'One of Ours' (1922), 'A Lost Lady' (1923), 'Death Comes for the Archbishop' (1927), 'Shadows on the Rock' (1931).

Catherine, a novel by Thackeray (q.v.), published in 1839–40, and written under the pseudonym 'Ikey Solomons, junior'. It is an ironical tale of a criminal life, designed to discredit the practice of ennobling crime in fiction. Catherine Hayes, from whom 'Catherine' was drawn, was executed for the murder of her husband in 1726.

Catherine de Bourgh, Lady, a character in Jane Austen's 'Pride and Prejudice' (q.v.).

Catholic Church, a term first applied to the whole body of Christian believers, as distinguished from an individual congregation or particular body of Christians. After the separation of the Eastern and Western Churches, 'Catholic' was assumed by the latter as its descriptive epithet, and 'Orthodox' by the former. At the Reformation the term 'Catholic' was claimed as its exclusive right by the body remaining under the Roman obedience, in opposition to the Protestant or Reformed Churches. These however also retained the term, giving it, for the most part, a wider and more ideal and absolute sense. In England it was claimed that the Church, even as Reformed, was the national branch of the 'Catholic Church' in its proper historical sense. As a consequence, in order to distinguish the unreformed Latin church, its chosen epithet of 'Catholic' was further qualified by 'Roman'. On this analogy 'Anglo-Catholic' has been used by some, since about 1835, of the Anglican Church, in preference to 'Protestant' [OED.]. In the latter part of the 19th and in the 20th cents., the term Anglo-Catholic has been applied in a more special sense to the present high church element in the Anglican Church, which was associated with the Oxford Movement (q.v.) and emphasizes the Catholic as distinct from the Protestant character of that Church.

The OLD CATHOLICS are a religious party who separated from the Roman Catholic communion in Germany after the Vatican Council of 1870–1.

Catholic King, His Catholic Majesty, a title assumed by the kings of Spain. It was given first to Isabella (by Alexander VI), then to her and her husband Ferdinand.

Catiline, a Roman tragedy by Jonson (q.v.), first acted in 1611. The play is based on the events of the year 63 B.C., when Catiline organized a conspiracy to overthrow the existing government and to renew with the aid of Sulla's veterans the scenes of bloodshed which Rome had recently seen. Cicero and Antonius were elected consuls, and Catiline, secretly encouraged by Caesar and Crassus, prepared for a rising. Cicero, however, warned by Fulvia, the mistress of Curius, of the intention to assassinate him as a first step in the movement, summons the senate and accuses Catiline, who leaves Rome and joins the troops raised by his adherents at Faesulae. Cicero obtains evidence of the guilt of the conspirators through the ambassadors of the Allobroges, and submits it to the senate, which resolves that they shall be put to death. Catiline falls in the decisive engagement between his troops and those of the government commanded by Petreius.

Catnach, James (1792–1841), a publisher in Seven Dials, London. He issued at a very low price a large number of chap-books, ballads, and broadsides, many of them about crimes, highwaymen, and executions, which throw much light on his period.

Cato, a tragedy by Addison (q.v.), produced in 1713.

It deals with the last phase of the life of Marcus Porcius Cato the republican, who is besieged in Utica by Caesar (46 B.C.). He is betrayed by Sempronius, a senator, and by Syphax, a Numidian ally, but faithfully supported by Juba, the Numidian prince. Further resistance to Caesar being useless, he provides for the escape of his friends and takes his own life rather than surrender to the dictator. A love interest is added to the play in the devotion of Juba to Cato's daughter Marcia, and in the rivalry of the two sons of Cato for the hand of Lucia, a rivalry resolved by the death of one of them while bravely resisting the traitor Syphax.

The political excitement at the moment when the play was produced—Anne's health was failing and the question of the succession was acute—contributed to the success of a drama dealing with Cato's last stand for liberty.

Cato the Censor (234–149 B.C.) was famous for his opposition in that office to the prevalent fashions of luxury. Having been sent on a mission to Africa, he was so struck with the reviving prosperity of Carthage that he became convinced that Rome would never be safe until Carthage was destroyed. Therefore whenever called upon to vote in the senate, and whatever the subject, his final words (according to Florus) were 'Delenda est Carthago'.

Cato Street Conspiracy, a plot by a certain Thistlewood (q.v.) and some thirty other persons in 1820 to murder the ministers of the Crown at a cabinet dinner, provoked by the repressive measures taken by the government against the advocates of reform. The conspirators met in a stable in Cato Street near the Edgware Road. The conspiracy was betrayed and the leaders executed.

notorious sister of Publius Clodius. He had a country house at Sirmio on the Lacus Benacus (Lake of Garda), the Sirmione of Tennyson's 'Frater, ave atque vale'.

Caucus, a word of obscure origin, which arose in New England, said to have been used in Boston (U.S.) before 1724. In the U.S. it signifies a private meeting of the representatives of a political party previous to an election or to a general meeting of the party, to select candidates for office or to concert other measures for furthering the party's interests. In English newspapers since 1878 it has been generally misused and applied opprobriously to a committee or organization charged with seeking to manage the elections and dictate to the constituencies, but which is in fact usually a representative committee popularly elected for the purpose of securing concerted political action in a constituency. [OED.]

Caudine Forks, narrow passes in the mountains of Samnium where the Roman army surrendered to the Samnites in 321 B.C., and were obliged to pass under the yoke (a spear supported transversely by two others placed upright) to symbolize their subjugation.

Cauline, SIR, the subject of a ballad included in Percy's 'Reliques', a young knight at the court of the king of Ireland, who falls in love with Christabelle, the king's daughter, is banished, returns in disguise and slays a grim 'Soldan' giant who is a suitor for the princess, but is himself mortally wounded. Christabelle dies of a broken heart.

Caurus, Latin name of the NW. wind.

Cavaller, Memoirs of a, see Memoirs.

Cavaliers, a name given to the adherents of the king in the Civil War of the 17th cent. It was originally reproachful and given to the swashbucklers on the king's side, who hailed the prospect of war.

CAVALIER LYRICS, a term applied to the lyrical poetry of which there was a remarkable outburst during the reign of Charles I, and of which the court was the centre, though Robert Herrick, the chief of these lyrics, was not a courtier. The principal other Cavalier lyrics were Thomas Carew, Sir John Suckling, and Richard Lovelace (qq.v.).

Cave, EDWARD (1691-1754), the son of a Rugby cobbler, became a London printer and published many journals and books, but is chiefly remembered as the founder of the 'Gentleman's Magazine' (q.v.), which he conducted from 1731 until his death.

CAVENDISH, GEORGE (1500-61?), a gentleman of Thomas Wolsey's household, and author of a remarkable biography of the cardinal, in which with much art he contrasts the magnificence of the cardinal's life with his subsequent disgrace, and indicates 'the wondrous mutability of vain honours . . . and the fickle trust to worldly princes'. It was first printed in 1641, but was previously circulated in manuscript.

Cavendish, HENRY (1731-1810), natural philosopher, grandson of the second duke of Devonshire, educated at Peterhouse, Cambridge. He discovered the constitution of water and atmospheric air, and experimented on electricity and the density of the earth. His name is commemorated in the CAVENDISH LABORATORY at Cambridge for physical research, founded in 1874 by the seventh duke of Devonshire.

Cavendish, THOMAS (1560-92), fitted out three ships in 1586 and circumnavigated the globe, reaching Plymouth on his return in September 1588. His ship was the 'Desire'. In the course of his voyage he captured the great treasure-ship off the coast of California. He planned another voyage in 1591 with Capt. John Davis, but died at sea.

Cavendish on Whist, 'The Principles of whist, stated and explained by Cavendish' (the pseudonym of HENRY JONES, 1831-99), published in 1862. Jones was a member of the Cavendish Whist Club.

Cavour, CAMILLO BENSO, Count di (1810-61), was prime minister in the Sardinian government 1852-9 and 1860-1. He caused Sardinia to join the western allies against Russia in 1855 and sent a Sardinian force to the Crimea under La Marmora. Having thus enhanced the international status of Sardinia, he in 1858 secured an alliance with Napoleon III, which led to the successful campaign of 1859 against Austria. He resigned office in anger on learning the terms of peace settled by the two emperors at Villafranca and accepted by Victor Emmanuel, by which Sardinia acquired only Lombardy. On his return to office in 1860 he effected the annexation of Tuscany, and after Garibaldi's adventurous, and at times embarrassing, expedition to Sicily and Naples, the annexation of southern Italy. His statesmanship thus brought about, before his death, the unification of the greater part of Italy.

CAXTON, WILLIAM (1422?-91), the first English printer, was born in Kent and apprenticed, 1438, to a London mercer. He went, after his master's death, to Bruges, 1441, where he remained till 1470 engaged in business and acting as governor (1465-9) of the English merchants in the Low Countries. He was also employed in negotiating commercial treaties with the dukes of Burgundy. From 1471 to 1476 he was in the household of Margaret (sister of Edward IV), duchess of Burgundy. Caxton began translating the French romance 'Le Recueil des Histoires de Troie' in March 1469 at Bruges and finished it in 1471 at Cologne. He learned printing after 1471 and before 1474, probably at Cologne and in company of Colard Mansion. He printed his 'Recuyell of the Histories of Troy', folio, probably in 1474, and 'The Game and Playe of the Chesse' (q.v.), another translation from the French, probably in 1475, both perhaps at a press set up in 1473 by Colard Mansion at Bruges and belonging to Caxton. He came to England in 1476, and continued in favour with Edward IV, Richard III, and Henry VII. He established a press at Westminster from which he issued, 1477-91, nearly eighty separate books, many of them translations by himself from French romances (the first of them was the earl of Rivers's translation of 'The Dictes and Sayings of the Philosophers', 1477). Six distinct founts of type were used by Caxton. At Westminster he lived in a house in the Almonry, near the west end of the abbey. His importance in the history of English literature is by no means confined to his work as a printer, for he contributed by his translations to the formation in the 15th cent. of an English prose style.

Caxtons, The, a novel by Bulwer Lytton (q.v.), published in 1849.

Pisistratus Caxton narrates, with gentle humour, the simple annals of the Caxton family. He gives a pleasant picture of his father, a kindly scholar absorbed in a great work; his uncle Jack, who pursues his mania for speculative enterprises with results disastrous to the family; and his other uncle, Roland, an old warrior in whose opinion Sir William Caxton who fought at Bosworth is a more creditable ancestor than Caxton the printer. The only considerable incident in the story is the attempt of the Byronic youth Vivian, who turns out to be the reprobate son of Roland, to carry off Fanny Trevanion, the rich heiress. Pisistratus, who has been in love with her and secretary to her father, emigrates to Australia and eventually marries his cousin Blanche.

Cayster, a river in Lydia, falling into the Aegean Sea near Ephesus, and according to the poets celebrated for its swans.

Cebès, a Greek philosopher, of Thebes, who figures in Plato's 'Phaedo'. The 'Picture' or 'Table' (πίναξ), a work once attributed to him, a symbolical representation of the life of man, is now held to be by a later author.

CEDILLA

Cecial, TOM, in 'Don Quixote' (q.v.), Sancho Panza's neighbour, who engages himself as mock-squire to the bachelor Samson Carrasco (q.v.) when the latter masquerades as the Knight of the Mirrors.

Cecilia, St., a Christian martyr who died at Rome in 230. She is said to have been forced to marry, in spite of her vows of celibacy, a certain Valerian. She converted him to Christianity, and both suffered martyrdom. Through a medieval misinterpretation of a sentence in her Acts ('Cantantibus organis in corde suo soli domino decantabat') she came to be associated with church music and in particular with the organ, which she was supposed to have played. When the Academy of Music was founded at Rome in 1584 she was adopted as the patroness of Church Music. Her story is told in Chaucer's 'Second Nun's Tale' (see Canterbury Tales). Dryden (q.v.) wrote a 'Song for St. Cecilia's Day', and Pope (q.v.) an 'Ode for Music on Saint Cecilia's Day'.

Cecilia, or Memoirs of an Heiress, a novel by F. Burney (q.v.), published in 1782.

This was the second of Miss Burney's novels, and was at once successful. Cecilia Beverley has inherited a large fortune on the sole condition that her husband must take her name. Until she comes of age she is required to live with one of her three guardians. The first of these is Harrel, a gambler, who, failing in his attempt to exploit her, and to save himself from ruin, commits suicide. The second is the impossibly vulgar and avaricious Briggs. Cecilia goes to stay with the third, the Hon. Compton Delville, a man of overweening family pride, 'arrogant without merit, imperious without capacity'. She and Mortimer Delville, his son, fall deeply in love with one another; but old Delville treats Cecilia with contempt, and is furious at the idea that his son should exchange his name for hers. A marriage is nevertheless arranged between the young couple on the basis that Cecilia shall renounce her fortune and Delville keep his name. But this plan is defeated by the machinations of the crafty Monckton, whom Cecilia has always regarded as a trusty friend, but who, being married to a woman much older than himself, hopes to win Cecilia and her fortune when his own wife dies. Monckton's treachery is exposed, Cecilia and Mortimer Delville are married, and after further tribulations old Delville is reconciled to the match. There are many admirably drawn subsidiary characters, notably the mischievous rattle, Lady Honoria Pemberton.

Cecilia Halkett, a character in Meredith's 'Beauchamp's Career' (q.v.).

Celestial Empire, THE, the translation of one of the native names for China.

Celestina, or the Tragi-Comedy of Calisto and Melibea, a dialogue in 21 acts, the greater part by Fernando de Rojas (q.v.), published in 1501.

The work takes the form of a dialogue, but is essentially dramatic, and marks an important stage in the literary history of Spain and of Europe. Though, as Mabbe, its translator observes, 'some part of it seemeth somewhat more obscene than may suit with a civil style', it is an extremely vivid, entertaining work, one of the first to present romance in everyday life. The reader is brought into disreputable, but admirably depicted, company. The principal interlocutors are these: Calisto, a young gentleman of birth and fortune; Melibea, a modest and romantic young lady; Celestina, a crafty wise old bawd; Parmeno and Sempronio, the rascally braggart servants of Calisto; and Elicia and Areusa, two wenches. The plot is briefly as follows. Calisto casually meeting Melibea falls violently in love with her, but is, from her modesty, sharply repulsed. On the advice of one of his servants he calls in the aid of Celestina, who interposing in the affair deflects Melibea from the path of virtue and brings about a general catastrophe. Celestina is murdered by Parmeno and Sempronio for a share in the reward that she has received, and these are punished with death for their crime. Calisto is killed in one of his secret meetings with Melibea, and she in despair takes her own life.

An excellent and racy, if exuberantly diffuse translation into English was made by James Mabbe (q.v.) and published in 1631. It has been reissued in the Tudor Translations. An English play or interlude, of unknown authorship, called 'Calisto and Melibea', was published by John Rastell about 1530. It is an adaptation of the earlier part of the Spanish work, and is one of the first English dramatic works that approach true comedy.

Celia, one of the principal characters in Shakespeare's 'As You Like It' (q.v.). See also Caelia.

CELLINI, BENVENUTO (1500-71), a

CENT NOUVELLES NOUVELLES

Florentine goldsmith and sculptor, and author of one of the most vivid and interesting autobiographies ever written. The first edition was published in 1730 (dedicated to Richard Boyle) at Naples. The best English translation is that by J. A. Symonds (q.v.), published in 1888. There is also a translation by Thomas Roscoe (1791-1871), with some passages omitted; reissued (with the omitted passages restored) in the 'World's Classics', 1926. Cellini combined the characters of artist and bravo; he was an arrogant, passionate, conceited man, vainglorious but not (thinks Symonds) deliberately untruthful. His autobiography gives a striking picture of 16th-cent. life in Rome and Paris, and throws interesting light on such personages as Pope Paul III, François I, and Cosimo de' Medici.

Celt, a name applied in modern times to peoples speaking languages akin to those of the ancient Galli or Gauls, including the Bretons in France, the Cornish, Welsh, Irish, Manx, and Gaelic of the British Isles. Also a name applied to flint implements of the Stone Age.

Celtic Twilight, The, a collection of stories by Yeats (q.v.), published in 1893, illustrating the mysticism of the Irish and their belief in fairies, ghosts, and spirits. It has since become a generic phrase (slightly ironical) for the whole Irish literary revival movement.

Cenci, The, a tragedy by P. B. Shelley (q.v.), published in 1819.

Count Francesco Cenci, the head of one of the noblest and richest families in Rome under the pontificate of Clement VIII, after a life of wickedness and debauchery, conceived an implacable hatred against his children, which towards one daughter Beatrice took the form of an incestuous passion. Beatrice, after vain attempts to escape from her miserable situation, plotted with her step-mother Lucretia, and her brother Giacomo, the murder of their common tyrant. It was done by two hired assassins. Circumstances having aroused suspicion against them, the Cenci were arrested, and by dint of examinations and torture, the facts were discovered, and the Cenci sentenced to death. In spite of the compassion aroused by their lamentable tale, the executions of Beatrice, her step-mother, and one of her brothers were carried out by order of the pope. These events occurred in the year 1599, and are made the subject of Shelley's play.

Censorship, see Appendix I.

Cent Nouvelles Nouvelles, Les, a collection of French tales, probably related to a real Court audience, of the jokes and intrigues of burghers and their dames and serving-maids, licentious in character, and showing Italian influence (e.g. of the 'Decameron'). It was presented by its author to Philippe duke of Burgundy in 1462.

CENTAURS

Centaurs, THE, a fabulous people of Thessaly, half men and half horses (see Ixion). The legend of their existence perhaps arose from the ancient inhabitants of Thessaly having tamed horses and appearing to their neighbours mounted on horseback. The celebrated battle of the Centaurs and the Lapithae (q.v.) occurred in consequence of a quarrel at the marriage of Hippodamia and Peirithous, king of the Lapithae. The Centaurs, who had been invited to the feast, intoxicated with wine, offered violence to the women. The Lapithae, resenting the injury, drove the Centaurs from the country. Famous among the Centaurs was Cheiron (q.v.).

CENTLIVRE, SUSANNAH (1667?-1723), actress and dramatist, married in 1706 Joseph Centlivre, cook to Queen Anne. She wrote eighteen plays, chiefly comedies, between 1700 and 1722. 'The Wonder! a Woman Keeps a Secret' (1714) provided Garrick with one of his most successful parts, and 'The Busybody' (q.v., 1709) and 'A Bold Stroke for a Wife' (q.v., 1718) are tolerably good.

Cento (Latin cento, a garment of patchwork), a literary composition made up of scraps from various authors, or, more loosely, a 'string' or farrago.

Cephalus, (1) the husband of Procris, daughter of Erechtheus. Eos (see Aurora) fell in love with him, and caused dissension between husband and wife. Artemis gave Procris a dog called Laelaps ('Storm') and a spear that never missed its aim. These Procris gave to Cephalus and a reconciliation followed. But Procris was still jealous, and watched her husband, hidden in a bush, when he was hunting. Cephalus, thinking that he heard some animal stirring in the bush, hurled the spear and killed Procris. 'There is a reference to this myth in the 'Shafalus' and 'Procrus' of Pyramus and Thisbe (Shakespeare, 'Midsummer Night's Dream', v. i). Milton refers to Cephalus as 'the Attic boy' in 'Il Penseroso' (q.v.). (2) The father of Lysias (q.v.), the old man in Bk. I of Plato's 'Republic'.

Cepheissus, THE, the chief river of Attica, flowing from Mt. Pentelicus past Athens.

CEPOLA or CEPOLLÀ, BARTOLOMÉ (d. c. 1477), an Italian jurist born at Verona, author of various legal works. His 'Cautelae juris utilissimae' (Venice, 1485) or 'Devices' and tricks for evading the law are often alluded to (e.g. Rabelais, II. x).

Cerberus, the dog of Pluto (q.v.), who had fifty heads according to Hesiod, and three according to other authors. He was stationed at the entrance of Hades, to prevent the living from descending to the infernal regions, and the dead from escaping. The heroes who in their lifetime visited Pluto's kingdom appeared him with a cake, for instance Aeneas ('Aen.' vi. 417), whence the expression 'a sop to Cerberus'; Orpheus (q.v.) lulled him to sleep with his lyre.

Cercôpes, cunning thievish gnomes who tried to steal the weapons of Hercules in his sleep, and were changed by Zeus into monkeys.

Cerdic (d. 534), a Saxon ealdorman, who according to the tradition landed near Southampton in 495, defeated the Britons, and acquired South Hampshire, and subsequently the Isle of Wight. He took the title of king of the West Saxons, and was the ancestor of the English royal line.

Cerdon, a cobbler, one of the bear-baiters in Butler's 'Hudibras' (q.v.).

Ceres, see Demeter.

CERVANTES SAAVEDRA, MIGUEL DE (1547-1616), the great Spanish novelist and dramatist, was born at Alcalá of an ancient but impoverished family, and was wounded and lost for life the use of his left hand at the battle of Lepanto (1571). He was taken by pirates in 1575, and spent the next five years as a prisoner at Algiers. The remainder of his life was, for the greater part, occupied with a struggle to earn a livelihood from literature and humble government employment. His greatest work 'Don Quixote' (q.v.) was published, the first part in 1605, the second in 1615. He also wrote a number of plays (only two of which survive), a collection of short stories ('Novelas Ejemplares'), and a tale of adventure, 'Persiles y Sigismunda'. Fletcher drew largely on these last two for the plots of his plays.

Cestus, the girdle of Aphrodite or Venus, which had the power of awakening love. Also the name for the leather thongs which were bound round the hands of Greek and Roman boxers to make their blows more effectual.

Cestus of Aglaia, The, articles by Ruskin on the laws of art, originally published in the 'Art Journal' (1865-6).

Ceyx, see Halcione and Ceix.

Cézanne, PAUL (1839-1906), French painter, born at Aix, one of the chief masters of the Modern French School, remarkable for his sense of form, sincerity, and power of expression. For long, the Salon refused admission to his works. His life is in part described in 'L'Œuvre' of his friend Zola. He is associated with the movement known as Post-Impressionism (q.v.).

Chablis, a well-known light dry white wine, produced near Auxerre in Yonne (France).

Chabot, The Tragedy of, a tragedy by Chapman (q.v.), probably revised and added to by Shirley, published in 1639. The date of its composition is uncertain.

Philip de Chabot, High Admiral of France under Francis I, a loyal servant of the king, incurs the enmity of Montmorency, the High Constable, Poyet the Chancellor, and their faction. By fearless insistence on his innocence he infuriates the king, is accused on trumped-up charges, and found guilty of high treason by the judges under pressure from the chancellor. The king pardons him and discovers the abusive conduct of the chancellor, who is tried and sentenced. But Chabot's heart is broken by the unjust treatment he has suffered, and he dies.

Chace, The, see Somerville.

Chadband, a character in Dickens's 'Bleak House' (q.v.).

Chaereas and Callirrhoe, a Greek romance by Chariton (? 2nd cent.), one of the sources on which Sidney drew in his 'Arcadia'.

Chaffanbrass, Mr., the skilful barrister in A. Trollope's 'The Three Clerks', 'Orley Farm', and 'Phineas Redux' (qq.v.).

Chainmail, Mr., a character in Peacock's 'Crotchet Castle' (q.v.). He believes the 12th cent. to be the best period in English history.

Chaldean, a native of Chaldea, especially one skilled in occult learning, astrology, &c. Hence generally a seer, soothsayer, astrologer.

Chaldee MS., see Blackwood's Magazine.

CHALKHILL, JOHN (fl. 1600), the author of a pastoral 'Thealma and Clearchus', published in 1683 by Izaak Walton, and reproduced in Saintsbury's 'Caroline Poets', vol. ii (1906), and of other verse included in the 'Compleat Angler'. Nothing definite is known about his life.

Challenger Expedition, THE, for deep-sea exploration, in which H.M.S. 'Challenger' was employed, 1872-6. It was conducted by Sir Charles Wyville Thomson (1830-82), the naturalist, who published 'The Voyage of the Challenger' in 1877.

CHALMERS, THOMAS (1780-1847), educated at St. Andrews, where he was professor of moral philosophy, 1823-8. He was subsequently (1828-43) professor of divinity at Edinburgh, and an active pioneer of the movement which led to the disruption of the Scottish Established Church and the formation of the Free Church. He was a great preacher and author of many theological and philosophical treatises, including 'The Adaptation of External Nature to the Moral and Intellectual Constitution of Man' (Bridge-water Treatise, 1833).

Cham, an obsolete form of the word Khan, formerly applied to the rulers of the Tartars and the Mongols, and to the emperor of China. Smollett, in a letter to Wilkes, 16 March 1759 (in Boswell), refers to Johnson as 'that great Cham of literature'.

Chamade, through French and Portuguese from L. clamare, to call, a signal by beat of drum or sound of trumpet inviting to a parley.

CHAMBERLAYNE, EDWARD (1616-1703), educated at St. Edmund Hall, Oxford, tutor to the duke of Grafton and to Prince George of Denmark, was author of 'Angliae

CHAMPAGNE

Notitia, or the Present State of England' (1669), a handbook of social and political conditions, which met with extraordinary success, and was enlarged by his son, John Chamberlayne.

CHAMBERLAYNE, WILLIAM (1619-89), was a physician at Shaftesbury in Dorset. He published a play entitled 'Love's Victory' in 1658, but is remembered for his 'Pharonnida' (1659), an heroic poem in five books of rhymed couplets. It deals with the romantic tale of Argalia, a kind of knight errant, rescued from the Turks on the coast of the Morea; threatened with execution for nearly slaying Almanzor, the villain of the story, but reprieved; falling in love with Pharonnida, the king's daughter; and after many vicissitudes united to her. The style is obscure and involved, and the tale somewhat incoherent; but the poem is not without beauties. It is in Saintsbury's 'Caroline Poets', vol. i (1905).

CHAMBERS, SIR EDMUND KERCHER (1866-), civil servant (Education) and literary critic. He is best known for the critical exactness and range of his history of the Elizabethan drama down to and including Shakespeare. His publications include: 'The Medieval Stage' (1903), 'The Elizabethan Stage' (1923), 'William Shakespeare' (1930).

CHAMBERS, EPHRAIM (d. 1740), published his 'Cyclopaedia' (the first English Encyclopaedia, which has no connexion with the current 'Chambers's Encyclopaedia') in 1728. See Encyclopédie.

CHAMBERS, ROBERT (1802-71), founded with his brother the publishing firm of W. and R. Chambers, Edinburgh, and wrote and issued a number of books on Scottish history, biography, and literature. He established 'Chambers's Journal' in 1832, and wrote and published anonymously in 1844 'Vestiges of Creation' in which he maintained a theory of evolution of species in animal life and prepared the way for the modern scientific view of the history of the earth. His 'Book of Days', an antiquarian miscellany, appeared in 1862-4.

Chambers's Encyclopaedia was begun in 1859 and completed in 1868, by the firm of W. and R. Chambers (see preceding entry). There have been many subsequent editions.

Chamont, one of the principal characters in Otway's 'The Orphan' (q.v.).

Champagne, the name of a former province in eastern France, through which flows the Marne. Its wine ranks highest among those of France. The best known is sparkling and straw-coloured, but other varieties are still, rose-coloured or red. Its fame dates far back.

CHAMPAGNE

It is related for instance that Wenceslaus, king of Bohemia, coming in 1397 to Rheims to negotiate a treaty with Charles VI, found the wine so much to his taste that he spun out the discussion to the utmost, getting drunk daily before dinner. It is mentioned by Butler in 'Hudibras', II. i (1664); and in Etherege's 'Man of Mode' (1676), IV. i, occur the lines,

Then sparkling Champagne
Puts an end to their reign.

Among the best-known names of champagne houses are Roederer, Perrier-Jouët, Veuve Clicquot, Pommery, Heidsieck, Mumm, Moët et Chandon. See also Sillery, Pérignon.

Champion, The, a periodical issued thrice a week in 1739-40, mainly written by H. Fielding (q.v.). The essays in it centre round an imaginary group, the Vinegar family.

Champion of the King, or OF ENGLAND: his office is, at the coronation, to ride armed into Westminster Hall, and challenge to combat any one who disputes the king's title. The office is attached to the manor of Scrivelsby, formerly held by the Marmion family, and is now held by the Dymoke family. The last performance was at the coronation of George IV.

Champollion, JEAN FRANÇOIS (1790-1832), a French Egyptologist, who was the first to interpret Egyptian hieroglyphics. See also Wilkinson.

Chancellor, RICHARD (d. 1556), navigator, pilot-major to Sir Hugh Willoughby's (q.v.) expedition to the North-East in 1553. He made a second expedition to Russia in 1555 and was wrecked off the coast of Aberdeenshire on his return. The narrative in Hakluyt of his first visit to Moscow is the first account of some importance in English of the Russian people.

Chances, The, a play by J. Fletcher, with perhaps some contributions by another hand. (The prologue and epilogue are not by Fletcher.) The date of the play is uncertain. The prologue refers to a production after Fletcher's death. The plot is based on a novel of Cervantes, and the 'Chances' are the coincidences by which Constantia, who is eloping with the duke of Ferrara, and the duke himself, are brought into a number of complications, from which they are extricated by Don John and Don Frederick, two Spanish gallants, Dame Gillian their landlady at Bologna, and Vecchio, a professional wizard. The dialogue shows Fletcher at his best.

Changeling, The, a tragedy by T. Middleton (q.v.) and W. Rowley (q.v.), printed in 1653, but acted as early as 1623.

Beatrice-Joanna, daughter of the Governor of Alicant, is ordered by her father to marry Alonso de Piracquo. She falls in love with Alsemero, and in order to avoid the marriage imposed on her, employs the ill-favoured villain De Flores, whom she detests but who cherishes a passion for her, to murder Alonso. To the horror of Beatrice, De Flores exacts the reward he had lusted for. Beatrice is now to marry Alsemero. To escape detection she arranges that her maid Diaphanta shall take her place on the wedding night; and to remove a dangerous witness, De Flores then kills the maid. The guilt of Beatrice and De Flores is revealed to Alsemero, and they are both brought before the governor, whereupon they take their own lives. The title of the play is taken from the sub-plot, in which Antonio disguises himself as a crazy changeling in order to get access to Isabella, wife of the keeper of a madhouse. The main plot is taken from John Reynolds's 'God's revenge against Murder' (1621).

CHANNING, WILLIAM ELLERY (1780-1842), an American Unitarian clergyman, much involved in the Unitarian controversy c. 1815. He exercised a marked influence on American literature, imbuing it with a religious spirit (as exemplified in Emerson, Bryant, and Longfellow). His 'Remarks on American Literature' appeared in 1830.

His nephew, WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING (1818-1901), poet and transcendentalist, is chiefly remembered for his friendship with Emerson. His 'Poems' appeared in 1843-7, 'The Woodman and other Poems' in 1849.

Chansons de geste, French historical verse romances, many of them connected with Charlemagne, composed in the 11th-13th cents., of which the CHANSON DE ROLAND (see Roland) is the oldest and best-known example. They were the work of the trouvères of northern France, composed in monorhyme stanzas, mostly of ten-syllabled verses, rhyming by assonance. The Chansons de geste were rendered by jongleurs for the diversion of lords in their halls or of public audiences as the minstrels wandered about France.

Chanticleer, the cock, figures in 'Reynard the Fox' (q.v.) and in Chaucer's 'Nun's Priest's Tale' (see Canterbury Tales).

Chantrey Bequest: Sir Francis Chantrey (1781-1841), sculptor, left about £3,000 a year to the Royal Academy for the purchase of works of art for the nation, and other purposes. Chantrey was the son of a carpenter and began life as a grocer's boy in Sheffield.

Chaonia, a district of Epirus where the doves, 'Chaonian birds', were said to deliver oracles. Cf. Dodona.

Chap-book, a modern name applied by book-collectors and others to specimens of the popular literature which was formerly circulated by itinerant dealers or chapmen, consisting chiefly of small pamphlets of popular tales, ballads, tracts, &c. They were illustrated with wood-blocks, and consisted of sixteen pages octavo or twenty-four pages duodecimo, and were sold generally at a penny to six-pence. They reproduced old romances, such as 'Bevis of Hampton' and 'Guy of Warwick', or such stories as John Gilpin, Robinson Crusoe, or nursery rhymes and fairy tales. They were issued in great numbers throughout the 18th cent.

Chaplin, CHARLES SPENCER (1880-). film comedian ('Charlie Chaplin'), born in London, but now resident in America.

CHAPMAN, GEORGE (1559?-1634?), born probably near Hitchin in Hertfordshire, and educated at Oxford. He is chiefly known for his translation of Homer, animated by 'a daring fiery spirit' (Pope) and commemorated in Keats's sonnet, 'Much have I travelled in the realms of gold'; but Swinburne and others have drawn attention to the remarkable quality of his dramatic works. He was renowned as a scholar and is perhaps the 'rival poet' of Shakespeare's 'Sonnets'.

He published the obscure poem 'The Shadow of Night' in 1594, 'Ovid's Banquet of Sence' in 1595, and a continuation of Marlowe's 'Hero and Leander' in 1598. His principal tragedies were published at the following dates: 'Bussy D'Ambois' (q.v., 1607), 'The Conspiracy and Tragedy of Byron' (q.v., 1608), 'The Revenge of Bussy D'Ambois' (q.v., 1613), 'Caesar and Pompey' (q.v., 1611), 'The Tragedy of Chabot' (q.v., 1639). His principal comedies were published at the following dates: 'The Blind Beggar of Alexandria' (1598), 'An Humorous Day's Mirth' (1599), 'All Fools' (q.v., 1605), 'May-Day' (1611), 'The Gentleman Usher' (q.v., 1606), 'Monsieur D'Olive' (q.v., 1606), 'The Widow's Tears' (1612), 'Eastward Hol' (q.v., 1605). This last play was written in collaboration with Ben Jonson and Marston, and contains a flippant allusion to the Scots, which gave offence at Court, and led to the temporary imprisonment of the authors. Chapman published a specimen of his rhyming fourteen-syllable version of the 'Iliad' in 1598, and the whole 'Iliad' in 1611, adding the 'Odyssey' (rhyming ten-syllable) in 1614-15, and the hymns &c. in 1616. Translations by him from Petrarch appeared in 1612, from Musaeus in 1616, Hesiod's 'Georgicks' in 1618, and a satire of Juvenal in 1629. He wrote also copies of verses for his friends' books, court poems, and a masque (1614). His collected works appeared in 1873-5, with an essay by Swinburne.

CHIAPONE, HESTER (1727-1801), née Mulso, a friend of Samuel Richardson and Gilbert White, published verses and tales (1750-3) and essays (1773-7). She wrote part of No. 10 of the 'Rambler'. Her 'Works' and 'Posthumous Works' appeared in 1807. Her 'Letters on the Improvement of the Mind' (1774) were highly esteemed in her day. She was a member of the 'Blue Stocking' (q.v.) coterie.

Charitie, The Balade of, see Chatterton.

Charivari (from 14th-cent. French and medieval Latin words of unknown origin), a serenade of 'rough music' with kettles, pans, tea-trays and the like, used in France in derision of unpopular marriages, and unpopular persons generally. Hence a confused medley of sounds. [OED.] 'Charivari' was taken as the name of a satirical journal in Paris, and adopted in 1841 as part of the title of the London 'Punch' (q.v.).

Charlemagne (742-814), king of the Franks (768) and emperor of the West (800), the son of Pepin. He and his paladins are the subject of numerous chansons de geste, of which the 'Chanson de Roland' is the most famous (see Roland). Legend relates that he is not dead, but sleeping in the Odenberg in Hesse, or in the Untersberg near Salzburg, whence he will emerge when the persecutions of Anti-christ are completed, to avenge the blood of the saints.

Charles I, king of England, 1625-49.

Charles II, king of England, 1660-85. He figures in Scott's 'Peveril of the Peak' and 'Woodstock' (qq.v.), and many other works.

Charles XII, king of Sweden, 1682-1718, and a great military commander, who led his forces successfully against the northern coalition. He captured the capital of Poland from Augustus the Elector of Saxony, and invaded Russia, defeating Peter the Great at Narva (1700) and being in turn totally defeated at Poltava in 1709, after which he retreated to Turkey. He returned in 1714 to Stralsund, which alone remained to him of his continental possessions, but was driven thence to Sweden. He was killed at Frederikshald in a war with Norway. His life was written by Voltaire. Johnson ('Vanity of Human Wishes') says of him:

He left the name at which the world grew pale,

To point a moral or adorn a tale.

Charles Edward Stuart (1720-88), the Young Pretender, figures in Scott's 'Waverley' and 'Redgauntlet' (qq.v.).

Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy

CHARLES THE BOLD

(1467-77), married Margaret of York, sister of Edward IV. He was severely defeated by the Swiss at Granson and Morat, and killed in an engagement with them before Nancy. He figures in Scott's 'Anne of Geierstein' and 'Quentin Durward' (qq.v.).

Charles's Wain, the constellation comprising the seven bright stars in Ursa Major, known also as 'The Plough' and 'The Dipper' (U.S.A.). The name appears to rise out of the verbal association of the star-name Arcturus with Arthur, and the legendary association of Arthur with Charlemagne; so that what was originally the wain of Arcturus became at length the wain of Charlemagne. [OED.; but the association of Arthur with Charlemagne does not appear to be well founded.]

Charley, CHARLIE, the name colloquially given in former times to a night-watchman. The origin is unknown: some have conjectured 'because Charles I in 1640 extended and improved the watch system in the metropolis'.

Also a small triangular beard extending from the under lip to a point a little below the chin: as seen in portraits of Charles I. [OED.]

Charley's Aunt, a highly popular farcical comedy by Brandon Thomas, produced in 1892 and still frequently played.

Charmian, in Shakespeare's 'Antony and Cleopatra' and Dryden's 'All for Love' (qq.v.), the attendant of Cleopatra. The name is in Plutarch's 'Antony'.

Charmond, FELICE, a character in Hardy's 'The Woodlanders' (q.v.).

Charon, in Gk. myth, the ferryman of Hades, who, for an obolus, ferried the souls of the dead over the rivers Styx and Acheron to the infernal regions. It was usual among the ancients to place a piece of money under the tongue of the deceased for the purpose of this payment.

CHARRIÈRE, MADAME DE, see Zélide.

Charterhouse, TITE, near Smithfield, London, was one of the houses of the Carthusian (q.v.) order in England. It was built in 1371, and at the dissolution of the monasteries under Henry VIII was taken from the monks with circumstances of great cruelty. It passed through the hands of various nobles, and was finally sold to Sir Thomas Sutton, merchant, who converted it into a school and a house for the aged poor. The school became famous and numbered Steele, Addison, Wesley, Leech, and Thackeray among its pupils. The home for poor brethren is the scene of Colonel Newcome's last days and death in Thackeray's 'The Newcomes' (q.v.). The old school has been removed to Godalming, and the school of the Merchant Taylors took its place until 1933.

Charteris, SIR PATRICK, the provost of Perth, in Scott's 'Fair Maid of Perth' (q.v.).

CHATEAUBRIAND

Chartist, one of the body of political reformers (chiefly of the working classes) who arose in 1837 and who made certain demands embodied in the 'Six Points' of the document called the 'People's Charter', viz. Universal Suffrage, Vote by Ballot, Annual Parliaments, Payment of Members, Abolition of the Property Qualification, and Equal Electoral Districts. The 'Chartists', as such, disappeared after 1848.

Chartreuse, a liqueur that derives its name from having been formerly made by the monks of La Grande Chartreuse, the Carthusian monastery near Grenoble, with aromatic herbs and brandy. The best Chartreuse is green in colour.

Charybdis, a dangerous whirlpool on the coast of Sicily, in the straits of Messina, opposite Scylla (q.v.). It threatened destruction to the fleet of Ulysses. It was said that Charybdis was an avaricious woman, who stole the oxen of Hercules, for which theft she was struck with a thunderbolt by Zeus, and turned into a whirlpool.

Chase, The, see Somerville.

Chaste Maid in Cheapside, A, a comedy by T. Middleton (q.v.), printed in 1630.

The play centres round the attempt of the dissolute Sir Walter Whorehound to pass off his mistress as his niece (the 'Chaste Maid') and to marry her to the foolish pedantic son of Yellowhammer, a rich goldsmith; while Whorehound himself is to marry Yellowhammer's daughter, Moll. The first part of the plot succeeds, but the second fails. For Moll and the resourceful young Touchwood are in love with one another, and their attempts to evade the parents and get married, though repeatedly foiled, are finally successful.

Chastelard, a tragedy by Swinburne (q.v.), published in 1865, on the subject of Mary Queen of Scots, and Chastelard, a grandson of Bayard, who fell desperately in love with her and followed her to Scotland. He was discovered in her room, sentenced to death, and executed.

Chataqua, see Chautauqua.

Château d'Amour, see Grosseteste.

Château Gaillard, a fortress built by Richard I on the height of Les Andelys overlooking the Seine, for the purpose of his war with the French king. It was lost by John (1204).

CHATEAUBRIAND, FRANÇOIS RENÉ, Vicomte de (1768-1848), one of the pioneers of the French romantic movement. His fame rests principally on his 'Le Génie du Christianisme' (1802), a work of Christian apologetic, based on the emotional and imaginative appeal of religion to the deepest instincts in man's nature. 'Of all religions that have ever existed'—thus the author sums up his thesis—'the Christian religion is the most poetical, the most favourable to freedom, art, and letters; the modern world owes all to it, from agriculture to the abstract sciences.' From this work Chateaubriand detached and published in advance two fragments, 'Atala', the romance of a young Red Indian, Chactas, and an Indian maiden, Atala; and 'René', the story of a young European, the author himself under a thin disguise, devoured by a secret sorrow, who flees to the solitudes of America. Both were enthusiastically received. Of Chateaubriand's later works, besides the romances 'Les Martyrs' (1809) and 'Le Dernier des Abencérages' (1826), the best known is the autobiographical 'Mémoires d'Outre-tombe' (1849-50). Early in the 19th cent. Chateaubriand turned his attention to politics. He became a minister under Louis XVIII, and went as ambassador to Berlin and London.

Chatham, EARL OF, see Pitt.

Chatsworth, the famous mansion in Derbyshire of the dukes of Devonshire. The original house was built by Sir William Cavendish, husband of Bess of Hardwick (q.v.). This was rebuilt in 1688 by the first duke of Devonshire.

CHATTERTON, THOMAS (1752-70), son of a writing-master who was a lay clerk of Bristol Cathedral, while still at school at Colston's Hospital wrote a notable satire 'Apostate Will', 1764, and other verses. In 1768 he published a pseudo-archaic description of the mayor of Bristol's passing over the 13th-cent. bridge, and met William Barrett, an antiquarian surgeon who was writing a history of Bristol, George Catcott, and Henry Burgum, pewterers, for all of whom he fabricated documents, pedigrees, poems, of which he claimed to possess the originals. He also fabricated a number of poems purporting to be the work of an imaginary 15th-cent. Bristol poet, Thomas Rowley, a monk and friend of William Canynge, an historical Bristol merchant. He offered some of these to Dodsley, the publisher, and sent a history of painting in England (supposed to be by Rowley) to Horace Walpole, who was temporarily deceived. The fraud was exposed by T. Tyrwhitt in his 'Poems supposed to have been written . . . by Thomas Rowley', 1777 and 1778; but the poems are none the less the work of a poetical genius. 'Elinoure and Juga', published in the 'Town and Country Magazine', 1769, was the only 'Rowleian' piece to appear in Chatterton's life-time, and editions of the poems of 'Thomas Rowley' were published in 1778 and 1782. In 1770 he came to London, and his burlesque opera 'The Revenge' was successfully produced in that year. Reduced to despair by his poverty, he poisoned himself with arsenic, 24 Aug. 1770, at the age of 17. His collected works appeared in 1803, and have been several times reprinted.

CHAUCER, GEOFFREY (1340?-1400), was son of John Chaucer (d. 1366), vintner, of London. The date of his birth has been matter for much discussion. In 1357 he was employed in the service of Lionel, afterwards duke of Clarence. In 1359 he was in the army with which Edward III invaded France, was taken prisoner, but shortly ransomed. He married Philippa, probably daughter of Sir Payne Roet, and sister of John of Gaunt's third wife. He evidently enjoyed John of Gaunt's patronage. Philippa died apparently in 1387. Chaucer held various positions at court and in the king's service, and was sent on a mission to Genoa and Florence in 1372-3, when he perhaps met Boccaccio and Petrarch. He was sent on secret service to Flanders in 1376 and 1377, and was attached to embassies to France and Lombardy in 1378. In 1374 he was appointed controller of customs in the port of London and leased the dwelling-house over Aldgate. He was knight of the shire for Kent in 1386, and went the Canterbury pilgrimage in April 1388. About this time he was clerk of the king's works at various places, including Westminster Abbey, living close to St. Margaret's. He received pensions from Edward III, John of Gaunt, Richard II, and Henry IV. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, a monument being erected to him in 1555.

Chaucer's writings fall into three periods: (1) The period of French influence (1359-72), in which he uses the octosyllabic couplet. To this period belong 'The Boke of the Duchesse', 1369, and the 'Romaunt of the Rose', so far as written by Chaucer. (2) The period of Italian influence, especially of Dante and Boccaccio, 1372-86, in which he leaves off the octosyllabic couplet, uses mainly the 'heroic' stanza of seven lines, and begins to use the heroic couplet. To this period belong 'The Hous of Fame'; 'The Parlement of Foules'; 'Troilus and Cryseyde'; 'The Legende of Good Women'; and the first drafts of some of his tales. (3) The period of his maturity, 1386-1400, in which he uses the heroic couplet. To this period belong the 'Canterbury Tales', designed about 1387. His various poetical works will be found referred to under their several titles. His prose works include a translation of Boethius, and a 'Treatise on the Astrolabe' compiled for 'little Lewis my son', in English, 'for Latin ne canst thou yet but small, my little son'.

The Ellesmere MS., owing to its regularity and general good quality, is the usual basis of the text of Chaucer. It is the only MS. of the 'Canterbury Tales' illustrated throughout and has been published in colliotype facsimile. It is now in the Huntington Library in the United States.

Chaucer's well-known portrait was made from memory by Occleve on the margin of one of his works. The 'Canterbury Tales' were first printed by Caxton in 1478(?); the collected works were first issued by W. Thynne in 1532. The fullest edition is that of W. W. Skeat, with introductions and notes, Oxford, 7 vols. (1894-7). See also Tyrwhitt.

CHAUCER SOCIETY

Chaucer Society, THE, founded in 1868 by Furnivall (q.v.), for the purpose of collecting materials for the study of Chaucer.

Chaucerians, SCOTTISH, name given to a group of 15th-16th cent. Scottish writers who show in a greater or less degree the influence of Chaucer. See James I (of Scotland), Henryson, Dunbar, Douglas (Gavin).

Chautauqua, sometimes incorrectly spelt Chataqua, an American literary institution developed in 1874, at first confined to summer literary classes held on Lake Chautauqua, New York State; later extended to a Reading Circle with a series of text-books arranged for home study; and now also to travelling entertainments of an educational nature, concerts, and drama. Its object is the general diffusion of education.

Chauvinism, an exaggerated and bellicose patriotism, a word derived from one Nicholas Chauvin of Rochefort, a veteran French soldier of the First Republic and Empire, whose demonstrative patriotism was celebrated and at length ridiculed by his comrades. Chauvin figured in the 'Soldat laboureur' of Scribe, and his name was especially popularized by Cogniard's famous vaudeville, 'La Cocarde tricolore' (1831).

Chaworth, MARY ANNE, later Mrs. Chaworth-Musters, the lady with whom Byron fell in love in his youth, and to whom he proposed in 1803. She is celebrated in Byron's poem, 'The Dream'.

Cheapside ('cheap' is from Old English clap, buying and selling) was a busy market in medieval London, and a place for pageants and sports, and occasionally for executions (until Tudor times, there were no buildings on the north side, so that more space was available than now). It was surrounded by streets whose names suggested the trade of the locality, Bread Street, Poultry, Ironmonger Lane, Honey Street, Milk Street, &c.

Cheddar Caves, stalactite caves in the cliffs of the Mendip Hills, near the village of Cheddar. CHEDDAR CHEESE, for which this district is also famous, is mentioned as early as 1666. Bailey in his dictionary of 1721 mentions (s.v. Cheddar) that 'the milk of all the town cows is brought every day into one common room', duly recorded, 'and one common cheese made with it'.

Cheeryble Brothers, THE, Ned and Charles, characters in Dickens's 'Nicholas Nickleby' (q.v.).

Chelron or Chlron, a centaur (q.v.), the son of Cronos (q.v.) and Philýra, famous for his knowledge of medicine, music, and archery. He taught mankind the use of medicinal herbs, and was the instructor of many heroes and the friend of Hercules. He was accidentally wounded by Hercules in the knee when the latter fought with the Centaurs. Hercules went to his assistance, but as the wound was incurable, Cheiron, to escape from the pain, gave up his immortality to Prometheus.

CHEKE, SIR JOHN (1514-57), fellow of St. John's College, tutor to Edward VI, and subsequently professor of Greek at Cambridge. He was imprisoned by Queen Mary, 1553-4. He was an eminent scholar, and though he wrote little in the vernacular (but many Latin translations from the Greek), was influential in promoting a simple style of English prose. He is referred to ('O soul of Sir John Cheeke') in Milton's Sonnet XI, 'A Book was writ of late'.

CHEKHOV, ANTON PAVLOVICH (1860-1904), Russian dramatist and novelist, whose gift of satirical humour has given a wide vogue to his works. His first play was 'Ivanov' (1887), followed by 'The Seagull', 'Uncle Vanya', 'The Three Sisters', and (what is generally considered the best) 'The Cherry Orchard'. Chekhov's fame rests chiefly on these and on his short tales, but he also wrote a number of novels: 'The Peasants', 'My Life', 'Ward No. 6', &c.

Chelsea, meaning, according to the 'Oxford Dictionary of English Place-names', 'landing-place for chalk or lime-stone', was a separate village until gradually absorbed in London in the 18th-19th cents. Here (on the site of the present Danvers Street) Sir Thomas More (q.v.) had his residence, where he received Erasmus. In the 17th and 18th cents. Chelsea was much patronized by Cockneys and was famous for its bun-house (see below; see also Congreve's 'Love for Love', II. ii). The manor of Chelsea was purchased in 1712 by Sir Hans Sloane (q.v.), who founded there the Botanic Garden. The Cremorne Gardens (q.v.) were in Chelsea. Chelsea has a reputation as a home of painters: Rossetti, Whistler, and many others lived there.

Chelsea, SAGE OF, T. Carlyle (q.v.).

Chelsea Bun-house, THE, famous in the 18th cent., and kept in its palmy days by one Richard Hand, stood in Jew's Row (now Pimlico Road). It was demolished in 1839. Swift (q.v.) writes to Stella about the 'r-r-rare Chelsea buns'.

Chelsea Hospital, for disabled soldiers ('Chelsea Pensioners'), was founded by Charles II and built from the designs of Sir Christopher Wren. Fanny Burney's father was for many years organist there.

Chemos or CHEMOSH, a Moabite god (1 Kings xi. 7), ranks after Moloch in Milton's hierarchy of hell ('Paradise Lost', i. 406).

CHÉNIER, ANDRÉ (1762-94), French poet and one of the earliest figures in the French Romantic movement. Inspired by the spirit of the Greek anthologists, he wrote idylls, eclogues, and elegies marked by pastoral simplicity and freshness. At first a revolutionary, he was presently alienated by the excesses of the Terror and wrote a fine ode in defence of Charlotte Corday. He was arrested early in 1794 and after some months in prison was guillotined on the 7th Thermidor, immediately before the fall of Robespierre.

CHÉNIER

His brother, MARIE-JOSEPH CHÉNIER (1764–1811), was a dramatic poet, and author of the 'Chant du Départ'.

Chaquers, a Tudor mansion near Princes Risborough, Bucks., presented to the nation in 1917 by Lord and Lady Lee of Fareham for the purpose of serving as the country seat of the Prime Minister of England for the time being.

Cherith, the name of the brook where Elijah was fed by ravens (1 Kings xviii).

Cherry and Merry, in Dickens's 'Martin Chuzzlewit' (q.v.), Peckaniff's daughters, Charity and Mercy.

Cherry and the Slae, The, see Montgomerie.

Cherubim, a Hebrew word of uncertain derivation. In the O.T. they are living creatures with two or four wings, but the accounts of their form are not consistent. They first appear in Gen. iii. 24, as guardians of the tree of life. The Divine Being is frequently stated to dwell or sit between (or above) the cherubim. Their inclusion among the angels appears to belong to Christian mysticism. According to Dionysius the Areopagite they form the second of the nine orders of angels. See Angel.

Cheshire Cat, To grin like a: no satisfactory explanation of the allusion has been put forward. It has been attributed to the fact that Cheshire cheeses were at one time moulded in the shape of a cat; and to the attempts of a sign-painter to represent a lion rampant on the signs of many of the Cheshire inns. (N. & Q., 1st series, ii. 412; v. 402). The Cheshire Cat figures in Lewis Carroll's 'Alice in Wonderland' (q.v.).

Cheshire Cheese, THE, a hostelry in Wine Office Court, off Fleet Street, London, rebuilt shortly after the Restoration and still in existence.

CHESNEY, SIR GEORGE TOMKYN (1833–95), a distinguished Indian officer, published in 'Blackwood's Magazine' in 1871 'The Battle of Dorking' (q.v.), which created a sensation, and in 1876 'The Dilemma', a powerful story of the Mutiny, besides other novels.

Chester, SIR JOHN, and EDWARD his son, characters in Dickens's 'Barnaby Rudge' (q.v.).

CHESTERFIELD, PHILIP DORMER STANHOPE, fourth earl of (1694–1773), statesman and diplomatist, was ambassador at The Hague, 1728–32, and entered the Pelham ministry in 1744. His tolerance as lord lieutenant of Ireland in 1745–6 kept that country quiet. He was a wit and an orator, wrote political tracts, and contributed to the 'World', but is remembered as a writer principally for his 'Letters' to his natural son, Philip Stanhope. These were written almost daily from 1737 onwards and were designed for the education of the young man. They are full of sensible instruction, admirably expressed, more particularly in matters of good breeding (for the boy was exceptionally awkward and ungraceful), but have been reprobated on account of a few passages contrary to good morals, in which he commended intrigue while condemning vulgar vice. The letters to his son were followed by letters to his godson, also named Philip Stanhope. These letters are on the same lines as their predecessors. The letters to his son were published (by the son's widow) in 1774; those to his godson, by Lord Carnarvon, in 1890. A complete edition of all Chesterfield's letters, by B. Dobrée, appeared in 1932. Chesterfield is also remembered in connexion with Johnson's 'Dictionary'. Johnson had addressed the 'Plan' of that work to Chesterfield, but it was received with neglect (unintentional according to the latter). On the publication of the Dictionary, Chesterfield wrote two papers in the 'World' in commendation of it. Thereupon on 7 Feb. 1755 Johnson addressed to Chesterfield the famous letter, in which he bitterly rejected a notice which 'had it been early, had been kind; but it has been delayed till I am indifferent, and cannot enjoy it; till I am solitary, and cannot impart it; till I am known, and do not want it'. Lord Chesterfield also wrote some 'Characters of Eminent Persons' which contain valuable historical matter. Every one feared him because he was believed to be writing his own Memoirs, which would brand most people severely. He gave his name to a kind of overcoat and to a kind of couch.

CHESTERTON, GILBERT KEITH (1874–1936) educated at St. Paul's School, essayist, critic, novelist, and poet, among whose best-known writings are: (novels and short stories) 'The Napoleon of Notting Hill', 'The Man who was Thursday', 'The Flying Inn', 'The Ball and the Cross', 'The Innocence of Father Brown', 'The Wisdom of Father Brown'; (poetry) 'The Ballad of the White Horse', 'Wine, Water, and Song', 'Poems'; (essays) 'Heretics', 'Generally Speaking', 'What's Wrong with the World'; (biography) 'Robert Browning', 'Charles Dickens'; (criticism) 'G. F. Watts', 'William Blake'.

CHESTRE, THOMAS, see Launfal.

CHETTLE, HENRY (d. 1607?), the son of a London dyer, was apprenticed to a stationer, and was for a time a partner in a printing business. Upon its failure he took to writing plays, of which he is reputed the author of thirteen, and the joint-author of considerably more (including 'The Blind Beggar of Bednal Green', q.v., with J. Day). The only extant play attributed to him alone is 'The Tragedy of Hoffman' (1602), dealing with the story of a Danish pirate who is executed, and the revenge and execution of his son. He edited

CHEATTLE

Greene's 'Groatworth of Wit' (q.v.) in 1592, and wrote two satirical pamphlets, 'Kind-Hart's Dreame' (1593) and 'Pierce Plainnes Prentiship' (1595). He also published 'Englände's Mourning Garment', an elegy on Queen Elizabeth, in 1603.

Chevallier, THE YOUNG, Charles Edward Stuart (1720-88), the Young Pretender.

Chevallier de St. George, James Francis Edward Stuart (1688-1766), the Old Pretender, called by the Jacobites 'King James III and VIII'.

Chevy Chase, The Ballad of, one of the oldest of the English ballads, probably dates in its primitive form from the 15th cent. Its subject is the rivalry of the neighbouring families of Percy and Douglas, heightened by the national quarrel between England and Scotland. Percy, earl of Northumberland, has vowed to hunt for three days across the Scottish border 'maugre the doughty Douglas'. The two parties meet and fight, there is great slaughter on both sides, and both Percy and Douglas are killed. (Cf. Otterbourne.) The ballad was printed in Capell's 'Prologues' in 1760 and is included in Percy's 'Reliques'.

Cheyne Row and Walk, in Chelsea, named from Lord Cheyne, who sold the manor to Sir Hans Sloane (q.v.). Carlyle lived in Cheyne Row; George Eliot, Count d'Orsay, D. G. Rossetti, Turner, in Cheyne Walk. Don Saltero's coffee-house (q.v.) stood in Cheyne Walk.

Chianti, the name of a group of mountains near Siena in Italy, which produce a celebrated wine.

Chiaroscuro, meaning originally the style of pictorial art in which only the light and shade, and not the various colours, are represented, is used figuratively of poetic and literary treatment in the sense of mingled clearness and obscurity, light and gloom, praise and blame, &c.; but is still used chiefly for pictorial art.

Chiasmus, a figure of speech by which the order of the words in the first of two parallel clauses is reversed in the second, e.g. 'He saved others; himself he cannot save.'

Chichele or Chicheley, HENRY (1362?-1443), archbishop of Canterbury, son of a yeoman of Higham Ferrers, Northamptonshire. He was educated at Winchester and New College, Oxford, and became archbishop in 1414. He founded the Chichele chest in Oxford University for the relief of poor students, built a house for Cistercians in Oxford, and was founder of All Souls College (q.v.).

Chichevache, a perversion of the French chiche face, 'thin-face', the name of a fabulous monster said to feed only on patient wives, and hence, from scarcity of the diet, to be always lean and hungry. Her spouse, the

CHILDE ROLAND

Bycorne, on the contrary grew fat on his abundant diet of patient husbands.

O noble wyves, ful of heigh prudence,

Let noon humilitie your tongues nayle . . .

Lest Chichevache you swolwe in her entrayle. (Chaucer, 'Clerk's Tale', 1132.)

Chiffinch, WILLIAM (1602-88), the confidential agent of Charles II, page of the bed-chamber, figures in Scott's 'Peveril of the Peak' (q.v.).

CHILD, FRANCIS JAMES (1825-96), born at Boston, U.S.A., the son of a sailmaker, and educated at Harvard, where he remained for a time as a tutor. He was much interested in English philology, and after studying at Göttingen and Berlin became in 1876 professor of English at his university. He edited the poetical works of Spenser in 1855; contributed 'Observations on the Language of Chaucer' and of Gower's 'Confessio Amantis' to the Memoirs of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences in 1863 and 1873; and published his great collection of 'English and Scottish Popular Ballads' in 1883-98. He was instrumental in obtaining the publication of the Percy Folio (q.v.) MS. 'Dict. American Biography'.

Childe, in 'Childe Harold', 'Childe Roland', &c., signifies a youth of gentle birth, and is used as a kind of title. In the 13th and 14th cents. 'child' appears to have been applied to a young noble awaiting knighthood.

Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, a poem in Spenserian stanzas by Lord Byron (q.v.), begun in Albania in 1809, of which the first two cantos appeared in 1812, canto iii in 1816, canto iv in 1818.

The poem purports to describe the travels and reflections of a pilgrim who, sated and disgusted with a life of pleasure and revelry, seeks distraction in foreign lands. The first two cantos take the reader to Portugal, Spain, the Ionian Isles, and Albania, and end with a lament on the bondage of Greece. In the third canto the pilgrim passes to Belgium, the Rhine, the Alps, and the Jura. The historical associations of each place are made the poet's theme, the Spanish war, the eve of Waterloo and Napoleon, and more especially Rousseau and Julie. In the fourth canto the poet abandons his imaginary pilgrim and speaks in his own person, of Venice, Arqua and Petrarch, Ferrara and Tasso, Florence and Boccaccio, Rome and her great men, from the Scipios to Rienzi.

Childe of Elle, the subject of an old ballad included in Percy's 'Reliques', who loves the fair Emmeline, runs away with her, slays the foremost of the pursuers, and is finally forgiven by the baron her father.

Childe Roland, in an old Scottish ballad, a son of King Arthur. His sister, Burd Ellen, is carried away by the fairies to the castle of the king of Elfland. Aided by the instructions of Merlin, Childe Roland makes his way into the castle and rescues his sister.

Child Rowland to the dark tower came,
His word was still 'Fie, foh, and fum,
I smell the blood of a British man.'

(Shakespeare, 'King Lear', III. iv.)

Halliwell ('Nursery Rhymes') thinks that Shakespeare is here quoting from two different compositions, the first line from a ballad on Roland, the second and third from the story of Jack the Giant-killer (q.v.).

Childe Roland to the Dark Tower Came, a poem by R. Browning (q.v.), included in 'Dramatic Romances', published in 'Men and Women' in 1855.

A brave knight is attempting an adventure, in which all who have previously undertaken it have failed. He reaches the tower just when he despairs of succeeding. Around him he sees the figures of the 'lost adventurers'. He sounds his horn to announce that he has come. We may see in the dreamlike narrative an allegory of life.

Childe Waters, one of the most beautiful of the old ballads, celebrating the constancy of Ellen to Childe Waters, her heartless lover, whom she serves as a page, receiving cruel and degrading treatment. Her child is born in a stable, where she is tending her master's horse. He hears her singing a lullaby and wishing herself dead, relents, and marries her. The ballad is in Percy's 'Reliques'.

Childermas, the festival of the Holy Innocents (28 December), commemorating the slaughter of the children by Herod (Matt. ii. 16).

Children in the Wood, THE, the subject of an old ballad (apparently written in 1595), which is included in Percy's and Ritson's collections. A gentleman of Norfolk on his death-bed leaves his property to his infant son and daughter, and gives the charge of them to his brother. The brother designs to get possession of the property by making away with the children. He hires two ruffians to slay them in a wood. One of these, more tender-hearted than the other, repents and kills his fellow, and then abandons the children in the wood. The children perish and the Robin-redbreast covers them with leaves. The wrath of God falls upon the wicked uncle, who loses his sons and his goods, and dies in gaol. The surviving ruffian is arrested for robbery, condemned to death, and confesses the deed.

A similar story is the subject of the second of 'Two lamentable Tragedies; the one the murder of Maister Beech, a chandler in Thames Street. The other of a young child murdered in a wood by two ruffins, with the consent of his uncle. By Robt. Harrington, 1601, 4to'.

Chillingworth, ROGER, in Hawthorne's

CHIMES

'The Scarlet Letter' (q.v.), the name assumed by Hester Prynne's husband.

CHILLINGWORTH, WILLIAM (1602-44), a scholar and fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, embraced Romanism and went to Douai in 1630, but abjured that creed in 1634. He was one of the literary coterie that gathered round Lord Falkland at Great Tew, and was the author of the controversial work, 'The Religion of the Protestants a safe Way to Salvation' (1638).

Chillip, DR., in Dickens's 'David Copperfield' (q.v.), the physician who attended Mrs. Copperfield at the hero's birth.

Chillon, The Prisoner of, see Prisoner of Chillon.

Chiltern Hundreds, hundreds (i.e. subdivisions of a county, having their own courts) in Oxfordshire and Buckinghamshire which contain the Chiltern Hills. The manorial rights of these belonged to the Crown, which appointed over them bailiffs and stewards. These offices are now obsolete, but the stewardship of the three Buckinghamshire hundreds (Stoke, Desborough, and Burnham) has been retained for a special purpose. No member of parliament may by law resign his seat so long as he is duly qualified; on the other hand a member who accepts an office of profit under the Crown must vacate his seat subject to re-election. Therefore a member who desires to resign applies for the 'Stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds' or other similar post, which is, by a legal figment, held to be such an office; the appointment entails his resignation, and having thus fulfilled its purpose, is itself vacated. [OED.]

Chimaera, according to Greek legend, a monster, offspring of Echidna (q.v.), with a lion's head, goat's body, and dragon's tail; the head continually vomited flame. It was overcome by Bellerophon (q.v.), mounted on the winged horse Pegasus.

According to Rabelais (II. vii), among the books found by Pantagruel in the library of St. Victor was a treatise on the very subtle question, debated for seventy days at the Council of Constance, 'utrum chimaera in vacuo bombinans possit comedere secundas intentiones', a formula in which the author sums up the inanities of decadent scholasticism.

Chimène, or XIMENA, the wife of the Cid (q.v.).

Chimes, The, a Christmas book by Dickens (q.v.), published in 1845.

It is the story of a nightmare or vision in which Toby Veck, porter and runner of errands, under the influence of the goblins of the church bells and a dish of tripe, witnesses awful misfortunes befalling his daughter, a vision happily dissipated at the end; together with some social satire on justices, aldermen, and the like, in the persons of Sir Joseph Bowley and Mr. Chute.

CHINGACHGOOK

Chingachgook, the Indian chief in the 'Leatherstocking' series of tales of Indian life of J. F. Cooper (q.v.).

Chios, an island in the Aegean Sea, one of the reputed birthplaces of Homer. It was celebrated for its wine.

Chippendale, THOMAS (d. 1779), a famous furniture-maker of London, noted for his light and elegant style. He published in 1752 'The Gentleman and Cabinet Maker's Director'.

Chivery, MR. and 'YOUNG JOHN', characters in Dickens's 'Little Dorrit' (q.v.).

Chloe, see Daphnis and Chloe. 'Chloe' is the name by which Pope ('Moral Essays', II. 157) refers to Lady Suffolk, mistress of George II. Matthew Prior has several poems to 'Chloe'.

The 'Chloe' or 'Cloe' mentioned in several of Horace Walpole's letters was the duke of Newcastle's French cook, Clouet.

Chloe, The Tale of, see Tale of Chloe.

Choice, The, see Pomfret.

Choir Invisible, The, a romantic novel of the Kentucky wilderness, by J. L. Allen (q.v.), published 1897.

Chollamb, see Scazon.

Chopin, FRÉDÉRIC FRANÇOIS (1809-49), pianist and composer, was born near Warsaw of a French father and a Polish mother. He composed two concertos, and a large number of pianoforte solo compositions, études, mazurkas, preludes, nocturnes, &c. His romantic connexion with George Sand (q.v.) is recorded in her 'Lucrezia Floriani', where Chopin figures as Prince Karol.

Chopine, a kind of shoe raised by a cork sole or the like, worn about 1600 in Spain and Italy, and on the English stage. 'Your ladyship is nearer heaven than when I saw you last, by the altitude of a chopine' (Shakespeare, 'Hamlet', II. ii), which implies that the boy-actor (who took female parts) had grown.

Chops of the Channel, the entrance into the English Channel from the Atlantic.

Chorlamb, a metrical foot of four syllables, the first and last long, the two others short. A Choree is a Trochee (q.v.).

Chouans, a name given to irregular bands who maintained in the west of France (the Vendée and Brittany) a partisan war against the Republic and the first empire, after 1793; hence a polemical name for partisans of the Bourbons. The word is perhaps from the name of Jean Chouan, said to be one of their leaders, or from chouan an older form of chat-huant, a species of owl. Probably the coincidence suggested the appellation. [OED.] It is said that the Chouans imitated the hoot of an owl as a rallying-cry. See Balsac for his novel 'Les Chouans'.

CHRISTIAN

CHRÉTIEN DE TROYES, a 12th-cent. French poet, author of part of the group of Arthurian romances, notably the Story of Perceval, in his unfinished 'Conte del Graal'. This is an important source for the Grail stories. Chrétien was one of the great literary figures of his age, and his works were widely translated and imitated.

Christ Church, Oxford, a college begun by Cardinal Wolsey (it was to be called 'Cardinal College'), and taken over after his fall and established by Henry VIII in 1546. Among famous men educated there were Locke, John Wesley, Dr. Pusey, and Gladstone. Christ Church is at the same time the cathedral of Oxford, the cathedral being within the walls of the college and serving as its chapel.

Christ's Hospital, London, also known as the BLUECOAT SCHOOL (q.v.), founded under a charter of Edward VI as a school for poor children, in buildings that before the dissolution had belonged to the Grey Friars. Here were educated Coleridge, Lamb, and Leigh Hunt. The school was removed to Horsham.

Christs Teares over Jerusalem, a tract by T. Nash (q.v.), published in 1593. Abandoning his contentious and vituperative writings, Nash here figures as a religious reformer. He applies Christ's prophecy of the fall of Jerusalem as a warning to sinful London. He analyses with his usual vigour the vices and abuses of contemporary society.

Christs Victorie and Triumph, the principal poem of Giles Fletcher (q.v.).

Christabel, a poem by S. T. Coleridge (q.v.), published in 1816.

The poem is unfinished. The first part was written at Stowey in Somerset in 1797, the second at Keswick in Cumberland in 1800 after the poet's return from Germany. Christabel, daughter of Sir Leoline, praying at night in the wood for her betrothed lover, finds a lady in distress, the fair Geraldine, and brings her to the castle, where she is hospitably received. She claims to be the daughter of Lord Roland de Vaux, who had once been the friend of Sir Leoline before they were estranged by a quarrel, and to have been forcibly abducted from her home. In reality she is a malignant supernatural creature who has assumed the form of Geraldine in order to work evil, and Christabel has seen through her disguise, but is forced to silence by a spell. Sir Leoline sends his bard to Lord Roland to tell him that his daughter is safe and to offer reconciliation.

The poem, apart from introducing a new metre, is important as one of the most beautiful in English poetry.

Christian, the hero of Bunyan's 'Pilgrim's Progress' (q.v.).

Christian, EDWARD, a character in Scott's 'Peveril of the Peak' (q.v.).

Christian, FLETCHER, see Bounty.

CHRISTIAN HERO

Christian Hero, The. An Argument proving that no Principles but those of Religion are Sufficient to make a great Man, a treatise by Steele (q.v.), published in 1701.

Finding, as the author tells us, 'Military life exposed to much Irregularity', he wrote this little work 'with a design to fix upon his own Mind a strong Impression of Virtue and Religion, in opposition to a stronger Propensity towards unwarrantable Pleasures'. In it he inculcates the value of the Bible as a moral guide and the failure of the old philosophy. The treatise ends with a comparison between Louis XIV and William III, and includes a significant passage recommending, in contrast with the immorality that pervaded most of the writings of the day, a chivalrous attitude towards women. The work is important as one of the first signs of a change of tone in the English literature of the period.

Christian King, Mostr, a title of the kings of France since the middle of the 15th cent., or even, according to some authorities, since Pepin le Bref (Larousse).

Christian Morals, see Browne (Sir T.).

Christianity, An Argument against abolishing, see Swift.

Christian Year, The, a collection of sacred poems by Keble (q.v.), published in 1827. The book attained great popularity both because of the beauty of much of the verse and owing to its connexion with the Oxford Movement (q.v.), of which it expressed the sentiment.

Christiana, in the second part of the 'Pilgrim's Progress' (q.v.), the wife of Christian.

Christie Johnstone, a novel by C. Reade (q.v.), published in 1853. [It is a romantic story, not devoid of humour, telling how the gallant large-hearted Christie, a Scottish fisher-girl, proved herself more than worthy to marry the weak-willed artist, Charles Gatty, and, by saving him from drowning, won over even his dour mother.

Christie's galleries, in King Street, St. James, one of the chief centres of art sales in London. James Christie, the elder (1730-1803), was an auctioneer in London (1766-1803). His eldest son, James Christie, the younger (1773-1831), took over his father's business, and moved to the present premises in 1824. He wrote on the antiquity of chess, Greek vases, &c.

Christie's Kirk on the Green, an old Scottish poem, doubtfully attributed to James I or James V of Scotland, in nine-lined stanzas with a 'bob' after the eighth line, descriptive of the rough fun, dancing, and love-making of a village festival or 'wappinshaw'. Two additional cantos were composed by Allan Ramsay (q.v.).

Christmas-box, originally a box, usually of earthenware, in which contributions of money were collected at Christmas by apprentices, &c., the box being broken when full and the contents shared. Now, a present given at Christmas to employees and tradespeople. Hence 'Boxing Day'.

Christmas Carol, A, a Christmas book by Dickens (q.v.), published in 1843.

Scrooge, an old curmudgeon, receives on Christmas Eve a visit from the ghost of Marley, his late partner in business, and beholds a series of visions of the past, present, and future, including one of what his own death will be like unless he is quick to amend his ways. As a result of this he wakes up on Christmas morning an altered man. He sends a turkey to his ill-used clerk, Bob Cratchit, positively enjoys subscribing to Christmas charities, and generally behaves like the genial old fellow that he has become.

Christmas Eve and Easter Day, two distinct poems under one title, by R. Browning (q.v.), published in 1850.

In the first the narrator recounts a spiritual experience, a vision in which he is taken first to a dissenting chapel, then to St. Peter's Church at Rome, then to a lecture-room where a German professor is investigating the origin of the Christian myth, and finally back to the dissenting chapel. He concludes that his 'heart does best to receive in meekness' this last mode of worship, where earthly aids are cast aside and God 'appears serene with the thinnest human veil between'.

In 'Easter Day' a Christian and a sceptic are disputing. The Christian narrates a vision from which he has learnt the value of life, with its limitations, but with the hope remaining 'to reach one eve the Better Land'.

Christopher, Sr., meaning 'Christ-bearer', a Christian martyr of the 3rd cent., said to have lived in Syria and to have been a man of exceptional size and strength. As a penance for his past sins he used to carry pilgrims over a river. Jesus Christ, the legend says, came to him in the form of a child, to be carried over, but before Christopher reached the other side, the burden became so heavy that he nearly failed. 'Marvel not', said Christ, 'for with me thou hast carried the sins of all the world.' The saint is commemorated on 25 July. He is the patron saint of wayfarers.

CHRISTOPHER NORTH, a pseudonym used by J. WILSON (1785-1854, q.v.).

Christopher Robin, a small boy who figures in the nursery tales of Mr. A. A. Milne. 'The Christopher Robin Story Book' appeared in 1929.

Christopher Sly, see Taming of the Shrew.

Christy Minstrels, a troupe of minstrels imitating negroes, originated in the 19th cent. by one George Christy of New York. The name was afterwards extended to any similar company with blackened faces who sing negro melodies interspersed with jokes.

Chronicles of the Canongate, The, an inclusive title for certain of Sir W. Scott's novels, 'The Highland Widow', 'The Two Drovers', and 'The Fair Maid of Perth' (qq.v.), to which the author attached the fiction that they were written by Mr. Chrystal Croftangry, who draws on the recollections of his old friend, Mrs. Bethune Baliol, a resident in the Canongate, Edinburgh. Mr. Croftangry's own story, notable among Scott's shorter sketches, forms an introduction to the Chronicles.

Chrononhotonthologos, a burlesque of contemporary drama by Henry Carey (q.v.), 'the Most 'Tragical Tragedy that ever was Tragediz'd by any Company of Tragedians', acted in 1734. Chrononhotonthologos is king of Queerummania, and two of the characters are Aldiborontiphoscophornio and Rigdum-Funnidos, names which Scott gave to James and John Ballantyne, on account of the pomposity of the one and the fun and cheerfulness of the other.

Chrysal, or the Adventures of a Guinea, see Adventures of a Guinea.

Chrysaor, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', v. i. 9 and v. xii. 40, the sword of Justice, wielded by Sir Artegal. The Chrysaor of Greek mythology was a son of Poseidon and Medusa.

Chrysēla, daughter of Chryses, a priest of Apollo. She had been taken prisoner and allotted to Agamemnon. Chryses came to the Greek camp to win his daughter's freedom, but was received by Agamemnon with contumely. Thereupon the god sent a plague on the Greek host. To avert this, Achilles urged that Agamemnon should follow the advice of Calchas, the seer, and surrender the damsel. This he finally was obliged to do, but in his wrath he took from Achilles the girl Briseis (q.v.), thereby causing Achilles to retire for a time from the Trojan War.

CHRYSOSTOM, ST. JOHN (c. 345-407), one of the Greek Fathers of the Church, was born at Antioch in Syria of a noble family. Under his mother's influence he was baptized in 370, and spent ten years in the desert, leading an ascetic life and studying theology. He became bishop of Constantinople, and applied the revenues of the see to charitable purposes. He was a most eloquent preacher, and his sermons, directed against the vices of the capital and of the leading personages of the empire (including the empress Eudoxia), coupled with his disciplinary measures, aroused much hostility. He was condemned by a packed synod (Ad Quercum), banished to Nicaea, recalled, and deposed by a second synod. He was sent to Cocysus on the slopes of Mount Taurus; but his energy was unquelled, and he was again removed to more distant regions, but died on the way at Comana. In his writings he emphasized the ascetic element in religion and the need for personal study of the Scriptures. His voluminous works include, notably, commentaries on the Gospel of St. Matthew and on the Epistles to the Romans and Corinthians. The name 'Chrysostom' means 'golden-mouth' and was given to him on account of his eloquence.

Chucks, Mr., a character in Marryat's 'Peter Simple' (q.v.).

Chuffey, in Dickens's 'Martin Chuzzlewit' (q.v.), Anthony Chuzzlewit's old clerk.

Chump, Mrs., a character in Meredith's 'Sandra Belloni' (q.v.).

CHURCH, RICHARD WILLIAM (1815-90), dean of St. Paul's, was author of lives of St. Wulfstan (1844) and St. Anselm (1870), and of Spenser and Bacon (1879 and 1884) in the English Men of Letters series. He also wrote a notable history of the 'Oxford Movement' (1891) and an essay on Dante, of whom he was a devoted student; this was republished with a translation of Dante's 'De Monarchia' in 1878. He published a large number of essays, sermons, and addresses, and an interesting little book on 'The Beginnings of the Middle Ages' (1877).

Church of England, the English branch of the Western Church, which at the Reformation repudiated the supremacy of the Pope, and asserted that of the Sovereign over all persons and in all causes, ecclesiastical as well as temporal, in his dominions. [OED.]

Church of Scotland, the Church established in Scotland in 1560 and confirmed in 1689. It is presbyterian (see Presbyterianism).

CHURCHILL, CHARLES (1731-64), educated at Westminster School. He went to St. John's College, Cambridge, but his university career was interrupted by his marriage at the age of 18. He became famous by his satire on contemporary actors, 'The Rosciad', published in 1761, and his violent satire on Bute and the Scots, 'The Prophecy of Famine', published in 1763. He attached himself to John Wilkes (q.v.) and contributed largely to his paper 'The North Briton'. He wrote other political and social satires (notably 'The Author', against Smollett; 'The Epistle to William Hogarth' and 'The Duellist', 1763; 'The Times', 1764; and 'The Candidate', directed against 'Jemmy Twitcher', Lord Sandwich, 1764), but died young, at Boulogne, on his way to visit Wilkes in France.

CHURCHILL, RT. HON. WINSTON (LEONARD SPENCER) (1874-), eldest son of the late Lord Randolph Churchill (third son of the seventh duke of Marlborough). He entered the army in 1895 and served in Cuba, India, Tirah, and Egypt; was present as a war correspondent at Spion Kop, Diamond Hill, &c.; and served in France as Lieut.-Col. in 1916. He was under-secretary of state for the colonies, 1906-8; president of the board of trade, 1908-10; home secretary, 1910-11; first lord of the Admiralty, 1911-15; secretary of state for war, 1918-21; for the colonies, 1921-2; chancellor of the exchequer 1924-9; prime minister, 1940-5. Among his publications are: 'The Story of the Malakand Field Force' (1898), 'The River War' (1899), 'London to Ladysmith via Pretoria' (1900), 'Ian Hamilton's March' (1900), 'Lord Randolph Churchill' (1906-7), 'My African Journey' (1908), 'Liberalism and the Social Problem' (1909), 'The World Crisis' (4 vols. 1923-9), 'My Early Life' (1930), 'Marlborough' (1933-8), and a novel, 'Savrola' (1900).

CHURCHILL, WINSTON (1871-), American novelist, was born in St. Louis, graduated from the U.S. Naval Academy, and settled in New Hampshire. Among his chief works are: 'Richard Carvel' (1899), 'The Crisis' (1901), 'The Crossing' (1904), 'Coniston' (1906), 'Mr. Crewe's Career' (1908), and 'The Inside of the Cup' (1913).

CHURCHYARD, THOMAS (1520?-1604), at one time page to Henry, earl of Surrey, the poet, lived a wandering life, partly as a soldier in Scotland, Ireland, France, and the Low Countries, partly as a hanger-on of the court and the nobility. He published, before 1553, 'A myrrour for man'. Between 1560 and 1603 he issued a multitude of broadsheets and small volumes in verse and prose, several containing autobiographical pieces and notices of current events. His best-known works are 'Shore's Wife' (1563), in the 'Mirror for Magistrates' (q.v.), and the 'Worthines of Wales' (1587). Among his narrative poems are the 'Wofull Warres in Flaunders' (1578) and the 'General Rehearsall of Warres' (1579), in which he made use of his own experience as a soldier. Spenser in his 'Colin Cloute' refers to Churchyard as 'Old Palaemon that sung so long until quite hoarse he grew'.

GIBBER, COLLEY (1671-1757), son of Caius Cibber the sculptor, was educated at Grantham School and became an actor in 1690. He brought out his first play 'Love's Last Shift' in 1696, of which Congreve said that 'it has only in it a great many things that were like wit, that in reality were not wit', a criticism applicable to his numerous other plays, in which he showed skill as a playwright rather than the qualities of a man of letters. Sir Novelty Fashion in 'Love's Last Shift' suggested Vanbrugh's Lord Foppington in 'The Relapse' (q.v.). One of the best of Cibber's plays was 'The Careless Husband' (q.v.), printed in 1705. Cibber was made poet laureate in 1730, and was fiercely attacked in consequence by other writers. Pope made him the hero of the 'Dunciad' (q.v.) in the final edition of that poem. Cibber published in 1740 an autobiography entitled 'Apology for the life of Mr. Colley Cibber, Comedian'. By this he is principally remembered, on account of the admirable theatrical portraits, of Betterton, Mrs. Bracegirdle, Nokes, &c., that it contains.

CICERO, MARCUS TULLIUS (106-43 B.C.), sometimes referred to in English literature as Tully, was born near Arpinum. After studying law and philosophy he came forward as a pleader. His success in this capacity opened the way for him to the highest offices, and he became consul in 63. His political fame is chiefly based on his vigorous action against the conspiracy of Catiline. Owing to the enmity of Clodius he was banished in 58 for a short time. In the civil war between Caesar and Pompey he joined the party of the latter, but after Pharsalia was pardoned by Caesar. After Caesar's assassination he took the lead of the republican party and vigorously attacked Mark Antony in his Philippic orations. On the formation of the triumvirate he was proscribed, and put to death in 43. His works consist of writings on the art of rhetoric (of which the 'De Oratore' is the chief); on political philosophy ('De Legibus' and 'De Republica'); on moral philosophy ('De Officiis', 'De Senectute', and 'De Amicitia'); and on theology ('De Natura Deorum'); of a large number of orations (including the Verrines and the Philippics) and epistles (many of them to his friend Atticus).

Cicisbeo (pron. tchi-tchiz-bay'-o), the name formerly given in Italy to the recognized gallant of a married woman. The word, whose origin is uncertain, is also used for a knot of ribbon tied to a sword-hilt, walking-stick, &c.

Cid, THE, the favourite hero of Spain, in the account of whom history and myth are difficult to disentangle. Rodrigo Diaz de Bivar, el Cid Campeador ('el Seyd', the lord, 'Campeador', champion), of a noble Castilian family, born c. 1030, rose to fame by his prowess in the war between Sancho of Castile and Sancho of Navarre, and in conflicts with the Moors. Having incurred the jealousy of Alphonso, king of Castile, he was banished and became a soldier of fortune, fighting at times for the Christians, at others for the Moors. His principal feat was the capture of Valencia from the Moors after a siege of nine months. He died of grief at the defeat of his force, in 1099.

In myth his character has been glorified into a type of knightly and Christian virtue and patriotic zeal. His achievements are narrated in the 'Poema del Cid' of the 12th cent. (the most important of early Spanish poems, some 3,700 irregular lines), in the Spanish Chronicle of the 13th cent., and in numerous ballads. The chronicles relating to him were translated by R. Southey (q.v., 1808). The Cid is the subject of the most famous drama of Corneille (q.v.). The Cid's horse was called Babieca.

Cid Hamet Ben Engell, an imaginary Arabian author to whom Cervantes attributes the story of Don Quixote (q.v.).

Cider: for J. Philips's poem, see Cyder.

Ci-devant, a French term meaning 'formerly', signifies, in the language of the French Revolution, a man of rank, i.e. one formerly such, the Republic having suppressed distinctions of nobility.

Cimabue, GIOVANNI (1240–c. 1302), Italian painter, born at Florence. His best-known work is the 'Madonna' in the church of Santa Maria Novella at Florence, which excited such enthusiasm that it was carried in public procession from Cimabue's studio to the church.

Cimmerian, of or belonging to the Cimmerii, a people fabled by the ancients to live in perpetual darkness; hence proverbially used as a qualification of dense darkness. The historical Cimmerii lived on the Sea of Azov, and the word Crimea is derived from their name.

Cincinnatus, THE, an order founded in 1783 by the officers of the American Revolutionary army 'to perpetuate friendship, and to raise a fund for the relief of the widows and orphans of those who fell in the War of Independence'. The badge of the society shows Cincinnatus receiving the ensigns of dictator.

Cincinnātus, LUCIUS QUINCTIUS, a type of old-fashioned integrity and frugality in the annals of the Roman republic. He was called in 458 B.C. from the plough, with which he cultivated his own land, to deliver the Roman army from the peril in which it stood in its conflict with the Aequians. Having successfully done this and held the command for only 16 days, he returned to his plough.

Cinderella, a fairy tale, from the French of Perrault (q.v.), translated by Robert Samber (1729?).

The gentle Cinderella is cruelly used by her step-mother and two step-sisters, and when her household drudgery is done, sits at the corner of the hearth in the cinders, whence her name. Her step-sisters having gone to a ball, she is left crying at home. Her fairy god-mother arrives, provides her with beautiful clothes, a coach made out of a pumpkin, and six horses transformed from mice, and sends her to the ball, on condition that she returns before the stroke of twelve. The prince falls in love with her. She hurries away at midnight, losing one of her tiny glass slippers (pantoufle de verre; perhaps verre should be vair, minever), and resumes her humble garb at the fireside. The prince has search made for her and announces that he will marry her whom the slipper fits. To the discomfiture of the step-sisters the slipper is found to fit only Cinderella, who produces the fellow to it from her pocket, and marries the prince. Andrew Lang, in his 'Perrault's Popular Tales' discusses the analogous stories which exist in the folk-lore of various countries.

Cinque Ports, a group of sea-ports (originally five, Hastings, Dover, Sandwich, Romney, Hythe, to which were added the two 'ancient towns', Rye and Winchelsea, and many associated towns) having jurisdiction along the south-east coast from Seaford in Sussex to Birkington in Kent. In ancient times they furnished the chief part of the English navy, in consideration of which they received many important privileges and franchises. These were mostly abolished in 1832 and 1835, and the Lord Wardenship is now chiefly an honorary dignity. Each of the associated towns above referred to was called a 'limb' of one of the ports, and contributed its ship to the tale of fifty-seven which the ports had to furnish in the 13th cent. The origin of the group is unknown; no real charter was granted before Edward I.

Cinquecento, a term applied in Italy to the 16th cent., and to that style of art and architecture, characterized by a reversion to classical forms, which arose about 1450.

CINTHIO, GIAMBATTISTA GERALDI (1504–73), born at Ferrara, the author of 'Hecatomimthi' or a hundred tales, told after the manner of Boccaccio's 'Decameron' (q.v.) by ten ladies and gentlemen sailing to Marseilles after the sack of Rome in 1527. Some of these were incorporated by Painter in his 'Palace of Pleasure' (q.v.) and provided the plots of Shakespeare's 'Othello' and 'Measure for Measure', and of plays by Beaumont and Fletcher and Shirley.

Circassian, the name of the inhabitants of a region in the NW. of the Caucasus, formerly known as Circassia (now Kuban). They were finally subjugated, after a long struggle, by the Russians in 1864, after which many thousands migrated to Turkish territory. They were notable for beauty of form and feature. Circassian fathers used to sell their daughters to Turkish merchants for Turkish harems.

Circē, celebrated for her knowledge of magic and venomous herbs, inhabited an island called Aeaea. Ulysses, returning from the Trojan War, visited this island. His companions were changed by Circe's potions into swine. Ulysses, fortified against her enchantment by the herb called moly, demanded from Circe, sword in hand, the restoration of his companions. Circe complied, and Ulysses remained with her for a year, becoming by her the father of Telegonus, or according to Hesiod of Agrius and Latinus. See also Scylla and Gryll.

Circumlocution Office, THE, the type of a government department, satirized in Dickens's 'Little Dorrit' (q.v.).

CIRENCESTER, RICHARD OF (d. 1401?), a monk of St. Peter's, Westminster, who compiled a 'Speculum Historiale', A.D. 447-1066. See Bertram (Charles).

Cirrha, a seaport on the Corinthian Gulf, near Delphi and Mt. Parnassus. The region was sacred to Apollo.

Cistercians, the name of a monastic order, an offshoot of the Benedictines, founded at Cistercium or Cîteaux in 1098 by Robert, abbot of Molesme. St. Bernard (q.v.) was a Cistercian; his Bernardines were a branch of the Cistercians with reformed rules.

Cities of the Plain, THE, see Sodom and Gomorrah.

Citizen of the World, The, by Goldsmith (q.v.), a collection of letters purporting to be written by or to an imaginary philosophic Chinaman, Lien Chi Altangi, residing in London. They first appeared as 'Chinese Letters' in Newbery's 'Public Ledger', most of them in the course of 1760. They were republished under the title of 'The Citizen of the World' in 1762. They are in effect a series of whimsical or satirical comments on English customs and peculiarities, on the mental and moral characteristics of the race, and on literary subjects, together with character-sketches and episodes, the whole strung on a slender thread of narrative. The best-known character-sketches in the book are those of the 'Man in Black' (q.v.) and 'Beau Tibbs' (q.v.).

City, THE, short for the City of London, that part of London which is under the jurisdiction of the Lord Mayor and Corporation; more particularly, the business part of this, in the neighbourhood of the Exchange and Bank of England. It substantially represents the ancient city that was enclosed in the Roman wall, with the addition of the wards of Farringdon Without and Bishopsgate Without. 'The City' is used metaphorically of business interests or business men.

City Heiress, The, a comedy by Aphra Behn (q.v.), produced in 1682.

Sir Timothy Treat-all, 'an old seditious knight, who keeps open house for Commonwealthmen', has disinherited his Tory nephew, Tom Wilding. Wilding is courting Charlot, the city-heiress, and introduces his mistress Diana to Sir Timothy, as Charlot. Sir Timothy, under this deception, arranges a marriage with her. During an entertainment at his house, he is visited by a strange nobleman who offers him the crown of Poland. The same night, however, his house is burgled and his papers stolen, and himself and the strange lord bound fast. It turns out not only that Sir Timothy has married his nephew's mistress, but that the Polish Ambassador was Wilding in disguise, and the burglars his associates, who have got possession of Sir Timothy's treasonable correspondence, and of the papers relating to his estate. Wilding is united to Charlot. The plot is complicated by another intrigue, in which Wilding and his friend Sir Charles Merriwill seek the favour of the rich widow, Lady Galliard.

City Madam, The, a comedy by Massinger (q.v.), acted in 1632 and printed in 1659.

The wife and daughters of Sir John Frugal, a rich merchant, are grown extravagant and presumptuous as a result of their wealth. The girls repel their suitors, Sir Maurice Lacy and Mr. Plenty, by attaching intolerable conditions to the grant of their hands. To teach them a lesson, and at the same time to test his brother, Luke, a ruined prodigal whom he has taken into his house (where he occupies a servile position and feigns virtue and humility), Sir John pretends to retire into a monastery and to hand over his property and the management of his family to Luke. Being placed in this position, the brother acts with great harshness to Lady Frugal and her daughters, and to Sir John's creditors and apprentices. Luke's hypocrisy is exposed, the return of Sir John is welcomed by his family, and his daughters gladly promise submission to their suitors.

City of Destruction, THE, in Bunyan's 'Pilgrim's Progress' (q.v.), typifies the state of the worldly and irreligious.

City of Dreadful Night, The, see under Thomson (J., 1834-82) and Kipling.

City of Refuge, in the Mosaic dispensation, a walled town set apart for the protection of those who had accidentally committed manslaughter. See Deut. iv. 41-3.

City of Seven Hills, THE, Rome. The seven hills are the Palatine, Aventine, Capitoline, Caelian, Esquiline, Viminal, and Quirinal.

City of Dreaming Spires: M. Arnold ('Thyrsis') refers to Oxford as 'that sweet city with her dreaming spires'.

City of the Tribes, THE, Galway, so called from the fourteen families or 'tribes' whose ancestors settled there about 1270.

City of the Violet Crown, THE, Athens, see Violet-crowned City.

City Witt, The, or the Woman wears the Breeches, a comedy by Brome (q.v.), printed in 1653.

This is the brightest and most amusing of Brome's comedies. Crasy, a young citizen, has been ruined by his generous and easy-going disposition, and is cursed moreover with a virago for a mother-in-law, Mrs. Pyan-net Sneakup. From her he gets no mercy in his misfortune, and the friends whom he has helped in the past turn from him when he comes to them for assistance. His wife indulges her amorous proclivities as soon as he leaves her. He determines to show them all that his past good-nature was not due to want of wit, and disguising himself in various characters plays on their several vices to extort from them the money and jewels he has lent them or they have stolen from him. Aided by his servant Jeremy, who passes himself off as the rich widow Tryman, he contrives a marriage between the latter and his malignant brother-in-law, a drubbing for each of his wife's would-be lovers, and humiliation for his mother-in-law. The pedant, Sarpego, with his comically apposite snatches of Latin, who refuses to repay him a loan of ten pounds, does not escape his share of punishment.

Civil War, Turf, in English history, the war between Charles I and Parliament, which began in 1642 and ended virtually in 1646. It was followed by the second Civil War of 1648-51, which was terminated by the battle of Worcester.

In American history, the Civil War or War of Secession (1861-5) was caused by the secession of the eleven southern or Confederate (q.v.) States (as a result of the anti-slavery agitation and the growth of the doctrine of state sovereignty) and was terminated by the surrender of their armies.

Civil Wars between the two Houses of York and Lancaster, an epic poem by S. Daniel (q.v.), of which the first four books appeared in 1505. The complete work, comprising eight books, was published in 1609. It contains some 900 eight-lined stanzas, of a grave and philosophic cast, and marked by strong patriotism. The first book deals with the period from the Conquest to Hereford's rising against Richard II, the remaining seven with that from the Wars of the Roses to the accession of Henry VII.

Clack, Miss, in Wilkie Collins's 'The Moonstone' (q.v.), a niece of Sir John Verinder, and narrator of part of the story.

Clairmont, THIS, Arthur Orton; see Tichborne.

Clairmont, CLAIRE (CIARA MARY JANE) (1798-1879), daughter of Mary Clairmont who became William Godwin's (q.v.) second wife. She accompanied Mary Godwin on her elopement with Shelley (q.v.), and in spite of pursuit remained with them on the Continent, giving rise to most of the calumnies directed against Shelley. She returned to London with the Shelleys and in 1816 obtained an introduction to Byron, becoming so intimate with him that when he went to Switzerland the Shelleys were induced to follow him. Her child Allegra was born in 1817, and for nearly three years lived with Byron. In 1821 Allegra was placed in a convent near Ravenna much against the will of Claire, and died in 1822 as the result of a fever. Claire's subsequent life was spent in Russia, Italy, and Paris. She died in Florence in 1879.

Clan na Gael, 'brotherhood of Gaels', an Irish secret society, which had its origin in 1870 among the Fenians (q.v.), and represented the party of extreme violence in the movement for Irish independence.

Clandestine Marriage, The, a comedy by Colman the elder and Garrick (qq.v.), produced in 1766.

This entertaining comedy was suggested by Hogarth's pictures of 'Marriage-a-la-Mode'. Lovewell, the clerk of Mr. Sterling, a wealthy and purse-proud London merchant, has secretly married his employer's younger daughter, Fanny, but dares not brave the father's anger by a disclosure. The father, ambitious to ally himself with a noble family, has arranged a marriage between his elder daughter and Sir John Melvil, nephew of Lord Ogleby, who accept the alliance as a way out of their pecuniary difficulties. Lord Ogleby and Melvil arrive at Sterling's house to make the final arrangements, when Melvil suddenly reveals his aversion for the match with the elder Miss Sterling and his passion for the more attractive Fanny. The latter with embarrassment repels his advances, but hesitates to reveal her marriage. Melvil turns to Mr. Sterling and induces him, for a financial consideration, to agree to the transfer of his affections to the younger daughter. But now Mrs. Heidelberg, Mr. Sterling's wealthy sister, strongly resents the proposed affront to the family, and orders Fanny to be packed off from the house. Fanny in despair applies to Lord Ogleby, an amorous old beau, who mistaking her inarticulate confession for a declaration of love for himself, announces that he will himself marry her, thereby further increasing the perplexity of Lovewell and Fanny. Finally a lover is discovered in Fanny's bedroom, and the household assemble outside the door for the exposure of the villain. When he turns out to be Lovewell, Lord Ogleby good-naturedly intervenes on behalf of the guilty couple, offers to take Lovewell under his own protection, and appeases Sterling's wrath.

Clara Douglas, the heroine of Bulwer Lytton's comedy 'Money' (q.v.).

Clara Middleton, the heroine of Meredith's 'The Egoist' (q.v.).

Clare, a nun of the order instituted at Assisi, c. 1212, by St. Clare, who was inspired by admiration for St. Francis of Assisi. The sisters are also called 'Poor Clares' and 'Minoresses'.

CLARE, JOHN (1793-1864), the son of a Northamptonshire labourer, and himself at various times a herd-boy, militiaman, vagrant, and unsuccessful farmer, who became insane in 1837. He published in 1820 'Poems Descriptive of Rural Life', 'The Village Minstrel' in 1821, 'The Shepherd's Calendar' in 1827, and 'The Rural Muse' in 1835. Other poems of his were published after his death (ed. A. Symons, 1908), and an edition of his poems by Blunden and Porter appeared in 1920. An autobiography of his early years was edited by Edmund Blunden in 1931.

Clarenceux, the second king-of-arms in England (see Heralds' College), whose office is to marshal and arrange the funerals of all baronets, knights, and esquires south of the river Trent. He was formerly called Surroy as opposed to Norroy the northern king-of-arms. The name Clarenceux is derived from the English dukedom created for Lionel, second son of Edward III, when he married the heiress of Clare in Suffolk. [OED.]

Clarendon, CONSTITUTIONS OF, enacted at a council summoned in 1164 by Henry II to meet at Clarendon in Wiltshire. Their object was to check the power of the clergy. The most important of the sixteen articles declared that beneficed clergy should not leave the realm without the king's leave; that no tenant-in-chief should be excommunicated without the king's knowledge; that a criminal clerk should be tried in the king's court; and that after conviction he should not be protected by the Church from punishment. After the murder of Becket, Henry was compelled to give up the Constitutions of Clarendon.

CLARENDON, EDWARD HYDE, earl of (1609-74), was educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, and practised law. As M.P. for Wootton Bassett in the Short Parliament and for Saltash in the Long Parliament, he at first sided with the opposition, but, as a strong Anglican, from 1641 onwards he was one of the chief supporters and advisers of the king. He followed the Prince of Wales in his exile to Scilly and Jersey, where he began his 'History'. He was lord chancellor and chief minister to Charles II from 1658, retaining this position at the Restoration. The future James II married his daughter, Anne Hyde. He subsequently became unpopular, partly owing to the ill-success of the Dutch war; and being impeached, he fled to France in 1667 and lived at Montpellier and Rouen, dying at the latter place. At Montpellier he composed his 'Life', part of which he incorporated with the 'History'.

The 'History'—'The True Historical Narrative of the Rebellion and Civil Wars in England'—was first printed from a transcript under the supervision of Clarendon's son in 1702-4, the original manuscript (now in the Bodleian) being first used in Bandinel's edition (1826). But Bandinel either deciphered it badly or garbled it, and the first true text is that of Dr. Macray (Oxford, 1888). The 'Life of Clarendon', by himself, appeared in 1759, the 'History of the Irish Rebellion and Civil Wars in Ireland' in 1721 (subsequently incorporated in the 'History'), and selections from his correspondence ('Clarendon State Papers'), edited by Scrope and Monkhouse, in 1767-86.

CLARK

Clarendon was chancellor of the University of Oxford from 1660 until his fall. His works were presented to the University by his heirs, and from the profits of the publication of the 'History' a new printing-house, which bore his name, was built for the University Press (q.v.).

Claret, from French clair, diminutive of clair, 'clear, light, bright', a name originally given to wines of a yellowish or light red colour, as distinguished alike from 'red wine' and 'white wine'; the contrast with the former ceased about 1600, and the name is now applied to the red wines of the Bordeaux region. The finest clarets come from the Médoc, a plain on the left bank of the Garonne, and include the Châteaux Lafite, Latour, and Margaux, together with Mouton Rothschild and Pontet Canet. With these is generally classed Haut Brion (Pepys's 'Ho Bryen'), sometimes a very fine wine, though this is grown in the Graves area.

Clarinda, the name used by Mrs. Agnes Maclehoze (née Craig) in her correspondence with Burns (q.v.), who signed himself Sylvander.

Clarissa, one of the principal characters in Vanbrugh's 'The Confederacy' (q.v.).

Clarissa Harlowe, a novel by Richardson (q.v.), of which two volumes were issued in 1747 and five in 1748.

This was the second of Richardson's novels and, as in the others, the story is told by means of letters, written by the heroine Clarissa to her friend Miss Howe, and by the other principal character, Robert Lovelace, to his friend John Belford. Clarissa, a young lady of good family, 'of great Delicacy, mistress of all the Accomplishments, natural and acquired, that adorn the Sex', is wooed by Lovelace, an attractive and versatile but unscrupulous man of fashion. Clarissa's family oppose the match because of his doubtful reputation, and Clarissa for a time resists his advances. But she is secretly fascinated by him, and he succeeds in carrying her off. Clarissa dies of shame, and Lovelace is killed in a duel by her cousin, Colonel Morden. The novel, as the title-page shows, was intended as a warning of 'the Distresses that may attend Misconduct both of Parents and Children in relation to Marriage', and was thus in some sort a complement of 'Pamela'.

CLARK, JOHN WILLIS (1833-1910), educated at Eton and Trinity College, Cambridge, registry of Cambridge University from 1891 till his death, is remembered for his 'Architectural History of the Colleges of Cambridge' (with Robert Willis, 1886), his 'Barnwell Priory' (1897, 1907), and his admirable history of libraries, entitled 'The Care of Books' (1901).

CLARKE, CHARLES COWDEN- (1787-1877), the schoolmaster and friend of Keats (q.v.), and author of 'Recollections of Writers' (with Mary Cowden-Clarke, 1878), &c.

CLARKE, MARY VICTORIA COWDEN- (1809-98), wife of Charles Cowden-Clarke (q.v.), is remembered as the author of the 'Complete Concordance to Shakespeare', which she published in monthly parts, 1844-5.

CLARKE, MARCUS ANDREW HISLOP (1846-81), emigrated to Victoria in 1863, and wrote a number of plays and novels, of which the best known is 'For the Term of his Natural Life' (1874), a vivid and gloomy tale of a penal settlement.

CLARKE, SAMUEL (1675-1729), educated at Caius College, Cambridge, metaphysician, moralist, and opponent of the Deists. His view of morality was that there exists, in the nature of things, an immutable agreement or harmony of certain things and circumstances with certain others, an aspect of reality, like its causal relations, apparent to the understanding. Clarke's principal works were his Boyle Lectures (1704 and 1705), 'A Demonstration of the Being and Attributes of God' and 'A Discourse concerning the Unchangeable Obligations of Natural Religion'.

Classic, in relation to literature, is defined by Sainte-Beuve as what is very good and is made to last. The O.E.D. defines it as (1) 'Of the first class, of the highest rank or importance; approved as a model; standard, leading. (2) Of or belonging to the standard authors of Greek and Latin antiquity. (3) In the style of the literature of Greek and Latin antiquity.' Cf. Romantic.

Classic Races, THE, a name applied to the five chief annual horse-races in England: the Two Thousand Guineas (for three-year-old colts and fillies), the One Thousand Guineas (for three-year-old fillies), the Derby (for three-year-old colts and fillies), the Oaks (for three-year-old fillies), and the St. Leger (for three-year-old colts and fillies). The first two are run at Newmarket, the second two at Epsom, the last at Doncaster.

Claude (1807-80), the chief of the Paris police 1859-75, who acquired celebrity in many criminal affairs. Entirely apocryphal memoirs of Claude (10 vols.) appeared in 1881-3.

Claude Lorraine, more correctly CLAUDE LE LORRAIN, is Claude Gellée (1600-82), a great French landscape painter, whom Ruskin held up to scorn, in contrast with Turner.

Claude Melnotte, the hero of Bulwer Lytton's 'The Lady of Lyons' (q.v.).

CLAYPOLE

CLAUDEL, PAUL (1868-), French diplomatist, poet, and dramatist, author of 'L'Otage', 'La Tête d'Or', 'L'Annonce faite à Marie', &c.

CLAUDIAN (Claudius Claudianus), the last great poet of ancient Rome, was a native of Alexandria. He lived in Rome c. A.D. 395-404, where he enjoyed the favour of Stilicho and praised him in official poems. The best known of his shorter works, the idyll on the 'Old Man of Verona', was translated by Cowley.

Clavering, SIR FRANCIS and LADY, characters in Thackeray's 'Pendennis' (q.v.).

Claverings, THE, a novel by A. Trollope (q.v.), published in 1867.

Harry Clavering and Julia Brabazon have been in love, but the latter, having debts and expensive tastes, throws over her impecunious lover and marries the wealthy Lord Ongar, a worn-out debauchee. He dies within a year, having led her a terrible life and contrived to asperse her honour. Meanwhile Harry Clavering has become engaged to Florence Burton, daughter of the engineer in whose house he has lived as a pupil, a young lady of amiable character but modest charms. Julia returns to London, a social outcast, and Harry becomes entangled with her, at last finding himself in the position of having promised to marry both Florence and the widow. Finally, under gentle pressure from various quarters, Harry decides to be faithful to Florence. The story includes various repellent characters, Julia's brother-in-law Sir Hugh Clavering, and Count Pateroff and his sister Mme Godeloup, whose proceedings intensify the punishment meted out to Julia for her worldly choice of a husband.

Clavijo, DON, in 'Don Quixote' (II. xxxviii, et seq.), a gentleman who is transformed into a crocodile by Malambruno, and released from the enchantment by Don Quixote.

Clavileño, in 'Don Quixote' (q.v., II. xli), the wooden horse supposed to possess magic properties, on which Don Quixote mounts to achieve the adventure of Trifaldi and Malambruno, and which, being full of combustibles, blows up on a match being applied to its tail.

Clayhanger, see Bennett (E. A.).

Claypole, NOAH, in Dickens's 'Oliver Twist' (q.v.), a fellow apprentice of the hero in the establishment of Mr. Sowerberry, the undertaker; and subsequently one of Fagin's gang of thieves.

CLEANNESS

Cleanness, an alliterative poem of 1,800 lines, of the period 1300-60, exalting purity and the delights of lawful love. It deals with three subjects from the Scriptures, to enforce its moral: the Flood, the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the fall of Belshazzar. It includes passages of great power, such as the denunciation of Sodom and the description of the destruction of Babylon. It is attributed to the same author as 'Pearl' and 'Patience' (q.v.).

Cleishbotham, JEDEDIAH, schoolmaster and parish clerk of Gandercleugh, who, by a fiction of Sir W. Scott, sold to publishers the 'Tales of My Landlord' (q.v.). These had been composed by his assistant schoolmaster Peter Pattieson from the stories told by the landlord of the Wallace Inn at Gandercleugh. (See the introduction to 'The Black Dwarf'.)

Clella or CLOELIA, a Roman maiden who, being among the hostages given to Porsena (q.v.), escaped and swam across the Tiber to Rome. The Romans returned her to Porsena, who from admiration of her courage released her. Her story is the basis of the 'Clélie' of Mlle de Scudéry (q.v.).

Clella, the coquette whose gradual decline to the almshouse is described by Crabbe (q.v.) in one of the tales of 'The Borough'.

CLEMENS, SAMUEL LANGHORNE, who wrote under the pseudonym MARK TWAIN (1835-1910), born in Missouri of a Virginian family, was apprenticed in boyhood to a printer, became a pilot on the Mississippi in 1857 and a newspaper correspondent in 1862, being at that time in Nevada. He then adopted as pseudonym the leadsmen's call which had become familiar to him on the Mississippi. He first came into prominence as a writer with his 'Jim Smiley and his Jumping Frog' in 1865, and shortly after became a popular lecturer. His best-known works are 'The Innocents Abroad' (1869), the fruit of a voyage to the Mediterranean and the Holy Land; 'A Tramp Abroad' (1880); 'Life on the Mississippi' (1883); 'Tom Sawyer' (1876), an amusing tale of young scapegraces of Missouri; and 'Huckleberry Finn' (1884), a masterpiece of humorous fiction and at the same time, it is said, an accurate picture of the old rough civilization of the Mississippi. His 'A Connecticut Yankee at the Court of King Arthur' appeared in 1889, 'In Defence of Harriet Shelley' in 1894, 'Joan of Arc' in 1896.

CLEMENT I, a bishop of Rome of the 1st cent., of whom little is known with certainty. According to Eusebius and Jerome he died in the third year of the reign of Trajan. Two 'Epistles to the Corinthians' are attributed to him, the first correctly. These were highly regarded in the early centuries of the Christian era, then disappeared, and were rediscovered by Patrick Young (Patricius Junius, 1584-1651, librarian to James I and Charles I), in the Alexandrian codex of the LXX.

CLEOPATRA

CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, a Greek Father of the Church, probably born at Alexandria, c. A.D. 160. Four of his works have come down to us. He was the first to apply Greek culture and philosophy to the exposition of the Christian faith.

Clementina Porretta, a character in Richardson's 'Sir Charles Grandison' (q.v.).

Clementine Decretals, see Decretals.

Clementine Vulgate, see Vulgate.

Glennam, ARTHUR and MRS., characters in Dickens's 'Little Dorrit' (q.v.).

Cleofas Zambullo, DON, the hero of 'Le Diable Boiteux' (q.v.) of Le Sage.

Cleombrotus, a philosopher of Ambracia, who is said, after reading the 'Phaedo' of Plato, to have leapt into the sea and drowned himself to exchange this life for a better.

'Hal Cleombrotus! And what salads in faith did you light on at the bottom of the Mediterranean?'

(Charles Lamb, 'All Fools' Day'.)

Cleon, an Athenian general and demagogue, originally a tanner, an opponent of Pericles and after his death leader of the party that opposed peace in the Peloponnesian War. He achieved military fame by taking prisoner in 424 B.C. the Spartans in the island of Sphacteria. He was subsequently defeated by Brasidas and killed in battle (422).

Cleon, a character in Shakespeare's 'Pericles' (q.v.).

Cleon, a poem by R. Browning (q.v.), published in 1855.

Cleon is supposed to be one of the poets to whom St. Paul in Acts xvii. 28 refers in the words, 'As certain also of your own poets have said, For we are also his offspring'. Cleon believes in Zeus as the one God, but sees no warrant for the belief in immortality. He states the case to King Protus: his sense of the inadequacy of this life, and his conception of another in which realization shall be as ample as unrealized desire is on earth. But Zeus has not revealed such a life, and Cleon grieves in consequence.

Cleopatra, eldest daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, king of Egypt, was born in 68 B.C. She was named by her father heir of the kingdom, in conjunction with her brother Ptolemy, but was driven from the throne by his guardians Pothinus and Achillas. She was restored to the throne with her brother by Julius Caesar, and when her brother perished in the Alexandrine War became sole ruler of Egypt. By Caesar she had a son named Caesarion. After Caesar's death in 44 B.C. she met Antony in Cilicia and gained his heart by her beauty and fascination. In the war between Antony and Augustus she followed her lover, and the defection of her fleet at the battle of Actium (31 B.C.) hastened his defeat.

CLEOPATRA

Despairing of Antony's fortunes, she retired to her mausoleum at Alexandria and caused a report to be spread of her death. Thereupon Antony stabbed himself. To escape being carried captive to Rome by Augustus, Cleopatra took her own life (30 B.C.). The story of her relations with Antony has been made the theme of three famous plays, Shakespeare's 'Antony and Cleopatra' (q.v.), Dryden's 'All for Love' (q.v.), and Samuel Daniel's 'Cleopatra' (see below). Her relations with Caesar are the theme of a play by G. B. Shaw (q.v.), 'Caesar and Cleopatra'.

The granite obelisks called CLEOPATRA'S NEEDLES have nothing to do with that queen, but were erected at Heliopolis by Thothmes III about 1600 B.C. That which stands on the Thames Embankment was brought to England in 1878.

Cleopatra, a tragedy in blank verse by S. Daniel (q.v.), published in 1594. It is on the Senecan model, and deals with the story of Cleopatra after the death of Antony. Octavius Caesar endeavours to persuade her to leave the monument that she had caused to be built, in order that he may have her to grace his triumph. Feigning to yield, she asks permission first to sacrifice to the ghost of Antonius. After the performance of the rites she dines with great magnificence, and by her order a basket of figs is brought her which contains an asp. With this she does herself to death. Her son Caesarion about the same time is murdered at Rhodes and the race of the Ptolemies becomes extinct.

Cleopatra, in Dickens's 'Dombey and Son' (q.v.), the name by which Mrs. Skewton (q.v.) was known, from the resemblance of her attitude when young in her brouche to that of the Egyptian princess in her galley. When old she maintained a bath chair for the sake of maintaining the attitude.

Cléopâtre, see La Calprenède.

Clerimond, in the tale of 'Valentine and Orson' (q.v.), the sister of the giant Ferragus.

Clerk of Chatham, THE, the schoolmaster in Shakespeare's '2 Henry VI', who in Act iv. ii is haled before Jack Cade.

Clerk's Tale, The, see Canterbury Tales.

CLERK-MAXWELL, JAMES (1831-79), was the first professor of experimental physics at Cambridge. His best-known researches relate to electricity and magnetism, and his theories with regard to these were fully propounded in a treatise published in 1873. Its fundamental ideas have been generally accepted and have formed the basis of much subsequent work. They contributed to the development of the theory of the Conservation of Energy.

Clerkenwell, in London, a district that took its name from a well at which the parish clerks of London used each year to perform a miracle play. The Knights Hospitallers (q.v.) of St. John had their house and church in this district.

CLITUS

Cleveland, CAPTAIN CLEMENT, a character in Scott's 'The Pirate' (q.v.).

Cliché, French, 'a stereotype block', a stock expression which by constant use has become hackneyed and lost its sharp edge.

Clichy, a suburb of Paris. The CLICHIENS were a royalist club that met there after the Terror.

Clicquot, VEUVE, see Champagne.

Clifford, LORD, THE SHEPHERD, see Shepherd (Lord Clifford, the).

CLIFFORD, SOPHIA LUCY (d. 1929), née Lane, wife of Professor W. K. Clifford (q.v.), is chiefly remembered as the author of two striking novels, 'Mrs. Keith's Crime' (1885, on the painful theme of a mother's right to end the misery of a suffering and incurable child) and 'Aunt Anne' (1893). 'A Wild Proxy' (1894), 'A Flash of Summer' (1895), 'The Love-Letters of a Worldly Woman' (1913), and 'Anyhow Stories' (for children, 1882), may also be mentioned. Of her plays, 'The Likeness of Night' was produced in 1901 at the St. James's Theatre, 'The Searchlight' was produced by Miss Horniman in 1910, and 'A Woman Alone' in 1914.

CLIFFORD, WILLIAM KINGDON (1845-79), educated at King's College, London, and Trinity College, Cambridge, professor of applied mathematics at University College, London. He wrote some philosophical treatises ('Seeing and Thinking', 1879; 'Lectures and Essays', 1879), conceiving consciousness as built up out of simple elements of 'mind-stuff'. His contributions to philosophy were cut short by his early death.

Clifford's Inn, one of the old Inns (q.v.) of Chancery, situated in the corner of Fleet Street and Chancery Lane, and said to have derived its name from a Robert Clifford, to whom Edward II granted the property in 1310 (Stow). The Society of law students who came into possession of it was dissolved at the beginning of the 20th cent., and the Inn has now been demolished.

Clink, THE LIBERTY OF THE, in Southwark, a precinct surrounding the London house of the bishops of Winchester. The Clink itself was a noted prison. The liberty enjoyed exemption from the ordinary jurisdiction; and here stood some of the early theatres, the bear-gardens, and the stews (G. R. Stirling Taylor, 'Historical Guide to London'). Hence the slang expression 'in clink' for 'in prison'.

Clío, the Muse (q.v.) of history.

CLIO were the letters with one or other of which Addison signed all his papers in the 'Spectator'.

Clitus or CLITUS, a friend and general of Alexander the Great, who saved Alexander's life at the battle of Granicus (334 B.C.). Taunted by Clitus at a banquet in 328,

CLITUS

Alexander, who was heated with wine, killed him with a javelin, and was then inconsolable for his loss.

CLIVE, MRS. CAROLINE ARCHER (1801-73), née Meysey-Wigley, published, chiefly under the initial V, verses and novels, including 'Paul Ferroll' (q.v., 1855). She was accidentally burnt to death.

Clive, CATHERINE, commonly known as KITTY CLIVE (1711-85), actress, and friend of Horace Walpole, by whom she was pensioned.

Clive, ROBERT, Baron Clive of Plassey (1725-74), obtained an ensign's commission in the East India Company's service in 1747. He showed his bravery and military gifts by the capture of Arcot in 1751 and his subsequent defence of that city against a vastly superior force of French and natives. In 1757 he avenged the tragedy of the Black Hole of Calcutta (q.v.) by defeating Suráj ud Dowlah in the great victory of Plassey. He became governor of Bengal in 1758, and a second time (after a visit to England) in 1765. He resigned owing to ill health in 1767. His conduct was subjected in 1772-3 to a parliamentary inquiry, which resulted substantially in his favour. He died by his own hand.

Clockmaker, Sam Slick, the, see Haliburton.

Cloddipole, one of the rustics in Gay's 'Shepherd's Week' (q.v.).

Clotster and the Hearth, The, an historical romance by C. Reade (q.v.), published in 1861, enlarged from the slight story, 'A Good Fight', which had appeared in 'Once a Week' in 1859.

The story, which is laid in the 15th cent., was inspired by the author's reading of the 'Colloquies' and life of Erasmus, and the writings of Froissart and Luther. Gerard, the hero, the son of a mercer of Tergou, is destined for the Church, but falls in love with Margaret Brandt, the daughter of a poor scholar, suspected of sorcery. He abandons his career and betroths himself to her, but the anger of his father, the hostility of the burgomaster, and the envy of his two wicked brothers succeed in preventing the marriage, and Gerard is imprisoned. He escapes to Margaret, but is presently pursued and obliged to flee the country. The story now proceeds through a series of exciting incidents and vivid scenes in monasteries, taverns, and palaces, as Gerard travels through the disturbed countries of Germany and Burgundy to Italy. Here, by the cruel device of his enemies, he receives false news of the death of Margaret, and in despair gives himself up to a life of debauchery, and then takes the cowl. Meanwhile Margaret gives birth to a son and is reduced to despair by the loss of all trace of Gerard. Finally, as a Dominican preacher, he returns to his native town, is astounded to discover Margaret alive, and is at length persuaded, through the agency of his little son, to return to her and accept the living of Gouda. This same son, the close of the story indicates, is the future Erasmus (q.v.).

Cloutie, a name for the Devil, as popularly represented with a cloven hoof (probably derived from an old word meaning 'claw').

O thou! whatever title suit thee,

Auld Hornie, Satan, Nick or Cloutie.

(Burns, 'Address to the Deil'.)

Clootz, ANACHARSIS, Jean Baptiste Clootz (1755-94), a Prussian, who migrated to Paris, took the name Anacharsis (q.v.), adopted revolutionary views, but was purged from the Jacobins and guillotined (see Carlyle, 'French Revolution', i. iii and vi. i).

Clorin, the 'Faithful Shepherdess' in Fletcher's drama of that name (q.v.).

Clorinda, in Tasso's 'Jerusalem Delivered', a leader of the pagan forces, the daughter of the king of Ethiopia, who had been lost as a babe in the forest and suckled by a tigress. Tancred, who has fallen in love with her, slays her unwittingly in a night attack.

Clos Vougeot, see Burgundy.

Cloten, a character in Shakespeare's 'Cymbeline' (q.v.).

Clotho, see Parcae.

Cloud-cuckoo-land, see Nephelococcygia.

Cloudesley, WILLIAM OF, see Adam Bell.

CLOUGH, ARTHUR HUGH (1819-61), son of a Liverpool cotton merchant, and educated at Rugby and Balliol College, Oxford, became a fellow of Oriel and, after throwing up his fellowship, principal of University Hall, London. He was subsequently an examiner in the Education Office. He died at Florence, and Matthew Arnold's 'Thyrsis' was written to commemorate his death. He is chiefly remembered as the author of the hexameter poem, 'The Bothie of Tober-na-Vuolich' (q.v., 1848), and of some fine lyrics, including the well-known 'Say not the struggle nought availeth', which bear the mark of the spiritual agitation caused by religious doubts. His longer poems, published posthumously, include 'Dipsychus' (q.v., 1869), 'Amours de Voyage' (like the 'Bothie' in hexameters), and 'Mari Magno', a series of tales (1862).

Glove, a character in Jonson's 'Every Man out of his Humour', who makes a pretence to learning by a display of long words and abstruse terms.

Club, THE, see Johnson (Samuel).

Clumsey, SIR TUNBELLY, a character in Vanbrugh's 'The Relapse' and Sheridan's 'A Trip to Scarborough' (qq.v.).

Cluniacs, an order of monks which developed from the Benedictine abbey of Cluny, near Mâcon in France, and separated from the parent order in the 11th cent. Its church at Cluny, largely wrecked in the Revolution, was second in size only to St. Peter's in Rome.

CLUTHA

Clutha, in Macpherson's Ossianic poems, the river Clyde.

Clutterbuck, CAPTAIN CUTHBERT, a fictitious personage supposed to be concerned with the publication of some of Sir W. Scott's novels, e.g. 'The Monastery'.

Clym of the Clough, see Adam Bell.

Clym Yeobright, a character in T. Hardy's 'The Return of the Native' (q.v.).

Clymēnē, (1) daughter of Oceanus and Te-thys, and mother of Atlas and Prometheus; (2) daughter of Minyas, and mother of Phae-thon by the Sun.

Some beauty rare, Calisto, Clymene.

(Milton, 'Paradise Regained', ii. 186.)

Clytemnestra, daughter of Tyndareus, king of Sparta, and Leda (q.v.), and wife of Agamemnon (q.v.), king of Argos. On the return of Agamemnon from the Trojan War, she, with her paramour Aegisthus (q.v.), murdered her husband, and was in turn slain by Orestes, Agamemnon's son.

Clytia or CLYTIE, a nymph, daughter of Oceanus, who was loved by Apollo. She was deserted by him, pined away, and was changed into a sunflower, which constantly turns its head to the sun.

Cnut or CANUTE (q.v.), king of England, 1016-35.

Coal Hole, THE, a tavern in Fountain Court, Strand, from which Thackeray in part drew his 'Cave of Harmony' (q.v.).

Coart, COUWAERT, or CUWAERT, in 'Reynard the Fox' (q.v.), the name of the hare. It is the same word as our 'coward'.

Coatel, a character in Southey's 'Madoc' (q.v.).

Coavinses, in Dickens's 'Bleak House' (q.v.), see Neckett.

COBBE, FRANCES POWER (1822-1904), philanthropist and religious writer, published anonymously 'The Theory of Intuitive Morals' in 1855-7. She was associated with Mary Carpenter in her ragged school and reformatory work, and occupied herself with relief of destitution and workhouse philanthropy. Her voluminous writings include 'Broken Lights' (1864), 'Darwinism in Morals' (1872), 'The Duties of Women' (1881), and an autobiography (1904). She was an early advocate of women's suffrage and opponent of vivisection.

COBBETT, WILLIAM (1763-1835), the son of a labourer at Farnham, and self-educated, served as a soldier in St. John's, New Brunswick, 1785-91. He obtained his discharge, brought an accusation of peculation against some of his former officers, and in 1792 retired to America to avoid prosecution. There he published pro-British pamphlets under the pseudonym of 'Peter Porcupine'. He returned to England in 1800 and became a Tory journalist, editing 'Cob-bett's Political Register', a weekly newspaper, from 1802. Soon he adopted popular opinions and wrote from 1804 in the radical interest. He published 'Parliamentary Debates', afterwards taken over by Hansard, and 'State Trials', wrote an 'English Grammar' (1817) and a number of books on economics and other subjects. He also farmed in Hampshire and subsequently in Surrey. From 1817 to 1819 he was in America. His 'History of the Protestant "Reformation" in England and Ireland' appeared in 1824; his 'Advice to Young Men' in 1829. He became M.P. for Oldham in 1832. He wrote with exceptional perspicuity and vigour, and showed good sense and sound observation in agricultural matters. But his honesty and shrewdness are marred by an arrogant and quarrelsome attitude, and by wrong-headed prejudices. His 'Rural Rides' (q.v.), collected in 1830, are to-day the most interesting of his writings. His 'Political Register', which attained a very large circulation, was continued until his death.

Cobden, RICHARD (1804-65), son of a Sussex farmer, settled in Manchester in 1832. He was a foremost leader of the Anti-Corn-Law League, and M.P. for Stockport (1841-7), for the West Riding of Yorkshire (1847-57), and for Stockdale in 1859. By his strenuous advocacy he powerfully contributed to the repeal of the Corn Laws (1846). He negotiated the commercial treaty with France, 1859-60.

COCCAI, MERLIN, see Folengo.

Cock-and-bull story, an expression that apparently had its origin in some tale or fable, means a long idle rambling story; or a concocted, incredible story.

'Some mens whole delight is . . . to talk of a cock and a bull over a pot.'

(Burton, 'Anatomy of Melancholy', II. ii. 4.)

Cock and Pie, used in asseverations, is perhaps for 'God and Pie', where 'Pie' is the table of rules of the Roman Catholic Church governing the offices for each day.

'By cock and pie, you shall not choose, air! come, come.'

(Shakespeare, 'Merry Wives', I. i.)

Cock Lane Ghost, a supposed ghost to which were attributed mysterious noises heard at No. 33 Cock Lane, Smithfield, of which the object was said to be the detection of a crime. They were discovered in 1762 to be due to an imposition practised by one William Parsons, his wife, and daughter, but not before the report had created much excitement. Dr. Johnson took part in the investigation of the mystery (see Boswell's 'Life', 1763). See A. Lang, 'Cock Lane and Common Sense', 1894.

Cock of the North, George, fifth duke of Gordon (1770-1836), who raised the regiment now known as the Gordon Highlanders and commanded it (1795-9) in Spain, Corsica,

COCK OF THE NORTH

Ireland, and Holland, where he was severely wounded. 'Cock of the North' is also the name of a well-known tune on the pipes.

Cockatrice (from Latin calcatrrix, apparently a medieval translation of the Greek ixneumon, ichneumon), a serpent identified with the basilisk (q.v.), fabled to kill by its mere glance, and to be hatched from a cock's egg. In heraldry, it is a hybrid monster with the head, wings, and feet of a cock, terminating in a serpent with a barbed tail.

Cockayne or COCKAIGNE, LAND OF, the name of a fabulous country, the abode of luxury and idleness. The origin of the term has been much discussed but remains obscure. Baring-Gould ('Curious Myths') regards it as originally a nickname for the 'Fortunate Isles' (q.v.). The word in its derivation is connected with 'cook' or 'cake'. The OED. gives a quotation c. 1305, from which it appears that the houses in Cockayne were covered with cakes.

Cocke Lorell's Bote, a popular satire of the 16th cent., in verse, in which types of the various tradesfolk take ship and sail through England. The captain of the 'Bote' is Cocke Lorell, a tinker and probably an historical personage. It is an interesting picture of low life.

COCKER, EDWARD (1631-75), a teacher of arithmetic and writing in London, whose treatise on arithmetic attained great popularity and gave rise to the expression 'according to Cocker'.

Cockney, from Middle English coken-ey, 'cocks' egg', of which the original meaning was perhaps one of the small or misshapen eggs occasionally laid by fowls. It came to mean 'a cockered child', an effeminate fellow or milksop, and so was used derisively for a townsman in contrast to the hardier inhabitants of the country, and finally for one born in the city of London (always more or less in a contemptuous or bantering sense). Hence it was extended to the London dialect or accent.

THE COCKNEY SCHOOL was a nickname given by Lockhart to a set of 19th-cent. writers belonging to London, of whom Leigh Hunt and Hazlitt were representative members.

Cockpit, THE, the name of a theatre in London in the 17th cent., referred to by Pepys (11 Oct. 1660 and 5 Jan. 1662-3). Also the name of a block of buildings near Whitehall erected by Henry VIII as government offices.

THE COCKPIT OF EUROPE is an expression applied to Belgium as the scene of many wars (a cockpit being the scene of cock-fights).

Cocles, PUBLIUS HORATIUS, a Roman who at first with two companions and then alone opposed the whole army of Porsena, king of Etruria, at the head of the bridge leading into Rome, while his companions behind him were cutting off communication with the other shore. When the bridge was destroyed, Cocles, though wounded, leapt into the Tiber and swam across it with his arms. The feat is the subject of one of Macaulay's 'Lays of Ancient Rome'.

Cocoa-tree Club, THE, in St. James's Street, originally a chocolate house of the same name, dating from the early 18th cent. After being a Tory centre and subsequently, in 1745, a resort of the Jacobite party, it became a fashionable club where, as Horace Walpole's letters attest, there was gambling for high stakes. 'At the Cocoa-tree Lord Stavordale, not one-and-twenty, lost eleven thousand last Tuesday, but recovered it by one great hand at hazard' (1770).

Cocythus, the 'river of lamentation', from κωκυτός, I howl; a river of Epirus, and by the poets regarded as a river of Hades. See Styx.

Codille, a term used in the game of ombre, when the adversaries of ombre win the game.

Just in the jaws of ruin, and Codille.

(Pope, 'Rape of the Lock', iii. 93.)

Codlin and Short, in Dickens's 'Old Curiosity Shop' (q.v.), travel about the country with a Punch and Judy show. Thomas Codlin was a surly misanthrope; Short (whose real name was Harris, but was familiarly known as 'Short Trotters') was a cheerful little man. Codlin, who suspects that Little Nell and her grandfather have run away from their friends and is anxious to get the reward for their discovery, assures Nell that 'Codlin's the friend, not Short'.

Codrington, CHRISTOPHER (1668-1710), born in Barbados, and educated at Christ Church, Oxford, became captain-general of the Leeward Islands in 1697. He spent the last years of his life in study on his Barbados estates, which he bequeathed to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, for the foundation of a college in Barbados. He also left his books and £10,000 to All Souls College, Oxford, a bequest out of which was founded the CODRINGTON LIBRARY.

Cælebs in Search of a Wife, a novel by Hannah More (q.v.), published in 1809. It is a collection of social sketches and precepts, strung together on the thread of the hero's search for a young woman who shall possess the qualities stipulated for by his departed parents.

Coffee-houses were first introduced in London in the time of the Commonwealth and were much frequented in the 17th and 18th cents. for political and literary discussion, circulation of news, &c. There is an interesting description of them in Macaulay's 'History of England', c. iii. See Button's, Will's, Grecian, Garraway's.

Cogglesby, ANDREW and TOM, characters in Meredith's 'Evan Harrington' (q.v.).

Cognac, a French brandy of superior quality distilled from the wine of Cognac, in the Charente. The name is sometimes extended to any French brandy.

COKE, SIR EDWARD (1552-1634), educated at Norwich and Trinity College, Cambridge, and a barrister of the Inner Temple, was advanced by Burghley's influence to be attorney-general, to the disappointment of Francis Bacon (q.v.), whose lifelong rival he was. He became chief justice of the Common Pleas in 1606, of the King's Bench in 1613. Here he quarrelled incessantly with the Court of Chancery and was dismissed by the king in 1616. Gardiner calls his dismissal a 'turning point' in the relations of king and parliament. Coke's fame as a legal author rests on his eleven volumes of 'Reports' (1600-15), and his 'Institutes' (1628-44) in which he recast, explained, and defended the common law rules. The first part of the 'Institutes' is the commentary on the 'Tenures' of Littleton (q.v.), whence the term, now obsolete, Coke-upon-Littleton, a cant name for a mixed drink.

Coke, LADY MARY (1726-1811), a daughter of John, Duke of Argyll, the wife of Edward Viscount Coke. Her entertaining 'Letters and Journals' have been privately printed (1889-96).

Cokes, BARTHOLOMEW, a character in Jonson's 'Bartholomew Fayre' (q.v.).

Colbek, THE DANCERS OF, the subject of a story in Robert Mannyng's 'Handlyng Synne' (q.v.).

A band of 'fools' led by Bovo and Gerlew come to Colbek (Kölbik in Anhalt, Saxony) and dance and sing in the churchyard, enticing the priest's daughter to dance with them. The priest, about to begin mass, bids them desist, but they continue. He curses them and prays that they may be obliged to dance for a twelvemonth. This they do in obedience to the curse, and although the others survive the ordeal, the priest's daughter falls dead at the end, and the priest dies soon after.

The circumstances (perhaps an epidemic of St. Vitus's dance) from which the story sprang appear to belong to 1021. Two letters narrating the event were circulated as credentials by pretended survivors of the band. One of these, the letter of Theodric, makes Bruno, bishop of Toul (afterwards Pope Leo IX), vouch for the facts. Theodric was miraculously cured at the shrine of St. Edith of Wilton, and the letter was preserved in the Acts of St. Edith, and Mannyng had it before him.

Colbrand, in the romance of 'Guy of Warwick' (q.v.), the Danish giant slain by Sir Guy. The story is also told in Drayton's 'Polyolbion', xii. 130 et seq.

Cold Harbour or COLD HARBOROUGH, an ancient building in the parish of All Hallows the Less, in Dowgate Ward, London, at one time the College of Heralds, and subsequently the residence of Bishop Tunstall (1474-1559). It was removed by the earl of Shrewsbury, who erected small tenements in its place, where debtors and others took sanctuary, a character that the locality enjoyed perhaps owing to its connexion with the bishop. The name is also applied to derelict houses (perhaps destroyed in the Saxon and Angle invasions of Britain) and is borne by several localities in England.

Coldbath Fields, in Clerkenwell, London, famous for a prison established there in the reign of James I, now closed.

Cole, KING, the 'merry old soul' of the nursery rhyme, was Coel, one of the legendary kings of Britain enumerated by Geoffrey of Monmouth (q.v.) in his 'Historia Regum Britanniae'. Some authorities trace him even farther back, to the god Camulus, whose name is seen in Camulodunum (Colchester). There is a poem about him by Masefield (q.v.) in 'King Cole and other Poems' (1923).

COLENSO, JOHN WILLIAM (1814-83), started life as a poor Cornish boy, became a sizar of St. John's College, Cambridge, a master at Harrow, and ultimately bishop of Natal. Besides text-books on arithmetic and algebra, he published 'Ten Weeks in Natal' in 1854; a 'Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans' (1861), which attacked the sacramental system and evoked much opposition; and a 'Critical Examination of the Pentateuch' (1862-79), concluding that these books were post-exile forgeries. He was deposed and excommunicated by Bishop Gray of Capetown (who had no jurisdiction over him), but confirmed in the possession of his see by the law courts (1866).

COLERIDGE, HARTLEY (1796-1849), eldest son of Samuel Taylor Coleridge (q.v.), educated at Ambleside and Merton College, Oxford, was appointed a probationer fellow of Oriol College, but dismissed in 1820 on a vague charge of intemperance. He tried work as a schoolmaster, with little success, contributed to the 'London Magazine' and 'Blackwood's', and lived mainly at Grasmere. His longest work is the 'Biographia Literaria' or 'Lives of Northern Worthies' (1833-6, 1852). His poems include some beautiful sonnets, notably those 'On Prayer', 'To Homer', 'To Shakespeare', and that on himself—'When I review the course that I have run', and some pieces marked by a singular melancholy charm, such as 'She is not fair to outward view', and 'She pass'd away like morning dew'. His collected poems were issued in 1851, and his essays and some of his notable marginalia in the same year, by his brother Derwent.

COLERIDGE, MARY ELIZABETH (1861-1907), belonged to the same family as her great namesake; for her grandfather, Francis George Coleridge, was the nephew of S. T. Coleridge (q.v.). She was author of some remarkable poetry. Her 'Poems Old and New' (1907) and 'Gathered Leaves' (1910) were published posthumously. Her first novel, 'The Seven Sleepers of Ephesus' (1893), was praised by R. L. Stevenson. 'The King with Two Faces', an historical novel centring round Gustavus III of Sweden, appeared in 1897.

COLERIDGE, SAMUEL TAYLOR (1772-1834), son of the vicar of Ottery St. Mary, Devon, was educated at Christ's Hospital (Lamb, in his Elia essay, describes the impression that Coleridge, some years his senior there, made upon him) and at Jesus College, Cambridge. Thence for an unknown reason he betook himself to London and enlisted in the 15th Dragoons, but was discharged after a few months and returned to Cambridge. He made the acquaintance of Robert Southey (q.v.), and the pair devoted themselves to 'Pantisocracy', a form of communism which they contemplated realizing on the banks of the Susquehanna. He married Sara Fricker in 1795, Southey marrying her sister.

He contributed verses to the 'Morning Chronicle' as early as 1793-5, and in 1794 wrote and published in conjunction with Southey 'The Fall of Robespierre'. In 1796 he started a newspaper, 'The Watchman', which lasted for only ten numbers. In 1795 he made the acquaintance of Wordsworth, and the two poets, between whom there sprang up a deep friendship, lived in close intercourse for about a year at Nether Stowey and Alfoxden in Somerset. Their 'Lyrical Ballads' (q.v.) containing Coleridge's 'Ancient Mariner' (q.v.) appeared in 1798. Coleridge wrote the first part of 'Christabel' (q.v.) and 'Kubla Khan' (q.v.) in 1797, and contributed some of his best poems to the 'Morning Post' during 1798-1802. 'France, an Ode', a retraction of his faith in the revolutionary movement, appeared in 1798. 'Dejection' was written in 1802. After his visit to Germany in 1798-9, he published (1799-1800) his translations of Schiller's 'Piccolomini' and 'The Death of Wallenstein' under the title 'Wallenstein'. He settled for a time (1800-4) at Keswick, where he wrote the second part of 'Christabel'. In 1804 he travelled to Malta and Italy, returning in 1806 broken in health and a prey to the use of opium. In 1808 he gave lectures on the English poets at the Royal Institution, which were imperfectly reported, and in 1809 he launched his second periodical, 'The Friend', 'a literary, moral, and political weekly paper', subsequently re-written and published as a book (1818). In this appeared the grim ballad-tale of 'The Three Graves', written some twelve years previously. He spent much of the latter part of his life in the houses of friends, notably of John Morgan at Hammersmith and subsequently at Calne, and after 1816 of a kindly surgeon, James Gillman, at Highgate. He had been given annuities of £75 each by Josiah and Thomas Wedgewood, but Josiah's was withdrawn in 1811. In 1817 appeared his 'Biographia Lite- raria' (q.v.) or literary autobiography, and in 1825 his 'Aids to Reflection' (q.v.), in the first of which he did much to introduce German philosophy to English thinkers, though some of his philosophical doctrines were arrived at independently. He also wrote three plays, 'The Fall of Robespierre' (1794), 'Zapolya' (1817), and 'Osorio'. This last, written before 1798, was acted, under the title 'Remorse', at Drury Lane in 1813. Coleridge's finest poems, 'The Ancient Mariner', 'Kubla Khan', and 'Christabel', are characterized by the sense of mystery that he suggests. His gift in a lighter mood is seen in such a poem as 'The Devil's Thoughts' (q.v.), written with Southey.

Apart from his poetry, Coleridge did valuable work in literary criticism, maintaining that the true end of poetry is to give pleasure 'through the medium of beauty'. The 'Biographia' contains much of this criticism, in particular of the poems of Wordsworth. In philosophy, he courageously stemmed the tide of the prevailing doctrines derived from Hume and Hartley, advocating a more spiritual and religious interpretation of life, based on what he had learnt from Kant and Schelling. 'Anima Poetae' (q.v.), edited from his unpublished note-books in 1895 by E. H. Coleridge, contains some of his most interesting work in this sphere. Mention must also be made of his 'Confessions of an Enquiring Spirit', edited by H. N. Coleridge in 1840, letters revealing his attitude to the question of Biblical inspiration. In political philosophy, to which he paid much attention, he declared himself the heir of Burke and an enemy of Jacobinism, though constructively he had little to offer. There are biographies by J. Dykes Campbell (1894) and E. K. Chambers (1938). His 'Letters' were edited by T. Allsop in 1836. Two volumes of his 'Unpublished Letters' were edited by E. L. Griggs in 1932.

COLERIDGE, SARA (1802-52), daughter of S. T. Coleridge (q.v.) and wife of Henry Nelson Coleridge, was author of 'Phantasmion' (1837), an elaborate romantic fairy-tale, with a host of characters, among whom figure Oloola, the spirit of the storm, and Valhorga, the earth spirit. Even Potentilla, the special protectress of Prince Phantasmion, is a fairy of no mean powers, for she is able to convert him into a sort of flying sea-serpent, for the discomfiture of the pirates who infest his shores. The story, which is concerned with the love of Phantasmion for Iarine, whom after many adventures he wins from his rivals Karadan and the wicked king Glandreth, is told with much charming fancy, and interspersed with many pleasant lyrics. Sara Coleridge also helped her brother Derwent to edit their father's poems, and her husband to edit her father's philosophical writings. Her interesting 'Letters' were published in 1873.

COLET, JOHN (1467?-1519), dean of St. Paul's and the principal Christian humanist of his day in England. He studied at Oxford and in Italy, and lectured on the New Testament at Oxford from 1496 to 1504, Erasmus being among his hearers. As dean of St. Paul's, he founded and endowed St. Paul's School, for which he wrote a Latin accidence, W. Lily supplying the syntax. This book, revised by Erasmus, ultimately developed into the 'Eton Latin Grammar'. Colet was a pioneer of the English Reformation, famous as a preacher and lecturer. His 'Exposition of St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans' and 'Exposition of St. Paul's First Epistle to the Corinthians' (ed. by J. H. Lupton, Cambridge University Press) throw light upon his method of exegesis. There is an interesting picture of Colet and his school in Erasmus, Ep. 1211 (in Allen's ed.; translation by J. H. Lupton, 1883).

Collin and Lucy, see Tickell.

Collin Clout, the name adopted by Edmund Spenser (q.v.) in the 'Shepherds Calender' and 'Collin Clouts come home againe' (qq.v.). COLIN CLOUT is also the name of a rustic in Gay's 'Shepherd's Week' (q.v.). See also Colyn Cloute.

Collin Clouts come home againe, an allegorical pastoral written by Spenser (q.v.) on his return to Kilcolman after his visit to London of 1589-91. It was dedicated to Sir Walter Raleigh 'in part payment of the infinite debt in which I acknowledge myself bounden unto you, for your singular favours and sundrie good turnes, shewed to me at my late being in England'. The poem describes in allegorical form how Raleigh visited Spenser in Ireland, and induced him to come to England 'his Cynthia to see'—i.e. the queen. There is a charming description of the sea voyage; after which the poet tells of the glories of the queen and her court, and the beauty of the ladies who frequent it. Then follows a bitter attack on the envies and intrigues of the court. The poem ends with a tribute to 'Rosalind' in spite of her cruelty to the poet. Of the characters mentioned in the work, Cynthia is Queen Elizabeth, Hobbinol is G. Harvey (q.v.), Amyntas is T. Watson (q.v.), the Shepherd of the Sea is Sir W. Raleigh (q.v.).

Coliseum or Colosseum, THE, or Flavian amphitheatre, in Rome, was begun by Vespasian in A.D. 72 and inaugurated by Titus, after his return from the conquest of Jerusalem. It was the scene, during four centuries, of countless gladiatorial combats and of the martyrdom of many Christians. It was reduced to its present ruinous condition partly by earthquakes, partly by being used as a quarry for building-stone.

Colkitto, 'or MACDONNELL, or GALASP', in Milton's first 'Tetrachordon' sonnet, was the lieutenant-general of the marquis of Montrose in his campaign on behalf of Charles I. He was called Alexander Macdonnell, Mac Colkittoch, Mac-Gillespie, that is to say Alexander Macdonnell, the son of Colkittoch, the son of Gillespie (or Galasp). He figures in Scott's 'Legend of Montrose' (q.v.).

Colleen Bawn, The (Anglo-Irish, meaning 'The Fair Girl'), the title of a play by Dion Boucicault (1859), founded on Gerald Griffin's 'The Collegians' (q.v.).

College of Arms, see Heralds' College.

Collegians, The, a novel by Griffin (q.v.), published in 1829.

It is a sombre, sensational story of the injudicious secret marriage of young Hardress Cregan with a girl of lower station than his own, repented when he finds himself loved by a woman of no less beauty and greater refinement. He allows himself to become affianced to the latter under strong pressure from an imperious mother, and connives at the removal, in fact at the murder, of his innocent young wife. He is arrested on the eve of his marriage with his second love. The tragedy is relieved by some amusing scenes of Irish life, quiet humour, and good ballads. Dion Boucicault's play 'The Colleen Bawn' was founded on this novel.

Collegiate Ladies, in Jonson's 'Epicœne' (q.v.), a group of dissolute women 'between courtiers and country madams, who live from their husbands and give entertainment to all the wits and braveries [beaux] of the time'.

COLLIER, JEREMY (1650-1726), educated at Ipswich and Caius College, Cambridge, was rector of Ampton, Suffolk, 1679-85. He publicly absolved on the scaffold two of those executed for the assassination plot, in 1696, and was in consequence outlawed. He became a nonjuring bishop in 1713. He is chiefly remembered for his 'Short View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the English Stage', 1698, in which he particularly attacked Congreve and Vanbrugh (q.v.). The work created a great, if temporary, impression. Congreve and D'Urfey were prosecuted, Betterton and Mrs. Bracegirdle were fined, and some of the poets replied, though not very effectively. But the futility of Collier's attack is shown by the continued success of the type of play that he inveighed against. Collier published a learned 'Ecclesiastical History of Great Britain' in 1708-14.

COLLIER, JOHN PAYNE (1789-1883), author of 'Notes on Rare English Books' (1865) and editor of the 'Roxburghe Ballads' (1847) as well as of many papers for the Camden, Percy, and Shakespeare societies; remembered also for his falsifications of ancient documents, notably for forgeries of marginal corrections of the text of Shakespeare in the 'Perkins folio'.

COLLINS, ARTHUR (1690?-1760), a bookseller in London, was author of the 'Peerage of England' (1709, enlarged editions, 1735 and 1756), and of the 'Baronetage of England' (1720).

COLLINS, JOHN CHURTON (1848-

COLLINS

1908), was educated at King Edward's School, Birmingham, and Balliol College, Oxford. He was greatly interested in English literature and long agitated, with ultimate success, for its academic recognition at Oxford. He was a frequent contributor to the 'Quarterly Review', 'The Saturday Review', and other periodicals, and became professor of English at the University of Birmingham. He edited Cyril Tourneur's works (1878), Lord Herbert of Cherbury's poems (1881), and Robert Greene's works (1905); and published 'Ephemera Critica' (1901), 'Studies in Shakespeare' (1904), 'Studies in Poetry and Criticism' (1905), and 'Voltaire, Montesquieu, and Rousseau in England' (1905). Churton Collins was found drowned at Oulton Broad, near Lowestoft.

COLLINS, WILLIAM (1721-59), the son of a Chichester hatter, educated at Winchester and Magdalen College, Oxford. He was an exquisite lyrical poet, but his verse was unfortunately small in quantity, and some of it (the 'Ode on the Music of the Grecian Theatre', written in 1750, and 'The Bell of Aragon', his last ode) is unfortunately lost. He published his 'Persian Eclogues' as an undergraduate in 1742, and in 1747 his 'Odes'. The best known of these are the 'Ode to Evening', the 'Ode to Simplicity', and the 'Ode written in 1746' ('How sleep the brave'). The charming 'Dirge in Cymbeline' must also be mentioned. His long 'Ode on the popular Superstitions of the Highlands', containing some magnificent verse, was written in 1749 and published posthumously. He became insane and died in his sister's house at Chichester.

Collins, WILLIAM, in Jane Austen's 'Pride and Prejudice' (q.v.), a pompous, silly, and self-satisfied young clergyman, excessively obsequious to persons of high social station. The solemn letter of thanks that he addresses to Mr. Bennet (c. xxii), though the text is not given) after his stay with the family has led to his name being colloquially associated with such letters.

COLLINS, WILLIAM WILKIE (1824-89), was called to the bar in 1851, but adopted literature as a profession. He made the acquaintance of Dickens and contributed to 'Household Words' from 1855. It was in this periodical that he published in 1860 'The Woman in White' (q.v.), by which his fame was established as practically the first English novelist who dealt with the detection of crime. His other works include: 'Antonina, or the Fall of Rome' (1850), 'Hide and Seek' (1854), 'The Dead Secret' (1857), 'My Miscellanies' (1862), 'No Name' (1862), 'Armada' (1866), 'The Moonstone' (q.v., 1868), 'Man and Wife' (1870), 'Poor Miss Finch' (1872), 'The New Magdalen' (1873), 'A Rogue's Life' (1879), 'Little Novels' (1879), 'The Black Robe' (1881). For the collaboration of Collins with Dickens, see Dickens.

COLMAN, GEORGE, the elder (1732-94), born in Florence, where his father was British envoy, was educated at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford. He was manager of the Covent Garden Theatre, 1767-74, and of the Haymarket Theatre, 1777-89. He was a friend of Garrick and collaborated with him in writing the excellent comedy, 'The Clandestine Marriage' (q.v., 1766). He wrote or adapted some thirty dramatic pieces, edited Beaumont and Fletcher (1778), and translated Terence (1765) and Horace's 'Art of Poetry' (1783). His most effective plays were 'Polly Honeycombe' (1760) and 'The Jealous Wife' (1761, an adaptation of Fielding's 'Tom Jones').

COLONEL JACK

COLMAN, GEORGE, the younger (1762-1836), son of George Colman the elder (q.v.), educated at Westminster School, Christ Church, Oxford, and Aberdeen University, made his name as a dramatist by the romantic comedy 'Inkle and Yarico' (q.v., 1787). His comedy 'The Heir-at-Law' (1797) is famous for its presentation of Dr. Pangloss, the greedy, pompous pedant. 'John Bull' (1803) contains the supposed type of the British character, Job Thornberry. 'The Iron Chest' (1796) is a dramatization of 'Caleb Williams' (q.v.). Colman's other pieces are less important.

Colmekill, in Shakespeare's 'Macbeth', II. iv, is I-Colm-kill (the island of Columba of the Church), the modern Iona (q.v.).

Colombe's Birthday, a play by R. Brown-ing (q.v.), published in 1844 and acted in 1853.

Colombe is duchess of Juliers and Cleves, liable however to be ousted under the Salic Law by her cousin Prince Berthold. The latter claims his rights, and offers the young duchess marriage, employing her advocate Valence to convey his offer. But Valence himself loves Colombe, and finally wins her by his loyalty and self-denial.

Colonel Jack, The History and Remarkable Life of Colonel Jacque, Commonly Call'd, a romance of adventure by Defoe (q.v.), published in 1722.

The supposed narrator, abandoned by his parents in childhood, falls into bad company and becomes a pickpocket. His profession grows distasteful to him, and he enlists, and presently deserts to avoid being sent to serve in Flanders. He is kidnapped, sent to Virginia, and sold to a planter. He is promoted to be an overseer, is given his liberty, becomes himself a planter, and acquires much wealth. He returns home, has a series of unfortunate matrimonial adventures, but finally ends in prosperity and repentance.

COLONNA, VITTORIA (1490-1547), granddaughter of Frederick, duke of Urbino, and devoted wife of the marquis of Pescara, was a woman remarkable in a dissolute age for her stainless character and the admiration she inspired among great men, among others Michelangelo. Her writings, largely religious, include some notable sonnets.

Colossus of Rhodes, a celebrated statue of Apollo by the sculptor Chares of Lindus in Rhodes, which passed for one of the seven wonders of the world. According to an unfounded tradition, its feet rested on two moles, which formed the entrance of the harbour, and ships passed between its legs. It is said by Pliny to have been seventy cubits high. It was demolished by an earthquake in 224 B.C.

COLUMBA, ST., otherwise COLUMCILLE or COLUMBANUS (521-597), son of Feidilmid, an Ulster chief, and a pupil of St. Finnian, became a recluse at Glasnevin, and built churches at Derry and other places. He went to Scotland in 563, founded the monastery of Hy (Iona), and preached to the Picts. His relics were translated to Ireland in 878, but were destroyed by the Danes in 1127. Several books believed to have been written by him were long venerated in Ireland. He is commemorated on 9 June.

Columban, St. (543-615), born in Leinster and a monk under St. Comgall at Bangor, Down, resided in Burgundy, 585-610. There he built monasteries at Anegray and Luxeuil, for which he drew up a monastic rule, afterwards common in France, until replaced by that of St. Benedict. He was expelled from Burgundy by Theodoric II and preached to the heathen Germans and Suabians. He founded the monastery of Bobbio in the Piedmont and died there. He is commemorated on 21 Nov.

Columbiad, The, a lengthy epic poem by Joel Barlow (q.v.), which surveys the panorama of early American history, as revealed in a vision to Columbus. After bringing his history up to date, the author launches into prophecy. First published as 'The Vision of Columbus' (1787), the poem was renamed 'The Columbiad' in 1807.

Columbine, a character in Italian comedy,

Columbus, CHRISTOPHER (c. 1445-1506), in Spanish CRISTÓVAL COLÓN, a Genoese navigator, the discoverer of America. He is said to have first proposed his expedition of discovery to the Genoese republic and other powers, but to have been rebuffed. He finally obtained the favour of Queen Isabella of Castile and embarked on his first voyage in 1492. He met with much ingratitude and persecution, but made in all four voyages to the West Indies. His object was to reach the Cathay of Marco Polo, and he remained under the impression that the regions he discovered were the fringes of the Asiatic continent.

A Castilla y a León

Columbus's Egg: after the return of Columbus from his successful voyage of discovery he was invited to a banquet by Cardinal Mendoza. 'A shallow courtier present, impatient of the honours paid to Columbus, abruptly asked him whether he thought that in case he had not discovered the Indies, there were not other men in Spain who would have been capable of the enterprise. To this Columbus made no immediate reply, but taking an egg, invited the company to make it stand on end. Every one attempted it, but in vain. Whereupon he struck it upon the table so as to break the end and left it standing on the broken part; illustrating in this simple manner that when he had once shown the way to the New World nothing was easier than to follow it.' (W. Irving, 'Life of Columbus', v. vii, on the authority of the Italian historian Benzoni; but the story, Prof. S. E. Morison states in 'The Atlantic Monthly' for January 1942, occurs earlier, in a biography of the Italian architect Brunelleschi.)

COLUMELLA, LUCIUS JUNIUS MODERATUS, a native of Gades in Spain. He was a contemporary of Seneca and the author of a work (c. A.D. 65) on the various forms of agriculture, the keeping of livestock and bees, &c. The 'Columella' referred to by Jane Austen in 'Sense and Sensibility' is the hero of a tale by Richard Graves (q.v.).

COLVIN, SIR SIDNEY (1845-1927), educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, became Slade Professor of Fine Art at Cambridge (1873-85), and keeper of the prints and drawings at the British Museum (1884-1912). Besides numerous contributions to periodicals, chiefly on the history and criticism of art, he published lives of Walter Savage Landor (1881) and Keats (1887) in the English Men of Letters series; 'A Florentine Picture Chronicle' (1898); 'Early Engraving and Engravers in England' (1905); 'Drawings by Old Masters at Oxford' (1902-8). Colvin edited the 'Letters of Keats', 1887, the Edinburgh edition of R. L. Stevenson's works (1894-7), and the 'Letters of R. L. Stevenson' (1899 and 1911). He published 'John Keats, his Life and Poetry' in 1917, 'Memories and Notes of Persons and Places' in 1921.

Colyn Cloute, a satirical poem by Skelton (q.v.), directed against ecclesiastical abuses, and written about 1519. See also Colin Clout.

Comala, the title of one of the Ossianic poems of Macpherson (q.v.). Comala, daughter of Sarno, king of Inistore, is in love with Fingal, and follows him, disguised as a youth. Her romantic passion so much recommends her to the king that he is about to marry her, when the invasion of Caracul (Caracalla) intervenes. Comala sees the battle from a neighbouring hill, and on the victory of Fingal, dies from the revulsion to joy from terror.

COMBE, WILLIAM (1741-1823), educated at Eton, published a number of metrical satires, including 'The Diaboliad' (1776, directed against Simon, Lord Irnham). He is specially remembered for the verses that he wrote to accompany Rowlandson's drawings of the adventures of 'Dr. Syntax'. The first of these works, 'Dr. Syntax in search of the Picturesque', a parody of the popular books of picturesque travels of the day (and particularly of those of William Gilpin, q.v.), appeared in the 'Poetical Magazine' in 1809 (reprinted in 1812). Dr. Syntax is the grotesque figure of a clergyman and school-master, who sets out during the holidays, on his old horse Grizzle, to 'make a TOUR and WRITE IT', and meets with a series of amusing misfortunes. This was followed in 1820 by 'The Second Tour of Dr. Syntax in search of Consolation' for the loss of his wife, and in 1821 by 'The Third Tour of Dr. Syntax in search of a Wife'. Combe also wrote the letterpress for Rowlandson's 'Dance of Death' (1815-16), 'Dance of Life' (1816), 'Johnny Quae Genus' (1822), and for 'The Microcosm of London' (1808).

Comberback, SILAS TOMKYN, name assumed by S. T. Coleridge on joining the Dragoons.

Comedy, from κωμῶδός = κωμοειδής singer in the κῶμος or comic chorus, a stage play of a light and amusing character with a happy conclusion to its plot. Also, that branch of the drama which adopts a humorous or familiar style, and depicts laughable characters and incidents. [OED.] Greek comedy originated in the festivals of Dionysus (q.v.), celebrated with song and merriment at the vintage. See also Sentimental Comedy.

Comedy, The Divine, see Divina Commedia. Comedy of Errors, The, a comedy by Shakespeare (q.v.), acted in 1594 (and perhaps as early as 1592), and first printed in the folio of 1623. This is one of the earliest and crudest of his plays and is, in the main, an adaptation of the 'Menæchmi' of Plautus.

Syracuse and Ephesus being at enmity, any Syracusan found in Ephesus is put to death unless he can pay a ransom of a thousand marks. Aegeon, an old Syracusan merchant, has been arrested in Ephesus, and on the duke's order explains how he came there. He and his wife Aemilia had twin sons, exactly alike and each named Antipholus; the parents had purchased twin slaves, also exactly alike, and each named Dromio, who attended on their sons. Having in a shipwreck been separated, with the younger son and one Dromio, from his wife and the other son and slave, Aegeon had never seen them since. The younger son (Antipholus of Syracuse) on reaching manhood had gone (with his Dromio) in search of his brother and mother and had no more been heard of, though Aegeon had now sought him for five years over the world, coming at last to Ephesus.

The duke, moved by this tale, gives Aegeon till evening to find the ransom. Now, the elder Antipholus (Antipholus of Ephesus), with one of the Dromios, has been living in Ephesus since his rescue from shipwreck and is married. Antipholus of Syracuse and the other Dromio have arrived there that very morning. Each twin retains the same confusing resemblance to his brother as in childhood. From this the comedy of errors results. Antipholus of Syracuse is summoned home to dinner by Dromio of Ephesus; he is claimed as husband by the wife of Antipholus of Ephesus, the latter being refused admittance to his own house, because he is supposed to be already within; and so forth. Finally Antipholus of Ephesus is confined as a lunatic, and Antipholus of Syracuse takes refuge from his brother's jealous wife in a convent.

Meanwhile evening has come and Aegeon is led to execution. As the duke proceeds to the place of execution, Antipholus of Ephesus appeals to him for redress. Then the abbeas of the convent presents Antipholus of Syracuse, also claiming redress. The simultaneous presence of the two brothers explains the numerous misunderstandings. Aegeon recovers his two sons and his liberty, and the abbeas turns out to be his lost wife, Aemilia.

COMESTOR, PETRUS, of Troyes, in Champagne, of the 12th cent., so named on account of his voracity in the matter of books. He was the author of a 'Historia Scholastica', a collection of scriptural narratives with commentary. His work was apparently known to Chaucer. Dante places him among the Doctors of the Church in the Heaven of the Sun, 'Paradiso', xii. 134.

important as the first example of English prose comedy, as afterwards seen in Congreve and Sheridan; while the serious portions are written in rhymed heroics. The play shows the author's acquaintance with the early comedies of Molière.

The serious part of the plot deals with the rivalry of Lord Beaufort and Colonel Bruce for the hand of Graciana. A duel ensues. Bruce is defeated, tries to kill himself in despair, is cured of his wound, and consoled with Graciana's sister. The comic and farcical part has only a slender plot and centres about the French valet Dufoy, who for his impudence is confined by his fellow servants in a tub. His master, Sir Frederick Frolick, the fine gentleman of the times, is courted by a rich widow; he cajoles her out of £200 and finally marries her. There is a foolish country knight, Sir Nicholas Cully, whom two rogues cozen out of a thousand pounds. The knaves and the fool are exposed, and for punishment married off against their will and expectation.

Coming of Arthur, The, the first of Tennyson's 'Idylls of the King' (q.v.), published in 1869.

Arthur, newly crowned and setting out to conquer his rebellious barons, sees and falls in love with Guinevere, daughter of King Leodegran of Camelard; and after his success sends to ask her hand. Leodegran hesitates, owing to the mystery that surrounds the birth of Arthur, but after hearing the advice of Bellicent, wife of King Lot of Orkney, consents. Lancelot comes to fetch Guinevere, and Arthur and she are married. An indication is given of the purpose that Arthur sets before himself in his kingdom: to

Have power on this dark land to lighten it,
And power on this dead world to make it live.

Coming Race, The, a romance by Bulwer Lytton (q.v.), published in 1871.

The narrator describes his visit to a subterranean race that in distant ages took refuge from inundations in the bowels of the earth. Owing to the discovery of Vril, a form of energy embodying all the natural forces, this race has reached a high degree of civilization and scientific invention. Their country is a Utopia in which there is neither war nor crime, neither poverty nor inequality. The inhabitants regard with contempt the type of society which they describe as 'Koom-Posh'—viz. the government of the ignorant upon the principle of being the most numerous, which leads to rivalry, misery, and degradation. Their women are physically stronger than their men, and it is the women who choose their spouses, a custom that involves the narrator in grave embarrassment and finally in danger of his life, from which he is saved by the devotion of his host's daughter and restored to the upper regions of the earth.

Commander of the Faithful, a title of the Caliphs (q.v.).

COMMON PRAYER

Commedia dell' Arte, in the history of Italian drama, improvised drama performed by professional actors, developed in the 16th cent. from the popular character comedy, and having its origin in the Atellane (q.v.) farces. It is said to have been invented by Francesco Cherea, a favourite actor of Pope Leo X.

COMMINES, PHILIPPE DE (c. 1445–1511), of a Flemish family, first served Philip of Burgundy and his son Charles the Bold, and then entered the service of the French king Louis XI, whose counsellor he became. He wrote remarkable chronicles of Louis XI and Charles VIII, which were translated into English by Thomas Danet (1596), and inspired Sir W. Scott's 'Quentin Durward' (q.v., in which Commynes himself figures). Commynes was the first critical and philosophical historian since classical times.

Common, Do!, a character in Jonson's 'The Alchemist' (q.v.).

Common Prayer, The Book of, was evolved in the 16th cent. to meet the popular need for aids to devotion (not entirely satisfied by the Primers, q.v.) and the demand for the use of the vernacular in church services. Its development was gradual. The Sarum breviary was reissued in 1541 and ordered to be used throughout the province of Canterbury in 1542. The reading in churches of a chapter of the Bible in English, and the Litany in English (probably the work of Cranmer, q.v.), were introduced in 1544, and an English communion service in 1548. About the same time the Primers were revised, and the King's Primer issued in 1545 in the interests of uniformity; it included the English Litany. Cranmer and a commission each drafted a scheme for a prayer book, and these were discussed in Edward VI's reign, leading to the successive issue of the Prayer Books of 1549 and 1552. In the latter the form of the Book of Common Prayer was practically settled, though a revision was made under Elizabeth (1559), minor changes under James I, and the final text is that of 1662. As it stands the Prayer Book represents largely the work of Cranmer; Nicholas Ridley (q.v.) may perhaps claim some share.

Common Prayer, The Revised Book of, embodied the proposals which, after prolonged discussion, the bishops, presided over by Archbishop Randall Davidson, laid before Convocation in 1927. It consisted of the Prayer Book of 1662 with a permissive alternative version as regards Holy Communion, Baptism, Confirmation, and Matrimony, and numerous additional occasional prayers. Opposition arose in regard to the revision of the office for Holy Communion, and when the Revised Book was submitted to Parliament at the end of 1927, it was rejected by the House of Commons though passed by the House of Lords. It was again submitted in the following year with certain modifications, but again rejected.

Complaint of Buckingham, The, a poem by T. Sackville (q.v.), contributed by him to the 'Mirror for Magistrates' (q.v.).

Henry Stafford, duke of Buckingham, after his rebellion against Richard III, takes refuge with a dependant, Humfrey Banastaire. Banastaire betrays him to the king, and Buckingham is executed. As his corpse lies on the ground, it raises its head and heaps curses on Banastaire and his children.

Compleat Angler, The, or the Contemplative Man's Recreation, a discourse on fishing by I. Walton (q.v.), first published in 1653, the second edition in 1655. The fifth edition, containing Cotton's continuation, appeared in 1676.

It takes the form of a dialogue, at first between the author 'Piscator' (a fisherman), Auceps (a fowler), and Venator (a hunter), each commending his own recreation, in which Auceps is silenced, and Venator becomes a pupil of the angle; then between Piscator and Venator alone. In the course of this, after a short spell with the otter-hounds, the author instructs his pupil in the mode of catching all the various kinds of fresh-water fish, with directions for dressing some of them for the table. There are observations on rivers and fish-ponds, and directions for the making of artificial flies and fishing-line. The instruction is given as they fish along the river Lea near London, and there are pleasant interludes of verse and song. But Walton, though a proficient angler, knew little of fly-fishing, and what he tells about it is admittedly in the main at second hand. The continuation, supplied by Charles Cotton (q.v.), takes the form of conversations between 'Piscator' and 'Viator' (a traveller, who turns out to be Venator of the earlier part), as they fish along the river Dove, which divides the counties of Derby and Stafford. 'Piscator' instructs 'Viator' in fishing 'fine and far off' for trout and grayling; and opportunities are taken to indicate the rocky and picturesque scenery of the district. There are also fuller directions for the making of artificial flies than had appeared in Walton's work.

Complutensian Polyglot Bible, THE, the earliest complete polyglot Bible, containing the Hebrew, Septuagint, and Vulgate texts, a Hebrew dictionary, &c., prepared at the expense of Cardinal Ximenes in the early part of the 16th cent., at Alcalá in Spain (of which town Complutum is the ancient name). The special Greek type used has formed the basis of modern Greek type-design (Proctor types and others). It has been called the finest Greek type ever designed.

COMTE, AUGUSTE (1798-1857), French philosopher, was in early life secretary to the socialist C. H. de Saint-Simon (q.v.), by whom he was influenced, but whom he subsequently repudiated. He was the chief exponent of the positivist philosophy, which excludes metaphysics and revealed religion, and substitutes the religion of humanity and sociological ethics, based on history and designed for the improvement of the human race. Comte's principal work was the 'Cours de Philosophie Positive' (1830-42), in which he worked out the three stages of knowledge, the theological, the metaphysical, and the positive, and classified the sciences according to their decreasing generality and increasing complexity: mathematics, astronomy, physics, chemistry, biology, sociology. In his later work, 'Système de Politique Positive' (1851-4), he attempted to frame a positivist religion which is a sort of parody of Roman Catholicism, with sacraments, prayers, &c. His principal English disciple was F. Harrison (q.v.), but he also influenced J. S. Mill (q.v.).

Comus, A Masque, presented at Ludlow Castle, 1634, before the Earl of Bridgewater, Lord President of Wales, by Milton (q.v.). Though described as a 'masque', it is strictly a pastoral entertainment.

This work was, like the 'Arcades' (q.v.), written at the request of Henry Lawes, the musician, while Milton was at Horton. The occasion was the celebration of the earl of Bridgewater's entry on the presidency of Wales and the Marches. The name 'Comus' was not included in the title in the first three printed editions, but is taken from one of the characters, a pagan god (and see Ben Jonson), son of Bacchus and Circe, who waylays travellers and tempts them to drink a magic liquor which changes their countenances into the faces of wild beasts. A lady and her two brothers are benighted in a forest. The lady, separated from her companions, and attracted by the revelry of Comus and his rout, comes upon Comus, in the guise of a shepherd, who offers to lodge her in his cottage, and leads her off. The brothers appear and are told what has happened by the good Attendant Spirit, who has taken the form of the shepherd Thyrsis. He warns them of the magic power of Comus and gives them the root of the plant Haemony as a protection. The scene changes, and Comus, with his rabble round him, is discovered pressing the lady to drink from a glass, while she, strong in her purity, resists his enticements. The brothers burst in and disperse the crew. Unfortunately they have not secured the wand of Comus, and are unable to release the lady from the enchanted chair in which she sits. Thyrsis thereupon invokes Sabrina, goddess of the neighbouring river Severn, who comes attended by water-nymphs, and frees the lady. After an ode of thanks to Sabrina, the lady and her brothers return safely to Ludlow Castle.

Conan, in the legends relating to Finn (Fingal), 'in some respects a kind of Thersites (q.v.), but brave and daring even to rashness' (Author's notes to 'Waverley'). Having visited the infernal regions, he received a cuff from the Arch-fiend, which he instantly returned with the words 'blow for blow'.

Conary, a poem by Ferguson (q.v.), published in 1880, and based on the old Irish bardic tale of the 'Destruction of the Guest-house of Da Derga'. Conary is a king of Ireland. Three lawless brothers banished for their crimes, and joined by the brothers of the king, roam the seas. They make a piratical raid on Ireland and attack the guest-house, where the champions of Ireland are assembled under the king. Learning that the king himself is there, two of his brothers take their own lives; the third is killed. But Conall, the mighty champion, is led away by fairies, and Conary, left almost alone, is killed.

Conciliation with America, Speech on, by E. Burke (q.v.), made in the House of Commons on 22 March, 1775.

This was a last effort by Burke to find a peaceful solution of the difference with the American colonies, and is one of his greatest speeches, and a literary masterpiece. Burke's proposal is to restore order and repose to the empire 'by restoring the former unsuspecting confidence of the colonies in the mother country'. He rejects the use of force, as temporary and uncertain in its effects, as impairing what it is sought to preserve, as contrary to experience in our colonial administration, and as inapplicable to the 'fierce spirit of liberty' prevailing in the English colonies. He traces the 'capital sources' from which this spirit has grown up, descent, religion, remoteness of situation; and propounds three alternatives, to change this spirit, to prosecute it as criminal, to comply with it as necessary. He shows the first two courses to be impossible or inexpedient. He dismisses American representation in parliament as impracticable. He finds the solution in the taxation of America through grants by the local legislatures and not by imposition. His trust is in America's interest in the British constitution: 'My hold of the colonies is in the close affection which grows from common names, from kindred blood, from similar privileges, and equal protection.' 'Freedom they can have from none but you. This is the commodity of price, of which you have the monopoly.' 'Magnanimity in politics is not seldom the truest wisdom; and a great empire and little minds go ill together.'

Confederacy, The, a comedy by Vanbrugh (q.v.), produced in 1705, adapted from d'An-court's 'Les Bourgeoises à la mode'.

Gripe and Moneytrap, two rich usurers, are niggardly husbands, and Gripe's wife, Clarissa, in order to pay her debts, is obliged to pawn her necklace with Mrs. Amlet, a seller of paint and powder and the like to ladies. Mrs. Amlet has a knave of a son, Dick, who passes himself off as a colonel, and is trying to win by fair means or foul the hand of Gripe's daughter Corinna, assisted in the plot by his confederate Brass, who acts as his footman, and by Flippanta, Clarissa's maid. Meanwhile Gripe falls in love with Moneytrap's wife, and Moneytrap falls in love with Gripe's wife. This the ladies communicate to each other and contrive to turn to their mutual advantage. By their directions, Brass and Flippanta, who act as go-betweens, extract two hundred and fifty pounds apiece from the would-be lovers to relieve their ladies' immediate necessities. An amusing scene follows in which the two couples are at tea together, very cheerful, each of the four pleased with the course of events, when the pawned necklace brings about a general exposure. Clarissa has told her husband that she has lost it, and he has warned the goldsmiths to look out for it. Dick has stolen it from his mother and sent Brass to try and sell it. The goldsmith to whom Brass offers it now brings it to Gripe. Dick's true character and the pawning of the necklace are thus brought to light. Clarissa, to silence her husband, alludes to the £250 given to Mrs. Moneytrap; and the latter, to silence hers, to the like present to Clarissa. However, as Corinna is prepared to take Dick in spite of all, and Mrs. Amlet to endow him with £10,000, roguery meets with some measure of success.

Confederate States of America, the name assumed by the eleven Southern States (Virginia, Georgia, North and South Carolina, Alabama, Tennessee, Louisiana, Arkansas, Mississippi, Florida, Texas) which seceded from the American Union in 1860-1 and formed a confederacy. After their defeat in the Civil War (q.v., 1865) they were forced into reunion with the Northern States.

Confederation of the Rhine, the union of certain German states under the protection of the French Empire from 1806 to 1813; it was an interesting reversion to the policy of Cardinal Richelieu (q.v.).

Confessio Amantis, The, is the principal English poem of Gower (q.v.). It exists in three versions completed probably between 1386 and 1390. The first version is dedicated to Richard II, the second to Henry IV. Caxton's edition (1483) follows the second version and is the basis of Professor Morley's text (1888). This version omits passages in praise of Richard II and Chaucer that had appeared in the first. The poem contains 34,000 lines in short couplets.

The poet tells how he, a lover weary of life, appealed to Venus, who required him to make full confession to Genius, her priest. This the lover does, and the priest instructs him concerning each of the seven deadly sins and its remedy, exemplifying each point with one or more stories. Venus reappears, shows the poet his grey hairs in a mirror, and dismisses him from her court as too old for love, giving him a pair of black beads marked 'pour reposer'. The stories are taken from classical and medieval sources and include the tale of Florent (told also by Chaucer's 'Wife of Bath') and that of Constance (Chaucer's 'Man of Lawes Tale'). The poem shows the influence of Chaucer, and the language is substantially the same as his.

Confessions of an English Opium Eater, by De Quincey (q.v.), published in 1822 (enlarged edition 1856).

This book, which established De Quincey's literary reputation, after an account of his early years and his rambling life in Wales, relates how he was led by physical suffering and nervous irritation first to take opium, and then to increase his consumption of it, until he reached the large quantity of 8,000 drops of laudanum a day. He describes the fearful effects, chiefly in the form of tumultuous dreams, brought about by this abuse of the drug, continued during eight years, until, alarmed at the prospect of imminent death, he determined to conquer the habit. The narrative ends with the account of the gradual reduction that he effected in his daily dose, a reduction itself attended by great suffering, but finally in the main successful.

Confucius or K'UNG FU-TZU (550 or 551-478 B.C.), meaning 'philosopher k'ung', was born of a noble but impoverished Chinese family, in Lu, a part of what is now the province of Shan-tung.

He was a teacher of moral and political science, claiming no divine revelation, and showed for a time his ability as a practical administrator and reformer in the chief magistracy of the city of Chung-tu. He gathered round him a large number of disciples, but left no written record of his ethical principles. His wise maxims and sayings, chief among which was his rule 'Do not unto others what you would not wish done unto yourself', were recorded by his followers. He put forward no distinctive religion, and his teaching related in the main to temporal and secular matters, unlike that of Lao-tze (q.v.), whom the sage is said to have visited. His sayings, which are widely known and constantly quoted among the Chinese, have played an important part in forming the character of the people.

CONFUCIANISM was a system of cosmology, politics, and ethics evolved in China during the Han dynasty (206 B.C.-A.D. 220). It regarded the emperor and the hierarchy of officials as divinely appointed, and the social relations as governed by the rule of Confucius above quoted. Under it the nature gods (the Sun, Heaven, Earth, &c.) were worshipped by the emperor and the officials; while ancestor-worship was practised by the people. The fall of the empire has brought the system, in its original form, to an end.

CONGREVE, WILLIAM (1670-1720), born at Bardsey, near Leeds, of an ancient family. Owing to the fact of his father's commanding the garrison at Youghal, he was educated at Kilkenny school and Trinity College, Dublin, at both of which he was a fellow student of Swift. He entered the Middle Temple, but soon gave up law for literature, published a feeble novel of intrigue, 'Incognita' (1692), and in 1693 suddenly achieved fame by his comedy 'The Old Bachelor' (q.v.). Of his other comedies, 'The Double Dealer' (q.v.) appeared in 1694, 'Love for Love' (q.v.) in 1695, and 'The Way of the World' (q.v.) in 1700. In these Congreve shows himself the supreme master of the artificial comedy or comedy of manners, displaying the narrow world of fashion and gallantry. His one tragedy 'The Mourning Bride' (q.v.) was produced in 1697. He replied in that year to the attack made on him in the 'Short View' of Jeremy Collier (q.v.). Congreve gave up writing for the stage in consequence, it is said, of the comparative failure of his last comedy. But he was then in moderately affluent circumstances, holding more than one government post, and enjoying general admiration and the friendship of men like Swift, Steele, and Pope. He was visited by Voltaire, and was closely attached to the Duchess of Marlborough. He was throughout the friend of the enchanting Mrs.

CONGREVE

Bracegirdle (q.v.). He was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Coningsby, or The New Generation, a political novel by Disraeli (q.v.), published in 1844.

The background of the story is formed by the political events from the passage of the Reform Bill in 1832 down to the fall of the Melbourne ministry in 1841. These provide the author with opportunity for expounding his own political creed, his contempt for the Conservatism without principles which he attributed to the party of Peel; his hostility to the Whigs and Utilitarianism; his condemnation of the new poor law and the unimaginative treatment of the peasantry. The existing system of government with its self-seeking politicians like Rigby, and its Tadpoles and Tapers (the typical party wire-pullers), must be amended, and the representation of the people obtained. Against this background we have the story of the early life of Harry Coningsby, a generous and intelligent lad, the orphan grandson of the wealthy marquess of Monmouth. Young Coningsby, whose parents had incurred Lord Monmouth's displeasure by their marriage, is now restored to his grandfather's favour, and sent to Eton, where he becomes the friend and saves the life of Oswald Millbank, son of a rich Lancashire manufacturer, who is Lord Monmouth's bitterest enemy. The story traces Coningsby's career at Eton and Cambridge, the development of political views contrary to those of his grandfather, and his falling in love with Edith, the daughter of Millbank. The discovery by Lord Monmouth of these deplorable tendencies in his grandson leads to a crisis in the hero's fortunes. On the death of Lord Monmouth it is found that Coningsby has been disinherited. He bravely renounces his life of ease and sets to work as a barrister. But Millbank, the manufacturer, who had been no less hostile than Lord Monmouth to Coningsby's marriage with Edith, impressed by the young man's proof of character, now relents, and the story ends with Coningsby's election to parliament for Millbank's constituency, his marriage to Edith, and his restoration to fortune.

Lord Monmouth is drawn from the same Lord Hertford who provided the model for Thackeray's Lord Steyne (q.v.), but without the latter's more repellent features. Rigby is a caricature of Croker (q.v.). Sidonia, the Jew superhero, who figures again in 'Tancred' (q.v.), here makes his first appearance.

Conington, JOHN (1825-69), educated at Rugby and Magdalen College, Oxford, and fellow of University College, Oxford, was the first professor of Latin at Oxford (1854-69). He edited Virgil and Persius, published verse translations of Horace (1863-9), the 'Aeneid' (1866), and half the 'Iliad' (1868).

Connoisseur, The, a periodical conducted in 1754-6 by George Colman the elder and

CONRAD

Bonnell Thornton, contained some early papers by W. Cowper (q.v.).

Conqueror, The, a fictional biography of Alexander Hamilton by Gertrude Atherton (q.v.), published in 1902.

Conquest of Granada, The, or Almanzor and Almahide, a heroic play in rhymed couplets, in two parts, by Dryden (q.v.). It appeared in 1670.

The play was very famous in its day, and besides much rant and bombast, contains some good verse and pleasant lyrics. It was one of the principal objects of satire in the 'Rehearsal' (q.v.). The plot is much embroiled and not worth giving in detail. The background is the quarrels of the rival factions of Moors, the Abencerrages and the Zegrys, under Boabdelin the last ruler of the kingdom of Granada, and the war in which that kingdom fell to Ferdinand and Isabella. Almanzor is a valiant soldier who aids the Moors against the Spaniards, but finally turns out to be the long-lost son of the duke of Arcos, a noble Spaniard. Almahide is the betrothed of Boabdelin, with whom Almanzor falls in love. She returns his love, but is faithful to her promise to Boabdelin, who throughout the play is torn between jealousy of Almanzor and need for his strong arm. Almanzor's suit remains unsuccessful until after the death of Boabdelin in the last act. A second love interest is provided by the rivalry of Abdalla, the king's brother, and Abdelmelich, chief of the Abencerrages, for the hand of the imperious Lyndaraxa, sister of the chief of the Zegrys; and a third, by the troubled course of the love of Ozmyrn, a brave young Abencerrage, for Benzayda, a Zegry maiden.

Conrad, the pirate chief in Lord Byron's 'The Corsair' (q.v.).

CONRAD, JOSEPH (1857-1924), whose full name was Teodor Josef Konrad Korzeniowski, was born of Polish parents in the Ukraine. He accompanied his parents when they were exiled (in consequence of revolutionary activities) to Vologda in Northern Russia, where his mother died; was subsequently for a time at school at Cracow; and in 1874 became member of the crew of a French vessel, thus satisfying a long-felt craving for a seafaring life. In 1878 he joined an English merchant ship, and in 1884 gained his Board of Trade certificate as a Master and was naturalized as a British subject. He left the sea in 1894 and devoted himself to literature.

The sea provides the setting of most of his works, and his devotion to it is seen at its best in his 'Mirror of the Sea' (1906). His earlier novels, 'Almayer's Folly' (1895) and 'An Outcast of the Islands' (1896), reveal Conrad struggling with the difficulties of a language and a technique unfamiliar to him. But he achieved success in 'The Nigger of the Narcissus' (1898), and 'Lord Jim' (1900), the tale of a young Englishman who in a moment of panic deserts his apparently sinking ship, loses his honour, and finally retrieves it by an honourable death. In 'Youth', 'Heart of Darkness', and 'Typhoon' (1902) Conrad produced three of his finest short stories. Among his other best-known works were 'Nostromo' (1904), 'The Secret Agent' (1907), 'Under Western Eyes' (1911), 'Chance' (1914), 'Within the Tides' (1915), and 'The Rescue' (1920).

Conrade of Montserrat, a character in Scott's 'The Talisman' (q.v.), based on the historical Conrad of Montferrat.

Conscience, Mr., in Bunyan's 'Holy War' (q.v.), the Recorder of the city of Mansoul, deposed from his office during the tyranny of Diabolus.

Conscious Lovers, The, a comedy by Steele (q.v.), based on the 'Andria' of Terence, produced in 1722. This was Steele's last play, and in it he illustrates his views on duelling, the proper attitude of men to women, &c.

Young Bevil is, at his father's desire, about to marry Lucinda, daughter of the wealthy Mr. Sealand. But he has fallen in love with Indiana, an orphan, whom he has found destitute and friendless in a foreign town and has honourably supported; she loves him in return. Not wishing openly to oppose his father's wishes, he makes known to Lucinda his aversion to the proposed marriage, the more readily because his friend Myrtle loves her, while she is also sued by an avaricious pedant, Cimberton. In doing this he offends Myrtle, is challenged to a duel, declines, and exhibits the folly of duelling. Indiana turns out to be the lost daughter, by a former marriage, of Mr. Sealand, who is happy to bestow her on Bevil in place of Lucinda. As the latter's dowry is now halved in consequence of the discovery of her sister, Cimberton renounces his suit, and Myrtle successfully asserts his claim.

Conscript Fathers, a collective title by which the Roman senators were addressed; used also as a title by the Venetian senate.

CONSTABLE, HENRY (1562-1613), was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, embraced Roman Catholicism, and withdrew to Paris. He published 'Diana', a volume of sonnets, in 1592; it was republished in 1594 with additions, many of them by other poets. He was sent as papal envoy to Edinburgh in 1599 and pensioned by the French king. He came to London in 1603, was imprisoned in the Tower in 1604 and released the same year. He died at Liège. Verses by him were embodied in various collections, among others in 'England's Helicon' (q.v.). His collected works were published in 1859. Many of his sonnets are modelled on or translated from sonnets by Desportes.

CONTARINI FLEMING

Constable, JOHN (1776-1837), the landscape painter, was born at East Bergholt in Suffolk and educated at Dedham school in Essex. His father was a miller. He became a student at the Royal Academy in 1799 and thereafter lived mainly in London, except for summer tours in the country. He painted portraits to support himself, and his genius as a painter of landscape met with little contemporary recognition in England, though he was more highly esteemed in France, where his work had much influence on the landscape-painters of the mid-19th cent. He was elected a Royal Academician in 1820. His 'Life' by his friend C. R. Leslie, R.A. (1843), is reckoned a model biography of one artist by another.

Constance, (1) the heroine of the 'Man of Lawes Tale' in the 'Canterbury Tales' (q.v.); (2) in Shakespeare's 'King John' (q.v.), the mother of Arthur, the king's nephew.

Constance of Beverley, a character in Scott's 'Marmion' (q.v.).

Constant Couple, The, or a Trip to the Jubilee, a comedy by Farquhar (q.v.), produced in 1700.

The play, which is coarse and farcical, was very successful, owing chiefly to the amusing character of Sir Harry Wildair, 'an airy gentleman, affecting humorous gaiety and freedom in his behaviour'. It had a less successful sequel in 'Sir Harry Wildair' (1701).

CONSTANT DE REBECQUE, BENJAMIN (1767-1830), French philosopher, orator, and politician, born at Lausanne of a family of French Protestant refugees, and educated partly in Germany and England. He removed to Paris in 1795, and was a friend of Mme de Staël (q.v.) and a prominent liberal politician and parliamentary orator. His best-known works are a psychological romance, 'Adolphe' (1816), a philosophical treatise, 'De la religion considérée dans sa source . . .' (1824-31), and his 'Mémoires'.

Constantia, a famous red wine grown on the Constantia farm near Capetown, S. Africa.

Constantia Durham, a character in Meredith's 'The Egoist' (q.v.).

Constantine the Great, Roman Emperor, A.D. 306-37. He was converted to Christianity, it is said, by seeing a luminous cross in the sky with the words ἐν τοῦτω νικᾷ (in hoc signo vince) before the battle (312) in which he defeated his rival Maxentius. He transferred the capital of the empire to Byzantium, which he renamed Constantinople. See Helena (Saint), Eusebius, Donation of Constantine, Labarum.

Contarini Fleming, a Psychological Romance, by Disraeli (q.v.), published in 1832.

The book takes the form of an autobiography, showing the development of a poetic character. Contarini Fleming is the son of a Saxon nobleman and a Venetian lady of ancient lineage. A child of an imaginative and melanchely disposition, he is wretched at school, from which he runs away, and is introduced into social and political life, for which he shows precocious aptitude, by his father, who has a sympathetic understanding of his peculiar temperament. His first attempts at literature are crude or ill-judged. He realizes the chief desire of his youth by visiting Venice, where he falls madly in love with a cousin, Alceste Contarini, whom he marries, but loses within a year. He then travels in Spain and the Levant, finally takes up his abode in Rome, and devotes himself to 'the amelioration of his kind' and 'the study and creation of the beautiful'.

CONTARINI FLEMING

Contemporary Review, The, was founded in 1865, and edited for many years by Sir Percy Bunting.

Continental system, THE, the plan of Napoleon Buonaparte for cutting off Great Britain from all connexion with the Continent, by forbidding to his subjects and allies the importation of British goods. This was proclaimed by the 'Berlin Decree' of 19 Nov. 1806.

Conversation, A complete Collection of polite and ingenious, by Swift (q.v.), published in 1738.

In this entertaining work Swift good-humouredly satirizes the stupidity, coarseness, and attempted wit of the conversation of fashionable people as he had observed it. In three dialogues he puts into the mouth of various characters, Lord Sparkish, Miss Notable, Lady Smart, Tom Neverout, &c., samples of questions and answers, proverbial sayings, and repartees, fitted, as he explains in the amusing introduction, 'to adorn every kind of discourse that an assembly of English ladies and gentlemen, met together for their mutual entertainment, can possibly want'. The work was published under the pseudonym of 'Simon Wagstaff, Esq.'

COOK, ELIZA (1818-89), poet. Her complete collected poems were published in 1870. The most popular of these was 'The Old Arm Chair', which had appeared in 1837. She conducted 'Eliza Cook's Journal', 1849-54.

COOK, JAMES (1728-79), the celebrated circumnavigator, published his 'Sailing Directions' in 1766-8. He left records of his three principal voyages: the first, round the Horn and the Cape of Good Hope, 1768-71 (an account of this was compiled by J. Hawkesworth from the journals of Cook and his botanist Joseph Banks, q.v., and published in 1773; Cook's own journal was edited by Wharton in 1803); the second, 'A Voyage towards the South Pole and round the World in 1772-5', published in 1777; the third, 'A Voyage to the Pacific Ocean in 1776-80', published in 1784 (the third volume by Capt. T. King). Cook touched at Hawaii in 1779, was driven off by a storm, and on putting back to refit was murdered by the natives.

Cook's Tale, The, see Canterbury Tales.

COPHETUA

Cooling Card, apparently a term of some unknown game, applied figuratively to anything that 'cools' a person's passion or enthusiasm. The expression is frequent in Elizabethan literature, e.g. in Lyly's 'Euphues' and Shakespeare's '1 Henry VI', v. iii. 84.

COOPER, JAMES FENIMORE (1789-1851), born at Burlington, New Jersey, spent his youth partly on a pioneer settlement on Otsego Lake (N.Y.), partly in the merchant marine (after dismissal from Yale), partly in the American navy. He then settled down as a country proprietor and a writer of novels. His second book 'The Spy' (1821), a stirring tale of the American Revolution, brought him into prominence. His other best-known works are: 'The Pioneers' (1823), 'The Pilot' (1823) and 'The Red Rover' (1828), two notable early tales of adventure at sea; 'The Last of the Mohicans' (1826), 'The Prairie' (1827), 'The Pathfinder' (1840), and 'The Deerslayer' (1841). The last four, with 'The Pioneers', form a series, 'The Leatherstocking Tales', dealing with Indian life in the forest and the wilderness, and centring in the adventures of Natty Bumppo; they furnish not only exciting incidents, but a vivid picture of the Red Indian and his surroundings in a period that has passed away. Cooper's 'England, with Sketches of Society in the Metropolis', a sarcastic account of English society, appeared in 1837.

Cooper's Hill, see Denham.

Copenhagen, the duke of Wellington's famous horse, which carried him in the Peninsular War and at Waterloo.

Copenhagen, THE BOMBARDMENT OF, by Nelson (under Sir Hyde Parker) in 1801, was undertaken in order to break up the Northern Confederacy (Russia, Sweden, and Denmark) against Britain. It was in the course of this that Nelson, placing his telescope to his blind eye, declared that he could not see the signal of recall hoisted by Admiral Parker.

Copernicus, latinized form of the surname of NICOLAS KOPPERNIK (1473-1543), a native of Thorn in Prussian Poland and a canon of Frauenburg, a celebrated astronomer, who propounded the theory that the planets including the earth move in orbits round the sun as centre, in opposition to the older theory of Ptolemy (q.v.) that the sun and planets move round the earth. His 'De revolutionibus' was published in 1543, but a brief popular account of his theory was circulated in manuscript from 1530.

Cophetua, KING, a legendary king in Africa, who cared not for womankind, until he saw a beggar maid 'all in gray', with whom he fell in love. He married her and together they lived 'a quiet life during their princely reign'. The tale is told in one of the ballads included in Percy's 'Reliques', where the maid's name is given as Penelophon. Shakespeare in 'Love's Labour's Lost' (Act IV, sc. i) gives it as

Zenelophon. There are other references to the story in Shakespeare's 'Romeo and Juliet' (II. i) and 'a Henry IV' (v. iii), in Jonson's 'Every Man in his Humour' (III. iv), and in Tennyson's 'The Beggar Maid'.

Copmanhurst, CLERK OF, otherwise Friar Tuck (q.v.), in Scott's 'Ivanhoe' (q.v.).

COPPÉE, FRANÇOIS ÉDOUARD JOACHIM (called François) (1842–1908), French poet and dramatist, noted for his studies of humble life in Paris. His verse includes 'Le Reliquaire' (1866), 'Intimités' (1868), 'La Grève des forgerons' (1869), 'Contes et vers' (1881–7). Among his plays are: 'Le Passant' (1869), 'Le Luthier de Crémone' (1877), 'Madame de Maintenon' (1881). His plays have been collected in four volumes (1873–86).

Copt, a native Egyptian Christian belonging to the Jacobite sect (Monophysites (q.v.) who take their name from Jacobus Baradaeus of Edessa, a 6th-cent. heresiarch). The word is probably a form of Αἰγύπτios (Egyptian), though some refer it to Coptos, the name of an ancient city in Upper Egypt. Coptic, a descendant of ancient Egyptian, has become a dead language, but is much studied because there are Coptic versions of the Scriptures.

Copyright, see Appendix II.

Coranto, or current of news, the name applied to periodical news-pamphlets issued between 1621 and 1641 (their publication was interrupted between 1632 and 1638) containing foreign intelligence taken from foreign papers. The Corantos were one of the first forms of English journalism, and were followed by the 'newsbook' (q.v.).

CORANTO or COURANTE was also the name of a dance formerly in vogue, distinguished by a running or gliding step.

Corbaccio, in Jonson's 'Volpone' (q.v.).

Corceca, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', I. iii. 18, 'blindness of heart', an old blind woman, mother of Abessa (Superstition).

Cordella, in Shakespeare's 'King Lear' (q.v.), the youngest daughter of the king.

Cordellier, a Franciscan friar of the strict rule, so called from the knotted cord worn round the waist. The 'Cordelliers' was the name of a political club in the French Revolution, which met in an old convent of this order. It included Danton and Marat among its members, and represented the most advanced revolutionary faction. See Jacobin. Cordon Bleu, the sky-blue ribbon worn by the Knights Grand Cross of the French order of the Holy Ghost, the highest order of chivalry under the Bourbon kings. The name is extended to a person distinguished in his profession, e.g. (facetiously) to a first-class cook.

Cordova, GONSALVO HERNANDEZ DE (1453–1515), a famous Spanish general known as the 'Great Captain', who, under Ferdinand the Catholic, fought against Portugal and the Moors, and drove the French out of Naples. See Bayard.

CORIO LANUS

Corduba, Cordova in Spain, the birthplace of the two Senecas and Lucan (qq.v.).

CORELLI, MARIE (1854–1924), novelist. Her publications include: 'A Romance of Two Worlds' (1886), 'Barabbas' (1893), 'Sorrows of Satan' (1895), 'The Mighty Atom' (1896), 'The Master Christian' (1900), 'Temporal Power' (1902), 'The Young Diana' (1917), 'The Secret Power' (1921).

Corfiambo, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', IV. vii and viii, 'a mighty man, Ryding upon a Dromedare on hie, Of stature huge and horrible of hew', symbolizes lust. He carries off Amoret, who is released from him by Timias and Belphoebe. He is slain by Prince Arthur.

Corinna, (1) a Greek poetess of Tanagra in Boeotia of the 6th c. B.C. She is said to have given instruction to Pindar. (2) Ovid's flame.

Corinne, the title of a novel by Mme de Staël (q.v.).

Corinthian, from the proverbial luxury and licentiousness of ancient Corinth, a gay licentious man.

'I am . . . a Corinthian, a lad of mettle, a good boy.'

(Shakespeare, '1 Henry IV', II. iv. 13.)

In the first half of the 19th cent., 'Corinthian' was used for a man of fashion about town. It was applied by M. Arnold to an over-brilliant literary style.

Corinthian Order, the lightest and most ornate of the three Grecian orders of architecture (Doric, Ionic, Corinthian), having an inverted bell-shaped capital adorned with rows of acanthus-leaves, giving rise to graceful volutes and helices.

Corinthian Tom, a character in Pierce Egan's 'Life in London'. See Egan.

Corinthians, THE, a well-known amateur Association Football club, founded in 1882.

Coriolanus, a Roman historical drama, by Shakespeare (q.v.), probably written about 1608. It was printed in the folio of 1623. The story is taken from North's Plutarch.

Caius Marcius, a proud Roman general, performs wonders of valour in a war against the Volscians, and captures the town Corioli, receiving in consequence the surname Coriolanus. On his return it is proposed to make him consul, but his arrogant and outspoken contempt of the Roman rabble makes him unpopular with the fickle crowd, and the tribunes of the people have no difficulty in securing his banishment. He betakes himself to the house of Aufidius, the Volscian general, his enemy of long standing, is received with delight, and leads the Volscians against Rome to effect his revenge. He reaches the walls of the city, and the Romans, to save it from destruction, send emissaries, old friends of Coriolanus, to propose terms, but in vain. Finally the mother, wife, and son of Coriolanus come and beseech him to spare the city. He yields to their prayers, makes a treaty favourable to the Volscians, and returns with them to Antium, a Volscian town. Here the Volscian general turns against him, accusing him of betraying the Volscian interests, and with the assistance of conspirators of his faction, slays Coriolanus in a public place.

Cormac, in the Ossianic poems of Macpherson (q.v.), the king of Ireland during whose minority Cuthullin commands the Irish forces, Swaran invades Ireland, and Fingal comes to the rescue. Cormac is murdered by Cairbar.

Cormoran, a Cornish giant slain by Jack the Giant-killer.

Corn Laws, THE, restricting the importation of foreign corn, were a subject of acute controversy during the first half of the 19th cent. The principal of these, Robinson's Act of 1815, permitted importation only when the price of wheat reached 80s. a quarter. A sliding-scale act was passed in 1828. The Corn Law was abolished by Peel in 1846, as a consequence of the agitation of the Anti-corn-law League of Bright and Cobden, the distress prevalent in England, and the Irish famine of 1845.

CORNEILLE, PIERRE (1606-84), French dramatist. He was in his early days one of the group of authors who wrote plays under the direction of the Cardinal de Richelieu. His genius was first shown in his tragedy 'Médée' (1635), followed by his masterpiece 'Le Cid' (q.v., 1636), based on a Spanish play concerning the youth of that hero. The other great works by which he founded classical tragedy in France were 'Horace', 'Cinna', and 'Polyeucte' (1640), 'La Mort de Pompée' (1643?), and 'Rodogune' (1644). His fine comedy 'Le Menteur' (1644) is adapted from the Spanish of Alarcón. His later plays are less important, and he was eclipsed by the growing fame of Racine. The characteristic of his tragedies is the nobility and grandeur of his heroes and heroines and the dignity of his style, often declamatory, sometimes rising to passionate ardour, and marked here and there by splendid lines.

Cornelia, 'Mother of the Gracchi' (2nd cent. B.C.), was the daughter of Publius Scipio Africanus the elder. She married Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus and became mother of the famous tribunes, Tiberius and Gaius. When a lady once made a show of her jewels at Cornelia's house, and asked to see Cornelia's, the latter produced her two sons, saying 'These are my jewels'.

Cornelia, the wife of Pompey in Kyd's tragedy, see Pompey the Great; also in Massfield's 'Tragedy of Pompey the Great'.

CORSAIR

Cornhill, in the city of London, 'a corn-market time out of mind', says Stow. Here there were stocks and a pillory.

Cornhill Magazine, The, a monthly periodical, was founded in 1860 with Thackeray (q.v.) as first editor. His last two novels, 'The Adventures of Philip' and 'Denis Duval', were published in it, as were also contributions from Ruskin and Matthew Arnold, Mrs. Gaskell's 'Cousin Phillis' and 'Wives and Daughters', and some of Trollope's novels. Sir Leslie Stephen (q.v.) was editor from 1871 to 1882, and subsequently James Payn, J. St. Loe Strachey, and R. J. Smith. 'Our storehouse being in Cornhill', writes Thackeray in the preface to the first number, 'we date and name our magazine from its place of publication.'

on the shipping and coasts of Christendom. The word is often treated as identical with pirate, though the Barbary corsairs, who chiefly sailed from N. African ports, were licensed by the Turkish government at Constantinople.

Corsair, The, a poem in heroic couplets by Lord Byron (q.v.), published in 1814.

Conrad, a pirate chief in the Aegean Sea, a man of many vices and one virtue (a certain sense of chivalry), receives warning that Seyd, the Turkish Pacha, is preparing a fleet for a descent on his island. He determines to anticipate him, takes leave of his beloved Medora, arrives at the Pacha's rallying-point at night, and introduces himself to his presence as a dervish escaped from the pirates. The premature firing of the Pacha's galleys by Conrad's men gives warning of the intended coup, which is only partially successful. Conrad is wounded and taken prisoner, but not before he has rescued Gulnare, the chief slave in the Pacha's harem, from imminent death. She becomes enamoured of him, obtains the postponement of his execution, and finally brings him a dagger wherewith he may kill Seyd in his sleep. From this act he revolts, whereupon she herself kills the Pacha, and escapes with Conrad. But she has now become repulsive to him. They arrive at the pirate island, where Conrad finds Medora dead from grief at the reported slaying of her lover. Conrad disappears and is never heard of more.

Corsican, THE, the CORSICAN UPSTART, GENERAL, &c., Napoleon Buonaparte, born at Ajaccio in Corsica in 1769.

Corsican Brothers, The, a play translated by Boucicault (q.v.) from the French, and produced in 1848.

Cortegiano, Il, see Castiglione.

Cortez, THE, the legislative assemblies of the Spanish and Portuguese kingdoms.

Cortese, GIACOMO, Italian scholar, in 1884 described a page of a palimpsest fragment which he had found in the binding of Ovid's 'Metamorphoses'. He gave a reproduction of the page, and attributed the fragment to Cornelius Nepos. The attribution and date were actively discussed by scholars, and the piece, which contained a reference to Ennius, passed into the histories of Latin literature as 'Anonymus Cortesianus'. In 1904 L. Traube (q.v.) showed that Cortese (by this time professor of classical philology at Rome) had invented the text and fabricated the reproduction by taking all the letters from Angelo Mai's plate of a palimpsest of a part of Cicero's 'De Republica', published in 1822.

Cortez, HERNANDO (1485-1547), the conqueror of Mexico. He entered Mexico City in 1519. It was not he, but Balboa (q.v.), who first of all Europeans gazed on the Pacific (see Keats's sonnet 'On first looking into Chapman's Homer').

Corton, see Burgundy.

COTGRAVE

Corvino, a character in Jonson's 'Volpone' (q.v.).

CORY, WILLIAM JOHNSON (1823-92), educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, was an assistant master at Eton and changed his name from Johnson to Cory in 1872. He published some educational works, but is remembered as the author of two volumes of poems, notably his 'Ionica' (1858) containing the well-known translation of the epigram on Heraclitus of Halicarnassus by the Alexandrian poet Callimachus, 'They told me, Heraclitus, they told me you were dead'. His 'Letters and Journals' (1897, edited by F. Warre-Cornish) are a classic.

CORYATE, THOMAS (1577?-1617), the son of a rector of Odcombe, educated at Gloucester Hall, Oxford, travelled in 1608 through France, Italy, Switzerland, Germany, and Holland, mainly on foot. He published in 1611 a narrative of his travels, entitled 'Coryats Crudities' and 'Coryats Cramb'. 'The Odcumbian Banquet', a reprint of verses prefixed to the 'Crudities', appeared in the same year. In 1612 he set out overland to India, travelling through Constantinople, Palestine, Mesopotamia, and reaching Agra in 1616. He died at Surat. A letter of his from the court of the Great Mogul is printed by Purchas, and this and another letter from the East are included in a compilation called 'Thomas Coriate Traveller for the English Wits: Greeting' (1616). Coryate wrote in a strange and extravagant style.

Corybantes, the priests of Cybele (q.v.), who in the celebration of their festivals beat their cymbals and behaved as if delirious. The infant Zeus (q.v.) was entrusted to their care, and with their cymbals they drowned his cries and prevented Cronos from finding where he was concealed.

Corycian Cave, THE, on Mt. Parnassus, derived its name from a nymph Corycia, beloved of Apollo. The Muses are sometimes called Corycian Nymphs.

Corydon, a shepherd who figures in the 'Idylls' of Theocritus and the 'Eclogues' of Virgil, and whose name has become conventional in pastoral poetry.

Coryphæus, the leader of a chorus in the Attic drama.

Cosmos, see Humboldt.

Costard, a clown in Shakespeare's 'Love's Labour's Lost' (q.v.).

Costigan, CAPTAIN and EMILY (Miss Fotheringay), characters in Thackeray's 'Pendennis' (q.v.).

Côte Rôtie, the name of a red wine grown on a hill near Ampuis in the Rhône region, of which the best quality is highly esteemed, but is small in quantity.

COTGRAVE, RANDLE (d. 1634?), author of a famous French-English Dictionary published in 1611. He was a scholar of St. John's College, Cambridge. He had a wide knowledge not only of French and French literature, but of the slang of the day, and also of natural history. Urquhart relied largely upon his dictionary for the translation of Rabelais.

COTGRAVE

Cotman, JOHN SELL (1782-1842), a great landscape-painter of Crome's 'Norwich School'.

Cotswold Games, public athletic contests held, from an uncertain antiquity, on the open rounded hills of the Cotswolds. They were revived and organized about 1604 by Captain Robert Dover, who lived in the Cotswolds, and were made the subject of 'Annalia Dubrensis, or Celebration of Captain Robert Dover's Cotswold Games', a collection of poems by thirty-three writers, including such well-known names as Drayton, Ben Jonson, Randolph, and Heywood. The games continued to be held during Whitsun-week until the end of the 18th cent. 'Dover's Games' are the scene of Wildgoose's first exploit in Graves's 'The Spiritual Quixote' (q.v.). 'Dover's Hill' is the name of the flat top of the Cotswold escarpment above Chipping Campden.

Cotswold, LION OF, i.e. a sheep. John Heywood, in the 16th cent., refers to some one who was as fierce 'as a lion of Cotswold'.

Cotter's Saturday Night, The, a poem by Burns (q.v.).

Cottesmore, THE, a famous pack of foxhounds, whose country adjoins that of the Quorn (q.v.), founded by Sir William Lowther (afterwards 1st earl of Lonsdale) towards the end of the 18th cent.

Cottle, JOSEPH (1770-1853), a bookseller of Bristol, who published works of Southey, Coleridge, and Wordsworth, and wrote poems of little literary merit. His brother AMOS SIMON COTTLE (1768-1800) translated in metre the Edda of Saemund (1797).

COTTON, CHARLES (1630-87), of Beresford Hall, Staffordshire, is chiefly remembered as the author of the dialogue between 'Piscator' and 'Viator' written in 1676, which forms the second part in the fifth edition of Izaak Walton's 'Compleat Angler' (q.v.). He also wrote many pleasant verses, including the 'New Year Poem' praised by Charles Lamb, burlesques of Virgil (1664) and Lucian (1665), and a translation of Montaigne's 'Essays' (1685), closer but less racy than Florio's (q.v.).

COTTON, SIR ROBERT BRUCE (1571-1631), educated at Westminster School and Jesus College, Cambridge, was an antiquary and collector of manuscripts and coins. He gave the free use of his library to Bacon, Camden, Raleigh, Selden, Speed, Usher, and other scholars, and sent a gift of manuscripts to the Bodleian Library on its foundation. He joined the parliamentary party and published various political tracts. The COTTONIAN LIBRARY, largely composed of works rescued from the dissolved monasteries, was left to the nation by Sir John Cotton (1621-1701), grandson of Sir Robert; it was placed in Essex House, then in Ashburnham House, where it suffered severely from fire in 1731. It was removed to the British Museum in 1753. It includes such treasures as the Lindisfarne Gospels (q.v.) and other splendid biblical MSS. such as the Codex Purpureus, and the MSS. of 'Beowulf', 'Pearl', and 'Gawain and the Green Knight' (qq.v.).

Cotton State: Alabama, see United States.

Cottys or Cottus, a hundred-handed giant, brother of Briareus (q.v.) and Gyes.

Cotytto, a Thracian goddess, associated with Cybele, worshipped with licentious rites, whose cult spread widely.

COUCH, SIR ARTHUR THOMAS QUILLER-, see Quiller-Couch.

Coué, ÉMILE (1857-1926), a chemist of Troyes in France, who developed a system of psychotherapy by which he claimed that persons, through auto-suggestion, could counteract a tendency to disease. His formula, 'Every day, in every way, I am becoming better and better', had a wide vogue.

Coulin, a British giant mentioned in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', II. x. 11.

Council of Trent, an 'oecumenical' council of the Roman Catholic Church which sat, with considerable intervals, at Trent in the Tyrol, 1545-63, settling in a coherent form the doctrines of that Church in opposition to those of the Reformation. Its decisions are the recognized Roman Catholic authority on matters of faith and discipline.

Count Julian, a tragedy by Landor (q.v.), published in 1812.

It deals with the story of the vengeance taken by Count Julian, a Spanish nobleman, on Roderigo the king, who has dishonoured Julian's daughter; and Julian's fate. The subject is also treated in Southey's 'Roderick' (q.v.), and in a different form by Rowley in his 'All's Lost by Lust' (q.v.).

Count Robert of Paris, a novel by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1831, the year before the author's death. This was, with the exception of 'The Surgeon's Daughter', his last novel. It was written in ill health and betrays the decline of his powers.

The scene is laid in Constantinople in the days of the Emperor Alexius Comnenus (1081-1118), and the story centres in the arrival there of the first crusaders, and in a plot of Nicephorus Briennius, the husband of Anna Comnena (q.v.), to dethrone his father-in-law. Anna Comnena herself figures largely in the novel and provides some of its best pages. Count Robert of Paris, a proud and valiant Frankish knight, and his Amazonian wife Brenhilda, are among the crusaders. On the occasion of the homage done by these to the emperor, Count Robert grossly insults the latter by seating himself on his throne. He thereby arouses the wrath of Hereward, an English soldier of the emperor's Varangian (q.v.) guard. The count and his wife, by a device of the emperor's, are detained as hostages for the crusaders when these cross to Asia; the count is thrown into prison, and rescued thence by the chivalrous Hereward. Meanwhile his wife Brenhilda is exposed to the unwelcome attentions of Briennius, and challenges him to a duel, agreeing to surrender herself to him if defeated. When the time for the duel comes, Count Robert presents himself in her stead, and as Briennius fails to appear, Hereward fights on his behalf. He is defeated, but his life is spared by the count in consideration of his past services. Hereward attaches himself to the count, having discovered his old Saxon love, Bertha, in the countess's waiting-woman.

Counter-Reformation, a movement in the Roman Catholic Church in opposition to the Protestant Reformation. It developed in the latter part of the 16th cent., after the Council of Trent (1545-63) and the peace of Cateau-Cambrésis (1559) between Philip II and Henri II of France. In the course of the repressive measures which, together with reforms and reorganization, formed part of this movement, Giordano Bruno (q.v.) was burnt as a heretic.

Countess Cathleen, The, a play by Yeats, published in 1892, one of the two plays with which the Irish national theatre started on its course (see Yeats, W. B.).

The scene is laid 'in Ireland in old times' at a period of famine. The people sell their souls to the demons for food. The countess does all she can to relieve their needs, till the demons steal her wealth. Finally she sells her own soul to the demons for a great sum, sacrificing her hope of salvation for the people. But at the end she is forgiven, for her intention was good.

Country Wife, The, a comedy by Wycherley (q.v.), produced in 1675.

This is one of the wittiest of Wycherley's plays, but the manners depicted are coarse and indecent. The plot illustrates the folly both of excessive jealousy and of excessive credulity in lovers. Mr. Pinchwife, having occasion to come to London for the marriage of his sister, Alithea, brings with him his artless young country wife, and the excess of his suspicion puts ideas into her head, which are the cause of his undoing. Sparkish, who was to marry Alithea, from the opposite excess of confidence and credulity loses her at the last moment to a new wooer; while Horner, a witty young libertine, who has spread a false report about himself in order to facilitate his amours, is able to satisfy Pinchwife of his wife's innocence.

This play was adapted by Garrick as 'The Country Girl'.

County Palatine, in England, a county of which the earl or lord had originally royal privileges, with the right of exclusive civil and criminal jurisdiction. The counties palatine are now Cheshire and Lancashire. The word Palatine meant originally 'of or belonging to the imperial palace of the Caesars'.

Coup de théâtre, an unexpected and sensational turn in a play.

Courcy, Lord and Lady de, and their sons and daughters, characters in A. Trollope's Barsetshire series of novels, types of a worldly, self-seeking, heartless aristocracy.

Courier, The, a newspaper that attained considerable importance in the early part of the 19th cent., under the management of Daniel Stuart (q.v.). Coleridge and Wordsworth were among its contributors. Galt (q.v.) was at one time its editor.

Courier of Lyons, The, see Reade.

Court of Arches, see Arches (Court of).

Court of Love, an institution said to have existed in Provence and Languedoc in the Middle Ages, a tribunal composed of lords and ladies for deciding questions of gallantry.

Court of Love, The, an allegory (1,400 lines in rhyme-royal) attributed doubtfully to Chaucer, in which the poet visits the Court of Venus, converses with those who frequent it, and reads its twenty statutes. He is assigned as 'servant' to a damsel, named Rosiall, and witnesses various allegorical scenes, notably the picture of those who have voluntarily renounced love. The poem ends with a charming concert of the birds on May-day, when they sing descants on the opening words of psalms. Linguistic peculiarities suggest that this poem was of later date than Chaucer, or was extensively re-written. It purports to be the work of one 'Philogenet, of Cambridge, clerk'. In spirit it is thoroughly Chaucerian.

Court of Pie-Powder, see Piepowder Court.

COURTELINE, the name by which GEORGES MOINAUX (1860-1929) is generally known: French humorist and satirist, who ridiculed French officialdom in his 'Messieurs les Ronds-de-cuir' (translated as 'The Bureaucrats'), and French legal absurdities in a number of short plays.

COURTHOPE, WILLIAM JOHN (1842-1917), educated at Harrow, and Corpus Christi College and New College, Oxford, became a civil service commissioner and professor of poetry at Oxford. His chief works are the last five volumes of the standard edition of Pope's works, including a 'Life' (1871-89); and a 'History of English Poetry' (1895-1910). In 1884 he contributed a volume on Addison to the English Men of Letters series. His other works include 'Ludibria Lunae' (1869), and the delightful Aristophanic 'Paradise of Birds' (1870, in which a philosopher and a poet are tried for the crimes of mankind against the birds and are barely acquitted). 'The Country Town and other Poems', published in 1927 after his death, contain many pieces of great charm.

Covenant, THE, or NATIONAL COVENANT, a protestation signed all over Scotland in 1638, in which the subscribers swore to defend the Protestant religion and to resist all contrary errors and corruptions. A COVENANTER (in Scotland traditionally pronounced covenant'ter) was a subscriber or adherent of the above.

Covenant, THE SOLEMN LEAGUE AND, a treaty between the English and Scottish nations concluded in 1643, stipulating the preservation of the reformed Church in Scotland, the reformation of religion in England, the extirpation of popery and episcopacy, and peace between the kingdoms.

Covent Garden, in London, the old Convent Garden of Westminster. At the dissolution of the monasteries, it passed into the hands of the Russell family, who built Bedford House north of the Strand and laid out the garden for building, with the market as the centre. Inigo Jones built St. Paul's Church there, and the piazza that runs along two sides of the market-place. Many celebrated people lived in Covent Garden (Sir Kenelm Digby, Sir Godfrey Kneller, Sir Peter Lely, Zoffany, Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, among others), and the Bedford Coffee-house and those of Will and Button (qq.v.) were in the neighbourhood. Covent Garden is frequently mentioned in 17th- and 18th-cent. literature, generally as a centre of dissipation. It is still the principal wholesale market in London for vegetables, fruit, and flowers.

The first COVENT GARDEN THEATRE was opened by Rich in 1732. It was burnt down in 1808, and its successor in 1856. In these, many famous actors were seen, including Garrick, Munden, the Kembles, Braham, Mrs. Siddons, and Macready. The new theatre (by Barry) opened in 1858 has been the principal home in England of English and Italian opera.

Covent Garden Journal, a periodical issued twice a week during 1752 by H. Fielding (q.v.), under the pseudonym of Sir Alexander Drawcansir, containing essays on literature and manners. It contained an attack on Smollett's 'Peregrine Pickle' and 'Roderick Random', to which that author replied in a scurrilous pamphlet, 'A Faithful Narrative of . . . Habbakuk Hilding, Justice, Dealer, and Chapman' (1752).

Coventry, TO SEND TO, to exclude a person from the society of which he is a member, on account of objectionable conduct. The origin of the expression is perhaps indicated, in the opinion of the OED., by the following quotation:

'At Bromingham a town so generally wicked that it had risen upon small parties of the king's, and killed or taken them prisoners and sent them to Coventry' [then strongly held for the parliament]. Clarendon, 'History of the Rebellion', vi, § 83.

COVENTRY, FRANCIS (d. 1759?), educated at Magdalene College, Cambridge, author of the 'History of Pompey the Little' (1751), a satire in the form of the picaresque narrative of the life of a lap-dog, who undergoes many vicissitudes, passing from one owner to another of very diverse stations.

COVERDALE, MILES (1488-1568), studied at Cambridge, was ordained priest in 1514 and adopted Lutheran views. He translated at Antwerp, apparently in the pay of Jacob van Meteren, the Bible and Apocrypha from German and Latin versions with the aid of Tyndale's New Testament. His translation was first printed perhaps by Christopher Froschouer of Zürich. A modified version was issued in 1537. Coverdale also superintended the printing of the 'Great Bible' of 1539 (see under Bible, The English). He was bishop of Exeter in 1551-3, and was allowed to leave England in 1554 after Queen Mary's accession. He was in England again in 1559, published his last book, 'Letters of Saints', in 1564, and was rector of St. Magnus, London Bridge, from 1563 to 1566. His collected works, which include translations of theological tracts and German hymns, were published in 1844-6. If he was in fact (which has been questioned) the translator of the version of the Bible attributed to him, he is entitled to the credit for much of the noble language of the Authorized Version, and in particular for the Prayer-book version of the Psalter.

Coverley, Sir Roger DE, a character described by Addison (q.v.) in the 'Spectator' (q.v.). He is a member of the Spectator Club, 'a gentleman of Worcestershire, of ancient descent, a baronet. His great-grandfather was inventor of that famous country-dance which is called after him. He is a gentleman that is very singular in his behaviour, but his singularities proceed from his good sense, and are contradictions to the manners of the world, only as he thinks the world is in the wrong. . . . It is said, he keeps himself a bachelor, by reason he was crossed in love by a perverse beautiful widow of the next county to him.' He figures in a number of the 'Spectator' papers (both by Addison and Steele), being depicted at home, at church, at the assizes, in town, at the play, at Vauxhall, &c.

COWLEY, ABRAHAM (1618-67), was son of a wealthy citizen of London, king's scholar at Westminster, and scholar and fellow of

COWLEY

Trinity College, Cambridge. His amazing precocity is shown by the fact that, when ten years of age, he composed an epical romance of 'Pyramus and Thisbe', followed two years later by the epic 'Constantia and Philetus' (both included in 'Poetical Blossoms' published in 1633). 'Love's Riddle', a pastoral drama, appeared in 1638; 'Naufragium Jocularé', a Latin comedy, in the same year; and 'The Guardian', reissued as 'The Cutter of Coleman Street', a comedy directed against the Puritans, in 1641. Ejected from Cambridge in that year as a result of the Civil War, he went first to Oxford and thence in 1646 to Paris, where he became cipher-secretary to Queen Henrietta Maria and was employed on delicate diplomatic missions. He came as a Royalist spy to England in 1655, was imprisoned, released on bail (his release occasioned suspicions of his honesty), and studied medicine at Oxford. After the restoration, a competence was provided for him by the earl of St. Albans and the duke of Buckingham, and he received a grant of the manor of Oldcourt (Nethercot).

His principal works, besides those mentioned above, are 'The Mistress', a love-cycle, 1647; 'Miscellanies' including four books of the 'Davideis', an epic in decasyllabic couplets on the biblical history of David, 1656; odes on the Restoration and against Cromwell, 1660-1; 'Verses on several occasions', 1663. In his 'Pindaric Odes', included in the 'Miscellanies', he introduced the fashion of the rhetorical ode, in irregular verse, imitated by Dryden and others. His prose works, marked by grace and simplicity of style, include a tract on 'The Advancement of Experimental Philosophy' (1661), a 'Discourse by way of Vision concerning Oliver Cromwell' (1661), and some 'Essays', notably one 'Of Myself', containing interesting particulars of his early life.

COWLEY, MRS. HANNAH (1743-1809), née Parkhouse, wrote a number of comedies between 1776 and 1795, including 'The Runaway' (1776) and 'A Bold Stroke for a Husband' (1783), of which the most successful was 'The Belle's Stratagem' (q.v.), produced in 1780. She contributed weekly sentimental verses to the 'World' as 'Anna Matilda'.

COWPER, WILLIAM (pron. Cooper), (1731-1800), son of a rector of Great Berkhamstead, was educated at a private school (where he was bullied) and at Westminster School. He was then articled to a solicitor (1750-2), in 1752 took chambers in the Middle Temple, and was called to the bar in 1754. He suffered from fits of depression, which, when he was offered a clerkship in the House of Lords in 1763, developed into mania, and he tried to commit suicide. From his mania he recovered, but he thereafter lived in retirement. In 1765 he became a boarder in the house of Morley Unwin at Huntingdon, where the cheerful simple life perfectly suited him.

CRABBE

After Unwin's death, he removed with Mary, Unwin's widow, to Olney, coming under the influence of Newton, the evangelical curate of the place, at whose instance he contributed to the collection of 'Olney Hymns' (published in 1779), his contributions including such well-known hymns as 'Hark, my soul! it is the Lord', and 'God moves in a mysterious way'. He became engaged to Mrs. Unwin, but suffered another outbreak of mania in 1773. In 1779, the influence of the strenuous Newton being withdrawn, Cowper entered upon the most peaceful period of his life, and began to write much poetry. In 1781 he published 'Anti-Thelyphthora', a reply to a book by his cousin Martin Madan advocating polygamy. At the suggestion of Mrs. Unwin he wrote eight satires: 'Table Talk', 'The Progress of Error', 'Truth', 'Expostulation', 'Hope', 'Charity', 'Conversation', and 'Retirement'. These were published in 1782. The volume included some shorter poems, among others the well-known 'Boadicea' and 'Verses supposed to be written by Alexander Selkirk'. In 1782 he wrote 'John Gilpin' (q.v.) and in 1784 'The Task' (q.v.). The volume which contained these (published in 1785) also included 'Tirocinium', a vigorous attack on public schools as Cowper knew them. In 1786 he moved, with Mrs. Unwin, to Weston, where he wrote some short poems published after his death, including 'Yardley Oak' (1791), the verses 'On the Loss of the Royal George', the sonnet 'To Mrs. Unwin', the beautiful lines 'To Mary', and 'The Poplar Field'. In 1785 he undertook the translation of Homer, published in 1791, which was not successful. He received a pension in 1794. Mrs. Unwin died in 1796, and her loss left Cowper shattered in mind and body. He wrote the fine but gloomy poem 'The Castaway' shortly before his death.

Cowper's admirable letters, of which several editions have been published, throw light on his simple, gentle, and humane personality. His poetry is notable as heralding a simpler and more natural style than the classical style of Pope and his inferior imitators.

Cox and Box, an operetta by Sir F. Burnand, music by Sir A. Sullivan (qq.v.), produced in 1867. See also Box and Cox.

Cox's Museum: James Cox, jeweller and clockmaker in Shoe Lane, had a museum in Spring Gardens, of which catalogues for 1772 and 1774 figure in the Catalogue of the British Museum. The East India Co. ordered two clocks from him to be sent to the emperor of China. But the museum did not prosper, and the stock was disposed of by a lottery. See Mrs. Ellis's notes in Mackinnon's edition (1930) of Miss Burney's 'Evelina', in which book there is a reference to the museum.

CRABBE, GEORGE (1754-1832), was born at Aldeburgh in Suffolk, where his father was collector of salt-duties. He was apprenticed to a doctor, and subsequently practised medicine at Aldeburgh. During his apprenticeship he made the acquaintance of Sarah Elmy, whom he married ten years later. In 1780 he went to London, where he was generously befriended by Edmund Burke and on his advice published 'The Library' in 1781, a poem in the manner of Pope containing the author's somewhat commonplace reflections on books and reading. In the same year he took orders and became curate of Aldeburgh, and from 1782 to 1785 was chaplain at Belvoir to the duke of Rutland. In 1783 appeared, after revision by Burke and Johnson, 'The Village' (q.v.), a poem in heroic couplets. A long interval followed during which Crabbe published nothing of importance. In 1807 appeared a volume containing among other poems 'The Parish Register' (q.v.), which first revealed the gifts of Crabbe as a narrative poet. The same volume contained 'Sir Eustace Grey', the terrible account, in eight-lined stanzas, by a patient in a madhouse, of his decline from happiness and prosperity. In 1810 he published 'The Borough' (q.v.), a poem in twenty-four 'letters', in which he illustrates by various stories the life of a country town. This was followed in 1812 by 'Tales', twenty-one stories in which the poet again shows his power of narrative and character-drawing. The best known of these is 'The Frank Courtship', the comedy of the wooing of the worldly Sybil by the puritan Josiah. 'This and other 'Tales', notably 'The Patron' and 'The Gentleman Farmer', reveal Crabbe's somewhat grim sense of humour. In 1814 Crabbe was appointed vicar of Trowbridge, and in 1819 he published 'Tales of the Hall', stories again, terrible, humorous, or sad. 'This was the last volume published in his life-time, but the collected edition of his works issued by his son in 1834 contained some fresh tales of considerable merit, such as 'The Equal Marriage' and 'Silford Hall'. A complete collection of Crabbe's poems, edited by A. W. Ward, was issued by the Cambridge University Press in 1905-7. Crabbe was a realistic describer of life as he saw it, in all its ugliness—'Though nature's sternest painter yet the best', as Byron called him—and rarely rose to the higher flights of poetry. He visited Scott at Edinburgh in 1822 (there is a pleasant account in Lockhart, lvi), and the two authors, though their outlook was so different, appear to have enjoyed each other's poetry.

Craftsman, The, a periodical started in December 1726 by Nicholas Amhurst ('Caleb D'Anvers'), to which Bolingbroke (q.v.) contributed his 'Remarks upon the History of England' (September 1730-May 1731) and his 'Dissertation upon Parties' (1733). Among other contributors were Dr. Arbuthnot, Swift, Budgell, and perhaps Pope. Its title was intended to indicate Sir Robert Walpole as a 'man of craft'; and its essence (so far as it was political) lay in its opposition to Walpole and his cabinets. The journal's best period was its first ten years.

CRANE, STEPHEN (1871-1900), an American novelist, whose early death interrupted a career of promise, is remembered as the author of 'The Red Badge of Courage, an Episode of the American Civil War' (1895) and of a volume of short stories, 'The Open Boat' (1898).

Crane, WALTER (1845-1915), artist, is remembered chiefly as a decorator of rooms and furniture and for his work in the illustration of books, especially of books for children, but including an edition of Spenser's 'Faerie Queene' (1894-6), and some poems of his own. He became in 1898 principal of the Royal College of Art, South Kensington. His art showed the influence of the Pre-Raphaelites, particularly of Morris, with whose socialistic views Crane was in agreement. He was the first president of the Art Workers' Guild, founded in 1884, and from 1895 to his death was president of the Arts and Crafts Exhibition Society.

Cranford, a novel by Mrs. Gaskell (q.v.), published in 'Household Words' in 1851-3, republished in 1853.

'Cranford' is a prose idyll, in which the authoress, drawing in part on her experiences of Knutsford, describes with much tenderness, and a just blend of humour and pathos, life in a quiet Cheshire village in the early 19th cent. Gentility is the predominant note in Cranford, and the ladies (there are hardly any gentlemen) practise 'elegant economy'. Mrs. Gaskell draws delightful portraits of these ladies, from the Honourable, but dull and pompous, Mrs. Jamieson (with her butler, Mr. Mulliner, who resembles 'a sulky cockatoo') to Miss Betty Barker, the old clerk's daughter. But the principal characters are the daughters of a former rector, Matilda Jenkyns (the gentle Miss Matty) and her stern elder sister Miss Deborah, who thinks 'Pickwick' by no means equal to Dr. Johnson. We have sketches of the tragedy of the genial Captain Brown, run over by a train while deep in the perusal of a number of the obnoxious 'Pickwick'; of Miss Matty's unhappy little love story; of the panic caused in the village by a succession of purely imaginary robberies; of the flutter due to the visit of Lady Glenmire, widow of a Scottish baron, and still more to her marriage with the rather vulgar Mr. Hoggins, the surgeon; and so forth, ending with the ruin of Miss Matty through the failure of a bank, the kindly devices of her friends to help her, and the fortunate return from India of her long-lost brother

Cranlon, in Drayton's 'Nymphidia' (q.v.), Queen Mab's charioteer.

CRANMER, THOMAS (1489-1556), archbishop of Canterbury, was a fellow of Jesus College, Cambridge. He propounded views in favour of the divorce of Henry VIII from Catharine of Aragon, was appointed to the archbishopric in 1533, and maintained the king's claim to be the supreme head of the Church of England. He supervised the production of the first prayer-book of Edward VI, 1549; prepared the revised prayer-book of 1552; and promulgated the forty-two articles of religion (afterwards reduced to thirty-nine) in the same year. To meet the need for suitable sermons, he contributed to and probably edited the first book of 'Homilies' issued in 1547. In Queen Mary's reign he was condemned for heresy by Cardinal Pole, recently appointed archbishop of Canterbury, and degraded in 1556. He signed six documents admitting the supremacy of the pope and the truth of all Roman Catholic doctrine except transubstantiation, in vain, and was burned at the stake repudiating these admissions on 21 March 1556, at Oxford, holding his right hand (which had written his recantation) steadily in the flames, that it might be the first burnt. He compiled a 'Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticarum' (1550), which never saw the light, and wrote on Anglican discipline and theology; but his chief title to fame is that of being the principal author of the English liturgy.

For CRANMER's BIBLE see under Bible (The English).

Crapaud or JOHNNY CRAPAUD, a derisive term at one time in use for a Frenchman. According to Guillim and Peacham, 17th-cent. writers on heraldry, the ancient arms of France were three crapauds or toads. Strange as it may seem, it appears uncertain whether this is true or not. There is much discussion of the subject in the 'I.D.C.' A statue of King Clovis at Frankfort-on-Main shows, it is said, three toads on his shield, and a 14th-cent. tapestry in Rheims Cathedral likewise shows toads as his device. On the other hand it is argued that heraldic emblems were adopted in France only after the first crusade, much later than Clovis. On the whole it appears that the so-called toads are rudely executed attempts to represent fleurs-de-lis, or lance-heads.

CRASHAW, RICHARD (1612?-49), the son of a noted anti-papal preacher, was educated at Charterhouse and Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, and was a fellow of Peterhouse from 1635 to 1643. He entered the Roman Catholic Church and went to Paris, and appears to have been introduced to Queen Henrietta Maria by his friend Cowley (q.v.), her secretary. She in turn introduced him to Cardinal Pallotto, the governor of Rome, who appointed him his private secretary, and subsequently procured him a benefice in the Basilica-church of Our Lady of Loretto in 1649, where he died shortly after his arrival.

His principal poetical work was the 'Steps to the Temple' (1646), a collection of religious poems showing great devotional ecstasy, and the influence of Marino and also, as Gosse has pointed out, of the Spanish Mystics. To this was attached a secular section, the 'Delights of the Muses', containing the well-known 'Music's Duel', a paraphrase of the Latin of Strada, in which the nightingale and the lute-player contend until the former, 'unable to measure all those wild diversities of chatt'ring strings', fails and dies; and also the pretty 'Wishes. To his (supposed) Mistress', beginning 'Whoe'er she be'. His poem, 'The Flaming Heart', a hymn to St. Teresa, belongs to the period before he became a Roman Catholic. The posthumous 'Carmen Deo Nostro' (1652) included reprints of many of his best earlier poems besides new works.

Cratchit, Bob, a character in Dickens's 'A Christmas Carol' (q.v.).

Craven Fellowships and scholarships at Oxford, and Craven scholarships and studentships at Cambridge, were founded by John, Baron Craven of Ryton (d. 1649).

CRAWFORD, FRANCIS MARION (1854-1909), was born of American parents at Bagni di Lucca in Tuscany, and was educated at Harvard, Heidelberg, and Rome. He edited for a time the 'Indian Herald' at Allahabad. His first novel, 'Mr. Isaacs, a tale of Modern India', was published in America in 1882. He returned to Italy in 1883 and thereafter lived principally at Sorrento. He travelled extensively and his novels reflect his knowledge of foreign lands. Thus four have Rome for their scene: 'Saracinesca' (1887), 'Sant' Ilario' (1889), 'Don Orsino' (1892), and 'Corleone' (1896); one has Constantinople, 'Paul Patoff' (1887); three have the East, 'Zoroaster' (1885), 'Khaled' (1891), 'Via Crucis' (1898); and three have Germany, 'Dr. Claudius' (1883), 'Greifenstein' (1889), and 'The Cigarette-maker's Romance' (1890); while the scene of others is laid in England or America.

Crawford, HENRY and MARY, characters in Jane Austen's 'Mansfield Park' (q.v.).

CRAWFORD, ISABELLA VALANEY (1850-86), Canadian poet, was born in Dublin, and from the age of eight lived in Canada. Her collected poems, which show a considerable lyrical gift, were published in 1905.

and his sons, PITT and RAWDON, leading characters in Thackeray's 'Vanity Fair' (q.v.).

Craye, COL. HORACE DE, a character in Meredith's 'The Egoist' (q.v.).

CRAYON, GEOFFREY, pseudonym of W. IRVING (q.v.).

Crazy Kate, the subject of a digression in 'The Sofa', the first part of Cowper's 'The Task'.

Creakle, in Dickens's 'David Copperfield' (q.v.), the bullying head master of the hero's first school.

Credo, 'I believe', the first word of the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds in Latin. Hence a name for either of these creeds. Also used for the short space of time in which a man might say his Creed.

CREEVEY, THOMAS (1768-1838), was whig M.P. successively for Thetford and Appleby. The 'Creevey Papers' published in 1903, consisting of letters to his step-daughter, Elizabeth Ord, extracts from his journal, and letters to Creevey from various important persons, are interesting for their gossip, and the light they throw on the characters of prominent persons and on the society of the later Georgian era. In Creevey's old age, when the Whigs were in power, he held office as treasurer of Ordnance, and afterwards as treasurer of Greenwich Hospital. Charles Greville (q.v.) in his 'Memoirs' (20 Feb. 1838) refers to Creevey's cheerful and sociable disposition; he was at once 'perfectly happy and exceedingly poor'.

CREIGHTON, MANDELL (1843-1901), fellow of Merton College, Oxford, held the living of Embleton in Northumberland until appointed in 1884 to the chair of ecclesiastical history at Cambridge. He was the first editor of the 'English Historical Review', surrendering the post on his selection for the bishopric of Peterborough in 1891, whence he was transferred to that of London in 1897. His important 'History of the Papacy during the Reformation' appeared in 1882-94. His other historical works include 'The Tudors and the Reformation' (1876), 'The Age of Elizabeth' (1876), and biographies of Simon de Montfort' (1876), Cardinal Wolsey (1888), and Queen Elizabeth (1896). His 'Life and Letters' was published by his widow in 1904.

Cremona, a town in Lombardy where the art of violin-making reached its highest excellence in the 17th and early 18th cents. The two Amatis, Stradivarius, and Guarnerius lived there. Its celebrity occasioned the famous quotation of Dean Swift, when a lady's mantua knocked over a violin:

'Mantua vae miseræ nimium vicina Cremonae' (Virgil, 'Eclogues', ix. 28).

Cremonæ Gardens, in Chelsea, were a popular place of entertainment during the middle of the 19th cent., but became notorious for irregularities and were closed in 1877.

CREWEIAN ORATION

Creon, (1) brother of Jocasta (see Oedipus and Sphinx) and later king of Thebes (see Antigone); (2) king of Corinth (see Creüsa).

Crescent and the Cross, The, the narrative of an eastern tour by Bartholomew Elliott George Warburton (1810-51), an Irish barrister, generally known as 'Eliot Warburton'. The book, which covers much the same ground as Kingslake's 'Eothen' (q.v.), had great success.

Cresseld, The Testament of, the chief work of the Scottish poet Henryson (q.v.), was printed in 1593. It is written in rhyme-royal. The poet describes in the prologue how he took up a book

Written by worthie Chaucer glorious
Of fair Cresseid and lusty Troilus, and proceeded to tell the retribution that came upon the fickle Cressida.

Diomedes, wearied of Cressida, repudiates her; she takes refuge with her father Calchas and bitterly reproaches Venus and Cupid. A council of the gods discusses the punishment for her blasphemy. Finally Saturn deprives her of joy and beauty, and the Moon strikes her with leprosy. As she sits by the wayside, with her leper's cup and clapper, Troilus rides by, with a party of victorious Trojans;

Then upon him she cast up baith her ene;
And with ane blenk it come into his thocht

That he sumtime hir face before had seen;

But she was in sic pleye he knew her nocht.

Nor do her dim eyes recognize him; but she receives his alms, and learns who he is, and dies after sending him a ring he once had given her.

Cressida, see Troilus and Cressida, also Cresseid.

Creüsa, (1) or Glauce, a daughter of Creon, king of Corinth. When she was about to marry Jason (q.v.), she put on a garment given her by Medea, whom Jason had abandoned. This garment was poisoned, and set her body on fire, so that she died in torment. (2) A daughter of Priam, king of Troy, and the wife of Aeneas (q.v.) and mother of Ascanius. In the flight after the fall of Troy she became separated from her husband, who never recovered her. According to Virgil, she appeared to Aeneas in a dream and predicted the calamities and eventual fame that awaited him.

Crewelan Oration, The, at Oxford, commemorates the benefactions to the University and to Lincoln College of Nathaniel Crewe, third Baron Crewe (1633-1721), bishop of Oxford and subsequently of Durham, who was rewarded with the deanery of the Chapel Royal for his subserviency to James II. He was excepted from the general pardon of 1690, but retained his see of Durham. The Creweian Oration has come to include all other benefactions during the preceding year, and is delivered, in alternate years, by the public orator and the professor of poetry.

CREWLER

Crewler, THE REV. HORACE and MRS., characters in Dickens's 'David Copperfield' (q.v.), the parents of SOPHY, whom Traddles marries.

CRICHTON, JAMES, 'THE ADMIRABLE' (1560-85?), son of Robert Crichton of Eliock, was educated at St. Andrews, and travelled to Paris, 1577, where he is said to have disputed on scientific questions in twelve languages. He served in the French army, and visited Genoa, Venice, and Padua, where he successfully challenged the university in discussion. He was a staunch Catholic and a good swordsman. He was killed in a brawl at Mantua. His authentic and extant works consist mainly of odes and orations addressed to Italian nobles and scholars. His title of Admirable originated in Sir Thomas Urquhart's narrative of his career, 1652.

For the play 'The Admirable Crichton', see Barrie.

Cricket on the Hearth, The, a Christmas book by Dickens (q.v.), published in 1846.

John Peerybingle, carrier, and his much younger wife, Dot, are as happy a couple as possible, although the venomous old Tackleton, who himself is about to marry the young May Fielding, throws suspicion on Dot's sincerity. This suspicion appears to be disastrously verified when an eccentric old stranger takes up his abode with the Peerybingles and is discovered one day by John, metamorphosed into a bright young man by the removal of his wig, in intimate conversation with Dot. By the fairy influence of the Cricket on the Hearth John is brought to the decision to pardon her offence, which he attributes to the incompatibility of their ages and temperaments. But there turns out to be no occasion for forgiveness, for the bright young man is an old friend, the lover of May Fielding, believed dead, who has turned up just in time to prevent her marrying Tackleton. Among the other characters are Caleb Plummer and his blind daughter, Bertha, the toy-makers; and Tilly Slowboy, most loving and incompetent of nurses.

Crimsworth, WILLIAM, the hero of Charlotte Brontë's 'The Professor' (q.v.).

Cripplegate, one of the gates of the city of London, of which there is record as early as the year 1000. The name is probably derived from an OE. word crepel, meaning a burrow or narrow passage, and indicates that the gate was a narrow and less important one. Stow repeatedly refers to it as a postern, but attributes the name to the number of cripples who resorted there.

Crisparkle, THE REV. SEPTIMUS, a character in Dickens's 'Edwin Drood' (q.v.).

Crispin and Crispinian, SAINTS, brothers, members of a noble Roman family, according to tradition, who left Rome for Soissons to preach Christianity and supported themselves there by shoemaking. They were ordered by the Emperor Maximian to be put to death, but survived various attempts to kill them, until their heads were cut off. They are the patron saints of shoemakers, and are commemorated on 25 Oct., date of the battle of Agincourt. See Shakespeare's 'Henry V', iv. iii. 40: 'This day is call'd the feast of Crispian', &c.

Crispinus, in Jonson's 'The Poetaster' (q.v.), represents the dramatist Marston.

Critic, The, or a Tragedy Rehearsed, a comedy by R. B. Sheridan (q.v.), produced in 1779.

In this play Sheridan satirized, after the manner of Buckingham's 'Rehearsal' (q.v.), not only the sentimental drama, but also the malignant literary criticism of the day. We have first Dangle and Sneer, the spiteful critics; Sir Fretful Plagiary, the poetaster (a caricature of Richard Cumberland); and Puff, the unscrupulous advertiser of literary wares, who has reduced the puff to a science. But Puff himself has written a tragedy, 'The Spanish Armada', to the rehearsal of which he takes Sneer and Dangle. This is an absurd historical drama with an admixture of the sentimental element, written in bombastic style, in which Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Christopher Hatton, the earl of Leicester, and Lord Burleigh are presented, at the moment when the Armada is approaching; while Tilburina, the daughter of the governor of Tilbury Fort, is in love with Don Ferolo Whiskerandos, a Spanish prisoner. The discussion of the play by the author and the two critics, as the rehearsal proceeds, makes a highly entertaining caricature of the dramatic art.

Critical Review, The, a Tory and Church paper, founded in 1756 by Archibald Hamilton, an Edinburgh printer, in opposition to the 'Monthly Review' (q.v.). It was edited during 1756-9 by Smollett (q.v.) and supported by Johnson and Robertson. It came to an end in 1817.

Croaker, a character in Goldsmith's 'The Good-natured Man' (q.v.).

CROCE, BENEDETTO (1866-), Italian philosopher. His publications include 'Filosofia dello spirito' (1 Estetica; 2 Logica; 3 Filosofia della pratica; 4 Teoria della storiografia), 'Problemi di estetica'; also some volumes of criticism and history, 'Saggi sulla letteratura italiana del Seicento'; 'Conversazioni critiche'; 'Goethe'; 'La Poesia di Dante'; 'Storia d'Italia dal 1871 al 1915'; 'Contributo alla critica di me stesso'.

Crockett, DAVID (1786-1836), American hunter and eccentric who has become a legendary character in American literature.

Crockford, 'Crockford's Clerical Directory', first published in 1857, and now issued annually. A book of reference for facts relating to the clergy and the Church of England.

Crockford's, a famous gambling club established in 1827 at 50 St. James's Street, London, by William Crockford (1775-1844). Crockford was originally a fishmonger; he amassed £1,200,000 out of the club in a few years.

Crocodile's Tears: the crocodile was fabulously said to weep, either to allure a man for the purpose of devouring him, or while devouring him. Whence many allusions in literature. Sir John Mandeville (xxviii) says, 'In that contre . . . ben gret plente of Cokadrilles. Theise serpents sleu men, and thei eten them wepyng'. 'Sir J. Hawkins' Voyage' in Hakluyt, iii, has this passage: 'In this river we saw many Crocodils. . . . His nature is ever when hee would have his prey, to cry and sob like a Christian body, to provoke them to come to him, and then hee snatcheth at them.'

Crocus, in mythology, the lover of the maiden Smilax. The pair were changed into the plants that bear their names.

Croesus, the last of the kings of Lydia, who passed for the richest of mankind. In conversation with Solon he claimed to be the happiest of men, but the philosopher replied that no man should be deemed happy until he had finished his life happily. When Croesus had been conquered by Cyrus and was about to be burnt alive, he thrice called on the name of Solon. Cyrus asking the reason for this, was moved at the explanation and at the recollection of the inconstancy of human affairs, and released Croesus, whom he made his friend.

Croft, ADMIRAL and MRS., characters in Jane Austen's 'Persuasion' (q.v.).

Croftangry, CHRYSAL, see Chronicles of the Canongate.

CROKER, JOHN WILSON (1780-1857), educated at Trinity College, Dublin, was secretary to the Admiralty and a prominent Tory politician. He is the supposed original of Rigby in Disraeli's 'Coningsby' (q.v.). He was a contributor to the 'Quarterly Review', and became notorious for his scathing criticism of Keats's 'Endymion'. He edited Boswell's 'Life of Johnson' (1831) and was severely criticized by Macaulay, whose 'History of England' (first two volumes) he in turn attacked in 1849. His works include 'An Intercepted Letter from Canton' (1804, a satire on Dublin society), 'Military Events of the French Revolution of 1830' (1831), and 'Essays on the Early Period of the French Revolution' (1857). The 'Croker Papers', published in 1884, are interesting for the light they throw on the political life of Croker's period of office (1808-32), and for the letters they include from the Duke of Wellington and others. It was Croker whom Macaulay said he 'detested more than cold boiled veal'.

CROKER, THOMAS CROFTON (1798-1854), author of 'Researches in the South of Ireland' (1824), 'Fairy Legends and Traditions' (1825-8), 'Legends of the Lakes' (1829), afterwards called 'Killarney Legends', and 'Popular Songs of Ireland' (1839). Croker's 'Legends', which are the work of an accomplished antiquary and earned the enthusiastic admiration of Scott, are a storehouse of information on Irish folk-lore.

CROLY, GEORGE (1780-1860), educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and rector of St. Stephen's, Walbrook, was author of 'Salathiel' (1829), a weird romance of the wandering Jew, Rome under Nero, and the siege of Jerusalem by Titus; 'Marston' (1846), a romance of which the French Revolution and the Napoleonic wars provide the background; 'Catiline' (1822), a tragedy; and numerous narrative and romantic poems. Byron ('Don Juan', xi. 57) refers to him as the 'Revd. Rowley Powley'.

Cromagnon, the name of a cave near Les Eyzies in the Dordogne, where in 1868 were discovered four skeletons in association with objects of the Aurignacian (q.v.) period. They were of a tall race with large low skulls, the face short and broad, the eye-sockets low, and the nose narrow and prominent, and form one of the three main types of man of the Aurignacian culture.

Crome, JOHN (1768-1821), generally called 'Old Crome' to distinguish him from his son, one of the greatest landscape-painters of Britain. He was born in humble circumstances and apprenticed to a sign-writer. He founded the Norwich school of painting, and was particularly successful in the treatment of trees.

Cromwell, The True Chronicle Historie of the whole life and death of Thomas Lord, a play published in 1602 and stated in the title to have been 'written by W. S.' It was included in the 3rd and 4th Shakespeare folios (1663 and 1685). The play has little merit and is certainly not by Shakespeare.

Cromwell, OLIVER, Lord Protector, 1653-8. He figures in Scott's 'Woodstock' (q.v.). His name was pronounced 'Crumwell', whence the Royalist toast, 'God send this crumb well down!'

Cromwell, RICHARD, Lord Protector, 1658-9.

Cromwell, THOMAS, Earl of Essex (1485?-1540), secretary to Cardinal Wolsey and subsequently to Henry VIII, and his chief adviser in ecclesiastical matters. He was the principal promoter of the dissolution of the monasteries. He negotiated Henry's marriage with Anne of Cleves. The failure of this match and of the policy that underlay it, coupled with the intense unpopularity of the minister, led to his downfall. A bill of attainder was passed and Cromwell was executed.

Cronos or KRONOS, in Greek mythology, one of the Titans, a son of Uranus and Gê, and father by Rhea of Hestia, Demeter, Hera, Poseidon, Hades, and Zeus. The children of

CRONOS

Uranus conspired against their father, who immediately after their birth had confined them in Tartarus, and Uranus was castrated and divided from Gæ by Cronos (a widely diffused cosmogonic myth; see A. Lang, 'Custom and Myth'). Cronos succeeded Uranus as ruler of the universe, and was in turn dethroned by Zeus. The Saturn (q.v.) of the Romans was identified with him.

Crop-ears or Crop-eared, terms applied to the Puritans or 'Roundheads' (q.v.) by their opponents, and probably intended to associate them with those whose ears had been cut off as a punishment. [OED.]

Crosble, ADOLPHUS, a character in A. Trollope's 'The Small House at Allington' (q.v.).

Crosby Hall, in Bishopsgate, London, a splendid mansion built by alderman Sir John Crosby (d. 1475) about 1466. It was an important feature of 16th-cent. London. Sir Thomas More lived there about 1520, and the countess of Pembroke, 'Sidney's sister', in 1609. It is mentioned in Shakespeare's 'Richard III', i. iii, and iii. i. The Hall, after a chequered career, was re-erected in 1908 on a site in Chelsea. It is now the centre of the Federation of University Women.

Crossjay Patterne, a character in Meredith's 'The Egoist' (q.v.).

Crotchet Castle, a novel by Peacock (q.v.), published in 1831. As in most of Peacock's novels, the story includes an assembly of oddities at a country house, Mr. Skionar (Coleridge), Mr. MacQuedy (a Scottish economist), Mr. Firedamp (a meteorologist), Mr. Chainmail (typifying medieval romance), and others. This is varied by a trip by river and canal to Wales, reminiscent of a trip taken by Peacock with Shelley up the Thames. The best character is the Rev. Dr. Follitt, a man 'both learned and jolly', of robust common sense, an improvement on Dr. Gaster and a forerunner of Dr. Opimian (qq.v.). The plot is extremely slight, and is supplied by young Mr. Crotchet's unfortunate love affairs with Miss Touchandgo and Lady Clarinda.

Crowdero, the one-legged fiddler (crowd, an old English word for fiddle) and leader of the bear-baiters in Butler's 'Hudibras' (q.v.).

Crowe, CAPTAIN, the Sancho Panza of Sir Launcelot Greaves in Smollett's (q.v.) novel of that name.

CROWE, WILLIAM, see Lewesdon Hill.

Crowland, see Croyland.

Crown of Thorns, THE, the crown that the soldiers put on the head of Jesus Christ before the Crucifixion (Matt. xxvii. 29).

Crown of Wild Olive, THE, four lectures by Ruskin (q.v.), delivered in 1866; the first on 'War', delivered at the Royal Military Academy; the second on 'The Future of England', at the Royal Artillery Institution; the third on 'Work', to a working men's institute, dealing in particular with the objects, sometimes wasteful or futile, to which capital directs labour; the fourth, in the Bradford Town Hall, on 'Traffic' (in the sense of buying and selling), in which he discussed architecture in its relation to religion, and the false ideals of wealth.

A crown of wild olive was the only prize at the Olympic Games (q.v.). Ruskin used it as a title in allusion to the importance of not working for a false idea of reward.

CROWNE, JOHN (1640?-1703?), probably the son of William Crowne, an emigrant to Nova Scotia. He returned to London by 1665, when his romance 'Pandion and Amphigenia' was published. His first comedy, 'The Country Wit', appeared in 1675, containing the character of Sir Mannerly Shallow, the pompous fool, subsequently developed by him into Sir Courtly Nice in the play of that name. Three dull tragedies followed, and then his best comedies 'City Politiques' (1683), a satire on the Whigs, and 'Sir Courtly Nice' (q.v.) in 1685. He wrote three further tragedies (including 'Thyestes', 1681) and two comedies: 'The English Friar' (1690), a satire on the Catholic priests who had been prominent at the court of James II; and 'The Married Beau' (1694), founded on the story of 'The Curious Impertinent' (q.v.) in 'Don Quixote'.

Croyland or CROWLAND, a famous abbey in Lincolnshire founded by Æthelbald of Mercia in the 8th cent., near the tomb of St. Guthlac. It figures prominently in C. Kingsley's 'Hereward the Wake' (q.v.).

Croyland or Crowland History, THE, a chronicle of the 14th or 15th cent., printed by Savile in 1596, and for long erroneously attributed to Ingulf, Abbot of Croyland (d. 1109), secretary to William the Conqueror. It was shown by Sir Francis Palgrave and others to be a forgery of the 15th cent.

CRUDEN, ALEXANDER (1701-70), a bookseller in the Royal Exchange and corrector of the press, who in 1737 published his 'Biblical Concordance'. He suffered periodical attacks of insanity, and once believed himself divinely appointed to reform the nation.

Cruikshank, GEORGE (1792-1878), artist and caricaturist, son of Isaac Cruikshank, also a famous caricaturist (of Revolutionary and Napoleonic war times). George Cruikshank illustrated a large number of literary works and periodicals, including 'The Scourge' (1811-16) and 'The Meteor' (1813-14), Pierce Egan's 'Life in London' (1821 onwards), Grumm's 'Popular Tales' (1824-6), Dickens's 'Sketches by Boz' and 'Oliver Twist', novels by Harrison Ainsworth, Thackeray's 'Legend of the Rhine', &c. Cruikshank issued for some years from 1835 an illustrated 'Comic Almanack', one of the predecessors of 'Punch'.

Crummles, MR. VINCENT, MRS., and NI-

CRUMMLES

NETTS ('the infant phenomenon'), characters in Dickens's 'Nicholas Nickleby' (q.v.).

Cruncher, JERRY, a character in Dickens's 'Tale of Two Cities' (q.v.).

Crusoe, ROBINSON, see Robinson Crusoe.

Crutched, CROUCHED, or CROSSED Friars (Fratres cruciferi), a minor order of friars so called from their bearing or wearing a cross. Their house stood at the corner of Seething Lane and Crutched Friars Street in the City of London. After their dissolution in 1539 and the destruction of the monastic buildings, the Navy Office was constructed on part of the site. There Samuel Pepys lived and conducted his business ('Diary', 18 July 1660, &c.).

Cry of the Children, The, one of the best known of the poems of E. B. Browning (q.v.), published in 1843 in 'Blackwood's Magazine'. It is the lament of the children in factories and mines, the victims of industrial development.

Crystal Palace, see Exhibition.

Cubism, a movement in 20th-cent. art generally held to originate with the Spanish painter Pablo Picasso (b. 1881), but of which examples are to be found in the work of Paul Cézanne (1839–1906). The essence of cubism is to emphasize the three-dimensional structure and mass of objects by eliminating curved lines and reducing bodies to primary forms, such as prisms, cubes, octahedrons, &c.; in other words presenting nature as a cubic pattern.

Cuchulain (pronounced 'Cuhoo'lin'), one of the principal heroes of the Ulster cycle of Irish mythology, the nephew or ward of Conchubar, king of Ulster. He is supposed to have lived in the first century of the Christian era. His birth was miraculous, and he showed his strength and prowess at an early age. While still a child he killed the terrible watch-dog of the Smith Culan, and compensated the owner by undertaking to guard his house in the dog's place, whence the name Cuchulain, signifying 'Culan's hound'. Of his numerous feats of valour, which won him the love of many women, the chief was his defence of Ulster, single-handed, against Medb or Maeve, queen of Connaught, who attacked it in order to carry off the Brown Bull of Cuailgne (pron. Cooley). Cuchulain was killed, when 27, by Lugaid, son of a king of Ulster, and the daughters of Calatin the wizard, in vengeance for their fathers whom Cuchulain had slain.

A series of the legends about him have been translated by Lady Gregory (q.v., 'Cuchulain of Muirthemne'). He figures in Macpherson's Ossianic poems as 'Cuthullin' (q.v.).

Cuckold's Haven or Point, a spot on the Thames riverside, a little below Rotherhithe, so called, according to tradition, because in King John's reign a miller there had a beautiful wife, who attracted the king's favour. The miller was compensated, says the tale, by a grant of as much land on that side as he could see from his house.

Cuckoo-Song, The, see 'Summer is icumen in'.

Cuddle Headrigg, in Scott's 'Old Mortality' (q.v.), the ploughman in Lady Margaret Bellenden's service.

Cuddy, a herdsman or shepherd, in the 'Shepherds Calender' of Spenser, and in the 'Shepherd's Week' of Gay (qq.v.).

CUDWORTH, RALPH (1617–88), educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, was one of the leading members of the Cambridge Platonists. He was successively master of Clare, professor of Hebrew, and master of Christ's. His principal works were 'The True Intellectual System of the Universe' (1678); and a 'Treatise concerning Eternal and Immutable Morality', published after his death (1731). His style is lucid, but has not the vigorous and striking quality of that of Hobbes.

The characteristic feature of the philosophy of Cudworth and the other Platonists is its reaction against the narrow Puritan dogmatism, and against the materialism of Hobbes and Descartes. They were idealists, and maintained the spiritual constitution of the universe. Sense can reveal only appearance; reality consists in 'intelligible forms', which are 'not impressions printed on the soul without, but ideas vitally protended or actively exerted from within itself'. As moralists they held that reason and religion are in harmony; truth and true goodness cannot be disunited; morality is based upon reason.

Cuff, SERGEANT, the detective in Wilkie Collins's 'The Moonstone' (q.v.).

Cufic, a variety of Arabic writing attributed to the scholars of Cufa or Kufa, an ancient city near Babylon, the residence of the Caliphs before the building of Bagdad, and a great seat of Mohammedan learning. Cufic differs from ordinary Arabic writing in the angular form of many of the letters and the general rigidity of the strokes. [OED.]

Culdee, from the Old Irish céle dé, associate or servant of God, member of an ancient Scoto-Irish religious order, found from the 8th cent. onwards. The name appears to have been first given to solitary recluses; these were afterwards associated in communities of anchorites; and finally brought under the canonical rule along with the secular clergy by the end of the 11th cent. [OED.]

Culling, MRS., afterwards LADY ROMFREY, a character in Meredith's 'Beauchamp's Career' (q.v.).

Cullō'den, near Inverness, the site of the battle in which in 1746 the duke of Cumberland defeated the force of the Young Pretender.

CULVERWEL, NATHANAEL (d. 1651?), educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, was one of the Cambridge Platonists (q.v.). His 'Light of Nature', in which he sought to apportion the respective spheres of reason and faith, was published in 1652. His early death, probably when only 32, prevented the execution of a larger design, the reconciliation of the teaching of the Gospel with reason.

CUMBERLAND, RICHARD (1732-1811), educated at Westminster School and Trinity College, Cambridge, was author of a number of sentimental comedies, of which 'The West Indian' and 'The Brothers' (qq.v.) are the best; some tragedies; two novels, 'Arundel' (1789) and 'Henry' (1795), and a translation of the 'Clouds' of Aristophanes; also of an interesting autobiography. Cumberland is caricatured by Sheridan as Sir Fretful Plagiary in 'The Critic' (q.v.).

Cumberland, WILLIAM AUGUSTUS, duke of (1726-65), second son of George II, and in command of the English army at Culloden (1746); known as 'the Butcher' on account of the severity with which he stamped out disaffection among the Highlanders. He figures in Scott's 'Waverley' (q.v.).

CUMNOR, LORD and LADY, and their daughter, LADY HARRIET, characters in Mrs. Gaskell's 'Wives and Daughters' (q.v.).

Cunctator, see Fabius.

CUNNINGHAM, ALLAN (1784-1842), a native of Dumfriesshire, was at first a stonemason and subsequently secretary to Francis Chantrey, the sculptor. He supplied to R. H. Cromek much of the material (fabricated by himself) of Cromek's 'Remains of Nithsdale and Galloway Song'. He published 'Traditional Tales of the English and Scottish Peasantry' in 1822, 'The Songs of Scotland, Ancient and Modern' (including the famous 'A Wet Sheet and a Flowing Sea') in 1825, and 'Lives of the most eminent British Painters, Sculptors, and Architects' in 1829-33. Many of Cunningham's short pieces and imitations of ancient ballads, such as 'Hame, Hame, Hame' and 'The sun rises bright in France', gained much popularity.

CUNNINGHAM, JOHN (1729-73), author of the successful farce 'Love in a Mist' (1747), and of much tuneful contemplative verse, not all of it included in his 'Poems, chiefly Pastoral' (1766).

CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM, ROBERT BONTINE (1852-1936), the son of a Scottish laird, educated at Harrow, a man of varied career, during which he was a M.P., a leader of the Dock Strike in 1887, an anarchist, and a traveller in remote parts of the world, particularly in the interior of Spanish America, where he gained an intimate knowledge of gaucho life and of the older civilization surviving from the period of Spanish rule. His writings include remarkable stories of travel and descriptions of strange scenes and people, and tales of Scotland, notably in 'Mogreb-el-Ackas' (Morocco, 1898), 'Thirteen Stories' (1900), 'Success' (1902), 'Hernando de Soto'

CURE FOR A CUCKOLD

(1903), 'Scottish Stories' (1914), 'The Horses of the Conquest' (1930).

Cunobellin (Cymbeline), a king of Britain in the early years of the Christian era, and father of Caractacus (q.v.).

Cup, Tha, a tragedy by A. Tennyson (q.v.), produced in 1881. Camma, the wife of Sin-natus, tetrarch of Galatia, poisons the pro-Roman traitor Synorix (who has killed her husband and tried to seduce her), and takes her own life.

Cupid, identified by the Romans with the Greek EROS, the god of Love. He is generally represented to be the son of Venus (Aphrodite), but his father is variously stated to be Jupiter, Mars, or Mercury. He is pictured as a winged infant, armed with a bow, a quiver full of arrows, and torches.

Cupid's Revenge, see Fletcher (J.).

Cupid and Campaspe, see Campaspe.

Cupid and Psyche, an allegorical episode in the tale of the 'Golden Ass' (q.v.) of Apuleius. Cupid becomes enamoured of Psyche, daughter of a king, and visits her every night, but remains invisible and forbids her to attempt to see him. Her sisters tell her that her lover is a serpent and will finally devour her. One night she takes a lamp and looks at Cupid while he sleeps, and agitated by the sight of his beauty lets fall a drop of hot oil on his shoulder. The angry god departs and leaves Psyche solitary and remorseful. She wanders over the earth in search of her lover, subjected by Venus to hardships and trials until Jupiter, taking pity on her, makes her immortal and reunites her to Cupid.

This fable was the subject of a poem by Shackerley Marmion (q.v.), 1637; of another by William Morris in the 'Earthly Paradise' (q.v.); and there is a version of it in Pater's 'Marius the Epicurean' (q.v.) and in the 'Eros and Psyche' of Bridges (q.v.).

Curaçao, a liqueur consisting of spirits flavoured with the peel of bitter oranges and sweetened; so called either because first received from the island of Curaçao (a Dutch dependency off the coast of Venezuela), or because Curaçao oranges were used in its preparation. The Hon. Bertie Cecil, 1st Life Guards, hero of Ouda's 'Under Two Flags', breakfasted (it would appear exclusively) off a glass of curaçao.

Curé de Meudon, Rabelais (q.v.).

Cure for a Cuckold, A, a comedy by J. Webster (q.v.) and W. Rowley (q.v.), brought out in 1661.

It deals with the love-affairs of two couples, Bonville and Annabel, and Lessingham and Clare; and contains a notable duel scene on Calais sands. It cannot be called a satisfactory play; but there are scenes in it which, on internal evidence, Gosse showed to be attributable to Webster; and these, if separated from the inferior matter provided by Rowley, form a complete and charming idyll, which Gosse proposed to call 'Love's Graduate'. Under this name they were issued in 1884, edited by S. E. Spring-Rice.

Curfew (from French couvre-feu), originally a regulation in force in medieval Europe by which at a fixed hour in the evening, indicated by the ringing of a bell, hearth-fires were to be covered over or extinguished, the probable object of the regulation being the prevention of conflagrations. Hence it has come to mean the practice of ringing a bell at a fixed hour in the evening, continued after the original purpose was obsolete. [OED.]

Curie, MARIE (1867-1934), née Skłodowska, born at Warsaw, the wife of Pierre Curie, a professor of physics at the Sorbonne. With her husband she discovered radium in 1898 and contributed greatly to the knowledge of radio-activity. M. and Mme Curie received the Nobel prize for physics in 1903, and Mme Curie (who succeeded her husband in his professorship after his death in 1906) received in 1911 that for chemistry also.

Curious Impertinent (or The Fatal Curiosity), an episode in 'Don Quixote' (q.v.), which provided the plot for more than one of the English 17th-cent. dramas. Anselmo having married the beautiful Camilla, urges his friend Lothario to test the virtue of the latter by making love to her. Lothario, at first reluctant, yields to the constant pressure of his friend, with results disastrous to all concerned. The lapse of Camilla encourages the licentiousness of her maid Leonela, and this leads to the discovery of her mistress's infidelity, the death of Anselmo and Lothario, and Camilla's retirement to a convent.

Curlius Dentatus, MARCIUS, Roman consul in 290, 275, and 274 B.C., celebrated as a type of old Roman frugality and virtue. After repeatedly defeating the enemies of Rome, he retired to his small farm and cultivated the land with his own hands. Compare Cincinnatus.

GURLL, EDMUND (1675-1747), a bookseller and pamphleteer, chiefly remembered for the controversy about the publication of Pope's correspondence (see under Pope, Alexander), and on account of his literary frauds and indecent publications (Pope refers to 'Curll's chaste press' in the 'Dunciad', i. 40). Curll is also mentioned in Swift's poem 'On the Death of Dr. Swift'.

CURRER BELL, see Brontë (C.).

Curryfin, LORD, a character in Peacock's 'Gryll Grange' (q.v.).

Curse of Kehama, The, a poem by Southey (q.v.), published in 1810.

The peasant Ladurlad kills Arvalan, son of the mighty Raja of the world, Kehama, to protect his daughter Kailyal from Arvalan's lust. Ladurlad and Kailyal are brought before the infuriated Kehama for punishment. Kailyal clings for protection to the statue of the goddess Marriataly, falls into the river, and is borne away. Kehama pronounces a curse on Ladurlad, charming his life, so that he cannot be harmed by disease or weapons or age, but at the same time is denied water and the fruits of the earth. Kailyal and Ladurlad, in his misery, are reunited. Then follow a succession of incidents in which the fate of this unfortunate pair is subjected to the influence of the various powers, good and evil, of the complicated Hindu mythology, while the revengeful spirit of Arvalan seeks again to get possession of Kailyal. The curse of Kehama turns into a blessing, for by his immunity from death, Ladurlad is able to save his daughter from the dangers that threaten her. Finally Kehama, who has obtained dominion over Swerga or heaven, aspires also to the throne of Paladon or hell. He drinks the 'amreeta' or cup of immortality, to find that he has drunk immortal death and punishment, and becomes the fourth supporter of the throne of Yamen the lord of hell. Kailyal also drinks it, and is borne to the Bower of Bliss, to enjoy immortal life. Ladurlad sinks to rest and awakes in heaven.

Cursive, see Minuscule.

Cursor Mundi, a poem in Northern Middle English of some 30,000 lines, mainly in eight-syllabled couplets, of the early 14th cent. It recounts, with many digressions, traditions, and fragments of hagiology, the Bible history from the creation onwards. The author, whose name is unknown, shows skill in popularizing religious instruction. Many copies of the poem survive, indicating the favour in which it was held.

Curtain, THE, one of the earliest of the London theatres, built, soon after the Theatre (q.v.), in Shoreditch. The Chamberlain's company, which included Richard Burbage and Shakespeare, probably acted there from 1597 to 1599.

Curtana, the pointless sword carried before the king of England at his coronation, emblematic of the sword of mercy.

CURTIS, GEORGE WILLIAM (1824-92), American writer, born at Providence, R.I., author of pleasant essays and books of travel, chiefly known in England for his charming little work, 'Prue and I' (1856), in which he depicts the happiness of the poor man gifted with imagination and blessed in love.

Curtius, LACUS: according to legend a chasm appeared in the Roman forum in 362 B.C., which the soothsayers declared could only be filled if Rome's greatest treasure were thrown into it. Whereupon Marcus Curtius, saying that Rome could have no greater treasure than arms and valour, mounted his steed in full armour and leapt into the chasm, which thereupon closed over him.

Curule Chair, in Roman antiquity, was a chair inlaid with ivory and shaped like a camp-stool, used by the highest magistrates.

CURZON

CURZON, ROBERT, fourteenth Baron Zouche (1810-73), educated at Charterhouse and Christ Church, Oxford, was author of a 'Visit to the Monasteries of the Levant' (1849), a fascinating record of travels, undertaken in search of manuscripts, to Mount Athos, Greece, Palestine, and Egypt; also of 'Armenia' (1854), and of an 'Account of the most celebrated Libraries of Italy' (1854).

CURZON OF KEDLESTON, GEORGE NATHANIEL, Marquess (1859-1925), as a young man travelled in India, Persia, and the Far East; was viceroy of India from 1899 to 1905, chancellor of Oxford University from 1907, and secretary of state for foreign affairs, 1918-22. His chief publication was 'Persia and the Persian Question' (1892), a monumental survey of the country, remarkable for its range, accuracy, and first-hand information. As viceroy Lord Curzon devoted great care to the neglected ancient monuments of India, and created the post of director-general of archaeology. Lord Curzon's immense powers of work, combined with a certain aloofness of demeanour and preference for splendour and formality in official life, gave rise to numerous legends, many of them of a humorous character.

Custance, the widow in Udall's 'Ralph Roister Doister' (q.v.).

Custaunce or CONSTAUNCE, the heroine of Chaucer's 'Man of Lawes Tale' (see Canterbury Tales).

Custom of the Country, The, a romantic drama by J. Fletcher (q.v.) and P. Massinger (q.v.), composed between 1619 and 1622, derived from the 'Persiles y Sigismunda' of Cervantes. The play is disfigured by the indecency of some of its scenes.

Count Clodio, an Italian governor, is suitor to Zenocia, but she loves Arnolde, the younger of two brothers, and marries him. Zenocia and the two brothers forcibly oppose Clodio's claim to the 'custom of the country' (by which he may spend the bridal night with every bride), and escape by sea. Zenocia is captured by a Portuguese captain, and placed in the service of Hippolita at Lisbon, where Arnolde also arrives. Hippolita falls in love with Arnolde, who endeavours to recover Zenocia. A meeting between them is witnessed by the jealous Hippolita, who orders Zenocia to be strangled; but this is prevented by the governor of Lisbon, to whom the repentant Clodio has applied for her release. Hippolita now has recourse to the witch Sulpitia, who causes Zenocia to waste away, by melting a waxen image of her. But Arnolde wastes away in sympathy. Hippolita, moved to remorse, cancels the charm, and resigns Zenocia to Arnolde. There is an underplot concerned with the adventures of Arnolde's elder brother Rutilio.

Custos Rotulorum, the principal justice of the peace in a county, who has custody of the rolls and records of the sessions of the peace.

CYANEAN ROCKS

Cute, ALDERMAN, a character in Dickens's 'The Chimes' (q.v.), said to be intended for Sir Peter Laurie, the City magistrate.

Cuthbert, St. (d. 687), in his youth kept sheep on the hills near the Lauder, a tributary of the Tweed. He entered the monastery of Melrose, of which he became prior. In course of time he was sent to fill the post of abbot of Lindisfarne, on which the monastery of Melrose then depended; and after several years, feeling himself called to a life of perfect solitude, he retired to the small island of Farne. In 684, at a synod held under St. Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury, he was selected for the see of Lindisfarne, and to overcome his unwillingness to accept it, King Egfrith himself, accompanied by the bishop of the Picts, visited him on his island. After two years, feeling death approaching, he retired to the solitude of his island, and died in his cell. His body, which was said to have remained for many years in a state of incorruption and was carried away by the monks when they were driven by the Danes from Lindisfarne, was finally buried in Durham cathedral. He is commemorated on 20 March.

St. CUTHBERT'S BEADS is a popular name, originating on Holy Island and the Northumbrian coast, for the detached and perforated joints of the encrinurites (a fossil lily-like marine animal) there found.

CUTHBERT BEDE, see Bradley (E.).

Cuthullin, in the Ossianic poems of Macpherson (q.v.), the Irish hero Cuchulain (q.v.), transposed in time so as to be contemporary with Finn (Fingal). See Fingal.

Cuttle, CAPTAIN EDWARD, a character in Dickens's 'Dombey and Son' (q.v.). His favourite expression is, 'When found, make a note of'.

Cutty Sark, (1) see Tam o' Shanter; (2) the name of a famous clipper ship built in 1869 for the China tea trade. She sailed 363 miles in one day. She is still in existence, used as a naval training ship.

Cutty Stool, formerly in Scotland, a particular seat in church where offenders against chastity, &c., had to sit during divine service and receive a public rebuke from the minister.

Cuvier, GEORGES (1769-1832), a great French naturalist, and a founder of the sciences of comparative anatomy and palaeontology.

Cuwaert, see Coart.

Cuyp, AELBERT (1605-91), a famous Dutch landscape-painter, who has been called 'the Dutch Claude'.

Cyanean Rocks or SYMPLEGANES, two rocks at the entrance of the Euxine Sea, which were believed to clash together, crushing vessels that passed between them. The Argonauts (q.v.) narrowly escaped them.

CYBĒLĒ

Cybēlē, an Asiatic goddess representing the fecundity of nature, worshipped especially in Phrygia. Thence her cult passed into Greece, where she was known as RHEA. According to mythology she became enamoured of the shepherd Attis (q.v.), a legend connected with the productivity of the earth.

Cyclādes, a group of islands in the Aegean sea, regarded as lying in a circle round Delos.

Cyclic poets, a group of Greek epic writers whose writings collectively formed a sort of legendary history of the world from the earliest times, and supplied themes to Greek dramatic and lyric poets. Nothing is known with certainty about the authors.

Cyclopes, a race of giants having but one eye, in the middle of the forehead, who inhabited the island of Sicily. When Ulysses visited the island, Polyphemus (q.v.) was chief among them. The most solid walls and impregnable fortresses were attributed to their work, and as they lived near Mt. Etna, they were supposed to be the workmen of Hephaestus and to fabricate the thunderbolts of Zeus. Among the Cyclopes mentioned by name in English literature are Brontēs (or Bronteus) and Pyracmon.

Cyder, a poem in blank verse, in two books, by J. Philips (q.v.), published in 1708, on the cultivation of cider apples, and the manufacture and virtues of cider, written in imitation of Virgil's Georgics.

Cyllēnē, one of the highest mountains in the Peloponnese, fabled to be the birthplace of Hermes (q.v.).

Cymbeline, a play by Shakespeare (q.v.), acted in 1610 or 1611, first printed in the folio of 1623. It combines a fragment of British history, freely adapted from Holinshed, with the story of Ginevra from Boccaccio's 'Decameron' (ii. 9).

Imogen, daughter of Cymbeline, king of Britain, has secretly married Leonatus Posthumus, an accomplished gentleman. The queen, Imogen's step-mother, desirous that her son Cloten should marry Imogen, reveals this secret marriage to the king, who banishes Posthumus. The latter, at Rome, boasts of the virtue of Imogen, and enters into a wager with Iachimo that if he can win Imogen's favour he shall have a diamond ring that Imogen had given Posthumus. Iachimo, repulsed by Imogen, by a stratagem gets admission to her chamber at night, brings back to Posthumus evidence that convinces him of her infidelity, and receives the ring. Posthumus writes to Pisanio, his servant at the court, directing him to kill Imogen. Pisanio from compassion spares her, provides her with a man's apparel, and leaves her in a forest, where she is kindly entertained by Bellarius and the two sons of Cymbeline, whom he had stolen in their infancy. A Roman army invades Britain. Imogen falls into the hands of the Roman general and becomes his page. In the ensuing battle

CYNEWULF

Cymbeline is captured and then rescued, and the general and Imogen are taken prisoners, as also Iachimo, thanks to the valour of Bellarius, of the king's sons, and also of Posthumus, who has returned from Rome to fight for Cymbeline. He now surrenders himself for execution as having returned from banishment. The Roman general asks Cymbeline to spare Imogen. The king, moved by something familiar in her appearance, spares her life and grants her a boon. She asks that Iachimo be forced to tell how he came by the ring that he wears on his finger. Iachimo discloses his treachery. Posthumus, learning that his wife is innocent and believing her dead, is in despair, till Imogen reveals herself. The king's joy at recovering his daughter is intensified when Bellarius restores to him his two lost sons, and the scene ends in a general reconciliation. The play contains the beautiful dirge, 'Fear no more the heat o' the sun'.

Cymochles in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', II. v, vi, and viii, 'a man of rare redoubted might', 'given all to lust and loose living', the husband of Acrasia (q.v.) and brother of Pyrochles (q.v.). He sets out to avenge on Sir Guyon the supposed death of his brother. But Phaedria (q.v.) intervenes. He is finally slain by Prince Arthur.

Cymōdōcē, one of the Nereids. Cymodoce is the name of the mother of Marinell in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', IV. xii. Swinburne's 'Island of Cymodoce' in 'Songs of the Springtides' is the island of Sark.

Cymon and Iphigenia, one of Dryden's 'Fables', taken from the 'Decameron' (v. i) of Boccaccio.

Cymry, the Welsh. The word, which is Welsh, probably means 'the compatriots'.

CYNEWULF, probably a Northumbrian poet of the latter part of the 8th cent., the author of four poems in Old English contained in the 'Exeter Book' and the 'Vercelli Book' (qq.v.). The epilogues of these poems contain runic characters corresponding to the letters that compose the name Cynewulf. These poems deal with the following subjects:

1. The Ascension.
2. The Legend of St. Juliana.
3. The 'Elene', or story of the discovery of the true cross by the Empress Helena, mother of Constantine.
4. The 'Fates of the Apostles'.

The first of these is placed in the manuscript between a poem on the Incarnation and one on the Last Judgement, which have also been doubtfully attributed to Cynewulf, the three together being commonly referred to as 'Christ'. Of the four poems mentioned, the finest is the 'Elene'. It consists of fifteen cantos, containing descriptive passages of great beauty, and the last of these is interesting as throwing light on the character and circumstances of the author. Resemblances between this poem and the 'Dream of the Rood' (q.v.) make it possible that Cynewulf was also the author of the latter.

CYNEWULF

Cynics, see Antisthenes.

Cynosure, 'dog's tail', the constellation Ursa Minor, which contains in its tail the Pole star; hence a centre of attraction.

Cynthia, (1) a surname of Artemis or Diana (q.v.), from Mt. Cynthus in Delos, where Artemis was supposed to have been born. (2) Spenser, in 'Colin Clouts come home againe', uses the name to designate Queen Elizabeth. (3) In Congreve's 'The Double Dealer' (q.v.), the daughter of Sir Paul Plyant, affianced to Mellefont.

Cynthia, a poem by R. Barnfield (q.v.).

Cynthia's Revels, a comedy by Jonson (q.v.), printed in 1601, satirizing some court types. These figure under the names of Amorphus, a traveller who has drunk of the fountain of self-love; Asotus, a foolish young gallant; Hedon the voluptuous; Anaides the impudent; Philautia, self-love; Argurion, money; Moria, folly. Cynthia is Queen Elizabeth. Actaeon alludes to Essex; Cupid and Mercury in disguise are pages at her court. The plot is extremely slight, and the play is tedious and of little interest at the present day. The song of Hesperus in Act v, sc. iii, 'Queen and huntress, chaste and fair', is one of Jonson's most beautiful lyrics.

Cypress, a coniferous tree, often regarded as symbolic of mourning, frequently planted in cemeteries of southern Europe, and its branches or sprigs used at funerals (the 'invisae cupressi' of Horace, Od. II. xiv). For the triple signification of the cypress among the ancients, as a symbol of generation, of death, and of immortality, see De Gubernatis, 'Mythologie des Plantes', II. s.v. Cypres.

In Shakespeare's 'Twelfth Night', II. iv ('in sad cypress let me be laid'), 'cypress' in the opinion of Aldis Wright means a coffin of cypress wood, or a bier strewn with cypress branches; but in III. i, of the same play, 'a cypress, not a bosom, hideth my heart', the word means 'cypress lawn' or 'crape'. Cf. Milton, 'Il Penseroso', 'sable stole of cypress lawn'. In the latter sense the word is derived from the name of the island of Cyprus.

Cypress, Mr., a character in Peacock's 'Nightmare Abbey' (q.v.), a caricature of Byron.

Cypresse Grove, THE, see Drummond of Hawthornden.

Cyprian, belonging to Cyprus, an island famous in ancient times for the worship of Aphrodite or Venus. Hence the word is used in the sense of 'lewd' or 'licentious', and in the 18th-19th cents. was used to signify a prostitute.

CYPRIAN, ST. (c. A.D. 200-58), bishop of Carthage and a Father of the Church, author of 'De Unitate Catholicae Ecclesiae' and other theological works, beheaded under the Emperor Valerian.

Cyrano de Bergerac, see Bergerac.

Cyrenaic School of philosophy, see Aristippus.

Cyrus, Le Grand, see Scudéry.

Cythéra, an island (Cerigo) on the coast of the Peloponnese, sacred to the goddess Aphrodite, who was thence surnamed Cythêra.

D

Dacier, THE HON. PERCY, a character in Meredith's 'Diana of the Crossways' (q.v.).

Dactyl, a metrical foot consisting of one long followed by two short syllables, or of one accented followed by two unaccented (derived from the three joints of the finger, δάκτυλος). See Metre.

Daedalus, an ingenious Athenian craftsman. Having murdered his nephew Talus, as likely to prove his rival in ingenuity, he fled with his son Icarus to Crete, where he constructed the famous labyrinth for King Minos (q.v.). Having incurred the king's displeasure, he was imprisoned, and escaped with Icarus by means of wings. But Icarus flew too high, and the heat of the sun melted the wax where-with the wings were fastened, so that he fell into the sea west of Samos (hence called the Icarian Sea) and was drowned. Daedalus made his way to Sicily.

Dagobert I, the son of Clotaire II and king of the Franks (628-39). St. Eloi (q.v.) was his treasurer.

Dagon, the national deity of the ancient Philistines, represented as half man, half fish (Judges xvi. 23; I Sam. v. 1-5; Milton, 'Paradise Lost', i. 462).

Dagonet, in Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur', King Arthur's fool.

Daguerreotype, an early photographic process, so called from Louis Jacques Daguerre (1787-1851) who (with Niepce) invented it in 1839.

Daily Courant, The, the first English daily newspaper, started in March 1702. It contained foreign intelligence, translated from foreign newspapers. It lasted till 1735.

Daily News, The, was founded by Dickens (q.v.), as a Liberal rival to the 'Morning Chronicle', in 1846. But Dickens soon abandoned the editorship to John Forster (q.v.). Among notable contributors and members of its staff at various times may be mentioned Harriet Martineau (q.v.), Andrew Lang (q.v.) and the eminent war correspondent, Archibald Forbes (1839-1900). It is now 'The News Chronicle', having absorbed 'The Daily Chronicle' in 1930.

Daily Telegraph, The, founded in 1855, was the first daily paper to be issued in London at a penny. Its enterprising character and rather highly coloured style proved so successful that for a time it enjoyed a larger circulation than any other English newspaper. Among famous members of its staff have been George Augustus Sala (q.v.), Sir Edwin Arnold (q.v.), and Edward Dickey (1832-1911).

Daimler, a superior and particularly quiet make of English motor-car, generally associated in novels with dignity and high life. It is named after one of the first German car manufacturers.

Dairymen's Daughter, The, a moral tale by Legh Richmond (1772-1827), rector of Turvey, published in 1809. This tract had an enormous circulation, reaching two million copies.

Daisy, SOLOMON, see Solomon Daisy.

Daisy Miller, one of Henry James's (q.v.) most famous stories, published in 1878, which recounts the adventures of a young American girl travelling in Europe.

Dalai-Lama, see Lama.

Dale, LAETITIA, a character in Meredith's 'The Egoist' (q.v.).

Dale, LILY, the heroine of A. Trollope's 'Small House at Allington' (q.v.). Her sister, Bell, her uncle the Squire, and her cousin, Bernard, are other important characters in this novel.

D'Alembert or DALEMBERT, JEAN LE ROND (1717-83), see Philosophes and Encyclopédie.

Dalgarno, LORD, a character in Scott's 'Fortunes of Nigel' (q.v.).

Dalgetty, DUGALD, a character in Scott's 'Legend of Montrose' (q.v.).

Dame Durden, the subject of a well-known song, who kept five men-servants 'to use the spade and flail', and five women servants 'to carry the milken-pail'.

Damien, FATHER JOSEPH (1841-89), a Belgian priest at Honolulu, went in 1873 to the neglected leper settlement on the island of Molokai. There he spent the rest of his life ministering, single-handed for the first twelve years, to the spiritual and material welfare of 700 lepers. In 1885 he contracted the disease, but continued at work until his death. R. L. Stevenson wrote an account of him, 'Father Damien', in 1890 ('Chambers's Biographical Dictionary').

Damiens, ROBERT FRANÇOIS (1714-57), a madman who attempted the life of Louis XV. He was executed after having been, it is said, chained on a steel bed that was heated. Hence the reference in Goldsmith's 'The Traveller' (q.v.) to 'Damiens' bed of steel'.

Damocles, one of the flatterers of Dionysius the elder, tyrant of Syracuse. He pronounced Dionysius the happiest of men, whereupon Dionysius invited him to experience the happiness of a monarch. He placed him at a banquet, where presently Damocles perceived a naked sword hanging over his head by a single hair.

Damoetas, a shepherd in the 'Idylls' of Theocritus and 'Eclogues' of Virgil. Also a character in Sidney's 'Arcadia', and an old shepherd in Milton's 'Lycidas' (qq.v.).

Damon, a shepherd singer in Virgil's eighth 'Eclogue'; a name adopted by poets for a rustic swain. Cf. 'Epitaphium Damonis' of Milton (q.v.), his Latin elegy on his friend Charles Diodati (q.v.).

Damon and Musidōra, two lovers, who are the subject of an episode in Thomson's 'Seasons' (q.v., 'Summer').

Damon and Pythias, a rhymed play by R. Edwards (q.v.), acted probably in 1564, printed in 1571. Damon and Pythias, Pythagorean Greeks, visit Syracuse, and the former is presently arrested on a baseless charge of spying and conspiring against Dionysius the tyrant of Syracuse, who orders his execution. Damon obtains a respite of two months to return home in order to settle his affairs, Pythias offering himself as security for his return. Damon is delayed and arrives when Pythias is just about to be put to death. They contend which shall be executed, each striving to save the other. Dionysius, impressed with their mutual loyalty, pardons Damon and asks to be admitted to their brotherhood.

In the original classical legend it is Phintias (of which 'Pythias' is a corruption), not Damon, who is sentenced, and Damon who goes bail for him.

DAMPIER, WILLIAM (1652-1715), buccaneer, logwood-cutter, privateer, and explorer, visited in the course of his activities many parts of the world, the Spanish Main, Yucatan, the Pacific, Australia, and the East Indies. He published accounts, in a vivid and straightforward style, of his travels and observations, in his 'Voyages' (1697), 'Voyages and Descriptions' (1699), and 'A Voyage to New Holland' (1703-0). Dampier also figures in Woodes Rogers's journal of his privateering expedition (see Rogers, W.).

Dan to Beersheba, FROM, i.e. from one end of the land to the other, an expression said to be first used by Sterne (q.v.) in the 'Sentimental Journey' (cf. Judges xx. 1). The city Dan was at the extreme north of the land of Canaan, Beersheba at the extreme south.

DANA, RICHARD HENRY (1815-82), born at Cambridge, Massachusetts, an American jurist and politician, shipped in 1834 as a sailor for a voyage in the Pacific. He published in 1840 a record of this experience under the title 'Two years before the Mast'.

DANÆ

Danæ, the daughter of Acrisius, king of Argos. An oracle foretold that the king would be killed by his daughter's son, and Acrisius therefore confined her in a brazen tower. Zeus, who was enamoured of her, visited her there in a shower of gold. Their son was Perseus (q.v.). Danae and the child were cast adrift on the sea in a boat and borne to the island of Seriphos, where they were kindly treated by the King Polydectes. See Perseus.

Danaides, the fifty daughters of Danaus, king of Argos, were promised in marriage to their fifty cousins, the sons of Aegyptus. Danaus, who had quarrelled with Aegyptus, made his daughters promise to slay their husbands on their wedding night. This they all did except Hypermnestra, who suffered her husband Lynceus to escape. The others were condemned in Hades to try for ever to fill a sieve with water.

Dance of Death, The, or Dans macabre (or Dans macabré) gave expression to the sense, especially prominent in the 15th cent. (perhaps as a consequence of the plague and the preaching of the mendicant friars), of the ubiquity of Death the leveller. The Dance appears to have first taken shape in France, as a mimed sermon, in which figures typical of various orders of society were seized and haled away each by its own corpse (not, as later, by the personification of Death). The earliest known painting of the Dance, accompanied by versified dialogues between living and dead, was made in 1424 in the cemetery of the Innocents in Paris, and the German artists (including Holbein) who later depicted it appear to have drawn inspiration from French sources. The origin of the word macabre or macabré has been the subject of many conjectures: the most recent view is that it represents the Aramaean word mqabrey, meaning 'grave-diggers' (T.L.S. 27 Apr. 1946).

Dancer, DANIEL, a famous miser (1716-94), in whose wretched hovel large sums of money were found after his death.

Dandy Dinmont, in Scott's 'Guy Mannerling' (q.v.), a sturdy hospitable Liddesdale farmer, and the owner of a special breed of terriers. The author explains in a note that the character was drawn from no individual, but that after the tale had been written the name Dandy Dinmont was generally given to Mr. James Davidson of Hindlee, on the edge of the Teviotdale mountains, who, besides bearing a general resemblance to the character in the novel, possessed a celebrated race of terriers, named Mustard or Pepper according to their colours, without other individual distinction, except 'old', 'young', and 'little'.

Dandin, GEORGE, the hero of a comedy of that name by Molière (q.v.), a tradesman who marries a noble's daughter and suffers many humiliations in consequence. 'Vous l'avez voulu, George Dandin', is his frequent comment on his situation.

DANIEL

Dandiprat, a small coin current in England in the 16th cent., worth three-halfpence. Hence a small, insignificant, or contemptible fellow.

Danegeld, an annual tax imposed at the end of the 10th cent. or in the 11th cent., originally (as is supposed) to provide funds for the protection of England from the Danes, and continued after the Norman Conquest as a land-tax. [OED.]

Dane-law, the part of England over which Danish law prevailed, being the district NE. of Watling Street ceded by the treaty of Wedmore (878), or perhaps the Northumbrian territory in Danish occupation. [OED.]

Dangerfield, a character in Sedley's 'Belamira' (q.v.); also a character in Sir W. Scott's 'Peveril of the Peak' (q.v.).

Dangle, a character in Sheridan's 'The Critic' (q.v.).

Daniel, CHARLES HENRY OLIVE (1836-1919), scholar, fellow, and Provost of Worcester College, Oxford, is remembered for his lifelong interest in printing. He established a private press at Oxford, where he revived the use of the Fell type (see Fell), and produced some fine examples of typography, including plays and poems of Robert Bridges.

The DANIEL MARK, sometimes called the Mini Mark, the special note of the press, represents Daniel in the lions' den with the motto: 'Misit Angelum suum' ('He sent his Angel').

DANIEL, SAMUEL (1562-1619), the son of a music-master, entered Magdalen Hall, Oxford, in 1579, and after visiting Italy became tutor to William Herbert, third earl of Pembroke, and later to Anne Clifford, daughter of the countess of Cumberland. He is mentioned in Spenser's 'Colin Clout' (q.v.) as the 'new shepherd late up sprung'. He published 'Delia', a collection of sonnets inspired by Tasso and Desportes, in 1592; the 'Complaynt of Rosamond', in which Fair Rosamund confesses and laments her relations with the king, also in 1592; and 'Cleopatra' (q.v.), a Senecan tragedy, in 1594. 'Musophilus, or Defence of all Learning' (q.v.) appeared in 1599; the 'Defence of Rhyme' in 1602 (?), in which he maintained, in reply to Thomas Campion's 'Art of English Poesy', the fitness of the English language for rhymed verse; 'Philotas' (q.v.), a Senecan tragedy, in 1605. He issued in 1609 a new edition of his 'Civill Warres' (q.v.), which had first appeared in 1595. He composed numerous masques for court festivities, including 'Tethys Festival', 1610, and 'Hymen's Triumph', 1615. He was inspector of the children of the queen's revels from 1615 to 1618. His poems were sharply criticized by Ben Jonson, with whom he was 'at jealousies', but praised for their 'sweetness of ryming' by Drummond of Hawthornden, and for their purity of language by Sir John Harington and S. T. Coleridge. William Browne (q.v.) calls him 'well-languaged Daniel'.

Daniel come to judgement, A, a quotation from Shakespeare's 'The Merchant of Venice', iv. i, in allusion to Susanna, 45 et seq.

Daniel in the lions' den, a reference to the story in Dan. vi of Daniel being cast, by order of King Darius, into the den of lions, and of their mouths being shut by the angel of God, so that they did not hurt him.

Daniel Deronda, a novel by G. Eliot (q.v.), published in 1876, the last of her novels.

Gwendolen Harleth, high-spirited, self-confident, and self-centred, marries Henleigh Grandcourt, an arrogant selfish man of the world, for his money and position, to save her mother and herself from destitution, and in spite of the fact that she knows of the existence of another woman and children to whom Grandcourt is in honour bound. She comes under the influence of the high-souled Daniel Deronda, and her dependence on his guidance increases as the brutality of her husband drives her to revolt and even to thoughts of murder. Daniel's own parentage is enveloped in mystery, which is gradually revealed by his attraction to the noble Jew, Mordecai, and his gentle sister, Mirah, and the final disclosure of his Jewish birth. Grandcourt's tragic death, of which Gwendolen feels herself partly guilty, leaves her with Daniel as her only hope. This is changed to despair when she learns his intention of devoting himself to the cause of a national centre for the Jewish race, and of marrying Mirah, a despair that gradually gives place to resignation. Klesmer, the musician, whose genius and devotion to his art atone for his personal deficiencies, is notable among the minor characters.

Danlsburgh, LORD, a character in Meredith's 'Diana of the Crossways' (q.v.), drawn from Lord Melbourne.

D'ANNUNZIO, GABRIELE (1863-1938), Italian poet and novelist. His best-known works are: 'Intermezzo di rime' (1883); 'Il libro delle vergini' (1884); 'Chimera' (1888); 'Elegie romane'; 'Le vergini delle rocce' (1896); 'Il trionfo del morte' (1894); 'La città morta' (1898); 'Il fuoco' (1900); 'Forse che sì, forse che no' (1910).

Danøker, a Dane.

'Inquire me first what Danakera are in Paris.'

(Shakespeare, 'Hamlet', II. i. 7.)

DANTE ALIGHIERI (1265-1321), a great Italian poet, was born, probably at Florence, of a Guelph family. His father, Alighiero, is said to have been a lawyer. The circumstances of his life are somewhat obscure, and have been the subject of much debate; our principal source of information about them is the 'Life of Dante' by Boccaccio.

Dante, in the 'Vita Nuova', written in his 26th year, the first of his three principal works, states that when he was nearly ten he first saw the 'glorious lady of his mind', who was called Beatrice, who was then nine and to whom he became devoted. Nine years later he saw her again in the street, when she courteously saluted him; and subsequently on divers occasions. Then Beatrice died in the year 1290, and Dante mourned her. Presently another lady came into his life, whom he first beheld gazing with pity at him from a window. These and other incidents evoked sonnets and other short poems which Dante incorporated in the 'Vita Nuova'. Who this Beatrice was has been the subject of much discussion. The generally accepted view is that she was Bice Portinari, who married Simone de Bardi. According to another view she was another Florentine lady, whose identity Dante designedly kept secret; while others hold that she was an ideal person without earthly existence. The second lady in the poem was probably Gemma Donati, Dante's wife, whom he married some time before 1298.

Dante joined the party of the Bianchi (q.v.), attained the municipal office of prior, and, incurring the special displeasure of the Pope, was sentenced to fine and imprisonment. He fled from Florence in 1301 and his subsequent movements are obscure, but we know that he led a wretched wandering life, that he was for a time in Paris, and that he ended his days at Ravenna.

Dante's second principal work, probably written about 1300, was the 'Convivio' or 'Convito' or 'Feast', an unfinished philosophical work (Dante was an Aristotelian). The third was his 'Divina Commedia' (q.v.), which is dealt with separately. He also wrote two Latin treatises, 'De Vulgari Eloquentia' on the philology of the Romance languages and poetical metre, and 'De Monarchia', on the relations of pope and prince. He was really the 'founder' (if such an expression can be used) of the Italian language: down to his time it was uncertain whether Provençal or some other southern French dialect would become the speech of northern Italy and spread southwards. Dante made his Tuscan into Italian.

Danton, JACQUES (1759-94), a celebrated French statesman of the Revolution, a member of the Convention and of the first (Dantonist) Committee of Public Safety, which gave place to the 'Great [Robespierist] Committee' in July 1793. He finally came into conflict with Robespierre and was guillotined.

Danu, in Gaelic mythology, the mother of the gods (the Tuatha dà Danann).

Daphnaida, an elegy by Spenser (q.v.). See Alcyon.

Daphne, according to mythology, a daughter of the river Penæus, of whom Apollo became enamoured. Daphne fleeing from his importunities entreated the assistance of the gods, who changed her into a laurel. Hence the laurel became the favourite tree of Apollo.

DAPHNIS

Daphnis, a son of Hermes, who was brought up by the nymphs, was taught by Pan to play on the flute, and became a shepherd on the slopes of Mt. Aetna. He was regarded as the inventor of pastoral poetry. According to one form of the legend, he was struck with blindness for infidelity to the Naiad whom he loved.

Daphnis and Chloe, a Greek pastoral romance, one of the earliest works of its kind, sometimes attributed to an author Longus, of whom nothing is known. Its date is uncertain, perhaps the 2nd cent. A.D. It is the story of two infants discovered respectively by Lamon and Dryas, shepherds of Mitylene, and brought up by them to tend their sheep and goats, and tells of their love and adventures, and final union, after the discovery of their wealthy parents. G. Moore (q.v.) wrote a translation ('The Pastoral Loves of Daphnis and Chloe'), published in a limited edition in 1924.

Dapper, a character in Jonson's 'The Alchemist' (q.v.).

D'ARBLAY, MME, see Burney.

Darby and Joan, a jocose appellation for an attached husband and wife, especially in advanced years and humble life. The 'Gentleman's Magazine' of 1735, V. 153, has, under the title 'The joys of love never forgot: a song', a mediocre copy of verses containing a reference to 'Old Darby, with Joan by his side', who 'are never happy asunder'. This has usually been considered the source of the names, and various conjectures have been made both as to the author and as to the identity of 'Darby and Joan', but with no valid results. [OED.]

Darcy, FITZWILLIAM, one of the principal characters in Jane Austen's 'Pride and Prejudice' (q.v.).

Dares, the boxer at the funeral games, in Virgil, 'Aen.' v. 369 et seq.

Dares Phrygius, in Homer's 'Iliad', v. 9, a priest of Hephaestus among the Trojans. A work in Latin purporting to be the translation of an account by him of the destruction of Troy, known as the De Excidio Trojae, was popular in the Middle Ages and one of the sources of Trojan legend. It dates perhaps from the 5th cent. A.D. See Dictys Cretensis.

Darien Scheme, THE, a scheme proposed by William Paterson (1658-1719), the projector of the Bank of England, for a Scottish settlement on the isthmus of Panama. An expedition for the purpose set out in 1698, but proved unsuccessful, and the scheme was abandoned in 1700. Practically the whole circulating capital of the Scottish people was invested in the scheme; and so, at the Union (1707), a sum of money was paid by England in compensation for the losses sustained by Scotland.

Darius the Great, son of Hystaspes, was king of Persia 521-485 B.C. According to

DARWIN

Herodotus (iii. 85), he and six other chiefs, having slain the usurper of the throne, Go-mates, agreed that that chief should be king whose horse neighed first, and in this way Darius was chosen, thanks to the ingenuity of his groom. He greatly extended the Persian empire and in his reign began the great war between the Persians and the Greeks. His army was defeated at Marathon, and before he was able to renew the struggle he died, leaving the execution of his schemes to his son Xerxes. Darius is referred to in Daniel v. 31, and the following chapters.

Dark Ages, a term sometimes applied to the period of the Middle Ages (q.v.) to mark the intellectual darkness of the time.

DARLEY, GEORGE (1795-1846), an Irish poet and mathematician, educated at Trinity College, Dublin. He was a member of the staff of the 'London Magazine' and wrote the pleasant pastoral drama 'Sylvia' (1827) and the poem 'Nepenthe', besides a good deal of other verse, including 'The Errors of Ecstacy' (1822), which shows his considerable lyrical power. Some of his prose tales were collected in 'Labours of Idleness' (1826).

Darley Arabian, a bay Arab stallion from whom the best English race-horses are descended, imported about 1700 by Mr. Darley of Yorkshire. 'Flying Childers' (q.v.) was his son, and 'Eclipse' (q.v.) his great-grandson.

DARLING, FRANK FRASER (1903-), naturalist, author of 'Wild Country' (1938), 'A Naturalist on Rona' (1939), and other descriptions of wild life in the British Isles.

Darling, GRACE, daughter of James Darling, keeper of the Outer-Farm lighthouse, off the coast of Northumberland, who with her father in 1838 gallantly put out in a coble in a heavy sea and rescued several passengers of the wrecked 'Forfarshire' steamer.

Darnay, CHARLES, a character in Dickens's 'A Tale of Two Cities' (q.v.).

D'Artagnan, one of the heroes of Alexandre Dumas's 'The Three Musketeers' (q.v.).

Dartle, ROSA, a character in Dickens's 'David Copperfield' (q.v.).

DARWIN, CHARLES ROBERT (1809-82), born at Shrewsbury, grandson of Erasmus Darwin (q.v.), was educated at Shrewsbury, Edinburgh University, and Christ's College, Cambridge. He embarked in 1831 as naturalist on the 'Beagle', bound for South America on a scientific expedition. He returned in 1836, and published in 1839 his 'Journal of Researches into the Geology and Natural History of the various countries visited by H.M.S. Beagle'. His 'Structure and Distribution of Coral Reefs' appeared in 1842, 'Geological Observations on Volcanic Islands' in 1844, and 'Geological Observations on S. America' in 1846. His great work, 'On the Origin of Species by means of Natural Selection', appeared in 1859. Darwin had received in 1858 from Dr. A. R. Wallace (q.v.) a manuscript containing a theory of the origin of species identical with his own. This he had published with a letter of his own, addressed to Dr. Asa Grey in 1857, containing a sketch of his theory. Darwin's book gave rise to intense opposition, but found distinguished supporters in Huxley, Lyell, and Sir Joseph Hooker. It was followed by 'The Variation of Animals and Plants under Domestication' (1868), and 'The Descent of Man' (1871). Among Darwin's other works were 'The Fertilisation of Orchids' (1862), supplemented by 'Cross and Self-Fertilisation' (1876); 'The Movements and Habits of Climbing Plants' (1864); 'The Expression of the Emotions in Man and Animals' (1872); 'Insectivorous Plants' (1875); 'The Power of Movement in Plants' (1880), in which was formulated his theory of circumnutation; and 'Formation of Vegetable Mould through the action of Worms' (1881). The 'Life and Letters of Charles Darwin', edited by his son Francis Darwin, appeared in 1887, and 'More Letters of Charles Darwin', by Francis Darwin and A. C. Seward in 1903.

DARWIN

DARWIN, ERASMUS (1731-1802), educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, spent much of his life as a physician at Lichfield, where he established a botanical garden. He embodied the botanical system of Linnaeus in a poem 'The Botanic Garden', of which Pt. II, 'The Loves of the Plants', appeared in 1789, and Pt. I, 'The Economy of Vegetation', in 1791. The poem is in heroic couplets, in imitation of Pope. The goddess of Botany, descending on earth, holds forth on various natural phenomena throughout the four cantos of Pt. I, while Pt. II describes 'the Ovidian metamorphosis of the flowers, with their floral harems', stamens and pistils figuring as beaux and belles. The work was ridiculed by Canning and Frere in 'The Loves of the Triangles'. In his 'Zoonomia', published in 1794-6, Darwin expounds the laws of organic life on the evolutionary principle.

DASENT, SIR GEORGE WEBBE (1817-96), Scandinavian scholar, educated at Westminster and Magdalen Hall, Oxford. He was the interpreter of Icelandic sagas to us, publishing many translations, 'Popular Tales from the Norse' (1859), 'The Story of Burnt Njal' (1861), &c.

Dashwood, ELINOR and MARIANNE, the principal characters in Jane Austen's 'Sense and Sensibility' (q.v.). JOHN DASHWOOD is their step-brother.

Datchery, DICK, the name assumed by one of the characters in Dickens's 'Edwin Drood' (q.v.); his identity is not revealed when the fragment ends.

DAUDET, ALPHONSE (1840-97), French novelist, perhaps best known in England as the creator of the amusing type of Provençal Frenchman, 'Tartarin de Tarascon'. Daudet wrote some charming short stories: 'Lettres de mon Moulin' (1869) and 'Contes du Lundi' (1873), and a number of novels which attained great popularity, 'Le Petit Chose' (1868), 'Fromont Jeune et Riser Aîné' (1874), 'Jack' (1876)—the first and third imitations of Dickens, the second of Thackeray—'Le Nabab' (1877), 'Numa Roumestan' (1880), &c.

DAVID

DAUDET, LÉON (1867-1943), son of Alphonse Daudet (q.v.), French critic, novelist, and polemical writer, leader of the Royalist party in France, editor of the 'Action Française'. He is author of 'Les Primaires', 'Le Bonheur d'être riche', 'L'Hérédité', 'Le Cœur brûlé', 'Fantômes et Vivants', 'Devant la Douleur', 'Salons et Journaux'.

Dauphin, the title of the eldest son of the king of France from 1349 to 1830. According to Littré, the title Dauphin borne by the lords of the Viennois was a proper name Delphinus (the same word as the name of the fish, dolphin), whence the province subject to them was called the Dauphiné. When Humbert III, the last lord of the Dauphiné, ceded the province to Philip of Valois in 1349, he made it a condition that the title should be perpetuated by being borne by the eldest son of the French king. [OED.]

The edition of the Latin classics ad usum Delphini (1674) was prepared for the son of Louis XIV.

D'AVENANT, SIR WILLIAM (1606-68), was born at Oxford and educated there. He is said to have been Shakespeare's godson. His earliest drama 'The Tragedy of Albovine' (q.v.) was published in 1629, 'The Cruel Brother' (a tragedy) in 1630, 'The Platonick Lovers' (tragi-comedy) in 1636, his comic masterpiece 'The Wits' (q.v.) in the same year, 'The Unfortunate Lovers' in 1643 (acted in 1638), and 'Love and Honour' in 1649 (acted in 1634). D'Avenant was made poet laureate in 1638. He actively supported the cause of Charles I, and was knighted by him in 1643 at the siege of Gloucester. He was imprisoned in the Tower, 1650-2, and is said to have been saved by Milton. His romantic epic 'Gondibert' (q.v.) appeared in 1651. He practically founded English opera by his 'Siege of Rhodes' (q.v., 1656). In conjunction with Dryden he adapted Shakespeare's 'Tempest' in 1667. With Dryden and others he is satirized in the 'Rehearsal' (q.v.).

David, in Dryden's 'Absalom and Achitophel' (q.v.), represents Charles II.

David, KING, the second king of Israel, the youngest son of Jesse of the tribe of Judah. In his youth he slew the Philistine giant Goliath (1 Sam. xvii). On the death of Saul he became king of Judah, and after the murder of Ishbosheth, of the whole of Israel (2 Sam. ii and v). His last years were darkened by the rebellion and death of his son Absalom (2 Sam. xv-xviii). See also David and Jonathan and Psalms.

DAVID

David, St. (6th cent.), the son of a prince of south Wales, is said to have received his education from St. Paulinus, at Whitland, Carmarthenshire. Returning to his native province, he established monasteries in the vale of the Roes near Menevia. He became bishop, and removed the see from Caerleon to Menevia (St. David's). He is the patron saint of Wales and is commemorated on 1 March.

David, Song to, see Smart.

David and Bethsabe, The Love of King, a play in blank verse by Peele (q.v.), printed in 1599. The title sufficiently indicates the subject of the play, which contains the well-known lines:

To joy her love I'll build a kingly bower,
Seated in hearing of a hundred streams.

David and Jonathan, types of loving friends; 'the soul of Jonathan was knit with the soul of David, and Jonathan loved him as his own soul' (1 Sam. xviii. 1). Jonathan was the son of Saul, David was Saul's appointed successor as king of Israel.

✓ David Copperfield, a novel by Dickens (q.v.), published in 1849-50. 'Of all my books,' wrote Dickens, 'I like this the best.' It is (in some of its details) Dickens's veiled autobiography.

David Copperfield is born at Blunderstone (of which the original is the village of Blundeston) in Suffolk, soon after the death of his father. His mother, a gentle weak woman, marries again, and her second husband, Mr. Murdstone, by cruelty disguised as firmness, and abetted by Miss Murdstone his sister, drives her to an early grave. Young Copperfield, who has proved recalcitrant, is sent to school, where he is bullied by the tyrannical headmaster, Creakle, but makes two friends in the brilliant and fascinating Steerforth and the good-humoured plodding Traddles. Thence he is sent to menial employment in London, where he lives a life of poverty and misery, enlivened by his acquaintance with the mercurial and impecunious Mr. Micawber and his family. He runs away and walks penniless to Dover to throw himself on the mercy of his aunt, Betsey Trotwood, an eccentric old lady, who had renounced all interest in him from his birth, because, contrary to her firm expectation, he had been born a boy instead of a girl. He is kindly received and given a new home, which he shares with an amiable lunatic, Mr. Dick. This poor gentleman is perpetually engaged on a memorial regarding his affairs, but is unable to complete it owing to the inevitable intrusion into it of King Charles's head. Copperfield continues his education at Canterbury, living in the house of Miss Trotwood's lawyer, Mr. Wickfield, whose daughter, Agnes, a girl of exceptionally sweet and high-minded disposition, exercises a powerful influence on the rest of his life. He then enters Doctors' Commons, being articled to Mr. Spenlow, of the firm of

DAVID SIMPLE

Spenlow and Jorkins. Meanwhile he has come again into touch with Steerforth, whom, ignorant of his true character, he introduces to the family of his old nurse, Clara Peggotty, married to Barkis, the carrier. This family consists of Mr. Peggotty, a Yarmouth fisherman, his nephew Ham, and the latter's cousin, Little Em'ly, a pretty simple girl whom Ham is about to marry. The remaining inmate of Mr. Peggotty's hospitable home is Mrs. Gummidge, another dependant and a widow, whose peevish laments for her forlorn condition are patiently borne by Mr. Peggotty. Steerforth induces Emily to run away with him, thereby producing intense misery in the Peggotty household. Mr. Peggotty sets out to find her, following her through many countries, and finally recovering her after she had been cast off by Steerforth. The latter's crime also brings unhappiness to his mother, and to her protégée, Rosa Dartle, who has long loved Steerforth with all the suppressed violence of a passionate nature. The tragedy finds its culmination in the shipwreck and drowning of Steerforth, and the death of Ham in trying to save him.

Meanwhile Copperfield, blind to the affection of Agnes Wickfield, marries Dora Spenlow, a pretty empty-headed child, and becomes famous as an author. Dora dies after a few years of married life, and Copperfield, at first disconsolate, gradually awakens to the mistake he has made in rejecting such a treasure as Agnes. Her father has fallen into the toils of a villainous and cunning clerk, Uriah Heep, who, under the cloak of fawning humility, has obtained complete control over him, reduced him to the verge of imbecility, and nearly ruined him. Uriah also aspires to marry Agnes. But his misdeeds, which include forgery and theft, are exposed by Micawber, employed as his clerk, with the assistance of Traddles, now a barrister. Uriah is last seen in prison, under a life sentence. Copperfield marries Agnes. Mr. Peggotty, with Emily and Mrs. Gummidge, is found prospering in Australia, where Mr. Micawber, relieved of his debts, appears finally as a much-esteemed colonial magistrate.

David Harum, a novel by Edward N. Westcott, an American banker (1846-98), published in 1898. David Harum, a country banker, is the embodiment of homely philosophy, humour, and sagacity.

David Simple, The Adventures of, in Search of a Real Friend, a romance by Sarah Fielding (q.v.), published in 1744.

The hero, disillusioned by the discovery that his beloved brother has attempted to rob him of his inheritance by means of a forged will, sets out on a journey to discover a human creature capable of friendship. His experiences are such as to convince him of the base and mercenary motives by which the world is actuated, until he meets Cynthia, who has unjustly been excluded from a share in her father's fortune and cruelly treated by the lady to whom she is companion; also a distressed brother and sister, Valentine and Camilla, who have been ousted from their father's affection by the machinations of a step-mother. These deserving people he relieves, and the four spend their time telling and listening to stories, wandering about London and moralizing on what they see; until the hero and Camilla, and Valentine and Cynthia, after a sufficient delay to prove the delicacy of all concerned, become betrothed. Valentine and Camilla are reconciled to their father, the hero decides to share his fortune with the others, and all live together as a happy community.

Davidels, an epic poem by A. Cowley (q.v.).

DAVIDSON, JOHN (1857-1909), was a schoolmaster in Scotland from 1872 to 1889. He settled in London in the latter year, having previously published 'Scramouch in Naxos' (1889) and other plays. His 'Perfervid', a novel, appeared in 1890. His 'Fleet Street Eclogues' (1893) proved his genuine poetic gift, followed by 'Ballads and Songs' in 1894, 'A Second Series of Fleet Street Eclogues' in 1896, 'New Ballads' in 1897, and 'The Last Ballad' in 1899. Between 1901 and 1908 he wrote a series of 'Testaments' expounding (in blank verse) a materialistic and rebellious philosophy, described very fully in the introduction to 'The Theatrocrat' (1905). He committed suicide in 1909, leaving an unfinished poem 'God and Mammon'.

Davies, CHRISTIAN, alias MOTHER ROSS (1667-1739), a female soldier, born in Dublin, who enlisted under the name of Christopher Welsh, c. 1693. She fought in Flanders and at the battle of Blenheim, 1704. She was wounded at Ramillies, 1706, and her sex having been revealed, was dismissed the service, but still followed the army. She was pensioned in 1712. She was thrice married, all her husbands being soldiers.

DAVIES, JOHN (1565?-1618), of Hereford, poet and writing-master. He published 'Microcosmos' (1603), 'Humours Heau'n on Earth. . . . As also The Triumph of Death' (1605), being a description of the plague of 1603), the 'Holy Roode' (1609), 'Wittes Pilgrimage (by Poeticall Essaies)' (1611), 'The Muse's Sacrifice', containing the author's famous 'Picture of an Happy Man' (1612), and 'Wit's Bedlam' (1617). He also issued an 'Anatomy of Fair Writing' (1633). Some of his epigrams, most of which are contained in 'The Scourge of Folly' (undated), are valuable for their notices of Ben Jonson, Fletcher, and other contemporary poets.

DAVIES, SIR JOHN (1569-1626), a Wiltshire man of good family, educated at Winchester and Queen's College, Oxford, solicitor- and attorney-general for Ireland, and subsequently appointed lord chief justice of the King's Bench in England as a reward for maintaining the legality of Charles I's forced loans. He died before taking up this office. His 'Orchestra', a poem in seven-lined stanzas, of the school of Spenser, in which natural phenomena are reduced to an ordered motion or 'dancing', was published in 1596. 'Astraea', a collection of acrostics on the name Elizabeth, appeared in 1599, and 'Noese Teipsum' (highly praised by Coleridge), a philosophical poem on the nature of man and on the nature and immortality of the soul, in the same year.

DAVIES, WILLIAM HENRY (1871-1940), poet and author of the 'Autobiography of a Super-tramp' (1908).

DAVISON, FRANCIS (1575?-1619?), son of William Davison, secretary of state to Queen Elizabeth; educated at Gray's Inn, and befriended by Essex. He issued, with his brother Walter, a 'Poetical Rapsody' (q.v.) 'containing diverse sonnets, odes, elegies, madrigals, and other Poesies' in 1602, 2nd edition in 1611, 3rd edition, 1621.

Davus Sum (Byron, 'Don Juan', XIII. xiii):

But I'm not Oedipus and Life's a Sphinx;
I tell the tale as it was told, nor dare

To venture a solution, Davus sum, is a quotation from Terence, 'Andria' (I. ii), where the slave Davus, in answer to a question, says, 'Davus sum, non Oedipus', alluding to the fact that Oedipus alone was able to solve the riddle of the Sphinx (q.v.).

DAVY, SIR HUMPHRY (1778-1829), natural philosopher, was professor of chemistry at the Royal Institution, and greatly advanced the knowledge of chemistry and galvanism. He invented the miner's safety-lamp. His collected works, prose and verse, with a memoir by his brother, were published in 1839-40. Mention may be made of his little dialogue 'Salmonia, or Days of Fly-fishing, by an Angler' (1828), which in its form and style reminds the reader of Isaac Walton. Davy was a friend of Sir W. Scott, and there is a pleasant account in Lockhart of Davy's visits to Abbotsford.

Davy Jones, in nautical slang, the spirit of the sea, the sailor's devil. DAVY JONES'S LOCKER, the grave of those who perish at sea.

DAVYS, JOHN (1550?-1605), navigator, made three Arctic voyages in search of the North-West Passage and gave his name to Davis Strait. He wrote the narrative (in Hakluyt) of the second of these voyages and was also author of 'The Seaman's Secrets' (1594) and 'The Worlde's Hydrographical Description' (1595).

Daw, SIR JOHN, in Jonson's 'Epicene' (q.v.), a braggart cowardly knight, who pretends to learning.

Dawes Plan, THE, an arrangement evolved by an international committee of financial experts set up at the end of 1923 to consider the question of the Reparations to be paid by Germany. Germany had declared it impossible to pay the annuities fixed by the Allies in 1921 (£100,000,000 plus 26 per cent. of exports) and France had begun the occupation of the Ruhr. The Committee, presided over by General Charles G. Dawes of the United States, comprised two representatives each for Great Britain, France, Italy, Belgium, and the United States. They reported in April 1924, making recommendations for the stabilization of the German currency, the reorganization of the Reichsbank, and the establishment of a Transfer Committee to receive payments in marks from Germany and carry out transfers of these to the Allies. They also drew up a schedule of annuities ranging from 1,000 million to 2,500 million gold marks, secured on taxes, railways, and industrial securities. The plan was put into operation, but was superseded by the Young Scheme (q.v.).

Dawks's Letter, a newspaper of the late 17th cent., printed in written characters to resemble a manuscript letter.

Dawson, BULLY, a notorious character in the 17th cent. Addison in the 'Spectator', No. 2, writes: 'Sir Roger was what you call a fine gentleman, had often supped with my Lord Rochester and Sir G. Etherege . . . and kicked Bully Dawson in a public coffeehouse for calling him youngster.' Charles Lamb refers to Bully Dawson in the 'Essays of Elia' ('Popular Fallacies').

Dawson, JEMMY, the hero of a ballad by Shenstone (q.v.). He was one of the Manchester rebels who supported the Young Pretender, and was drawn, hanged, and quartered on Kennington Common in 1746.

Dawson, PHOEBE, the heroine of one of the tales in Crabbe's 'The Parish Register', ii (q.v.).

Day, FANCY, the heroine of Hardy's 'Under the Greenwood Tree' (q.v.).

Day, DAYE, or DAIE, JOHN (1522-84), printer, imprisoned for his protestant zeal in Queen Mary's reign, is remembered as having printed the first church-music book in English (1560) and the first English edition of Foxe's 'Martyrs' (1563); and as having been the first to cast Anglo-Saxon type in England. He introduced a new italic, a Roman, and a Greek type.

DAY, JOHN (fl. 1606), was educated at Caius College, Cambridge. He collaborated with Dekker and others in a number of plays. Of his own extant works, 'The Isle of Gulls', suggested by Sidney's 'Arcadia', appeared in 1606, 'Law Trickes' in 1608, and 'Humour out of Breath' in the same year. His best work, 'The Parliament of Bees' (q.v.), appeared perhaps in 1607, though the earliest extant copy is of 1641. His works were collected by A. H. Bullen in 1881. See also Parnassus Plays.

DAY, THOMAS (1748-89), educated at Charterhouse and Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and a barrister of the Middle Temple, devoted himself largely to works of moral and social reform. He was the author of the 'History of Sandford and Merton' (1783-9, see Sandford and Merton), in which he attempted to reconcile Rousseau's naturalism with a sounder morality.

Day of Doom, The, a poem by Michael Wigglesworth, published in New England in 1662, with the sub-title: 'A Poetical Description of the Great and Last Judgment.'

De Augmentis, see Bacon (Francis).

De Bourgh, LADY CATHERINE, a character in Jane Austen's 'Pride and Prejudice' (q.v.).

De Craye, COLONEL, a character in Meredith's 'The Egoist' (q.v.).

De Croye, ISABELLE and HAMELINE, characters in Scott's 'Quentin Durward' (q.v.).

DE LA MARE, WALTER (1873-1956), educated at St. Paul's Cathedral School, and for some years engaged in business in London, is the author of many poems in which dreams and reality, fairies and humble natural creatures, are delightfully blended. His works include 'The Listeners' (1912), 'Peacock Pie' (1913), 'The Veil' (1921), all poems; 'Collected Poems' (1920); 'Henry Brocken' (1904), 'The Return' (1910), 'Memoirs of a Midget' (1921) (novels). His early books were published under the name of Walter Ramal.

DE LA RAMÉE, MARIE LOUISE, see Ouida.

DEMORGAN, WILLIAM FRENCH (1839-1917), educated at University College, London, at first devoted his attention to art and in particular to the production of stained glass and glazed pottery, working for a time in association with his friend William Morris (q.v.). He was particularly successful with decorative tiles, but ill health brought his activities in this direction to an end, and in the latter part of his life he turned to the writing of fiction. 'Joseph Vance', his masterpiece, appeared in 1906, 'Alice-for-Short' in 1907, 'Somehow Good' in 1908, 'It never can happen again' in 1909, 'An Affair of Dishonour' in 1910, 'A Likely Story' in 1911, and 'When Ghost meets Ghost' in 1914. 'The Old Madhouse' (1919) and 'The Old Man's Youth' (1921), left unfinished by De Morgan, were skilfully completed by his widow. De Morgan also wrote two treatises on the craft of pottery (Society of Arts Journal, vol. xl, and a 'Report on the Feasibility of a Manufacture of Glazed Pottery in Egypt', 1894).

De Nugis Curialium, see Map. This is also the sub-title of the 'Policraticus' of John of Salisbury (q.v.).

De Profundis, 'Out of the depths', the first two words of the Latin version of Psalm cxxx. It is the title of the prose apologia of Oscar Wilde (q.v.).

DE QUINCEY, THOMAS (1785-1859), the son of a Manchester merchant, was educated at Manchester Grammar School, and after leading for some time a rambling life, went to Worcester College, Oxford, but took no degree. He here first began opium-eating. He was one of the early members of the staff of 'Blackwood's Magazine' (q.v.), for which he wrote the 'Confessions of an English Opium Eater' (q.v., 1822, enlarged ed. 1856), and 'On Murder as one of the Fine Arts' (1827). De Quincey produced a great deal of miscellaneous literary work, including the translation of a German novel ('Walladmor'), an original novel 'Klosterheim' (1832), 'The Logic of Political Economy' (1844), and a large number of essays on a great variety of subjects. Mention should be made of his 'Autobiographic Sketches' (1834-53), his articles on Wordsworth, Coleridge, Lamb, and others, his dream visions ('Suspiria de Profundis'), 'Savannah-La-Mar', 'Levans and Our Ladies of Sorrow', 'The English Mail-Coach', and his tales, 'The Spanish Military Nun' and 'The Revolt of the Tartars'. Of his critical work, his essay 'On the Knocking at the Gate in Macbeth' is best remembered. He wrote an ornate prose, sometimes marked by splendid imagery (as in passages of 'Our Ladies of Sorrow', the 'Confessions', and the 'Autobiography') and humour. His works have been more than once collected. An edition by D. Masson in fourteen volumes appeared in 1889-90.

DE QUINCEY

De Vere, ARTHUR, alias YOUNG PILIPSON, son of the earl of Leicester, a character in Scott's 'Anne of Geierstein' (q.v.).

DE VERE, AUBREY THOMAS (1814-1902), the son of Sir Aubrey de Vere (1788-1846, himself a poet), was educated at Trinity College, Dublin. He came early under the influence of Coleridge and Wordsworth. He was a friend of Tennyson, and a lifelong friend and advocate of Sir Henry Taylor, as poet and dramatist. Later friends included Robert Browning and R. H. Hutton. He published 'The Waldensians and other Poems' in 1842, and 'English Misrule and Irish Misdeeds', displaying Irish sympathies, in 1848. In 1851 he was received into the Roman Catholic Church. His voluminous works include 'The Legends of St. Patrick' (1872), 'Critical Essays' (1887-9), 'Recollections' (1897), and dramas. He is the subject of a 'Memoir' by Wilfrid Ward (1904).

Death and Dr. Hornbook, a satirical poem by Burns (q.v.). Dr. Hornbook was a fictitious village schoolmaster who eked out his salary by the sale of drugs.

Death of Blanche, The, see Boke of the Duchesse.

Death's Jest-Book, or The Fool's Tragedy, a play by Beddoes (q.v.), begun by him in 1825 and altered and touched up by him until the end of his life. It was published, after his death, in 1850. Three distinct manuscript versions of the play exist.

Wolfram and Isbrand have entered the service of Melveric, the duke of Munsterberg, in disguise, to take vengeance on him for the death of their father and the dishonour of their sister; Wolfram in the character of a knight, Isbrand of a court-fool. Wolfram, of a generous and forgiving temper, is sent to rescue Melveric from captivity among the Moors, and chivalrously carries out his mission. He finds Melveric in love with Sibylla, a fellow captive, whose affection has already been given to Wolfram. Contention arises, in which Wolfram's generosity is repaid first with a poisoned cup and then with death by Melveric's sword. Melveric returns to his country, where many troubles await him and where he is haunted by the ghost of Wolfram. There follows a strange medley of conspiracy, murder, and charnel-house scenes, with an element of the supernatural, which ends in the death of all the principal characters, the ghost of Wolfram leading off Melveric to the sepulchre as the curtain falls. The play contains some fine blank verse and beautiful lyrics, notably the dirge for Wolfram, beginning

If thou wilt ease thy heart
Of love and all its smart.

Debatable Land, a tract of country between the Esk and the Sark on the borders of Cumberland, claimed before the Union by both England and Scotland, and the scene of frequent conflicts.

Debreit, the peerage of the United Kingdom first published in 1802 by John Debreit, under the title 'Peerage of England, Scotland, and Ireland, containing an Account of all the Peers'. Now issued annually.

Decameron, The, a collection of tales by Boccaccio (q.v.), written between 1348 and 1358 and drawn from many sources. The setting of the tales is as follows. Florence being visited by the plague in 1348, seven young ladies and three young men leave the city for neighbouring villas, the beauty of which is described, and spend part of each of ten days (whence the name) in diverting one another with stories, each person telling one tale on each day, so that there are one hundred tales in all. The work had much influence on English literature, notably on Chaucer, and many of the tales were incorporated in Painter's 'Palace of Pleasure' (q.v.).

Declaration of Independence, THE, the document signed 4 July 1776, whereby the American Congress declared the United States of North America to be independent of the British Crown. Thomas Jefferson, John Adams, Roger Sherman, Robert R. Livingston, and Benjamin Franklin drew up the Declaration, which was signed by eleven States.

Declaration of Indulgence, THE, was issued by Charles II in 1672 suspending the penal laws in ecclesiastical matters in such a way as to give religious liberty to Roman Catholics and Dissenters. It was recalled in 1673 under pressure from the Commons. A fresh Declaration of Indulgence was issued by James II in 1687; and a third in April 1688. It was for refusing to compel their clergy to read the last that the seven bishops were brought to trial. Three successive Declarations of Indulgence were published in Scotland, 1662-4, to the advantage of moderate Presbyterianism.

Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, The, an historical work by Gibbon (q.v.), of which vol. i of the first (quarto) edition was published in 1776, vols. ii and iii in 1781, and the last three volumes in 1788.

This, the greatest of historical works in English literature, falls into three divisions, as defined by the author in the preface: from the age of Trajan and the Antonines to the subversion of the western Empire; from the reign of Justinian in the East to the establishment of the second or German Empire of the West, under Charlemagne; from the revival of the western Empire to the taking of Constantinople by the Turks. It thus covers a period of about thirteen centuries, and comprehends such vast subjects as the establishment of the Christian religion, the movements and settlements of the Teutonic tribes, the conquests of the Mohammedans, and the crusades. It traces in fact the connexion of the ancient world with the modern.

The history is marked by lucidity, completeness, and substantial accuracy, though in the latter respect it has been superseded by later works written in the light of fuller knowledge. (It is supplemented by notes in the editions of J. B. Bury, 1896-1900, 1909-13.) The principal criticism to which it is open is a certain lack of proportion, and a want of sympathy with man in his nobler impulses. History was to Gibbon 'little more than the crimes, follies, and misfortunes of mankind'.

Decretals, epistles of the popes on points of doctrine or ecclesiastical law. The first collection of decretals was that of Gregory IX in five books (1234), followed by a sixth book in 1298, by the CLEMENTINES of Clement V in 1313, and by the EXTRAVAGANTS of John XXII and his successors. The decretals constitute the 'new' canon law as distinguished from the 'old' canon law contained in Gratian's 'Decree' of 1150.

THE FALSE OR ISIDORIAN DECRETALS are a collection of decretals, made in the 9th cent., containing certain spurious documents supporting the papal claim to temporal power. The author takes the name of Isidore, archbishop of Seville (d. 636). The forged documents contain about a hundred letters purporting to be from early popes, and include the famous 'Donation of Constantine' (q.v.). They were finally shown to be spurious by Laurentius Valia, the great humanist, in the 15th cent.

Dedlock, SIR LEICESTER, LADY, and VOLUMINA, characters in Dickens's 'Bleak House' (q.v.).

Dee, MILLER OF THE, see Miller of the Dee.

DEE, DR. JOHN (1527-1608), mathematician and astrologer, was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, and became a fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, where the stage effects he introduced into a performance of the 'Peace' of Aristophanes procured him his lifelong reputation of being a magician; this was confirmed by his erudition and practice of crystallo-mancy and astrology. He wrote numerous learned works, including 'De Trigonon' (1565), 'Navigationis ad Cathayam . . . delineatio Hydrographica' (1580), and a 'Treatise on the Rosie Crucian Secrets'.

Deerbrook, a novel by Harriet Martineau (q.v.), 1839.

Deerslayer, The, a novel by James Fenimore Cooper (q.v.).

Defarge, M. and MME, characters in Dickens's 'A Tale of Two Cities' (q.v.).

Defence of All Learning, see Musophilus.

Defence of Poesie, see Apologia for Poetry.

Defence of Poetry, see Shelley (P. B.).

Defender of the Faith, DEFENSOR FIDEI, a title conferred on Henry VIII by Leo X in 1521, in recognition of Henry's 'Defence of the Seven Sacraments'. The Bull is in Rymer's 'Foedera', vi, and in an Appendix to Roscoe's 'Leo X'.

Deffand, MME DU, MARIE DE VICHY-CHAMROND (1697-1780), a French literary hostess, whose salon was frequented by Montesquieu, D'Alembert, and others, and who became blind in later life. Horace Walpole was her close friend, and a large number of her letters to him survive (edited by Mrs. Paget Toynbee, 1912). Walpole's letters to her were destroyed by his request.

DEFOE, DANIEL (1660?-1731), born in London, the son of James Foe, a butcher. He changed his name to Defoe c. 1703. He married Mary Tuffley in January 1683/4, being at that time a hosiery merchant in Cornhill, and having apparently travelled in Spain, Italy, Germany, and France. He took part in Monmouth's rebellion, and joined William III's army in 1688. In 1701 he published 'The True-born Englishman', a satirical poem combating the popular prejudice against a king of foreign birth. In 1702 appeared 'The Shortest Way with the Dissenters', a notorious pamphlet in which Defoe, himself a dissenter, ironically demanded the total suppression of dissent, at any cost, to show the absurdity of ecclesiastical intolerance. For this he was fined, imprisoned (May–November, 1703), and pilloried. Although he was regarded as a hero by the people, the sense of his unjust treatment appears to have affected his character. Under the influence of this and of pecuniary distress—he attributed his ruin to his imprisonment—he became shifty and mercenary in public affairs. He wrote his 'Hymn to the Pillory', a mock-Pindaric ode, while imprisoned, and started his newspaper 'The Review' (q.v.) in 1704. In the same year appeared his pamphlet 'Giving Alms no Charity', and in 1706 his 'True Relation of the Apparition of one Mrs. Veal', a vivid piece of reporting of a current ghost story. During the following years he was employed as a secret agent of Harley and Godolphin, largely in Scotland, in support of the union, but his fidelity to his employers is questioned. Certain ironical anti-Jacobite pamphlets in 1712–13 led to his prosecution by the Whigs for treasonable publications and to a brief imprisonment. He now started a new trade journal, 'Mercator', in place of 'The Review'. In 1715 he was convicted of libelling Lord Annesley, but escaped punishment by the favour of Lord Townshend, the Whig secretary of state, to whom he sold his services as a secret agent and journalist.

He published the first volume of his best-known work 'Robinson Crusoe' (q.v.) in 1719, the 'Farther Adventures' of his hero following a few months later. The next five years saw the appearance of his most important works of fiction, as follows: 'Life and Adventures of Mr. Duncan Campbell, the deaf and dumb conjurer, and 'Captain Singleton' (q.v.), in 1720; 'Moll Flanders' (q.v.), 'A Journal of the Plague Year' (q.v.), 'The History of Peter the Great', and 'Colonel Jack' (q.v.) in 1722; 'Roxana' (q.v.), the 'Memoirs of a Cavalier' (q.v., not quite certainly by Defoe), his tracts on Jack Sheppard (q.v.), and 'A New Voyage round the World', in 1724; 'The Four Voyages of Capt. George Roberts' in 1726. 'The Memoirs of Captain George Carleton' (q.v.), which appeared in 1728, were probably largely by his hand. His 'Tour through the Whole Island of Great Britain', a delightful guide-book, in three volumes, appeared in 1724–7. During the last six years of his life (1725–31) his principal works were 'The Complete English Tradesman' (1726), 'Augusta Triumphans, or the Way to make London the Most Flourishing City in the Universe' (1728), 'A Plan of the English Commerce' (1728), and 'The Complete English Gentleman', not published until 1890. In addition to the works mentioned above, Defoe produced a vast number of pamphlets on all sorts of subjects; in all he published over 250 works. He died in his lodgings in Ropemaker's Alley, Moorfields, and was buried in what is now Bunhill Fields. Defoe, apart from the political shiftiness above alluded to, was not only an extraordinarily prolific and versatile, but a liberal, humane, and moral writer.

Deformed Transformed, The, an unfinished drama by Lord Byron (q.v.), written in 1822.

Arnold is a hideous hunchback and miserable in consequence of his deformity. A stranger, the Devil in disguise, offers to change his shape, and calls up the forms of Caesar, Alcibiades, and others to tempt him. Arnold chooses the form of Achilles, and this the stranger confers upon him, assuming in exchange the hunchback shape of Arnold, whom he thereafter follows as an attendant. Part II presents the sack of Rome in 1527, in the course of which Arnold distinguishes himself. At this point the fragment ends.

Degare or Degore, Sir, a metrical romance of some 900 lines, of the early 14th cent. The daughter of a king of England, who has been ravished by a knight, secretly bears a son. She abandons him in the forest with a purse of money, a letter of directions, and a pair of gloves designed to indicate the lady he is to marry. The poem relates the prowess of the son in numerous adventures encountered in his search for his father. The name is supposed to be a corruption of L'égaré, and is the origin of 'Diggory'.

Degas (final s sounded), EDGAR (1834–1917), French painter, whose perfect draughtsmanship and intense interest in the world about him are displayed in scenes of the ballet and the race-course and in mordant studies of commonplace figures of humble life.

Deiánira, a daughter of Oenēus, king of Aetolia. Her beauty gained her many admirers and her father promised to give her to him who proved the strongest. Hercules obtained the prize and married Deianira. As they travelled together, they were stopped by the swollen stream of the Evenus, and the centaur Nessus offered to carry her safely to the opposite shore. Hercules consented, but no sooner had Nessus reached the opposite bank than he offered violence to Deianira. Hercules, seeing this, shot a poisoned arrow and mortally wounded Nessus. To avenge himself the latter gave Deianira his tunic, stained with blood infected by the poisoned arrow, telling her that it had the power to reclaim a husband from unlawful loves. When Hercules was unfaithful to her, Deianira sent him the centaur's garment, which caused his death.

Deldāmia, a daughter of Lycomēdēs, at whose court Achilles (q.v.) spent some time in concealment. She bore to Achilles a son, Neoptolemus.

Dell, Address to the, a poem by Burns (q.v.).

Delphobus, a son of Priam of Troy, who married Helen (q.v.) after the death of his brother Paris. He was betrayed by her and slain by Menelaus. He figures in Shakespeare's Troilus and Cressida (q.v.).

Deirdre, the heroine of the tale of 'The Sons of Usnach' (pron. 'Usna'), one of the 'Three Sorrowful Stories of Erin'. She was the daughter of Fedlimid, harper to King Conchobar of Ulster, and Cathbad the Druid prophesied that her beauty would bring banishment and death to heroes. Conchobar destined her for his wife and had her brought up in solitude. But she accidentally saw and fell in love with Naoise (pron. 'Naisi'), the son of Usnach, who with his brothers carried her off to Scotland. They were lured back by Conchobar and treacherously slain, and Deirdre took her own life. (See Lady Gregory, 'Cuchulain of Muirhemne', and the dramas on Deirdre by G. W. Russell, Synge, and Yeats.)

Deism, or 'natural religion', the belief in a Supreme Being as the source of finite existence, with rejection of revelation and the supernatural doctrines of Christianity.

The DEISTS, who came into prominence at the end of the 17th and during the 18th cents., were a group of writers holding the above belief, of whom the chief were Charles Blount (1654-93), John Toland (1670-1722), Matthew Tindal (1657-1733), Anthony Collins (1676-1729), Thomas Chubb (1679-1747), and the third earl of Shaftesbury (q.v.). Their views derived from those of Lord Herbert of Cherbury (q.v.).

DEKKER, THOMAS (1570?-1632), was born, and mainly lived, in London, the manners of which his writings vividly illustrate. He suffered from poverty and was long in prison for debt, but appears to have been a man of happy and lovable temperament. He was engaged about 1598 by Philip Henslowe (q.v.) to write plays (most of which are now lost) in collaboration with Drayton, Ben Jonson, and many others. He published 'The Shoemaker's Holiday' (q.v.) and 'Old Fortunatus' (q.v.), comedies, in 1600. Having been ridiculed, jointly with Marston, by Ben Jonson in the 'Poetaster', he retorted in 'Satiromastix' (q.v.), a play produced in 1602. His other principal plays are 'The Honest Whore' (q.v.), of which Pt. I appeared in 1604, and Pt. II in 1630; 'Patient Grisail' (q.v.), written in collaboration with Chettle and Haughton, 1603; the 'Witch of Edmonton' (q.v.), written in collaboration with Ford and Rowley, 1623. He also collaborated with Middleton in the 'Roaring Girl' (q.v.), 1611, and Massinger in the 'Virgin Martyr' (q.v.), 1622. He published a tragi-comedy 'Match Me in London', 1631. He wrote a number of pamphlets, as follows: 'The Wonderful Year 1603', containing a poignant description of London during the plague of that year; 'The Seuen deadly Sinnes of London', and 'Newes from Hell', an imitation of Nash, 1606; 'The Belman of London', a social satire, 1608. He produced 'The Guls Hornebooke' (q.v.), 1609, and 'Fowre Birds of Noahs Arke', a prose devotional work, 1609. 'The Batchelors Banquet', a tract founded on 'Les Quinze Joyes de Mariage', has been wrongly attributed to him. His dramatic works were collected by R. H. Shepherd in 1873, and his miscellaneous works by Dr. Grosart in 'The Huth Library'. His writings are marked by a sunny simplicity and sympathy for the poor and oppressed (including animals tortured for man's amusement).

DELLA ROBBIA

DELANE, JOHN THADDEUS (1817-79), educated at King's College, London, and Magdalen Hall, Oxford, the famous editor of 'The Times' (q.v.), 1841-77.

DELANY, MRS. MARY (1700-88), of the Granville family, the wife (after the death of her first husband) of Dr. Patrick Delany (the friend of Swift), left a voluminous correspondence ('Autobiography and Correspondence', 1861-2; see also 'Mrs. Delany at Court', R. Brimley Johnson, 1925), throwing much light on the mode of life among people of quality in the 18th cent. Mrs. Delany introduced Fanny Burney at court.

Delectable Mountains, THE, in Bunyan's 'Pilgrim's Progress' (q.v.), 'Emmanuel's Land', within sight of the Celestial City.

Delenda est Carthago, see Cato the Censor.

Della, a name of Artemis or Diana, who was said to have been born in the island of Delos.

Della, a collection of sonnets by S. Daniel (q.v.), published in 1592.

Delilah (DALILA in Milton), in Judges xvi, a woman of the valley of Sorek, loved by Samson; she persuaded him to tell her the secret of his strength and (by cutting off his hair) betrayed him to the Philistines.

Della Crusca, ACCADEMIA, literally academy of the bran or chaff, the name of an academy established at Florence in 1582, mainly with the object of sifting and purifying the Italian language; whence its name, and its emblem, a sieve. The first edition of its dictionary appeared in 1612.

The name Della Cruscan is also applied to a school of English poetry, at once silly and pretentious, started towards the end of the 18th cent. It was taken from the Florentine Academy, to which Robert Merry (1735-98), one of the members of the school, in fact belonged. The Della Cruscan poets were attacked by W. Gifford (q.v.) in his 'Baviad' and 'Maeviad'.

Della Robbia, LUCA (1400-82), a Florentine sculptor, famous for his work in terra-cotta, for the bas-reliefs on Giotto's Campanile, the bronze doors of the sacristy of the Duomo, and other sculptures in Florence. The secret of his terra-cotta process was inherited by his nephew Andrea, and the four sons of the latter; and the work of the various members of the family is not easy to distinguish. Its chief characteristic is the use of white figures against a blue or other coloured background.

DELLA ROBBIA

Delmour, COLONEL, and his brother MR. DELMOUR, characters in Miss Ferrier's 'The Inheritance' (q.v.).

DELONEY, THOMAS (1543?-1600?), ballad-writer and pamphleteer, was by trade a silk-weaver. He wrote ballads and broadsides (three on the Spanish Armada, 1588). But his three chief works, written between 1596 and 1600, are prose narratives relating respectively to the clothier's craft ('Thomas of Reading'), the weaver's craft ('Jack of Newbury'), and the shoemaker's craft ('The Gentle Craft'). This last includes the story of 'Simon Eyre', the shoemaker's apprentice who became lord mayor and founder of Leadenhall (a story adapted by Dekker in his 'Shoemaker's Holiday', q.v.); and that of 'Richard Casteler' in which figures Long Meg or Meg of Westminster (q.v.). In these works the author, with considerable humour, portrays the life of the middle classes of Elizabethan times, and gives vivid pictures of London scenes.

Deloralne, WILLIAM OF, a character in Scott's 'Lay of the Last Minstrel' (q.v.).

Delos, an island in the Aegean, one of the Cyclades, supposed to have been raised from the sea, as a floating island, by Poseidon, and anchored to the bottom of the sea by Zeus, to be a resting-place for Latona (q.v.). It contained temples of Apollo and Latona. The whole island was declared sacred by the Greeks, and was made the treasury of the Greek confederacy against the Persians. It was the transfer of this treasury to Athens that provoked the jealousy of other Greek states, and thus contributed to bring about the Peloponnesian War.

Delphi, situated in Phocis, in a deep rocky cleft on the south-west slopes of Mt. Parnassus, was the seat of a temple to Apollo and of an oracle of world-wide fame. The oracles were delivered by a priestess of Apollo called the PYTHIA, who was supposed to be inspired by the sulphurous vapours issuing from a cavity in the ground within the temple. It was customary for those who consulted the oracle to give large presents to the god; whence were derived the immense treasures of the temple. The oracle was in existence in the Mycenaean age and did not finally disappear until the 4th cent. A.D. But its period of greatest influence was in the 8th to 5th cents. B.C. It was looted by Sulla and sank into decay during the 1st cent. A.D. There was a revival under Hadrian and the final flicker came under Julian (A.D. 360).

Delville, MORTIMER, the hero of Miss Burney's 'Cecilia' (q.v.).

Dēmēter, known as CERES to the Romans, was the Greek goddess of the corn-bearing earth and of agriculture. Mythology made her the daughter of Cronos and sister of Zeus, but she does not figure among Homer's Olympian deities. Persephone (Proserpine, q.v.) was her daughter. She instructed Triptolemus, the son of Cēlūs, king of Attica, in the arts of agriculture, and lent him her chariot, wherein he travelled all over the world bringing corn to the inhabitants. After the carrying off of Proserpine by Pluto (see under Proserpine), she endeavoured in vain to recover her daughter, and so great was her grief that Jupiter granted Proserpine to spend part of the year with her mother and the remainder with Pluto. This myth, symbolical of the sowing of the seed (the sojourn of Proserpine with Pluto in the nether regions) and growing of the corn (her return to the upper world), and perhaps also of the death of man and his future life, was celebrated in the great Eleusinian mysteries.

The myth has been treated by Lord Tennyson in his 'Demeter and Persephone', and by Robert Bridges in his mask 'Demeter' (1905).

Demetrius, PSEUDO-, an impostor who usurped the Russian throne in 1605-6, and was assassinated in Moscow in the latter year. He was a monk, Otrefief by name, who pretended to be Demetrius, the son of the Tsar Ivan whom Boris the usurper had put to death.

Demetrius, the silversmith of Ephesus, who stirred up his fellow craftsmen against Paul; see Acts xix. 24 et seq.

Demetrius, a character in Shakespeare's 'Midsummer Night's Dream' (q.v.); also in Jonson's 'The Poetaster' (q.v.), where Demetrius represents the poet Marston; also in Fletcher's 'The Humorous Lieutenant' (q.v.).

Demurge, in the Platonic philosophy, the maker or creator of the world; in certain later systems, as the Gnostic, a being subordinate to the Supreme Being, and sometimes conceived as the author of evil.

Demōcritus, a celebrated Greek philosopher, born at Abdera about 460 B.C. He wrote on the natural sciences, mathematics, morals, and music. He advanced (with Leucippus) the theory that the world was formed by the concourse of atoms, the theory subsequently expounded by Lucretius, and confirmed and developed by recent scientific discovery. Juvenal speaks of him as ever laughing at the follies of mankind, and he is sometimes known as the 'laughing philosopher' in opposition to the melancholy Heraclitus (q.v.).

DEMOCRITUS JUNIOR, pseudonym of ROBERT BURTON (q.v.).

Demogorgon, the name of a mysterious deity, first mentioned, so far as is known, by the scholiast (Lactantius?) on Statius's 'Thebais'; also mentioned by the scholiast on Lucan's 'Pharsalia'; perhaps a mistake for δημιουργός, the Creator. Demogorgon is described in the 'Genealogia Deorum' of Boccaccio as the primeval god of ancient mythology, and this appears to be the sense of the word in modern literature (Spenser, Milton, Shelley, &c.). [OED.] In Shelley's 'Prometheus Unbound' (q.v.) Demogorgon is an eternal principle or power which ousts the gods of a false theology. The countess of Saldar's 'Demogorgon' (in Meredith's 'Evan Harrington', q.v.) is tailordom.

Demon-lover, THE, see Lenora.

Demôphōon or De'môphon, (1) son of Celëus, king of Eleusis, and brother of (or identical with) Triptolemus (q.v.). Celëus hospitably received Demeter (q.v.) when she was wandering about the world in search of her daughter, and she, to mark her gratitude, tried to make Demophoon immortal by placing him in the flames, in order to purge away his mortal elements. But his mother, Metanira, was terrified and intervened; (2) son of Theseus (q.v.) and Phaedra, and lover of Phyllis, daughter of Sithon, king of Thrace. He left her to go for a time to Athens but prolonged his absence, and Phyllis, thinking herself abandoned, took her own life and was changed into a tree.

DEMOSTHENES (c. 383-322 B.C.), the Athenian orator, born in the Attic deme of Paeania. His fame, won by his eloquence and personality in spite of lack of wealth and position, rests principally on the orations delivered to rouse his countrymen to the danger of the subjugation of Greece by Philip of Macedon (hence the word 'philippic'). After the defeat of the confederate Greeks, Antipater, one of the successors of Alexander, demanded the surrender of Demosthenes, who, pursued by the Macedonian emissaries, took poison and died.

DENHAM, SIR JAMES STEUART, see Steuart.

Denham, JENNY, a character in Meredith's 'Beauchamp's Career' (q.v.).

DENHAM, SIR JOHN (1615-69), was born in Dublin and educated at Trinity College, Oxford. He took part in public affairs on the king's side and was forced to surrender Farnham Castle, of which he was governor, to Sir William Waller in 1642. His chief poetical work is the topographical poem 'Cooper's Hill' (1642), combining description of scenery with reflections, moral, historical, and political, and containing the well-known quatrain on the River Thames, which begins 'O could I flow like thee'. Denham published 'The Sophy', an historical tragedy of the Turkish court, in 1641; also a paraphrase of part of the 'Aeneid', and occasional verses and satires.

Denis, St., first bishop of Paris and patron saint of France, decapitated in 280 with two companions on the hill of Montmartre. Legend (which also identifies Denis with Dionysius the Areopagite of Acts xvii) relates that they carried their heads in their hands to the spot where subsequently the abbey of Saint-Denis, near Paris, was built.

Denis Duval, an unfinished novel by Thackeray (q.v.), published in the 'Cornhill Magazine' in 1864. This was Thackeray's last work of fiction.

The principal scene of the fragment is Rye in the second half of the 18th cent., with its colony of French refugees, and its widespread smuggling activities. Here Denis Duval, a descendant of French Protestant pastors, lives with his grandfather, a barber and smuggler, and his Alsatian mother. He tells the story of his life, how in early youth he fell in love with Agnes, the daughter of Mme de Saverne, a Frenchwoman who had fled to England from the tyranny of her half-crazy husband, under the evil influence of the Chevalier de la Motte, a sinister person who subsequently kills her husband. De la Motte settles in Rye and joins in the smuggling business, and (with Lütterloh, a German associate) in more treasonable practices, which Denis Duval is the means of bringing to light. Denis incurs the fierce enmity of the smuggling confederacy of Rye, is vigorously persecuted, escapes great dangers, and takes to the sea. And here the fragment breaks off. But we know from Thackeray's notes that it was intended that Denis should go through a long course of adventures in the naval service, from the sea-fight with Captain Paul Jones to the defeat of Admiral Grasse's squadron; that De la Motte should endeavour forcibly to marry Agnes to Lütterloh; that De la Motte was hanged, and that Lütterloh went down on the 'Royal George', on board of which he had gone to receive payment for his work as a spy.

Dennis, in Dickens's 'Barnaby Rudge' (q.v.), the hangman and one of the leaders of the No-Popery riots.

DENNIS, JOHN (1657-1734), educated at Harrow and Caius College, Cambridge, was author of 'Rinaldo and Armida' (1699) and other tragedies, one of which, 'Appius and Virginia' (1709), was satirized for its bombast by Pope ('Essay on Criticism', iii. 585-8). To this Dennis replied in his 'Reflections, Critical and Satirical' (1711). Pope retorted in his 'Narrative of Dr. Robert Norris, concerning the strange and deplorable Frenzy of Mr.

DENNIS

J. Denn—an officer in the Custom-House' (1713), an employment held by Dennis. He is best known for his critical works, which include 'The Advancement and Reformation of Modern Poetry' (1701), 'The Grounds of Criticism in Poetry' (1704), 'An Essay on the Genius and Writings of Shakespeare' (1712).

Dennison, JENNY, in Scott's 'Old Mortality' (q.v.), the attendant on Edith Bellenden.

Denouement, the unravelling of the plot, the final solution, in a drama or novel; Aristotle's λύσις.

Deodand, a thing forfeited to God; specifically in English law a personal chattel which, having been the immediate occasion of the death of a human being, was forfeited to God as an expiatory offering, i.e. forfeited to the Crown to be applied to pious uses. Deodands were abolished by statute in 1846.

Deor, Complaint of, an OE. poem of 42 verses, divided into stanzas. Its date is uncertain but it may be classed chronologically with 'Beowulf' (q.v.). It is included in the 'Exeter Book' (q.v.). Deor is a minstrel who has fallen out of favour and been supplanted by another minstrel, Heorrenda, and consoles himself by considering the misfortunes of others, Wayland the Smith, Theodoric, Hermanric, &c. Each stanza ends with the refrain 'That passed; this also may'.

'Deputy', in Dickens's 'Edwin Drood' (q.v.), the nearest thing to a name acknowledged by the imp who attends on Durdles.

Derby, COUNTESS OF, wife of the seventh earl, who as 'queen' of the Isle of Man figures in Scott's 'Peveril of the Peak' (q.v.).

Derby, THE, the most noted annual horse-race in England, founded in 1780 by the 12th earl of Derby, for three-year-olds, run at Epsom usually on the Wednesday before or the second Wednesday after Whit-Sunday. Hence DERBY DAY, the day on which the race is run.

A DERBY HAT is a stiff felt hat with rounded crown and narrow brim (U.S.A.).

Derceto, the fish-goddess of Ascalon in Syria, the legendary mother of Semiramis (q.v.).

Derrick, a noted hangman at Tyburn, c. 1600, the origin of the word 'derrick', a crane.

Derriman, Festus, the braggart yeoman in Hardy's 'The Trumpet-Major' (q.v.).

Dervish, a Mohammedan friar, who has taken vows of poverty. Some sects of Der-vishes are known by their fantastic practices of dancing or whirling, and howling.

Deaborough, Lucy, a character in Meredith's 'The Ordeal of Richard Feverel' (q.v.).

DESCARTES, RENÉ (1596-1650), a French mathematician, physicist, and philosopher, the founder of the school of philosophy known as CARTESIAN. He lived a great part of his life in Holland, and was invited by Queen Christina to Sweden, where he died. The starting-point of his philosophy, expounded in his chief work 'Le Discours de la Méthode' (1637), was the famous phrase cogito, ergo sum, 'I think, therefore I am', and the distinction between spirit and matter. Rejecting philosophical authority and tradition, he relied exclusively on reason, and adopted a quasi-mechanical conception of the universe, which he reduced to space, matter, and motion, operating under mathematical laws. He did not, however, explain the interaction of spirit and matter, while some of his principal physical theories were upset by Newton's discoveries. But his influence on the development of philosophy and science was immense. It extended to literature, where the impulse he gave to the rule of reason is manifested in the writers of the 17th cent. The chief ethical work of Descartes was his 'Traité des Passions' (1649).

DESCHAMPS, EUSTACHE, surnamed MOREL (b. c. 1346), French poet, one of the creators of the ballade. He addressed a complimentary poem to Chaucer, whom he styled 'great translator'.

Deademona, the heroine of Shakespeare's 'Othello' (q.v.).

Deseret State: Utah, see United States.

Deserted Village, The, a poem by Goldsmith (q.v.), published in 1770, of which the theme is the superiority of agriculture to trade in the national economy. The poet revisits Auburn, a village hallowed by early associations, and marks its depopulation and the inroads of monopolizing riches, which have driven the peasants to emigration. He laments a state of society where 'wealth accumulates and men decay'. The poem contains charming descriptions of village life and character. Boswell attributes the last four lines to Johnson. Goldsmith's pictures of a happy rural community provoked a protest in Crabbe's 'The Village'.

Despair, GIANT, in Bunyan's 'Pilgrim's Progress' (q.v.), imprisons Christian and Hopeful in Doubting Castle.

Desperate Remedies, a novel by Hardy (q.v.), published in 1871.

This was the first of Hardy's published novels, and belongs in his classification to the group of 'novels of ingenuity', with the best claim to that description of the three novels of that group. It is a tale of 'mystery, entanglement, surprise, and moral obliquity', in which Cythera Graye, beloved by and loving a young architect, Edward Springrove, is forced by poverty to accept a post as lady's maid to the eccentric Miss Aldclyffe, the woman whom her father had loved but had been unable to marry. Miss Aldclyffe's machinations, the discovery that Edward is already engaged to a woman whom he does not love, and the urgent need of supporting a sick brother, drive Cythera to accept the hand of Aeneas Mauston, Miss Aldclyffe's illegitimate son, a passionate villain, whose first wife is believed to have perished in a fire. No sooner is the wedding ceremony performed than Cytherea discovers that Edward is free from his entanglement and that there is reason to think that Mauston's first wife is still alive, and she escapes from his clutches. Ingenious detective work brings to light the fact that Mauston has murdered his first wife, in order to gain Cytherea. He hangs himself in his cell, and the lovers are finally united.

DESPERATE REMEDIES

Destiny, a novel by Miss Ferrier (q.v.), published in 1831.

The story deals with the fortunes of the various members of the Malcolm family: Glenroy, a typical Highland chief, married, after the death of his first wife, to the London-bred Lady Elizabeth Waldegrave, who finds conditions of life in her husband's home so intolerable that she separates from him; Glenroy's poor but worthy cousin Captain Malcolm and his son Ronald; another cousin, the misanthrope Inch-Orran, who disappoints Glenroy by leaving his estate to Ronald and his father; Glenroy's nephew Reginald, who plights his troth to Edith, the chief's daughter by his first wife, and jilts her to marry her half-sister; Ronald, who voluntarily disappears after a shipwreck to leave his father in possession of the Inch-Orran property, and returns after years to marry the jilted Edith. The story of their vicissitudes, somewhat artificial, is relieved by one or two good characters, notably that of the boorish minister, the Rev. Duncan M'Dow.

Deucalion, a son of Prometheus (q.v.), and ruler of part of Thessaly. Jupiter, angered by the impiety of mankind, covered the earth with a deluge. Deucalion and his wife Pyrrha saved their lives by taking refuge on the top of Parnassus, or, according to some, by building a ship as advised by Prometheus, in which they were carried to the top of that mountain. After the flood had subsided, Deucalion and Pyrrha consulted the oracle of Themis on the question how to repair the loss of mankind and were told to throw stones behind them. The stones thrown by Deucalion became men, and those thrown by Pyrrha women.

Deuceace, THE HON. ALGERNON PERCY, youngest son of the earl of Crabs, a character in Thackeray's "The Memoirs of Mr. C. J. Yellowplush" (q.v.).

Deuceace is an unscrupulous gambler and swindler, who, after ruining the simpleton Dawkins, overreaches himself in the pursuit of the large fortune left by Sir George Griffin to his pretty young widow and his crook-backed daughter by an earlier marriage, on conditions which are unknown. Uncertain which to marry, Deuceace determines to have two strings to his bow. His design is discovered by the widow and her bitter vindictiveness aroused. She lures him first into a duel, in which he loses a hand, and then into a marriage with the humpback, to discover too late that the latter is penniless, and that he has been outwitted by his own father—a cleverer scoundrel—who has married the widow and secured the fortune.

Deus ex machina, 'God from the machine', an unexpected event or intervention in a play or novel, which resolves a difficult situation. When a god was introduced in the ancient Greek drama, he was brought on to the stage by some mechanical device (μηχανή).

Deuteronomy (from Greek δεύτερος second, and νόμος law), the title of the fifth book of the Pentateuch, originating in a mistranslation of the Hebrew words in Deut. xvii. 18, which mean 'a copy or duplicate of this law'. The book contains a repetition, with comments, of the Decalogue and most of the laws contained in Exodus xxi-xxiii and xxiv. Some authorities regard it as the 'book of the law' discovered by Hilkiah, the high priest, in the house of the Lord, during the reign of Josiah (2 Kings xxii. 8).

Deva, one of the good spirits of Hindu mythology.

Deva, the river Dee in Cheshire.

Where Deva spreads her wizard stream.
(Milton, 'Lycidas'.)

Devī, in Hindu mythology, 'the goddess', the wife of Siva (q.v.).

Devil, THE (from the Greek δαιμόλος, 'distorter, traducer', the word used by the Septuagint to translate the Hebrew word 'Satan'), in Jewish and Christian theology, the name of the supreme spirit of evil, subordinate to the Creator, but possessing superhuman powers of access to, and influence over, men. [OED.] The conception of the Devil may be traced to the idea widely diffused among men, of the dual principles of good and evil in the scheme of things, an idea expressed, for instance, in the Ormazd and Ahriman of the Persians. In the Jewish religion this conception is personified at first in the serpent, a malignant and treacherous creature. The word 'devil' is also applied to malignant beings of supernatural powers, of whom Satan is the prince, clothed, in mediæval conception, in grotesque and hideous forms, with horns, tails, and cloven hoofs, derived from figures of Greek and Roman mythology (Pan, the satyr); thence it is transferred to malignantly wicked or cruel men. It is finally applied colloquially to a junior legal counsel who does professional work for his leader, a literary hack, and generally one who does work for which another receives credit or remuneration or both. A Printer's devil is the errand-boy in a printer's office; but Johnson (in Boswell, 20 April 1781) speaks of a man having married a printer's devil.

DEVIL IS AN ASS

Devil is an Ass, The, a comedy by Jonson (q.v.), first acted in 1616, ridiculing the 'projectors' or monopolists, and exposing the pretended demoniacs and witch-finders, of the day. Fitzdottrel, a 'gull' or simpleton, is cheated out of his estate by Meercraft, a 'projector', who parades various ridiculous schemes for making money, and deludes him with the promise that he will make him duke of Drownland through a project for land reclamation. When Fitzdottrel finds he has made over his estate to the wrong person, he consents to pretend to be bewitched:

It is the easiest thing, Sir, to be done,
As plain as fizzling: roll but with your eyes
And foam at the mouth. A little castle-soap will do it, and deceives a justice by the simple fraud. Pug, 'a less devil' who has been allowed by Satan to try his hand at iniquity on earth for one day, finds himself completely outwitted by human knaves, outdone in wickedness, and finally sent to Newgate.

Devil upon Two Sticks in England, The, a continuation by W. Combe (q.v.), published in 1790, of Le Sage's 'Diable Boiteux' (q.v.). Foote (q.v.) also wrote a farce called 'The Devil upon Two Sticks', produced in 1768, satirizing the College of Physicians and quack doctors.

Devil's Advocate, see Advocatus Diaboli.

Devil's Island, THE, the Île du Diable, one of the three small Îles du Salut off the coast of French Guiana, part of the French penal settlement in that colony.

Devil's Thoughts, The, a humorous satirical poem by S. T. Coleridge and Southey (qq.v.) describing the Devil going a-walking and enjoying the sight of the vices of men as they follow their several avocations. The poem was imitated by Byron in his 'Devil's Drive', and by Shelley in his 'Devil's Walk'. Some lines in it have become familiar, such as

And the Devil did grin, for his darling sin
Is pride that spies humility.

Devorguilla, (1) the wife of John de Baliol, founder of Balliol College, Oxford. After his death she increased the endowment of the college. In fact, the college was founded out of Devorguilla's property. She was a great heiress in Galloway. John de Baliol had little land of his own. (2) or Dearbhorgail, wife of O'Ruark, prince of Meath. Dermot MacMurchad, king of Leinster, during the absence of O'Ruark on a pilgrimage, eloped with her to his capital, Ferns. Roderick of Connaught, high king of Ireland, came to O'Ruark's assistance. Dermot fled to England and received help from Henry II. This was the occasion of the Anglo-Norman invasion of Ireland in 1170. The story is told by Giraldus Cambrensis ('History of the Conquest of Ireland', ch. i et seq.).

DEWEY, JOHN (1859-), American philosopher, one of the leaders of the Pragmatist school, born at Burlington, Vermont. His chief works are: 'Critical Theory of Ethics' (1891), 'Studies in Logical Theory' (1903), 'Democracy and Education' (1916), 'Human Nature and Conduct' (1922).

Dewey, MELVIL (1851-1931), a well-known American librarian, one of the founders of the American Library Association and of the School of Library Economy. He is the originator of the 'Decimal system of classification for library cataloguing'. He advocated a phonetic system of spelling, which is adopted in his 'Decimal System of Classification'.

Dewy, DICK, the hero of Hardy's 'Under the Greenwood Tree' (q.v.).

Dhu'lkarnain, the name under which Alexander the Great figures in the Koran (c. xviii), and builds the wall against the irruptions of Gog and Magog (q.v.). The word means 'two-horned' (see Dulcarnon), and various reasons are given for the name being applied to Alexander, such as that he was king of the East and of the West.

Diable Boiteux, Le ('The Lame Devil'), a romance by Le Sage (q.v.), published in 1707.

Asmodeus (q.v.), a demon released by Don Cleofas Zambullo from a bottle in which he has been imprisoned by a magician, diverts his benefactor by lifting the roofs off houses and showing him what is passing within, thus providing a series of satirical pictures of Parisian society. He assists Don Cleofas in a number of adventures and finally effects his union with his beloved Serafina. See Devil upon Two Sticks.

Diacritic, from diakrēnō to separate, a sign or mark above or under a letter used to distinguish its various sounds or values, e.g. ð, é, ç, â.

Diadochos, meaning 'successor' (plural, Diadochi), the name given to the Macedonian generals among whom the empire of Alexander the Great was divided after his death.

Diaeresis, from diapléw to divide, (1) the separation of a diphthong into two separate vowels; (2) the sign ['] placed over the second of two vowels, which otherwise make a diphthong or single sound, to indicate that they are to be pronounced separately.

Diafoirus, a doctor in the 'Malade Imaginaire' of Molière (q.v.).

Dial, The, the literary organ of the American Transcendental movement (see Transcendental Club), which appeared for a few years from 1840, and of which R. W. Emerson (q.v.) was for a time editor. It contained contributions from Thoreau (q.v.).

Diall of Princes, the title of the translation by Sir T. North (q.v.) of Guevara's 'El Relox de Principes', published in 1577, which provided much of the material for Lyly's 'Euphues' (q.v.).

DIALOGUES OF THE DEAD

Dialogues of the Dead, Four, by Prior (q.v.), imaginary conversations on the model set by Lucian and perhaps directly suggested by Fénelon's 'Dialogues des morts'. The first is between 'Charles the Emperor and Clenard the Grammarian' on the relative character of greatness; the second is between 'Mr. John Lock and Seigneur de Montaigne'; the third between 'The Vicar of Bray and Sir Thomas Moor'; and the fourth between 'Oliver Cromwell and his Porter'.

George, Lord Lyttelton (q.v.), also wrote 'Dialogues of the Dead' (1760).

Dialogues concerning Natural Religion, a treatise on natural theology, by Hume (q.v.), published in 1779.

There are three interlocutors in the Dialogues, whose attitudes are indicated by Hume when he contrasts 'the accurate philosophical turn of Cleanthes' with 'the careless scepticism of Philo' and 'the rigid inflexible orthodoxy of Demea'. Hume intends to make Cleanthes the hero of the dialogue; his position is that of a philosophical theism, in which divine intelligence and goodness are inferred from evidences of purpose in the world as we know it. But in the course of the dialogue the scepticism of Philo makes considerable impression upon his opponent.

The subject of the Dialogues is the nature of God (the existence of God is considered unquestionable). Philo attacks the anthropomorphism of the theologians, who see in the nature of God a counterpart of that of man. The discussion brings Philo and Cleanthes into agreement on the existence of the evidences of design in the works of God. But as regards the inferences to be drawn thence, Philo will not go beyond the inference of a divine intelligence. He cannot accede to the inference of divine goodness. Divine goodness may be compatible with the misery that we see in the world, but is assuredly not to be inferred thence.

Dialogus de Scaccario, or Dialogus of the Exchequer, is the work of Robert Fitz-Nigel, treasurer of England from 1168 to 1198, and bishop of London 1189-98. It takes the form of a dialogue in Latin between teacher and pupil, and is one of the principal sources of our knowledge of the Norman administration in England prior to Magna Carta.

Diamond Necklace, AFFAIR OF THE, the name given to the plot, successfully carried out in 1783-4, of Jeanne de St. Remy de Valois, the descendant of an illegitimate son of Henri II and wife of a self-styled Comte de Lamotte, to get possession of a diamond necklace from the jewellers who had made it, on the pretence that Queen Marie Antoinette had consented to purchase it. Jeanne de Valois had persuaded the Cardinal de Rohan, her dupe, who was desirous of dispelling the disfavour in which he was held at court, that she was in favour with the queen; she had even effected an interview between him and a woman who personated the queen. The cardinal was next led to believe that the queen wished to purchase the necklace and to employ him as intermediary. By this means, and a forged document purporting to signify the queen's acceptance of the terms of purchase, Jeanne got possession of the necklace. It was broken up, and the Comte de Lamotte fled to England with most of the jewels. The cardinal and Jeanne were arrested; the cardinal was acquitted, Jeanne was whipped and branded. She escaped from the Salpêtrière, where she was imprisoned, came to England, wrote her memoirs, and died in 1791. Though the innocence of the queen is now established, much suspicion and discredit clung to her for a time. (See A. Lang, 'Historical Mysteries', and T. Carlyle, 'The Diamond Necklace'.) Diamond Pitt, see Pitt (T.).

Diana, a Roman goddess identified with the Greek ARTEMIS. The latter was the daughter of Zeus and Leto, and the twin sister of Apollo. She lived in perpetual celibacy and was the goddess of the chase. She also presided over child-birth, and in post-Homeric literature was identified with the moon, in which character she frequently occurs in English literature. There was a famous temple of Diana or Artemis at Ephesus, but here her characteristics were different, and were those of an Eastern nature-goddess. Her statue at Ephesus, which was supposed to have fallen from heaven, was a many-breasted idol, symbolizing the productive forces of nature. 'Great is Diana of the Ephesians' was the cry of the silversmiths of Ephesus, when they found their trade in shrines for Diana threatened by the preaching of Paul (Acts xix. 24 et seq.).

Diana, a character in Shakespeare's 'All's Well that Ends Well' (q.v.).

Diana, a volume of sonnets by H. Constable (q.v.), first published in 1592.

Diana Enamorada, see Montemayor.

Diana Merion, the heroine of Meredith's 'Diana of the Crossways' (q.v.).

Diana of the Crossways, a novel by Meredith (q.v.), published in 1885. The story has some historical foundation, but not in respect of the central incident of the betrayal of a political secret with which the name of the Hon. Mrs. Norton, Sheridan's granddaughter, was falsely connected.

The beautiful and witty Irish girl, Diana Merion, marries Mr. Warwick, 'a gentlemanly official', a man of limited intelligence, quite incapable of understanding the exceptional qualities of his wife. Her innocent indiscretions awaken his jealousy and he brings an action for divorce against her, citing Lord Dannisburgh, an eminent statesman (drawn from Lord Melbourne), which he loses. Husband and wife then live apart. Percy Dacier, a rising young politician, falls in love with her and she with him, and under stress of persecution by her husband she is on the point of accepting his protection, when the dangerous illness of her devoted friend, Lady Dunstane, recalls her to her senses. Dacier perseveres in his attentions, and she is once more on the point of yielding to his importunities when he discovers that an important political secret confided by him to her has been communicated, from mixed motives, among others pecuniary embarrassment, to the editor of a London newspaper. This produces a final breach between them. At this point Diana's husband dies. After a time she gives her hand to her steady faithful adorer, Thomas Redworth, who, without brilliancy, has sufficient wit to understand and appreciate her.

Diana Vernon, a character in Scott's 'Rob Roy' (q.v.).

Diarmid or DIARMAIT O'Duibhne, in the legends relating to the Irish hero Finn, the lover of Grainne (q.v.).

Diary of a Country Parson, The, see Woodforde.

Diary of a Nobody, The, by George and Weedon Grossmith, published in 1892. It originally appeared in 'Punch'. It is the diary of Charles Pooter, of The Laurels, Holloway, an assistant in a mercantile business, and recounts with an amusing simplicity his domestic, social, and business troubles, and their satisfactory issue.

DIBDIN, CHARLES (1745-1814), dramatist and song-writer, is best remembered for his nautical songs, including 'Tom Bowling'. He published a 'History of the Stage' (1795), and produced several plays at the Haymarket and Lyceum theatres.

DIBDIN, THOMAS FROGNALL (1776-1847), nephew of Charles Dibdin (q.v.), educated at St. John's College, Oxford, a famous bibliographer, was librarian to Lord Spencer at Althorp. He published his 'Introduction to the Knowledge of Rare and Valuable Editions of the Greek and Latin Classics' in 1802, his 'Bibliomania' (a 'bibliographical romance', in which the study of bibliography is recommended as a cure for bibliomania) in 1809, 'A Bibliographical, Antiquarian, and Picturesque Tour in France and Germany' in 1821, his 'Library Companion' in 1824, 'Reminiscences of a Literary Life' in 1836, and his 'Bibliographical, Antiquarian, and Picturesque Tour in the Northern Counties of England' in 1838.

DICEY, ALBERT VENN (1835-1922), educated at Balliol College, Oxford, fellow of All Souls, and Vinerian professor of law. He was author of an 'Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution' (1885) and other legal works.

Dick, Mr., the amiable lunatic in Dickens's 'David Copperfield' (q.v.).

Dick Amlet, a character in Vanbrugh's 'The Confederacy' (q.v.).

DICKENS

DICKENS, CHARLES (1812-70), the son of a government clerk, underwent in early life, as the result of his family's poverty (his father was imprisoned in the Marshalsea), experiences similar to some of those depicted in 'David Copperfield', and received little education. He became reporter of debates in the Commons to the 'Morning Chronicle' in 1835, and contributed to the 'Monthly Magazine' (1833-5), to the 'Evening Chronicle' (1835), and other periodicals, the articles that were subsequently republished as 'Sketches by Boz, Illustrative of Every-Day Life and Every-Day People' (1836-7). These were immediately followed by 'The Posthumous Papers of the Pickwick Club', of which the publication in twenty monthly numbers began in April 1836 (the author being then 24). In this work Dickens suddenly reached the plenitude of his powers as a humorist and achieved success and financial ease. 'Oliver Twist' (q.v., 1837-8) followed in 'Bentley's Miscellany', and 'Nicholas Nickleby' (q.v., 1838-9) in monthly numbers. His next two novels, 'The Old Curiosity Shop' (q.v.) and 'Barnaby Rudge' (q.v.), Dickens published as parts of the serial 'Master Humphrey's Clock' (1840-1), an unnecessary device which he soon abandoned. In 1842 he went to America, where he advocated international copyright and the abolition of slavery. The literary results of the voyage were 'American Notes' (1842) and 'Martin Chuzzlewit' (q.v., 1843-4). 'A Christmas Carol' appeared in 1843, a Christmas book that was followed in each of the succeeding years by 'The Chimes', 'The Cricket on the Hearth', 'The Battle of Life', and 'The Haunted Man', works described by him as 'a whimsical sort of masque intended to awaken loving and forbearing thoughts', which added greatly to his popularity. He paid a long visit to Italy in 1844, which produced the 'Pictures from Italy' contributed to the 'Daily News' in 1846 (Dickens was the founder and for a short time editor of this paper), and to Switzerland in 1846, where he wrote 'Dombey and Son' (q.v.), published in 1848. In 1850 Dickens started the weekly periodical 'Household Words', succeeded in 1859 by 'All the Year Round', and this he carried on until his death. In these he published much of his later writings, including the Christmas stories that replaced the earlier Christmas books. 'David Copperfield' (q.v.), appeared in monthly numbers in 1849-50, 'Bleak House' (q.v.) in 1852-3, the unsuccessful 'Child's History of England' in 1852-4, 'Hard Times' (q.v.) in 1854, 'Little Dorrit' (q.v.) in 1855-7, 'A Tale of Two Cities' (q.v.) in 1859, 'Great Expectations' (q.v.) in 1860-1, and 'Our Mutual Friend' (q.v.) in 1864-5. Dickens had begun to give public readings in 1858, which he continued during his second visit to America in 1867-8. After his return he began, in 1870, 'Edwin Drood' (q.v.), but died suddenly before finishing it. Among minor works of his later years should be mentioned 'Hunted Down' ('New York Ledger', 1859, 'Household Words', 1860), 'Holiday Romance' (1868), 'The Uncommercial Traveller' series (q.v., 1861). Dickens collaborated with Wilkie Collins in various stories which appeared in 'Household Words' and 'All the Year Round' (e.g. 'The Wreck of the Golden Mary', 'A Message from the Sea', and 'No Thoroughfare'). The standard biography of Dickens is that of John Forster (1872-4; memorial edition, 1911); see also that by Dame Una Pope-Hennessy (1945).

DICKINSON, EMILY (1830-86), American poet, born at Amherst, Massachusetts. She lived a quiet and secluded life, and her poems were published only after her death. They are remarkable for their mystic quality, and she now ranks high as a poet, with a reputation that extends far beyond her own country. The published volumes are: 'Poems, 1890'; 'Poems, 1891'; 'Poems, 1896'; 'The Single Hound' (1914), 'Further Poems' (1929), 'The Complete Poems of Emily Dickinson' (1924). A Life with a selection of her Letters was published in 1924.

DICTYS CRETENSIS, the reputed author of a diary of the Trojan War. A Latin translation of what purported to be a Greek version of this diary has come down to us. According to the preface to this work Dictys was a Cretan of Cnossos who accompanied Idomeneus to the Trojan War. This and the narrative of Dares Phrygius (q.v.) are the chief sources of medieval Trojan legends.

Diddler, JEREMY, the chief character in James Kenney's farce 'Raising the Wind' (1803). Jeremy's characteristic methods of 'raising the wind' by continually borrowing small sums which he does not pay back, and otherwise sponging on people, probably gave rise to the current sense of the verb 'diddle'—to cheat or victimize. [OED.]

DIDEROT, DENIS (1713-84), French philosopher, dramatist, and critic, the son of a cutler, chiefly remembered in England as one of the founders of the 'Encyclopédie' (q.v.) and principal director of that great enterprise. He was the author of philosophical essays, such as the 'Lettre sur les aveugles' (1749) and the 'Pensées sur l'interprétation de la nature' (1754), of works of dramatic and art criticism, of novels ('La Religieuse', 'Jacques le Fataliste'), of the amusing character sketch 'Le Neveu de Rameau', and of two sentimental comedies, 'Le Fils Naturel' (1757) and 'Le Père de Famille' (1758).

Dido, also called ELISSA, the daughter of a Tyrian king. She was married to her uncle, Acerbas, who was murdered for the sake of his wealth. But Dido sailed secretly from Tyre with his treasure. Arriving on the coast of Africa, she obtained the grant of so much land as could be covered with the hide of a bull. But she had the hide cut into thin strips and enclosed a space which became the fort of Carthage. Threatened by the neighbouring King Iarbas, who demanded her in marriage, she erected a funeral pile and took her own life. Virgil makes Dido a contemporary of Aeneas (q.v.). She falls in love with him when he is shipwrecked on the coast of Carthage. When Aeneas, by order of the gods, forsakes her, Dido kills herself. There is an opera, 'Dido and Aeneas', by Henry Purcell (q.v.).

Dido, The Tragedy of, a tragedy by Marlowe and Nash (qq.v.), published in 1594.

Die-hard, one that resists to the last; an appellation of the 57th regiment of Foot in the British army, earned by their gallant conduct at the battle of Albuera (D.N.B., s.v. Inglis, Sir William); now frequently applied in a political sense to those who are ultra-conservative in their general views or in reference to some particular subject of controversy.

Dies Irae, 'day of wrath', the first words of the greatest among medieval Latin hymns, the authorship of which is attributed to Thomas of Celano (fl. c. 1225).

Dietrich of Bern, the name given in the 'Nibelungenlied' (q.v.) to Theodoric, a great king of the Ostrogoths (c. 454-526), who invaded Italy and decisively defeated Odoacer at Verona (Bern) in 489. He was the hero of the German epics of the 13th cent. and of the Teutonic race in general, and the centre round which clustered many legends.

Dieu et mon droit, 'God and my right', said to be the password given by Richard I at the battle of Gisors (1198), in which he defeated the French. It has been the motto of the sovereigns of England since the time of Henry VI.

DIGBY, SIR KENELM (1603-65), was educated at Gloucester Hall (Worcester College), Oxford. This versatile man was an author, a naval commander (who defeated the French and Venetian fleets in Scanderoon harbour, 1628), and a very rash diplomatist. He was interested in physical science (he discovered the necessity of oxygen to the life of plants, and was a member of the council of the Royal Society). He published a criticism of Sir T. Browne's 'Religio Medici' in 1643, and wrote 'Of Bodies' and 'Of the Immortality of Man's Soul' in the same year. His 'Private Memoirs' (an account, under disguised names, of his wooing and wedding of Venetia Stanley) were published in 1827-8.

DIGBY, KENELM HENRY (1800-80), educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and converted to Roman Catholicism, was author of 'The Broad Stone of Honour' (q.v., 1822), 'Mores Catholici' (1831-40), &c.

DILETTANTI

Dilettanti, SOCIETY OF THE, originally founded about 1732 as a dining society by some gentlemen of wealth and position who had travelled in Italy, soon devoted itself to the patronage of the fine arts. It has chiefly encouraged the study of classical archaeology. See Lionel Cust's 'History' of the society (1898).

DILKE, SIR CHARLES WENTWORTH (1843-1911), liberal statesman, was author of 'Greater Britain' (1868), the record of a tour through many parts of the British Empire. He treated more fully questions connected with the empire in his 'Problems of Greater Britain' (1890). He published anonymously in 1874 a lively satirical brochure, 'The Fall of Prince Florestan of Monaco'. He was proprietor of the 'Athenaeum' and 'Notes and Queries'.

DILLON, WENTWORTH, fourth earl of Roscommon (1633?-85), author of a blank-verse translation of Horace's 'Ars Poetica' (1680) and an 'Essay on Translated Verse' (1684). He was the first critic who publicly praised Milton's 'Paradise Lost'.

Dimeter, see Metre.

Dimmesdale, REV. ARTHUR, a character in Hawthorne's 'The Scarlet Letter' (q.v.).

Dinadan, SIR, in Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur', one of King Arthur's knights and in the opinion of Sir Tristram 'the best joker and jester, and a noble knight of his hands, and the best knight that I know'.

Diocletian (245-313), born of obscure parents in Dalmatia, rose to distinction in the army, and was proclaimed Roman emperor in 284. In consequence of the attacks to which the empire was exposed in many directions, he shared the rule first with Maximian, and subsequently with two other Caesars, taking the East for his own share. In 305 he abdicated and retired to his native Dalmatia, where he built the magnificent palace, the ruins of which, still known as SPALATO, inspired Robert Adam's design of the Adelphi. The Christians were subjected to severe persecution in his reign (303). He was the first Roman emperor to establish the joint rule system on a permanent basis.

Diodati, CHARLES (d. 1638), son of an Italian Protestant who had settled in London and married an English wife, the schoolfellow and close friend of Milton. Milton addressed to him two of his Latin elegies, and lamented his death in the pastoral 'Epitaphium Damonis'.

DIONYSIUS

DIODORUS SICULUS, a Greek historian born in Sicily, who flourished in the latter half of the 1st cent. B.C. He wrote a history of the world in forty books, of which we possess i-v (dealing with the early history of Egypt, Assyria, Ethiopia, and Greece) and xi-xx (from the Persian invasion of Greece to 302 B.C.).

DIOGENES LAERTIUS, of Laerte in Cilicia, an author of the 2nd or 3rd cents. A.D., who wrote in Greek ten books of 'Lives of the Philosophers', which have survived.

Diogenes the Cynic, a Greek philosopher born at Sinope in Pontus about 412 B.C., who, after a dissolute youth, practised at Athens the greatest austerity, finally taking up his residence, it is said, in a large earthenware jar. He censured all intellectual pursuits, such as astronomy, not directed to some obvious practical advantage. He was taken prisoner by pirates, and sold as a slave at Corinth, but soon received his freedom. Here occurred his famous interview with Alexander the Great, who asked him whether he could oblige him in any way, and was told 'Yes, by standing out of my sunshine'. It is said that Alexander was so struck with his independence that he said, 'If I were not Alexander, I should wish to be Diogenes.' When Philip of Macedon was threatening Corinth and the inhabitants feverishly set about strengthening the defences, Diogenes, not to be outdone in activity, trundled his tub to and fro (Lucian, 'De Hist. Conscr.', 3).

Diomēdēs, son of Tydeus and king of Argos, was one of the Greek princes who joined in the expedition against Troy, and, next to Achilles, was the bravest in the host. Athene aided him in battle and enabled him to wound even Ares and Aphrodite. According to post-Homeric legend he helped Odysseus to carry off the palladium (q.v.) from Troy.

There was another Diomedes, king of the Bistones in Thrace. He owned famous mares, which he fed on human flesh. He was killed by Hercules.

Diōnē, according to Homer, the mother of Aphrodite by Zeus; according to Hesiod, the daughter of Oceanus. In early Greek mythology she was probably the supreme goddess, the female counterpart of Zeus (her name is from diōs, genitive of Zeūs).

Dionysius, the ELDER and YOUNGER, were tyrants of Syracuse (405-367 B.C., and 367-343 B.C. respectively). The elder made himself master of half Sicily, beautified Syracuse, had a taste for literature, and was visited by Plato. He became very suspicious in his later years, and is said to have made a subterranean cave, known as DIONYSIUS' EAR, with peculiar acoustic properties, from which he could hear what was said by prisoners whom he held in confinement. (This is referred to in Scott's 'Fortunes of Nigel'.)

The younger was twice driven from the throne, and finally was, it is said, reduced to support himself at Corinth as a schoolmaster. To this Byron refers in his 'Ode to Napoleon':

DIONYSIUS

That Corinth's pedagogue hath now
Transferr'd his by-word to thy brow.

Dionysius of Halicarnassus (1st cent. B.C.), Greek rhetorician, author of a History of Rome and of works of literary criticism.

Dionysius the Areopagite, a disciple of St. Paul (Acts xvii. 34). A 5th-cent. writer who sought to introduce certain mystical elements into Christianity from Neoplatonism claimed to be Dionysius the Areopagite, and successfully imposed on medieval Christendom.

Dionysus, a Greek god, also known as BACCHUS, the son of Zeus and Semele (q.v.), a god of the fertility of nature, a suffering god, who dies and comes to life again, particularly a god of wine, who loosens care and inspires to music and poetry. Hence his connexion with the dithyramb, tragedy, and comedy. Elements of ecstasy and mysticism are found in his cult. Zeus, to save the infant Dionysus from the jealousy of his wife Hera, conveyed him to Mt. Nysa, where he was brought up by the nymphs. He was persecuted by unbelievers and took vengeance on them (see, e.g., Pentheus). He made an expedition to Eastern lands, teaching mankind the elements of civilization and the use of wine. In this connexion he is frequently represented drawn in a chariot by tigers, and accompanied by a rout of votaries, male and female (Satyrs, Sileni, Maenads, Bassarids).

Dionyza, a character in Shakespeare's 'Pericles' (q.v.).

Dioscuri, or 'sons of Zeus', a name given to Castor (q.v.) and Pollux.

Diotima, a priestess of Mantinea, reputed teacher of Socrates in philosophy, referred to in the 'Symposium' of Plato.

Diplomatic, originally meant 'of or pertaining to official or original documents' (from Greek δίπλωμα, a doubling, a folded paper, a letter of recommendation), and the diplomatic science was the science of palaeography, in which sense it is used in the title of the great work of Mabillon (q.v.), 'De re diplomatica'. The transition to its later meaning appears to have arisen from the title 'Corps Universel Diplomatique du Droit des Gens' of Dumont (1726), where, as the subject matter was international relations, 'corps diplomatique', though used in its original sense, came to be taken as meaning 'having to do with international relations'. [OED.]

Dipsas, a serpent whose bite was fabled to produce raging thirst.

Cerastes horn'd, Hydrops, and Ellops drear,

And Dipsas.

(Milton, 'Paradise Lost', x. 526.)

Dipsodes, 'the thirsty ones', the people whose conquest by Pantagruel (q.v.) is related by Rabelais (Bk. II. xxiii, xxviii, et seq.).

DISRAELI

Dipsychus, a poem by Clough (q.v.), published posthumously. The poem, which represents the 'conflict between a tender conscience and the world', takes the form of dialogues between Dipsychus and an attendant Mephistophelean spirit, 'a compound of convention and impiety', who endeavours to persuade him to adopt a worldly standard of conduct. The scene is set in Venice.

Dircē, see under Antiope. The fountain Dirce being near Thebes, the epithet DIRCEAN is used by poets as equivalent to Theban or Boeotian, and applied to Pindar ('the Dircean Swan') and others.

Discoveries made upon Men and Matter, see Timber.

Dismal Science, THE, political economy; so named by T. Carlyle ('The Nigger Question', Misc. Ess. vii. 84).

Dismas, or DYSMAS, or DIMAS, the legendary name of the Penitent Thief crucified by the side of Jesus Christ. The name of the Impenitent Thief was Gestas.

Disowned, The, a novel by Bulwer Lytton (q.v.), published in 1828. It is the story of a young man, Clinton L'Estrange, who is repudiated by his father Lord Ulswater (from a mistaken suspicion that he is not in fact his son), but is finally rehabilitated. The villain Crauford is drawn from Henry Fauntleroy, the banker and forger, who was executed in 1824.

Dispensary, The, see Garth.

DISRAELI, BENJAMIN, first earl of Beaconsfield (1804-81), eldest son of Isaac D'Israeli (q.v.), received his literary training chiefly in his father's library, and was never at a university. He entered Lincoln's Inn in 1824, and published his first novel 'Vivian Grey' (q.v.) in his twenty-second year (1826-7). He was much hampered by debt during his early years, but he made the grand tour. He published 'The Young Duke' in 1831, 'Contarini Fleming' (q.v.) in 1832, 'Alroy' and 'Ixion in Heaven' (q.v.) in 1833, 'The Infernal Marriage' (q.v.) in 1834, 'The Rise of Iskander' in 1834, 'Henrietta Temple' (q.v.) in 1837, and 'Venetia' (q.v.) in the same year. In that year also he entered parliament as member for Maidstone. 'Coningsby' and 'Sybil' (qq.v.) appeared in 1844 and 1845, 'Tancred' (q.v.) in 1847. For many years after this political affairs absorbed his energies, and it was not until 1870 that his next famous novel 'Lothair' (q.v.) was published. He was prime minister from February to December 1868, and again from 1874 to 1880. He became the intimate friend of Queen Victoria. He published his last novel, 'Endymion' (q.v.), in the latter year. His principal merit as a novelist is his skill in presenting political and social types and the motives by which they are actuated, as a rule with a kindly humour. Many of his characters are drawn from personages of his time. Among Disraeli's writings outside fiction, the best is his 'Lord George Bentinck: a Political Biography' (1852). He also wrote a 'Vindication of the English Constitution' (1835), 'The Letters of Runnymede' (mostly vigorous attacks on contemporary politicians) and 'The Spirit of Whiggism' (1836). Disraeli's 'Correspondence with his Sister, 1832-52' was published in 1886, and 'Home Letters and Correspondence' in 1887, both edited by Ralph Disraeli. His 'Letters to Lady Bradford and Lady Chesterfield' appeared in 1929. His Life has been written by W. F. Monypenny and G. E. Buckle (revised edition, 1929).

DISRAELI

D'ISRAELI, ISAAC (1766-1848), descended from a Jewish family which had fled from Spain to Venice in time of persecution, the father of Benjamin Disraeli (q.v.), was the author of several discursive collections of literary and historical anecdotes, of which the first, and best, was 'Curiosities of Literature' (1791-3 and 1823). He also wrote 'Calamities of Authors' (1812-13), 'Quarrels of Authors' (1814), and 'Amenities of Literature' (1841).

Dives, a Latin word meaning 'rich man', which occurs in the Vulgate version of the parable of Lazarus (Luke xvi), and has come to be used generically for 'rich man'.

Divina Commedia (pron. com-may'dyah), the greatest work of Dante (q.v.), probably begun about 1300, comprising the 'Inferno', the 'Purgatorio' and the 'Paradiso', in lines of eleven syllables rhyming a b a b c b c d c.

DOBBIN

The 'Inferno' is a description of Hell, conceived as a graduated conical funnel, to the successive circles of which the various categories of sinners are assigned. The 'Purgatorio' is a description of Purgatory, a mountain rising in circular ledges, on which are the various groups of repentant sinners. In his visit to Hell and Purgatory, Dante has for guide the poet Virgil, and there he sees and converses with his lost friends or former foes. The 'Paradiso' is a vision of a world of beauty, light, and song, where the Poet encounters Beatrice, now an angel. The poem is not only an exposition of the future life, but a work of moral edification, replete with symbolism and allusions based on Dante's wide knowledge of philosophy, astronomy, natural science, and history.

Among well-known translations are those of Longfellow and H. F. Cary (qq.v.).

Dixie, the name of an American national song, composed in 1859 by Daniel Decatur Emmett (1815-1904), musician and composer of negro melodies to Bryant's Minstrels, New York. It made a special appeal to the army of the Confederate States in the American Civil War, and still enjoys great popularity. 'Dixie' in the song signifies the Southern States; it is 'de land ob cotton'. It occurs in many other Southern songs which the Civil War produced. The origin of the name is obscure. Some refer it to Jeremiah Dixon, who with Charles Mason in 1763-7 surveyed the boundary between Maryland and Pennsylvania, which later separated the slave States from the free States; and there are various other explanations, none of them convincing.

DIXON, RICHARD WATSON (1833-1900), educated at King Edward's School, Birmingham, and Pembroke College, Oxford, became the intimate friend of Burne-Jones, William Morris, R. Bridges, and G. M. Hopkins, held various preferments, and was canon of Carlisle for many years. He published an elaborate 'History of the Church of England from the Abolition of Roman Jurisdiction' (1877-1900) and several volumes of poems, of which the longest (in terza rima) is 'Mano, or a poetical history . . . concerning the adventures of a Norman Knight' in the 10th and 11th cents. (1883); the best are included in the selection of 'Poems' issued with a memoir by Dr. R. Bridges in 1909.

Dizzy, familiar abbreviation of the name of Benjamin Disraeli (q.v.), earl of Beaconsfield. Djinn, see Jinn.

Dobbbin, CAPTAIN, afterwards COLONEL, WILLIAM, a character in Thackeray's 'Vanity Fair' (q.v.).

DOBBS

Dobbs, DOMINIE, a character in Marryat's 'Jacob Faithful' (q.v.).

DOBELL, SYDNEY THOMPSON (1824-74), who was privately educated, published in 1850 'The Roman', a dramatic poem inspired by sympathy with oppressed Italy, and in 1853 'Balder' (q.v.). Under the influence of the Crimean War he issued in 1855 'Sonnets on the War' (jointly with Alexander Smith), and in 1856 'England in Time of War'. Two volumes of his poetical works appeared in 1875. Dobell was a leading member of the 'Spasmodic School' ridiculed by Aytoun (q.v.). His best-known pieces are 'Tommy's Dead', the lament of a father over his son; and the ballad with the refrain 'Oh, Keith of Ravelston', included in 'A Nuptial Song'.

DOBSON, HENRY AUSTIN (1840-1921), educated at Beaumaris Grammar School and at a gymnasium at Strasbourg, then a French city, entered the Board of Trade, where he served from 1856 to 1901. He was an accomplished writer of verse of the lighter kind, some of his best work appearing in 'Vignettes in Rhyme' (1873), 'Proverbs in Porcelain' (1877), and in 'Old World Idylls' (1883). A further volume 'At the Sign of the Lyre' (1885) was extremely popular. Dobson had a wide knowledge of the 18th cent., testified by his prose biographies of William Hogarth (1879, extended 1891), Steele (1886), Goldsmith (1888), Horace Walpole (1890), Samuel Richardson (1902), Fanny Burney (1903). Under the title of 'Four Frenchwomen' (1890) he published essays on Charlotte Corday, Madame Roland, the Princesse de Lamballe, and Madame de Genlis. He also published three series of 'Eighteenth-Century Vignettes' (1802-4-6), besides several volumes of collected essays.

Doch-an-doris or DOCH-AN-DOROCH (Gaelic), a stirrup-cup, or a final drink at night.

Doctor, The, a miscellany by Southey (q.v.), published in 1834-47. It is a collection of articles on a great variety of subjects, differing from a common-place book in that they are connected together, somewhat loosely, by the story that runs through them of an imaginary Dr. Daniel Dove of Doncaster and his horse Nobs. It contains the nursery story of The Three Bears, and its humour is occasionally Rabelaisian.

Doctor ANGELICUS, Thomas Aquinas (q.v.); INVINCIBILIS, William Ockham (q.v.); IRREFRAGABILIS, Alexander of Hales (q.v.); MIRABILIS, Roger Bacon (q.v.); SUBTILIS, Duns Scotus (q.v.); UNIVERSALIS, Albertus Magnus (q.v.).

Doctor Faustus, The tragical history of, a drama in blank verse and prose by Marlowe (q.v.), published apparently in 1604, though entered in the Stationers' Register in 1601, and probably produced in 1588. It is perhaps the first dramatization of the medieval legend of a man who sold his soul to the Devil, and who became identified with a Dr. Faustus, a necromancer of the 16th cent. The legend appeared in the 'Volskubuch' published at Frankfurt in 1587, and was translated into English as 'The History of the Damnable Life and Death of Dr. John Faustus'. Marlowe's play follows this translation in the general outline of the story, though not in the conception of the principal character, who, under the poet's hand, from a mere magician, becomes a man athirst for infinite power, ambitious to be 'great Emperor of the world'.

Faustus, weary of the sciences, turns to magic and calls up Mephistopheles, with whom he makes a compact to surrender his soul to the Devil in return for twenty-four years of life; during these Mephistopheles shall attend on him and give him whatsoever he demands. Then follows a number of scenes in which this compact is executed, notable among them the calling up of Paris and Helen, where Faustus addresses Helen in the well-known lines: 'Was this the face that launched a thousand ships. . .'. The anguish of mind of Faustus as the hour for the surrender of his soul draws near is poignantly depicted. Both in its end and in the general conception of the character of Faustus, the play thus differs greatly from the 'Faust' of Goethe (q.v.).

Doctor Thorne, a novel by A. Trollope (q.v.), published in 1858, one of the Barsetshire group of novels.

Dr. Thorne, a man of good family, is the medical practitioner at the village of Greshamsbury. His brother, Henry Thorne, has seduced the sister of Roger Scatcherd, a stonemason, and been killed by him. Roger Scatcherd has been imprisoned and liberated, his sister has emigrated and married, and her child, known as Mary Thorne, has been brought up by Dr. Thorne; but the circumstances of her birth are not generally known. Scatcherd, in spite of a propensity to drink, has become a wealthy contractor. Mr. Gresham, squire of Greshamsbury, has been impoverished by extravagant expenditure, partly due to his aristocratic wife, a member of the De Courcy family; he is gravely embarrassed and his property is largely mortgaged to Scatcherd. Frank Gresham, his son, falls in love with the obscure and penniless Mary Thorne. The novel is occupied mainly with the attempts of his family to induce him to abandon Mary, and to 'marry money', in particular Miss Dunstable, the heiress of wealth made by a patent unguent, and a sensible and entertaining person, though somewhat elderly. Their efforts are defeated, and when Mary is found to be the heiress of old Scatcherd, all obstacles to her union with Frank are removed.

Dr. Wortle's School, a novel by A. Trollope (q.v.), published in 1881.

Dr. Wortle is the proprietor of a highly successful private school patronized by the nobility. He engages as assistant master a certain Mr. Peacocke, a former fellow of Trinity, Oxford, a man in holy orders, who has spent five years in the United States and there married. Though he and his wife (as the matron) are thoroughly efficient and agreeable, there is some mystery about their past, and suspicion arises that they are not married. Their union was in fact not regular, for their marriage had taken place when Mrs. Peacocke's first husband, a brutal drunkard, was, without their knowledge, still alive. The scandal increases, fomented by an enemy of Dr. Wortle, and he receives what he considers an impertinent admonition from the bishop. Dr. Wortle, who has a good deal of the sturdy independence of Archdeacon Grantly (q.v.), moved by compassion for the unfortunate couple and annoyance at the interference of the bishop and the complaints of various sanctimonious parents, obstinately takes his assistant's side, in spite of the threatened ruin of his school. Matters are put right by the death of the first husband, and Dr. Wortle triumphs.

Doctors' Commons, originally the common table and dining-hall of the College of Doctors of Civil Law in London; hence the name is applied to the buildings occupied by these, and now to their site, to the south of St. Paul's Cathedral. The society was formed in 1509, and in their buildings were held the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty courts. The society was dissolved in 1858 and the buildings taken down in 1867. Literary allusions to Doctors' Commons in later times generally relate to marriage licences, probate and registration of wills, and divorce proceedings, presumably because such matters were dealt with there.

Doctors of the Church, certain early 'fathers', distinguished by their learning and sanctity: especially, in the Western Church, Ambrose, Augustine, Jerome, Gregory; in the Eastern Church, Athanasius, Basil, Gregory of Nazianzus, and Chrysostom.

DODD, WILLIAM (1729-77), a forger, educated at Clare Hall, Cambridge, and rector of Hockliffe and Vicar of Chalgrove (1772). He forged a bond for £4,200 in the name of his former pupil, the fifth Lord Chesterfield, and was executed, in spite of many petitions on his behalf, one of them written by Dr. Johnson. Dodd's numerous publications include 'Beauties of Shakespeare' (1752).

DODDRIDGE, PHILIP (1702-51), a non-conformist divine, was a celebrated hymn-writer and author of 'The Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul' (1745), a work notable for its literary as well as its devotional quality. He also published in 1747 'Some Remarkable Passages in the Life of Col. James Gardiner', the reformed rake and colonel of dragoons (1688-1745) who became a religious enthusiast, was killed at Prestonpans, and figures in Scott's 'Waverley' (q.v.).

DODGSON, CHARLES LUTWIDGE (1832-98), celebrated under his pseudonym LEWIS CARROLL, was educated at Rugby School and Christ Church, Oxford. He was mathematical lecturer at Oxford from 1855 to 1881. Dodgson wrote books for children that had the advantage of appealing by their humour, logic, and inventive absurdity to grown-up people also. His most popular works were 'Alice's Adventures in Wonderland' (1865), and 'Through the Looking-glass' (1872), both illustrated by Sir John Tenniel. His other publications include 'The Hunting of the Snark' (q.v., 1876), 'Rhyme? and Reason?' (1883), and 'Sylvie and Bruno' (1889), besides various mathematical treatises of which the most valuable is 'Euclid and his Modern Rivals' (1879).

DODINGTON, GEORGE BUBB (1691-1762), a time-serving politician who attained high office and a peerage (as Baron Melcombe), was author of a 'Diary', published posthumously in 1784, which throws much light on the venal politics of his day.

Dods, MEG, in Scott's 'St. Ronan's Well' (q.v.), the landlady of the Cleikum Inn.

DODSLEY, ROBERT (1703-64), while a footman in the service of the Hon. Mrs. Lowther, published 'Servitude, a Poem' (1729, afterwards reissued as 'The Footman's Friendly Advice to his Brethren of the Livery'). He became a bookseller and wrote several plays, including a tragedy 'Cleone' (1758), a musical play, 'The Blind Beggar of Bethnal Green' (1741), and 'The Toyshop, a dramatic Satire' (1735). But he is chiefly remembered as the publisher of works by Pope, Johnson, Young, Goldsmith, and Gray, and of the 'Select Collection of Old Plays' (1744) and 'A Collection of Poems by several hands' (1748-58), revised and continued by Pearce (1775). In 1758 he founded, in conjunction with Edmund Burke, the 'Annual Register', which still appears. His place of business was at 'Tully's Head' in Pall Mall.

Dodson and Fogg, in Dickens's 'Pickwick Papers' (q.v.), Mrs. Bardell's attorneys.

Doe, JOHN, see John Doe.

Dogberry and Verges, in Shakespeare's 'Much Ado about Nothing' (q.v.), constables. Dogberry is a precursor of Mrs. Malaprop in his gift for misapplying words.

Dog-Latin, bad, unidiomatic Latin. '“Nescio quid est materia cum me”, Sterne writes to one of his friends (in dog-Latin, and very sad dog-Latin too); Thackeray, 'Eng. Hum.' vi. Cf. Doggerel.

DOGS

Dogs, famous in History, Myth, and Fiction:
Actaeon's hounds, see Actaeon.
Alcibiades' dog. Plutarch relates that Alcibiades had an uncommonly large and beautiful dog, whose principal ornament was his tail. Yet he caused the tail to be cut off, that the Athenians should talk of this piece of eccentricity rather than find something worse to say of him.
Argos, q.v. (2).
Beau, Cowper's spaniel.
Bevis, in Scott's 'Woodstock', Sir Henry Lee's greyhound.
Boatswain, Byron's favourite dog; the inscription on a monument to him at Newstead states that he possessed 'Beauty without vanity, Strength without insolence, Courage without ferocity, and all the Virtues of man without his Vices'.
Bounce, a Danish dog belonging to Pope.
Boy, a favourite dog of Prince Rupert's, his companion in imprisonment at Lintz, suspected of being his master's familiar spirit, and famous in pamphlet warfare. His death at Marston Moor was greeted with exultation by the Puritans.
Bran, q.v., Fingal's dog.
Bull's-eye, in Dickens's 'Oliver Twist', Bill Sikes's dog.
Cerberus, q.v.
Crab, in Shakespeare's 'Two Gentlemen of Verona' (q.v.), Launce's dog.
Dash, Thomas Hood's dog and later Charles Lamb's; he provides some amusing passages in Lamb's letters.
Dogenes, in Dickens's 'Dombey and Son', the dog that Toots gives to Florence Dombey.
Flush, Mrs. Browning's dog, the gift of Miss Mitford.
Geist, a dachshund belonging to Matthew Arnold, celebrated in the poem, 'Geist's Grave'. Geist was succeeded by other dachshunds, Max and Kaiser.
Gelert, see Bethgelert.
Jip, in Dickens's 'David Copperfield', Dora's dog.
Katmer, q.v.
Labbs, in Aristophanes' 'Wasps', the dog who is tried for stealing a cheese.
Laelaps, see Cephalus. This hound was fated to catch whatever it pursued. A difficulty seemed likely to arise when it was set to hunt an uncatchable fox which was devastating the Theban territory; but Zeus evaded the problem by turning both into stone.
Luath, q.v.
Lufra, in Scott's 'The Lady of the Lake' (v. 25), Douglas's hound.
Lycas, the subject of an epitaph attributed to Simonides (q.v.), translated as follows by F. L. Lucas:
 Although beneath this grave-mound thy white bones now are lying,
 Surely, my huntress Lycas, the wild things dread thee still.

DOG-STAR

The memory of thy worth tall Pélion keeps undying,
 And the looming peak of Ossa, and Cithaeron's lonely hill.
Maera, see Icarus.
Maida, a favourite hound of Sir Walter Scott's.
Margarita, a hunting dog to which a tombstone, now in the British Museum, was erected by its Roman master and mistress.
Math, King Richard II's favourite greyhound. According to Froissart, ii, ch. 238 [241], it forsook Richard at the castle of Flint, when his deposition was imminent, and attached itself to Henry of Lancaster.
Mauthe's dog, a spectral dog, of which an account is given in a note to Scott's 'Peveril of the Peak', reputed to have haunted Peel Castle in the Isle of Man.
Montargis, Dog of, q.v.
Music, a favourite dog of Wordsworth's, on which he wrote two poems.
Mustard and Pepper, in Scott's 'Guy Mannering', the terriers of Dandy Dinmont (q.v.).
Orthrus, see Geryon.
Peritas, a dog belonging to Alexander the Great, after which he is said to have named a city.
Pomero and Giallo, Pomeranian dogs belonging to W. S. Landor.
Rab and his Friends, see Brown (Dr. J.).
Roswal, in Scott's 'The Talisman' (q.v.), Sir Kenneth's hound.
Tartar, in C. Brontë's 'Shirley' (q.v.), Shirley's dog, 'of a breed between mastiff and bull-dog'.
Theseus' hounds, in Shakespeare's 'A Midsummer Night's Dream' (q.v.), 'bred out of the Spartan kind . . . slow in pursuit, but match'd in mouth like bells'.
Tobias's dog, which accompanies Raphael and Tobias on their journey (Tob. v. 16).
Toby, q.v.
Xanthippus' dog, the dog of Xanthippus (the father of Pericles) which swam by his master's galley to Salamis when the Athenians were obliged to abandon their city, and was buried by his master on a promontory known as Cynossema (Dog's Grave).
 There are some good stories of sheep-dogs in Hudson's 'A Shepherd's Life', and dog-stories of another kind in Jack London's 'The Call of the Wild', 'White Fang', and 'Jerry of the Islands'.
Dog-star, the star Sirius, in the constellation of the Greater Dog, the brightest of the fixed stars. Also applied to Procyon (the Lesser Dog-Star), a star of the first magnitude in the Lesser Dog.
 The days about the time of the heliacal rising of the Dog-Star are known as the DOG-DAYS (in current almanacs 3 July to 11 Aug.). The name arose from the pernicious 'influence' attributed to the Dog-Star, but it has long been popularly associated with the belief that at this season dogs are most apt to run mad. [OED.]

DOG-STAR

Doge of Venice: for his wedding with the sea, see Adriatic.

Doggerel, comic or burlesque, or trivial, mean, or irregular verse. The derivation is unknown, but cf. Dog-Latin. [OED.]

Doggett, THOMAS (d. 1721), actor and joint-manager of the Haymarket, and subsequently of Drury Lane, theatres, and friend of Congreve and Colley Cibber, instituted in 1716, in honour of the anniversary of the accession of George I, a prize, known as DOGGETT'S COAT AND BADGE, for a rowing competition among Thames watermen, which is still held.

Dolt, an old Dutch coin, the eighth of a stiver, worth about half a farthing in English money.

Dol Common, in Jonson's 'The Alchemist' (q.v.), the female confederate of Subtle and Face.

Dolabella, a character in Shakespeare's 'Antony and Cleopatra' (q.v.), and in Dryden's 'All for Love' (q.v.).

DOLBEN, DIGBY MACKWORTH (1848-67), was educated at Eton. Even at school he displayed Roman Catholic tendencies as well as a marked poetic gift. He became an Anglican Benedictine monk in 1864. He was accidentally drowned in the river Welland in his twentieth year, when preparing to go up to Oxford. His poems, many of them religious and devotional, were edited with a memoir by Robert Bridges in 1915.

Doldrums, THE, a condition of dullness or drowsiness; hence the condition of a ship that is becalmed; and the region near the Equator where the trade winds meet and neutralize each other, and ships are liable to be becalmed.

Doll Common, see Dol Common.

Doll Tearsheet, a character in Shakespeare's '2 Henry IV' (q.v.).

Dollalolla, QUEEN, a character in Fielding's 'Tom Thumb' (q.v.).

Dollar, the English name for the German thaler, a large silver coin, of varying value, current in the German states from the 16th cent.; especially the unit of the German monetary union (1857-73) equal to 3 marks (about 2s. 11d.). The word thaler is short for Joachimsthaler, literally '(gulden) of Joachimsthal' (in Bohemia), where they were coined in 1519 from a silver mine opened there in 1516.

DOLLAR is also the English name for the peso or piece of eight (i.e. eight reales), worth about 4s. 6d., formerly current in Spain and the Spanish American colonies, and marked with the figure 8. The dollar is now the standard unit of coinage (worth 4s. 2d. at par) of the United States, and the name is also applied to various foreign coins of a value more or less approaching that of the Spanish or American dollar. The dollar sign $ is perhaps a corruption of ps, the Spanish contraction for peso; or a corruption of the two pillars (symbolizing the Pillars of Hercules) on Spanish coins, with the scroll about them; or of the figure 8 and the pillars.

Döllinger, JOHANN JOSEPH IGNAZ VON (1799-1890), a great German Church historian, a Liberal, and the head of the 'Old Catholic' party in the Roman Church. He opposed the declaration relating to papal infallibility, and was excommunicated by the archbishop of Munich in 1871.

Dolly Dialogues, The, by Anthony Hope (Hawkins), published in 1894, reprinted from the 'Westminster Gazette'. They are amusing and witty conversations, hung on a slight thread of story, in which figure Samuel Travers Carter, a middle-aged bachelor, and the attractive Dolly Foster, with whom he has flirted at Monte Carlo, and whose marriage to Lord Mickleham is understood to have caused Carter much unhappiness.

Dolly Varden, a character in Dickens's 'Barnaby Rudge' (q.v.). Also the name of a picture hat.

Dolon, a Trojan who went by night as a spy to the Greek camp and was slain by Ulysses and Diomedes ('Iliad', x). In Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', v. vi, Dolon is 'a man of subtil wit and wicked mind', who tries to entrap Britomart.

Dolores, a poem in anapaests by Swinburne (q.v.) included in the first series of 'Poems and Ballads'. It is addressed to 'Our Lady of Pain' and in it the poet sings of forbidden pleasures and the weariness and satiety that follow them.

Dorn, a shortened form of the Latin dominus, prefixed to the names of Roman Catholic ecclesiastical and monastic dignitaries, especially of Benedictine and Carthusian monks.

Dombey and Son [Dealings with the Firm of], a novel by Dickens (q.v.), published in 1847-8.

When the story opens Mr. Dombey, the rich, proud, frigid head of the shipping house of Dombey and Son, has just been presented with a son and heir, Paul, and his wife dies. The father's love and hopes are centred in the boy, an odd, delicate, prematurely old child, who is sent to Dr. Blimber's school, under whose strenuous discipline he sickens and dies. Dombey neglects his daughter, Florence, and the estrangement is increased by the death of her brother. Walter Gay, a frank, good-hearted youth in Dombey's employment, falls in love with her, but is sent to the West Indies by Dombey, who disapproves of their relations. He is shipwrecked on the way and believed to be drowned. Dombey marries again—a proud and penniless young widow, Edith Granger, but his arrogant treatment drives her into relations with his villainous manager, Carker, with whom she flies to France, fiercely repelling, however, the natural view he takes of the situation. They are pursued, Carker meets Dombey in a railway station, falls in front of a train, and is killed. The house of Dombey fails; Dombey has lost his fortune, his son, and his wife; his daughter has been driven by ill-treatment to fly from him, and has married Walter Gay, who has survived his shipwreck. Thoroughly humbled, he lives in desolate solitude till Florence returns to him and at last finds the way to his heart.

DOMBEY AND SON

Among the other notable characters in the book are Solomon Gills, the nautical instrument-maker and uncle of Walter Gay, and his friend Cuttle, the genial old sea-captain; Susan Nipper, Florence's devoted servant; Toots, the innocent and humble admirer of Florence; Joe Bagstock, the gouty retired Major; and 'Cousin Feenix', the good-natured aristocrat.

Domdaniel, apparently from the Greek or Latin words meaning 'hall or house of Daniel'; a fictitious name introduced in the French 'Continuation of the Arabian Nights' by Dom Chaves and M. Cazotte, 1788-93, whence adopted by Southey in 'Thalaba' (q.v.), and so by Carlyle. It is not clear whether 'Daniel' is intended to refer to the Hebrew prophet or to 'a great Grecian Sage' of that name who appears in the tale of 'the Queen and the Serpents' in the 'Arabian Nights'. Domdaniel is a fabled submarine hall where a magician or sorcerer met with his disciples. [OED.]

Domesday Book, where 'Domesday' is a Middle English spelling of 'Doomsday', day of judgement, is the name applied since the 12th cent. to the record of the Great Inquest or survey of the lands of England, made by order of William the Conqueror in 1086. It contains a record of the ownership, area, and value of these lands, and of the numbers of tenants, livestock, &c. Its title originated in a popular name given to the book, as a final and conclusive authority on all matters connected with land-tenure. The MS. is in the Public Record Office.

DOMETT, ALFRED (1811-87), educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, and a barrister of the Middle Temple, emigrated to New Zealand. He was a friend of R. Browning, who lamented his departure in 'Waring' (q.v.). Domett was author of 'Ranolf and Amohia, a South Sea Day Dream' (1872) and 'Flotsam and Jetsam' (1877). Of these poems the former is a story of Maori life, and contains beautiful descriptions of New Zealand scenery.

Dominicans, an order of mendicant friars instituted in 1215 by the Spanish ecclesiastic, Domingo de Guzman, also called St. Dominic. They were known in England as the Black Friars from the colour of their dress.

DON JUAN

Dôn, the British equivalent of the Gaelic Danu (q.v.), the mother of the gods.

Don Carlos (1788-1855), second son of Charles IV of Spain, a claimant to the Spanish throne, deprived of the position of heir presumptive by the abolition of the Salic law (pragmatic sanction of 1830). His son and grandson were likewise claimants. CARLIST risings in their favour are frequently referred to.

Don John of Austria, see John.

Don Carlos, a tragedy by Otway (q.v.), in rhymed verse, produced in 1676.

Philip II, king of Spain, having married Elizabeth of Valois, who had been affianced to his son Don Carlos, is stirred to jealousy by their mutual affection. This jealousy is inflamed by the machinations of Ruy Gomez and his wife the duchess of Eboli, till he believes in their guilty relations; he causes the queen to be poisoned and Don Carlos takes his own life, the king discovering too late their innocence.

Don Juan, according to a Spanish story first dramatized by Gabriel Tellez (1571-1641, who wrote under the pseudonym of Tirso de Molina) in 'El Burlador de Sevilla', and subsequently by Molière in 'Le Festin de Pierre', and in Mozart's great opera 'Don Giovanni', was Don Juan Tenorio, of Seville. Having attempted to ravish Doña Anna, the daughter of the commander of Seville, he is surprised by the father, whom he kills in a duel. A statue of the commander is erected over his tomb. Juan and his cowardly servant Leporello visit the tomb, when the statue is seen to move its head. Juan jestingly invites it to a banquet. The statue comes, seizes Juan, and delivers him to devils. Don Juan is the proverbial heartless and impious seducer. His injured wife is Elvira.

Don Juan is the theme of a play by Shadwell (q.v.), 'The Libertine'; and of a poem by Lord Byron (see below). For R. Browning's Don Juan, see Fifine at the Fair; and for G. B. Shaw's, see Man and Superman.

Don Juan, an epic satire in ottava rima, in sixteen cantos by Lord Byron (q.v.), published in 1819-24.

Don Juan, a young gentleman of Seville, in consequence of an intrigue with Donna Julia, is sent abroad by his mother at the age of 16. The vessel in which he travels is wrecked and crew and passengers take to the long-boat. After much suffering, in the course of which first Juan's spaniel, then his tutor, are eaten by the crew, Juan is cast up on a Greek island. He is restored to life by Haidée, the beautiful daughter of a Greek pirate, and the pair fall in love. The father, who is thought dead, returns, finds the lovers together, and cuts down Juan, who is placed in chains on one of the pirate's ships. Haidée goes mad and dies, and Juan is sold as a slave in Constantinople to a sultan who has fallen in love with him. He has the misfortune to arouse her jealousy, is menaced with death, but escapes to the Russian army which is besieging Ismail. In consequence of his gallant conduct at the capture of the town, he is sent with dispatches to St. Petersburg, where he attracts the favour of the Empress Catharine. The latter sends him on a political mission to England. The last cantos (the poem is unfinished) are taken up with a satirical description of social conditions in England, and in a less degree with the love-affairs of Juan. With the story are intermingled innumerable digressions on every sort of subject, treated in a mocking vein; and with attacks on the victims of Byron's scorn or enmity, Southey, Coleridge, Wellington, Lord Londonderry, and many others. The lovely lyric, 'The Isles of Greece', occurs in canto iii.

Don Juan himself is a charming, handsome, and unprincipled young man, who delights in succumbing to the beautiful women he meets, but he is little more than the connecting thread in a vast social comedy intershot with Byron's passionate wit. The form of the poem was inspired by the 'Whistlecraft' of J. H. Frere (q.v.).

Don Quixote de la Mancha, a satirical romance by Cervantes (q.v.), published in 1605, a second part appearing in 1615.

Cervantes gave to this work the form of a burlesque of the romances of chivalry, which were already losing their popularity with his countrymen. But he soon ceased to write mere burlesque; the character of the hero gradually deepens and the work becomes a criticism of life, which Spaniards accept as permanent and universal. The substance of the story is as follows. Don Quixote, a poor gentleman of La Mancha, a man of amiable character, and otherwise sane, has had his wits disordered by inordinate devotion to such tales, and imagines himself called upon to roam the world in search of adventures, on his old horse (Rosinante), and accoutred in rusty armour, accompanied by a squire in the rustic Sancho Panza, a curious mixture of credulity and shrewdness, whom he lures with the prospect of the governorship of an island. He conforms to chivalric tradition in nominating a good-looking girl of a neighbouring village to be mistress of his heart, under the style of Dulcinea del Toboso, an honour of which she is entirely unaware. To the disordered imagination of the knight the most commonplace objects assume fearful or romantic forms, and he is consequently involved in the most absurd adventures with distressing consequences to himself. Finally one of his friends, the bachelor Samson Carrasco, in order to force him to return to his home, disguises himself as a knight, overthrows Don Quixote, and requires him to abstain for a year from chivalrous exploits. This period Don Quixote resolves to spend as a shepherd, living a pastoral life, but falling sick on his return to his village, after a few days he dies.

The above story, as has been said, consists of two parts. After the first had been published, a continuation was issued by a writer who styled himself Alonso Fernandez de Avellaneda. This forgery, which Cervantes appears to have resented, stimulated him to write his own Part II. The book was translated into English, as early as 1612, by Thomas Shelton, and in 1700-3 by Motteux (q.v.); and the plots of several 17th-cent. English plays have been traced to it.

Don Raphael and Ambrose Lamela, in Le Sage's 'Gil Blas' (q.v.), a pair of cunning rogues who appear from time to time in the course of the story, and are finally among the victims at an auto-da-fé.

Don Saltero's Coffee-house, founded by John Salter about 1690, stood in Cheyne Walk, Chelsea. It was still in existence when Carlyle moved into Cheyne Row in 1834. There is at present on its site a house called Don Salteros.

Don Sebastian, a tragi-comedy, by Dryden (q.v.), published in 1691.

The play is based on the legend that Sebastian (q.v.) king of Portugal survived the battle of Alcazar. He is presented as a captive of Muley Moluch, the Moor, together with Almeyda, a princess of the royal house, with whom Sebastian is in love. Muley Moluch, moved by Sebastian's courage and dignity, spares his life; but on learning that he has used his liberty to marry Almeyda (of whom Muley Moluch has become violently enamoured), orders his execution. The person charged to carry it out is Dorax, a noble Portuguese, who, in consequence of what he considers unjust treatment by Don Sebastian in the past, has turned renegade and is now governor of the fortress. Dorax, however, saves Sebastian, desiring a more honourable revenge. Muley Moluch is killed in a revolt, and Almeyda and Sebastian are established in control of the kingdom. But, horrified at the discovery that they have the same father, Sebastian becomes an anchorite and Almeyda takes the veil. There is a fine scene where Dorax, after having saved Sebastian, reveals himself as the aggrieved Don Alonzo, and demands satisfaction; a scene which ends in a display of generosity on each side and reconciliation. The author uses the character of the Mufti to ridicule the Christian clergy.

Donation of Constantine, THE, the supposed grant by the Emperor Constantine to Pope Silvester of temporal power over Rome and Italy, in gratitude for his own conversion to Christianity. The grant, which was probably forged at Rome in the 8th cent., is included in the False Decretals (q.v.).

Donatists, a Christian sect which arose in North Africa in A.D. 311 out of a dispute concerning the election of a bishop of Carthage. They maintained that their own party was the only true Church, and that the baptisms and ordinations of others were invalid. Their name was derived from Donatus, a supporter of Majorinus (the bishop elected by the Donatists), or from Donatus the Great, who succeeded Majorinus as bishop. [OED.]

DONATUS, AELIUS, a grammarian who taught at Rome in the 4th cent. and had St. Jerome among his pupils. He was the author of a Latin grammar, 'Ars Grammatica', known as the 'Donet' or 'Donat', which has served as the basis of later works. A 'Donet' is hence used for an introduction to, or the elements of, any art or science. It is mentioned in 'Piers Plowman', A, v. 123, and other early English works. The original 'Donat' is ridiculed by Rabelais as one of the works in which Thubal Holofernes instructed the youthful Gargantua (q.v., i. xiv).

Donet or DONAT, see Donatus.

DONNE, JOHN (1571 or 1572–1631), the son of a London ironmonger and of a daughter of J. Heywood (q.v.) the author, was educated both at Oxford and Cambridge, and was entered at Lincoln's Inn. He was in the early part of his life a Roman Catholic. He was secretary to Sir T. Egerton, keeper of the great seal from 1598 to 1602, but alienated his favour by a secret marriage with Anne More, niece of the lord keeper's wife. He sailed in the two expeditions of Essex, to Cadiz and to the Islands, in 1596 and 1597, an episode of which we have a reflection in his early poems 'The Storm' and 'The Calm'. He took Anglican orders in 1615 and preached sermons which rank among the best of the 17th cent. From 1621 to his death he was dean of St. Paul's and frequently preached before Charles I.

In verse he wrote satires, epistles, elegies, and miscellaneous poems, distinguished by wit, profundity of thought and erudition, passion, and subtlety, coupled with a certain roughness of form ('I sing not Syren-like to tempt; for I am harsh'). He was the greatest of the writers of 'metaphysical' poetry, in which passion is interwoven with reasoning. Among his more important poems is the satirical 'Progresse of the Soule', begun in 1601, in which, adopting the doctrine of metempsychosis, he traces the migration of the soul of Eve's apple through the bodies of various heretics. But he left the work uncompleted. His best-known poems are some of the miscellaneous ones, 'The Ecstasie', 'Hymn to God the Father', the sonnet to Death ('Death, be not proud'), 'Go and catch a falling star', &c. They include also a fine funeral elegy (in 'Anniversaries') on the death of Elizabeth Drury, and an 'Epithalamium' on the marriage of the Count Palatine and the Princess Elizabeth, 1613. Thomas Carew described him as a king who ruled as he thought fit

The universal monarchy of wit, and Ben Jonson wrote of him that he was 'the first poet in some things'.

Imperfect collections of his poems appeared in 1633–49, and 'Letters' by him in 1651. His poems were edited by Dr. Grosart in 1872–3, by C. E. Norton in 1895, by E. K. Chambers in 1896, and by H. J. C. Grierson (Oxford English Texts, 1912; Oxford Poets, 1929), the standard edition. A biography of Donne was written by Izaak Walton, published in 1640, another by E. Gosse in 1899. His name is pronounced and was frequently spelt 'Dunne'.

DORICOURT

Donnithorne, ARTHUR, a character in George Eliot's 'Adam Bede' (q.v.).

Donnybrook, a village near Dublin, famous for its fair, the scene of much riotous jollity, dating from the time of King John, and suppressed in the 19th cent.

Donzel, from Latin dominicellus, diminutive of dominus, a young gentleman not yet knighted, a squire or page. 'Damsel' is the feminine form.

Dooley, Mr., see Dunne.

Doolin of Mayence, the subject of a French chanson de geste of the 13th cent., and of a prose romance of the 15th cent. He was reputed an ancestor of Ogier the Dane (q.v.).

Doomsday Book, see Domesday Book.

Doomster, in a Scottish court of law, the officer (usually the executioner) who formerly read or repeated the sentence.

Doorm, EARL, a character in Tennyson's 'Idylls of the King' ('Geraint and Enid', q.v.).

Dora, the popular name for the Defence of the Realm Act, 1914, under which many regulations restrictive of liberty were issued.

Dora Spenlow, in Dickens's 'David Copperfield' (q.v.), the hero's 'child-wife'.

Dorastus and Fawnia, see Pandosto.

Dorax, a character in Dryden's 'Don Sebastian' (q.v.).

Dorcas Society, a ladies' association, connected with a church, for the purpose of making clothes for the poor; called after the Dorcas mentioned in Acts ix. 36.

Dorian Mode, in music, one of the ancient Greek modes, of a simple and solemn character, a minor scale appropriate to earnest or warlike melodies (Jebb).

Doric, derived from Doris, a small country in Greece, south of Thessaly, the home of the Dorians, one of the principal Hellenic races. From Doris the Dorians migrated to the Peloponnese (Herodotus i. 56). The word is used to signify rustic, as in

With eager thought warbling his Doric lay.
(Milton, 'Lycidas'.)

It is used also of a 'broad' or rustic dialect of English, as that of the north of England, and Scotland.

DORIC ORDER, in architecture, one of the three Grecian orders (Doric, Ionic, Corinthian); of which it is the oldest, strongest, and simplest.

Doricourt, a character in Mrs. Cowley's 'The Belle's Stratagem' (q.v.).

DORIGEN

Dorigen, the heroine of the Franklin's Tale, in Chaucer's 'Canterbury Tales' (q.v.).

Dorimant, a character in Etherege's 'The Man of Mode' (q.v.).

Dorothea, the heroine of 'Hermann and Dorothea', a poem by Goethe (q.v.).

Dorothea, St., a Christian martyr who suffered in the persecution under Diocletian (303). She is commemorated on 6 February. Her story forms the subject of Massinger's 'The Virgin-Martyr' (q.v.).

Dorothea Brooke, the heroine of G. Eliot's 'Middlemarch' (q.v.).

D'Orsay, ALFRED GUILLAUME GABRIEL (1801-52), a Frenchman who, coming to London in 1821, soon made himself famous as a wit, a dandy, and an artist. He was adopted by the Earl and Countess of Blessington. In 1823, with his benefactors, he travelled to Genoa, where he met Byron and made a rapid pencil sketch of the poet which has survived. In 1827 he married Lady Harriet Gardiner, Lord Blessington's daughter by a former marriage, but a separation took place almost immediately. He was prominent in the society of Gore House, at which Lady Blessington entertained all literary, political, and artistic London.

Dorset, EARL OF, see under Sackville (C.) and Sackville (T.).

DOS PASSOS, JOHN (1896-), American novelist, born at Chicago. His chief books are: 'Three Soldiers' (1921), 'Manhattan Transfer' (1925), 'The 42nd Parallel' (1930). Dos Passos is one of the most read of the younger American novelists, and is well known in this country. He has developed a technique by which he obtains a remarkable atmosphere of stress and hustle. This he does, mostly, by alternating in rapid sequence scenes from a great number of individual lives and groups, throwing them together so that he obtains a cinematographic effect.

DOSTOEVSKY, FEODOR MICHAELOVICH (1821-81), Russian novelist, who in 1849 was condemned to death for revolutionary activities, and spent years of hard labour in the Siberian mines. The first of his novels was 'Poor People' (1846), followed by 'Letters from a Dead House' (1861-2), his masterpiece 'Crime and Punishment' (1866), 'The Idiot' (1866), 'The Possessed' (1871), and the unfinished 'The Brothers Karamazov' (1880). Dostoevsky 'extended the boundaries and enlarged the horizons of the novel by exploring the dark places of the human spirit . . . he abstracted mind and will and passion from their background of names and clothes and addresses, and exhibited them in pure disembodied states of being' (T.L.S., 5 June 1930).

Dotheboys Hall, in Dickens's 'Nicholas Nickleby' (q.v.), the school conducted by Mr. Squeers.

Double Dealer, The, a comedy by Congreve (q.v.), produced in 1694.

Mellefont, nephew and prospective heir of Lord Touchwood, is about to marry Cynthia, daughter of Sir Paul Plyant. Lady Touchwood, a violent dissolute woman, is in love with Mellefont, but as he rejects her advances, determines to prevent the match and ruin him in Lord Touchwood's esteem. In this design she finds a confederate in Maskwell, the Double Dealer, who has been her lover, pretends to be Mellefont's friend, and aspires to cheat him of Cynthia and get her for himself. To this end he leads Plyant to suspect an intrigue between Mellefont and Lady Plyant, and Touchwood an intrigue between Mellefont and Lady Touchwood; and contrives that Touchwood shall find Mellefont in the latter's chamber. Mellefont is disinherited and Cynthia is to be made over to Maskwell. The latter's plot, however, here goes wrong. Lord Touchwood informs Lady Touchwood of Maskwell's intention to marry Cynthia. This awakens her jealousy. She finds Maskwell and upbraids him, and is overheard by Lord Touchwood, who now perceives Maskwell's treachery, and defeats his final attempt to carry off Cynthia.

Double Decent, The, or, The Cure for Jealousy, a lively comedy by William Popple (1701-64), produced in 1735. Two young men, whom it is proposed to marry to two heiresses who are unknown to them, conspire to defeat the project. They arrange to exchange places with their valets, who are to court the ladies. The ladies, apprised of the trick, exchange places with their maids. But the pseudo-valets fall in love with the pseudo-maids, and all ends well.

Doubloon, a Spanish gold coin, originally double the value of a pistole (q.v.), i.e. = 33 to 36 shillings English.

Doubting Castle, in Bunyan's 'Pilgrim's Progress' (q.v.), the castle of Giant Despair.

Doucepers, see Douxepers.

DOUGHTY, CHARLES MONTAGU (1843-1926), educated at Caius College, Cambridge, is principally remembered for his remarkable record of 'Travels in Arabia Deserta' carried out in 1876-8, first published in 1888 (republished in 1920 and 1921). It is notable for its style, in which Chaucerian and Elizabethan English is mixed with Arabic. Doughty also wrote a number of poems: 'The Dawn in Britain' (6 vols., 1906), 'Adam cast forth' (a sacred drama, 1908), 'The Cliffs' (1909), 'The Clouds' (1912), 'The Titans' (1916), 'Mansoul, or the Riddle of the World' (1920).

Douglas, a romantic tragedy by J. Home (q.v.), based on a Scottish ballad, and acted in 1756.

Old Norval, the shepherd, brings up the infant son of Douglas and Sir Malcolm's daughter, who after his birth has married Lord Randolph. The child has been exposed owing to Sir Malcolm's hatred. Known as Young Norval, he saves the life of Lord Randolph, and is given a commission in the army. Hated and traduced by Glenalvon, Lord Randolph's heir-presumptive, he is waylaid, slays Glenalvon, but is himself killed by Lord Randolph. His identity is discovered, and his mother in despair takes her own life.

DOUGLAS

Douglas, ARCHIBALD, fifth earl of Angus (Bell-the-cat, q.v.), figures in Sir W. Scott's 'Marmion' (q.v.).

Douglas, THE BLACK, a name applied to two of the Douglasses:

(1) Sir James Douglas (1286?-1330), who in 1319, in the days of Robert Bruce and Edward II, invaded England and plundered many towns and villages in the North. 'It was said that the name of this indefatigable and successful chief had become so formidable that women used in the northern counties to still their froward children by threatening them with the Black Douglas' (Scott, 'History of Scotland', ch. xi). He three times destroyed an English garrison in his castle of Douglas, which he burnt twice (see Douglas Larder), and it is on one of these incidents that Scott bases the story of his 'Castle Dangerous' (q.v.). After the conclusion of peace with Edward III, James Douglas set out on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, carrying the heart of Bruce, but was killed on the way, fighting the Moors in Andalusia.

(2) Sir William Douglas, Lord of Nithsdale (d. 1392?), illegitimate son of Archibald, third earl of Douglas. He married a daughter of Robert II and received the lordship of Nithsdale in 1387. In 1388 he made a retaliatory raid on Ireland, burning Carlingford and plundering the Isle of Man.

Douglas, ELLEN, heroine of Sir W. Scott's 'Lady of the Lake' (q.v.).

DOUGLAS, GAWIN or GAVIN (1474?-1522), Scottish poet and bishop of Dunkeld, was third son of Archibald, fifth earl of Angus. He wrote two allegorical poems, 'The Palace of Honour' (first published 1553?) and 'King Hart' (first printed 1786); also a translation of the 'Aeneid' with prologues (1553), which constitutes him the earliest translator of the classics into English; probably there were earlier editions published both of the 'Aeneid' and of 'The Palace of Honour'. There is an edition of Douglas's works by John Small of Edinburgh (1874).

Douglas, SIR JAMES and SIR WILLIAM, see Douglas (The Black, 1) and (2).

DOUGLAS, NORMAN, contemporary writer. Among his works are 'Alone' (1921), 'South Wind' (1917), 'In the Beginning' (1928), 'Three of Them' (1930).

Douglas Larder, THE: the English in the time of Edward I had placed a garrison in Douglas Castle and stored it with provisions for the English army. Sir James Douglas (q.v.) surprised the garrison on Palm Sunday 1306-7 and got possession of the castle. He broke up the barrels of provisions, killed his prisoners and threw in their dead bodies; and then set fire to the castle. (Scott, 'Tales of a Grandfather', ch. ix.)

Douglas Tragedy, The, a ballad included in Scott's 'Border Minstrelsy', the story of the carrying off of Lady Margaret by Lord William Douglas. They are pursued by her father and seven brothers, who fall in the ensuing fight. But Lord William dies of his wounds, and Lady Margaret does not survive him.

Dousterswivel, HERMAN, a character in Scott's 'The Antiquary' (q.v.).

Doucepers, DOUCEPERS, in the Carolingian romances, the twelve peers or paladins of Charlemagne, said to be attached to his person as being the bravest of his knights. Spenser in the 'Faerie Queene', III. x. 31, likens Braggadochio to 'a doughty Doucepere'.

Dove Cottage, a short distance from the NE. shore of Grasmere Lake, taken by Wordsworth and his sister at the end of 1799 when they migrated to the Lakes. They occupied it till the end of 1807.

Dover, CAPTAIN ROBERT, see Cotswold Games.

DOWDEN, EDWARD (1843-1913), educated at Queen's College, Cork, and Trinity College, Dublin, became professor of English literature at the latter in 1867. He was noted as a Shakespearian scholar, publishing in 1875 'Shakespeare, his Mind and Art', and his 'Shakespeare Primer' in 1877, followed by editions of many single plays. He wrote a number of other volumes of criticism, the standard 'Life of Shelley' (1886), and short biographies of Southey, Browning, and Montaigne.

Dowel, Dobet, Dobest, characters in 'Piers Plowman' (q.v.), Passus IX.

DOWLAND, JOHN (1563?-1626?), lutanist and composer, published three books of 'Songes or Ayres of Foure Partes with Tableture for the Lute' (1597, 1600, and 1603). He dedicated his 'Lachrymae' to Anne of Denmark, and was lutanist to Charles I, 1625.

Down with Knavery, see Hey for Honesty.

Downing, SIR GEORGE (1623?-84), soldier, diplomat, and politician, was scout-master-general of Cromwell's army in Scotland in 1650 and headed the movement for offering Cromwell the crown. He was British resident at The Hague both under Cromwell and Charles II, and M.P. for Morpeth in 1670.

DOWNING STREET, Westminster, No. 10 of which is the official residence of the prime minister, is named after the above. The street also contains the official residence of the chancellor of the exchequer, and the foreign and colonial offices stand on its S. side. So that 'Downing Street' is often used to signify the British government.

Sir George Downing (1684?-1749), the grandson of the above, left estates from the proceeds of which, after much litigation, DOWNING COLLEGE, Cambridge, was founded.

DOWSABEL, an English form of the Latin female name Dulcibella, used generically for a sweetheart.

DOWSON, ERNEST (1867-1900), author of a book of remarkable poems (1896), of which the best known is 'Non sum qualis eram . . .' with the refrain 'I have been faithful to thee, Cynara! in my fashion'.

DOYLE, SIR ARTHUR CONAN (1859-1930), educated at Stonyhurst and Edinburgh University, adopted the profession of medicine and practised at Southsea, 1882-90. He will be remembered chiefly for his creation of the amateur detective, Sherlock Holmes (q.v.), embodied in a cycle of stories ('The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes' (1891), 'The Memoirs of Sherlock Holmes' (1894), and others), and of his friend and foil Dr. Watson. Doyle's first work of fiction, 'A Study in Scarlet' (also a Holmes story), appeared in 1887, and was followed by a series of historical and other romances for half a century. Notable among them may be mentioned 'Micah Clarke' (1889), 'The White Company' (1891), 'The Exploits of Brigadier Gerard' (1896), 'Rodney Stone' (1896). His patriotism was shown in his pamphlet 'The Great Boer War' (1900), designed to place the true facts of that war before the world. His 'Story of Waterloo', a one-act play (1900), originally 'A Straggler of '15', furnished Sir Henry Irving with one of his most successful parts. He wrote a 'History of Spiritualism' (1926), a subject in which during his later years he was much interested.

DOYLE, SIR FRANCIS HASTINGS CHARLES (1810-88), second baronet, was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, and became fellow of All Souls and professor of poetry at Oxford. He published several volumes of verse, including ballads on military subjects ('The Loss of the Birkenhead', 'The Red Thread of Honour', and 'The Private of the Buffs').

Doyle, RICHARD (1824-83), artist and caricaturist. He designed the cover of 'Punch' (q.v.), and contributed to that periodical from 1843 to 1850, when he severed his connexion with it owing to its strong anti-Papal tone (Doyle was a devout Catholic). Among his best-known drawings were the 'Brown, Jones, and Robinson' (q.v.) series. He also illustrated Ruskin's 'King of the Golden River' (1851), Thackeray's 'The Newcomes' (1853-5), and other books.

Drachenfels, a mountain in the Siebengebirge on the Rhine, in which is the Drachenhöhle or dragon's cave, the lair of the dragon killed by Siegfried (q.v.).

Draco, a celebrated lawgiver of Athens, whose code (621 B.C.) was noted for its severity; hence the adjective 'draconian' = 'severe'.

DRAKE

Dragon of Wantley. The, a humorous ballad, probably of the 17th cent., satirizing the old verse romances. It tells of a Yorkshire dragon that devoured children and cattle, and was killed by More of More Hall. The ballad is included in Percy's 'Reliques', the editor of which provides the following key: Wantley is Wharnccliffe, in the parish of Penniston, Yorks. A conflict having arisen between the parishioners and Sir Francis Wortley (the dragon) with regard to the tithes, More of More Hall as attorney or counsellor conducted the suit, which was decided in favour of the parishioners. For another explanation see Lockhart's 'Scott', ch. xii.

A burlesque opera called the 'Dragon of Wantley' by Henry Carey (q.v.) was produced in 1734. The inn at Barchester mentioned by Trollope (passim) is 'The Dragon of Wantley'.

Dragon's Teeth, see Cadmus.

Dragonnades, a series of persecutions directed by Louis XIV against the Protestants of France, so called because dragoons were quartered upon them. Hence the word 'dragoonade' is applied to any persecution with the help of troops.

Drake, SIR FRANCIS (1540?-96), circumnavigator and admiral, was born at Tavistock, Devonshire. His early sea-career is uncertain, but he was undoubtedly engaged in the Guinea trade with Sir John Hawkins. He commanded the 'Judith' in Hawkins's ill-fated expedition to San Juan de Ulloa of 1567, and made three voyages to the W. Indies in 1570-2. In 1577 he set out in the 'Pelican' (afterwards renamed 'The Golden Hind') for the river Plate, sailed through the Straits of Magellan (after executing Thomas Doughty, one of his officers, on a charge of conspiracy), plundered Valparaiso, rounded the Cape of Good Hope, and completed the circumnavigation of the world. He was knighted by Elizabeth on his return in 1581. Under a commission from Elizabeth he plundered St. Iago and burnt Vigo in 1585, and took San Domingo and Cartagena. In 1587 he destroyed a Spanish armament in the harbour of Cadiz, unaware that the order to commit acts of war, in so far as it extended to Spanish territory, had been withdrawn. Drake, as vice-admiral, commanded one of the divisions of the English fleet against the Armada, which he defeated off Gravelines and pursued to the north of Scotland. He was subsequently associated with Sir John Norris in an expedition which in 1589 plundered Coruña and destroyed much Spanish shipping. Drake died in January 1596 off Portobello in the course of an unsuccessful expedition with Sir John Hawkins to the W. Indies; Hawkins had died on the same expedition a few weeks before Drake. The narratives of some of his expeditions figure in Hakluyt and Purchas, and he became the hero of many legends.

DRAKE

DRAKE, JOSEPH RODMAN (1795–1820), American poet, born in New York City, author of a fantastic poem, 'The Culprit Fay'. His collected verse, 'The Culprit Fay and Other Poems', was published in 1835.

Drama of Exile, A, a poem by E. B. Brownning (q.v.).

Dramatis Personae, a collection of poems by R. Browning (q.v.), published in 1864, three years after his wife's death. The collection includes 'Abt Vogler' (q.v.), 'Prospice', 'Rabbi Ben Ezra' (q.v.), 'A Death in the Desert', and the longer pieces 'Caliban upon Setebos' (q.v.) and 'Mr. Sludge, "The Medium"' (q.v.).

Draper, Mrs. ELIZA (1744–78), wife of Daniel Draper (an official in the service of the East India Company), with whom Sterne (q.v.) had one of his love-affairs. She is the 'Eliza' and the 'Bramine' of the 'Journal to Eliza' and of the 'Letters from Yorick to Eliza'.

Drapier's Letters, The, published by Swift (q.v.) in 1724. The word 'Drapier' = 'Draper'.

A patent had been granted to the duchess of Kendal for supplying copper coins for use in Ireland, and by her had been sold to a certain William Wood for £10,000. The profit on the patent would have been apparently some £25,000. In 1723 the Irish houses of parliament voted addresses protesting against the transaction. Swift took up the cudgels on behalf of the Irish. Writing in the character of a Dublin draper, he published a series of four letters in which he prophesied ruin to the Irish if 'Wood's half-pence' were admitted into circulation. The letters produced an immense effect, and the government was forced to abandon the project and compensate Wood.

Drawcansir, a character in Buckingham's 'The Rehearsal' (q.v.), parodying Almanzor in Dryden's 'Conquest of Granada' (q.v.).

DRAWCANSIR, SIR ALEXANDER, pseudonym of H. FIELDING (q.v.).

DRAYTON, MICHAEL (1563–1631), born at Hartshill in Warwickshire, but of the details of whose life little is known, produced a vast quantity of historical, topographical, and religious verse, besides odes, sonnets, and satires. His earliest work was a volume of sacred verse, the 'Harmonie of the Church', paraphrases of songs and prayers from the O.T. and Apocrypha, published in 1591. In 1593 he published 'Idea, the Shepherds Garland', eclogues in the tradition of Spenser, praising Elizabeth, lamenting Sir P. Sidney, &c., and containing pleasant songs. These were republished with alterations as 'Eglogs' c. 1605 in 'Poems Lyrick and Pastoral', and as 'Pastorals' in 1619. Drayton's 'Ideas Mirrour', a series of sonnets, many of them inspired by French originals, and including the magnificent 'Since there's no help, come let us kiss and part', was published in 1594. The lady referred to under the name 'Idea' was probably Anne, second daughter of Sir Henry Goodere, an early patron of Drayton. 'Endimion and Phœbe', a pastoral, was written about 1595.

DREAMS

Drayton's great topographical poem on England, 'Polyolbion' (q.v.), was completed in 1622. 'The Owle', a satire, appeared in 1604; and 'Poemes Lyrick and Pastoral', containing the splendid 'Ballad of Agincourt' ('Fair stood the wind for France'), the ode 'To the Virginian Voyage', and some other notable odes on the Anacreontic model, c. 1605. 'Nimphidia' (q.v.) and other poems, including two pleasant pastorals and the interesting autobiographical and critical letter in verse 'To Henry Reynolds', appeared in 1627.

Drayton's chief historical poems were 'Piers Gaveston', c. 1593; 'Matilda', 1594; 'The Tragical Legend of Robert, Duke of Normandie', 1596; 'Mortimeriados', republished as 'The Barrons Wars', 1603; and the 'Legend of Great Cromwell', included in the 1610 edition of the 'Mirror for Magistrates' (q.v.). In 1597 appeared his 'England's Heroicall Epistles', imaginary letters in verse exchanged by historical personages, of whom there are twelve couples in the first edition of the work, such as Henry II and Fair Rosamund, Edward IV and Jane Shore, Lord Guildford Dudley and Lady Jane Grey. Drayton was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Dreadnought, the name of a large battleship, the first of its class (having ten 12-inch guns in five turrets, turbine engines, and other innovations), built for the British navy in 1905. It was the name of a queen's ship in Elizabeth's reign. A ship of the same name was engaged at the battle of Trafalgar and subsequently served as a hospital for seamen of all nations, now replaced by the Seamen's Hospital at Greenwich.

Dream, The, a poem by Lord Byron (q.v.), written in 1816 and inspired by his love for Mary Chaworth.

Dream of Fair Women, A, a poem by A. Tennyson (q.v.).

Dream of Gerontlus, see Neuman.

Dream of the Rood, The, an OE. poem, attributed by some to Cædmon (q.v.), by others to Cynewulf (q.v.). It consists of a narrative introduction, relating the vision of the cross, and the poet's emotions in its presence; followed by the address of the visionary cross to the poet, telling of the crucifixion and resurrection, his reflections thereon, and allusions to the sufferings of spirits in hell and the joys of saints and angels in heaven.

The poem is included in the Vercelli MS. and parts of it are inscribed in runes on the Ruthwell Cross in Annandale.

Dreams, GATES OF, according to Greek legend, the ivory gate and the gate of horn, through which false and true dreams respectively issue. There is a reference to them in the 'Odyssey', xix. 562, and in the 'Aeneid', vi. 894 et seq.

DREISER, THEODORE (1871-), American novelist, born in Indiana. His chief books are: 'Sister Carrie' (1900), 'The Financier' (1912), 'The Genius' (1915), 'A Book about Myself' (1922), 'An American Tragedy' (1925), 'Dawn' (autobiographical, 1931). Dreiser's mood is one of austere, humourless, but very powerful realism, written in a rugged and ugly style. He may be said to carry into American fiction the tradition of Zola.

Dreme, The, see Lindsay (Sir D.).

Dresden China: Augustus, elector of Saxony (1670-1733), formed a collection of Chinese and Japanese porcelain and established experimental pottery works at Dresden. Here Böttger discovered how to make a porcelain resembling the Chinese ware, first exhibited in 1710. The manufacture was conducted with extreme secrecy at Meissen near Dresden, where the factory remained until the 19th cent., its products being known as Dresden china. Here Kandler, the chief modeller of the factory from 1731 to 1775, produced the little statuettes and groups particularly associated with the name.

Dreyfus, ALFRED (1859-1935), an officer in the French army, famous owing to the judicial miscarriage which caused his imprisonment and the fierce controversy which preceded his rehabilitation. In 1894 a letter (known as the bordereau or schedule), addressed to the German military attaché in Paris and enumerating a number of documents which were to be sent to the latter, was purloined from the German embassy and handed to the French Ministry of War. Owing to the similarity of the handwriting of this unsigned letter to that of Dreyfus, who held an appointment at the ministry, he was arrested, tried, and convicted, and sent to the Devil's Island off the coast of Guiana. In 1896 Col. Picquart came accidentally upon evidence indicating that the true criminal was a certain Major Esterhazy. But the strongest opposition, involving the use of forgery, intimidation, and a violent anti-semitic press campaign, was raised to the reopening of the question of the guilt of Dreyfus. In the course of this controversy, Émile Zola published his famous letter, entitled 'J'accuse', in 'L'Aurore' (Jan. 1898), and was condemned in consequence to a year's imprisonment. It was not until 1906 that the sentence condemning Dreyfus was finally quashed by the Court of Appeal. The controversy gave rise to the term DREYFUSARD, to signify a supporter of the innocence of Dreyfus. Extracts from the papers of Col. Schwartzkoppen, the German military attaché in Paris at the time, confirming Esterhazy's guilt, appeared in 1930.

DRINKWATER, JOHN (1882-1937), poet and dramatist, is perhaps best known for his fine historical play 'Abraham Lincoln' (1918).

DRUM'S ENTERTAINMENT

His published works include other historical plays on 'Oliver Cromwell' (1921), 'Mary Stuart' (1921), and 'Robert E. Lee' (1923), several volumes of verse, an edition of Sir Philip Sidney's poems, studies of William Morris (1912) and Swinburne (1913), &c. He published in 1930 a life of Pepys. His autobiography was published in 1931-2.

DROESHOUT, MARTIN (fl. 1620-51), engraver; see Shakespeare.

Droit d'aubaine, a right claimed by French kings, in default of treaty to the contrary, to the property of any alien who died in their country. It was abolished in 1790, re-established by Napoleon I, and finally annulled in 1819. The etymology of aubaine is uncertain; Hatzfeldt and Darmesteter refer aubain, an alien, to a presumed late Latin form alibanum, from alibi.

Drolls or DROLL-HUMOURS, in Commonwealth days, when various devices were employed to evade the ordinance of 2 Sept. 1642 forbidding stage plays, were farces or comic scenes adapted from existing plays or invented by the actors, and produced generally on extemporized stages at fairs and in taverns. Among the subjects of such 'drolls' were Falstaff, the grave-diggers' colloquy in 'Hamlet', and Bottom the Weaver.

Dromio, the name of the twin slaves in Shakespeare's 'Comedy of Errors' (q.v.).

Drows, see Trows.

Drugger, ABEL, in Jonson's 'The Alchemist' (q.v.). One of Garrick's most famous parts.

Druidism, a religious system that prevailed among the ancient Celts of Gaul and Britain. According to Caesar the Druids were a learned and priestly class. They believed in the immortality and transmigration of the soul. Their rites were conducted in oak-groves, and the oak and mistletoe (q.v.) were objects of veneration to them. In Irish and Welsh legend they figure as magicians and soothsayers. After their defeat in Mona (Anglesey) by the Romans under Suetonius Paulinus, there is no further mention of their existence in England and Wales, but they survived in Ireland and north Britain.

The modern 'Druids' are a Friendly Society founded in England in 1781, and since extended to America and Australia.

Drum ecclesiastic, the pulpit, from the stanza in Butler's 'Hudibras' (q.v., i. i):

When Gospel trumpeter, surrounded
With long-eared rout, to battle sounded;
And pulpit, drum ecclesiastic,
Was beat with fist instead of a stick.

Drum's Entertainment, JACK or TOM, a rough reception, turning an unwelcome guest out of doors; 'to bale a man in by the head, and thrust him out by both the shoulders' (Holinshed). The expression occurs in Shakespeare, 'All's Well', III. vi.

DRUMMER

Drummer, The, a comedy by Addison (q.v.), produced in 1715. Sir George Truman, supposed to have been killed in the wars, returns after twelve months' captivity and ousts the suitors of Lady Truman, including one who, in order to forward his plans, has assumed the disguise of a ghostly drummer.

DRUMMOND, HENRY (1851-97), theological writer, author of 'Natural Law in the Spiritual World' (1883), 'Ascent of Man' (1894).

DRUMMOND, WILLIAM HENRY (1854-1907), Canadian poet, was born in Ireland and went to Canada with his family at the age of 11. He is the poet of the French-Canadian habitant and voyageur, and treats in simple homely verse of their oddities and backwoods life. He published 'The Habitant' (1897), 'Johnny Courteau' (1901), 'The Voyageur' (1905), 'The Great Fight' (1908).

DRUMMOND OF HAWTHORNDEN, WILLIAM (1585-1649), was born at the manor of Hawthornden near Edinburgh. He was educated at Edinburgh University, and travelled abroad. He was a friend of Drayton and an acquaintance of Ben Jonson, a Royalist and episcopalian, and he wrote pamphlets and verses in the Royalist cause. He had an unhappy love story: Mary Cunningham of Barns, to whom he was affianced, died on the eve of their wedding, and inspired many of his sonnets and songs. He also wrote elegies, satires, and hymns.

Drummond lamented Prince Henry in 'Tears on the Death of Mœliades' in 1613, and published 'Flowers of Zion' (religious verse) and 'The Cypress Grove', his finest work, a prose meditation on death, in 1623. He wrote a 'History of Scotland' from 1423 to 1524, which was first printed in 1655. He also left manuscript notes (printed in 1832) of a visit that Ben Jonson paid him. The first collected edition of his poems was issued in 1656, his complete works were printed in 1711, and there have been in the 19th cent. editions by Laing, by the Maitland Club, and a life of him by David Masson. There is a critical edition of the poems by L. E. Kastner, 1913.

Drury Lane, London, was so called from the Drury family, who had a large house there from Tudor times. The theatre of that name was originally a cock-pit in the Lane, converted into a theatre in James I's time. It was rebuilt by Thomas Killigrew (1612-83, q.v.), to whom Charles II granted a patent in 1662, again by Wren in 1674, and again in 1812. The reopening of the theatre on this last occasion was celebrated in 'Rejected Addresses' (q.v.). Booth, Garrick, Mrs. Siddons, Kemble, and Kean are among the famous actors who have been seen there. In the 19th cent. it was the great house of Christmas pantomimes.

Druses, or DRUZES, a political and religious sect, inhabiting the region round Mt. Lebanon, and the Hauran in Syria. They are believed to derive their name from Ismail al-Darazi, who in 1040 supported the claim of the tenth Fatimite Caliph, Hakim Biamrillah, to be a divine incarnation, and introduced this belief to the Lebanon. [OED.] Darazi was, however, declared apostate by Hamzah ibn Ali ibn Hamzah, who is regarded as the founder of their faith. The religious tenets of the Druses, a singularly exclusive body, are sedulously veiled in obscurity. See also Return of the Druses.

Dryads and Hamadryads, in the belief of the Greeks and Romans, were the nymphs (q.v.) of trees, and were thought to die with the trees that had been their abode.

Dryasdust, DR. JONAS, a fictitious character, a prosy antiquarian, to whom Sir W. Scott addresses the prefaces of some of his novels.

DRYDEN, JOHN (1631-1700), was born at the vicarage of Aldwinkle All Saints, between Thrapston and Oundle in Northamptonshire. He was educated at Westminster, under Busby, and at Trinity College, Cambridge. He had a small competence and is said to have attached himself to his wealthy cousin, Sir Gilbert Pickering, Cromwell's chamberlain. In 1658 he wrote his remarkable 'Heroic Stanzas' (quatrains) on the death of Cromwell; 'Astraea Redux' in 1660, on the return of Charles II, in which he first showed his mastery of the heroic couplet; and a 'Panegyric' on the Restoration in 1661. His early plays, 'The Wild Gallant' (in prose, acted in 1663) and 'The Rival Ladies' (acted in 1664), are not of great importance, except that the latter is an early example of the use of the rhymed couplet in dramatic verse. 'The Indian Emperor' (1665) (an heroic play dealing with the conquest of Mexico by Cortez, the love of the Emperor Montezuma's daughter for Cortez, and the death of father and daughter) was very popular and is one of the best of its kind. In 1663 Dryden married Lady Elizabeth Howard, eldest daughter of the earl of Berkshire. The marriage appears not to have been altogether a happy one, though there is no evidence of actual disunion. His wife survived him until 1714. In 1667 Dryden published his 'Annus Mirabilis' (q.v.). He was appointed poet laureate in 1668 and historiographer in 1670, and wrote some fourteen plays between 1668 and 1681. Of these the most important are the following: 'Tyrannic Love or the Royal Martyr' (q.v.), 1669, and 'Almanzor and Almahide or the Conquest of Granada' (q.v.), 1670; 'Amboyna', a tragedy in prose and blank verse produced in 1673, designed to exasperate the English against the Dutch by reviving the story of the massacre of some Englishmen at that place (in the Moluccas) by the Dutch in 1623; 'Aurengzebe' (q.v.), his last rhymed tragedy, 1676; the 'Spanish Fryar', 1681, an attack on the papists (Elvira with the aid of a friar carries on an intrigue with Lorenzo, who is discovered to be her brother). His best play and his first drama in blank verse, 'All for Love' (q.v.), a version of the story of Antony and Cleopatra, appeared in 1678. Of his earlier comedies the best is 'Marriage-à-la-Mode' (q.v.), produced in 1673; the 'Mock Astrologer' (1668), adapted from a play by Thomas Corneille, contains four fine songs. In 1679 he wrote an adaptation of 'Troilus and Cressida' (q.v.), 'which might', said George Saintsbury, 'much better have been left unattempted'. Dryden makes Cressida kill herself because her fidelity to Troilus is doubted; and Troilus kills Diomedes, and is in turn killed by Achilles; a commonplace solution.

In 1671 appeared the 'Rehearsal' (q.v.), attributed to Buckingham, satirizing the rhymed heroic plays of Dryden, D'Avenant, and others. In 1673 Dryden was engaged in a literary controversy with Elkanah Settle (q.v.), author of a series of bombastic dramas which enjoyed considerable popularity. In 1679, having incurred the ill-will of John Wilmot, second earl of Rochester, on account of a passage in the earl of Mulgrave's anonymous 'Essay on Satire', which was attributed to Dryden, the latter was attacked and beaten, at Rochester's instigation, by masked men in Rose Alley, Covent Garden.

Dryden wrote a number of critical pieces which generally took the form of prefaces to his plays; but one, the 'Essay of Dramatic Poesy' (q.v.), was an independent work. It was published in 1668. His 'Defence of the Epilogue' at the end of the 'Conquest of Granada' contains a criticism of Fletcher and of certain aspects of Shakespeare's writing; and the Dedication to 'Examem Poeticum' (vol. iii of 'Miscellany Poems') is another notable piece of critical work.

In 1680 began the period of Dryden's satirical and didactic poems. 'Absalom and Achitophel' (q.v.) appeared in 1681; 'The Medal' (q.v.) in 1682; 'Mac Flecknoe' (q.v.) piratically in 1682 (authorized ed. 1684, probably written c. 1679); 'Religio Laici' (q.v.) also in 1682; 'The Hind and the Panther' (q.v.) in 1687, after his conversion to Roman Catholicism in 1686. His Pindaric ode on the death of Charles II 'Threnodia Augustalis' and his much finer 'Ode to the Memory of Mrs. Anne Killigrew' (pronounced by Johnson to be the finest in the language) appeared in 1685 and 1686. (Anne Killigrew was a poetess and painter, who was drowned 'shooting' London Bridge.) His later dramas include two operas, 'Albion and Albanus' (1685) and 'King Arthur' (1691); 'Don Sebastian' (q.v.), a tragi-comedy, and 'Amphitryon' (q.v.), a comedy, both of the year 1690; and 'Cleomenes', a tragedy based on Plutarch's account of the Spartan hero, 1692. His last play was 'Love Triumphant', a tragi-comedy on the lines of 'Marriage-à-la-Mode', 1694.

Dryden refused to take the oaths at the Revolution and was deprived of the laureate-ship and of a place in the Customs that he had held since 1683. The last part of his life was occupied largely with translations, many of which appeared in 'Miscellany Poems' (1684 and later years). He translated in verse Persius and the Satires of Juvenal (1693), the whole of Virgil (the complete work appeared in 1697), and parts of Horace, Ovid, Homer, Theocritus, and Lucretius. The translation of Virgil was very successful, and according to Pope brought him in £1,200. The translation of Juvenal and Persius was prefaced by a 'Discourse concerning the Original and Progress of Satire' (1693). Dryden also paraphrased the Latin hymn 'Veni Creator Spiritus' ('Creator Spirit, by whose aid'), and Scott further attributed to him a version of the 'Te Deum' and of a hymn for the Nativity of St. John the Baptist. He wrote his famous second ode for St. Cecilia's day (the first 'Song for St. Cecilia's Day' was published in 1687), entitled 'Alexander's Feast', for a musical society in 1697; he thought it the best of all his poetry. His last great work was the collection of paraphrases of tales by Chaucer, Boccaccio, and Ovid, called 'Fables, Ancient and Modern' (q.v.), with a delightful preface, published late in 1699, shortly before his death in April 1700. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, in Chaucer's grave, and twenty years later a monument to him was erected there by John Sheffield, Lord Mulgrave (Duke of Buckingham).

Dryden's published works were very numerous; in addition to those referred to above, mention may be made of the following:

Poems—'Upon the death of Lord Hastings' (1649), contributed to 'Lachrymae Musarum' when Dryden was at Westminster; verses prefixed to John Hoddesdon's 'Sion and Parnassus' (1650); lines 'To My Lord Chancellor Clarendon' (1662) and 'Verses to Her Royal Highness the Duchess of York', Clarendon's daughter (1665); 'Britannia Rediviva: a Poem on the Birth of the Prince' (1688); 'Eleonora; a Panegyric Poem to the Memory of the Countess of Abingdon' (1692); 'An Ode, on the Death of Mr. Henry Purcell' (1696); the 'Secular Masque', prologue and epilogue, written for the revival of Fletcher's play, 'The Pilgrim' (1700). In addition Dryden wrote a large number of prologues and epilogues for his own plays and those of other authors, or to be spoken on special occasions.

Plays—'Secret Love, or the Maiden-Queen' (1668); 'Sir Martin Mar-all, or the Feign'd Innocence' (1668); 'The Tempest', an adaptation of Shakespeare's play by D'Avenant and Dryden (1670); 'The Assignation, or Love in a Nunnery' (1672); 'The State of Innocence, and Fall of Man', a dramatic version of Milton's 'Paradise Lost' (1677); 'Oedipus' (with Nathaniel Lee, 1679); 'The Kind Keeper, or Mr. Limberham' (1680); 'The Duke of Guise' (with Nathaniel Lee, 1683). Dryden also contributed to Sir Robert Howard's 'Indian Queen' (1665).

Prose Works—A life of Plutarch, prefixed to a translation of Plutarch's 'Lives' by several hands' (1683); part of 'A Defence of the Papers Written by the late King and Duchess of York' (1686); the 'Character of St. Evremont' in 'Miscellaneous Essays by St. Evremont' (1692); the 'Character of Polybius and his writings' in 'The History of Polybius translated by Sir H. S.' (1693-8); 'Life of Lucian', written in 1696 for a projected translation of Lucian's 'Dialogues' (1711). Also translations of 'The History of the League', by Maimbourg (1684); 'The Life of St. Francis Xavier', by Bouhours (1686); and 'De Arte Graphica', by Du Fresnoy (1695).

DRYDEN

The standard edition of Dryden's collected works is that of Sir W. Scott, published in 1808, and revised and corrected by George Saintsbury in 1882. A collection of Dryden's 'Critical Essays', by W. P. Ker, was published in 1900. There is a life of Dryden by G. Saintsbury in the English Men of Letters series (1881).

Du Barry, JEANNE BÉCU, Comtesse (1743-93), mistress of Louis XV, executed during the Terror.

DU BARTAS, GUILLAUME SALUSTE, SIEUR (1544-90), a French poet and soldier, who was mortally wounded at the battle of Ivry. As a poet he was less appreciated in France than in Britain, where he was received by James VI of Scotland and by Queen Elizabeth, and welcomed by Sir Philip Sidney. He published in 1578 an epic on the creation of the world, called 'La Semaine', which was translated into English by Joshua Sylvester (1592-9, collective ed. 1605). He may have influenced Spenser and Donne; and Milton, in writing the 'Paradise Lost', had perhaps, here and there, Sylvester's translation in mind.

DU BOIS, WILLIAM EDWARD BURGHARDT (1868-), American writer, born in Massachusetts. Du Bois is of negro descent and his work has been devoted to the negro question. His works present the attitude and mentality of the negro from the negro point of view. His chief books are: 'The Souls of Black Folk' (1903); 'John Brown' (1909); 'Quest of the Silver Fleece' (1911); 'The Negro' (1915); 'Black Folk' (1939); 'Dusk of Dawn' (1940).

DU CANGE, CHARLES DU FRESNE, SIEUR (1610-88), French man of letters, author of a valuable 'Glossarium ad scriptores mediae et infimae latinitatis' (1678), and editor of Joinville's and Villehardouin's chronicles.

DU MAURIER, GEORGE LOUIS PALMELLA BUSSON (1834-96), born in Paris, where he was educated, was the author of three novels, 'Peter Ibbetson' (1891), 'Trilby' (1894), and 'The Martian' (published posthumously in 1896). They are rendered interesting by the author's recollections of early days as an art student in Paris and Antwerp, but are somewhat marred by sentimentalism and melodrama. He contributed occasional drawings to 'Punch' from 1860, and joined its regular staff in 1864, in succession to John

DUCHESS OF MALFI

Leech. His drawings chiefly satirize upper and middle-class society in the spirit of Thackeray. He also contributed verse and prose to the same periodical from 1865, including 'The History of the Jack Sprats'.

Dualism, a philosophical system that recognizes two ultimate and independent principles in the scheme of things, such as mind and matter, or good and evil. It is opposed to idealism and to materialism.

Dubric or DUBRICIUS, Str. (d. 612), the reputed founder of the bishopric of Llandaff, said by Geoffrey of Monmouth to have crowned Arthur king of Britain and to have been archbishop of Caerleon. He is mentioned in Tennyson's 'The Coming of Arthur' (q.v.).

Ducat, from Italian ducato, late Latin ducat, used as the name of a silver coin issued in 1140 by Roger II of Sicily, bearing the superscription R DX AP, i.e. Rogerus Dux Apuliae, to which, according to Du Cange, 'Glossarium', 'Ducatus nomen imposuit'. In 1284 the first gold ducat (worth about 9s.) was struck at Venice under the doge John Dandolo, with the legend 'Sit tibi Christe datus quem tu regis iste ducatus'. This, though it did not originate, may have contributed to spread the name. [OED.] The silver ducat was worth about 3s. 6d.

Ducdame, ducdame, ducdame, in Shakespeare's 'As You Like It', II. v, perhaps a transposition for duc ad me, 'bring to me' (Hammer, also Johnson), or mere jargon.

Duchess of Malfi, The, a tragedy by J. Webster (q.v.), published in 1623, but played before 1614. The story is taken from one of Bandello's novelle, through Painter's 'Palace of Pleasure' (q.v.), and also shows the influence of Sidney's 'Arcadia' (q.v.).

The duchess, a spirited and high-minded woman, a widow, in a charming scene reveals her love for the honest Antonio, the steward of her court. They are secretly married, in spite of the warning of her brothers, the cardinal and Ferdinand, duke of Calabria, that she must not remarry; a warning induced by consideration for their royal blood of Arragon and Castile, and, as Ferdinand afterwards confesses, by desire to inherit her property. They place in her employment, to spy upon her, the ex-galley-slave Bosola, who betrays her to them. The duchess and Antonio fly and separate. The duchess is captured and is subjected by Ferdinand and Bosola to fearful mental tortures and finally strangled with two of her children. Retribution comes upon the murderers; Ferdinand goes mad, the cardinal is killed by the remorseful Bosola, and Bosola by the lunatic Ferdinand. Bosola has already killed Antonio, mistaking him for the cardinal. The often-quoted dramatic line 'Cover her face. Mine eyes dazzle. She died young', occurs in Act IV, sc. ii.

DUCROW

Ducrow, Andrew (1793–1842), a celebrated equestrian performer, the son of a Flemish 'strong man'. He was the chief equestrian at Astley's (q.v.) circus and the originator of many feats of horsemanship still seen at circuses. He subsequently became proprietor of Astley's with William Best.

Dudon, in the 'Orlando Innamorato' and 'Orlando Furioso' (qq.v.), son of Ogier the Dane, is captured by Rodomont and sent a prisoner to Africa, where he helps to destroy the fleet of Agramant.

Duenna, The, a comic opera by R. B. Sheridan (q.v.), produced in 1775.

Don Jerome, an obstinate irascible father, is determined that his daughter Louisa shall marry an odious little Jew, Isaac, but she is in love with Antonio. Jerome discovers that the duenna is acting as intermediary between Louisa and Antonio, dismisses the duenna, and locks up Louisa. Louisa disguised as the duenna escapes from the house, leaving the duenna to take her place. The Jew is fooled into marrying the duenna and into bringing Antonio and Louisa together.

Duessa, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', the daughter of Deceit and Shame, Falsehood in general, in Book I signifies in particular the Roman Catholic Church, and in Book V, ix, Mary Queen of Scots (the reference causing great offence to the king of Scotland).

DUFF, JAMES GRANT (1789–1858), a distinguished Anglo-Indian official, was author of an important 'History of the Mahrattas' (1826).

DUFFY, SIR CHARLES GAVAN (1816–1903), Irish nationalist, is remembered in a literary connexion as having started with Thomas Osborne Davis, in 1842, 'The Nation', a journal for which he gathered a brilliant staff of 'Young Irelanders'. 'The Nation' was suppressed on political grounds in 1848–9. Duffy emigrated to Australia in 1855 and rose to political eminence there. He wrote 'Young Ireland, 1840–50' (1880–3), 'Life of Thomas Davis' (1890), 'Conversations with Thomas Carlyle' (1892), and 'My Life in Two Hemispheres' (1898).

DUGDALE, SIR WILLIAM (1605–86), garter king-at-arms, and author of 'The Antiquities of Warwickshire', a topographical history that showed a great advance in respect of fullness and accuracy on previous works of the same kind. It was published in 1656. Dugdale's 'Monasticon Anglicanum', written in collaboration with Roger Dodsworth, an account of the English monastic houses, appeared in three volumes in 1655–73. In 1658 he published his 'History of St. Paul's Cathedral', and in 1662 'The History of Imbanking and Drayning of divers Fennes and Marshes', in which he strays beyond the limits of his subject to give much information of antiquarian and historical interest. He also wrote 'Origines Juridicales' (1666), a history of English laws, law-courts, and kindred matters, and 'The Baronage of England' (1675–6).

DULCINEA DEL TOBOSO

Duke, THE IRON, the duke of Wellington, so called from his firm will.

Duke of Exeter's Daughter, the name given to a rack in the Tower of London, of which the invention is attributed to John Holland, duke of Exeter, constable of the Tower in 1420.

Duke of Milan, The, a tragedy by Massinger (q.v.), printed in 1623, one of his earliest and most popular plays.

Ludovico Sforza, duke of Milan, has, in the war between the Emperor Charles and the French, allied himself with the latter. On their defeat, he goes to surrender himself to Charles, but in fear of his fate, first gives a written instruction to his wicked favourite Francisco to put his beloved wife Marcellia to death if anything untoward happens to himself. Francisco, in order to make Marcellia yield to his lust, reveals this warrant to her, but fails to move her chastity and only incenses her against the duke, so that on his return after his reconciliation with Charles she receives him coldly. This, coupled with accusations from various quarters of his wife's intimacy with Francisco, makes him suspicious of her. Francisco, to avenge himself for his failure, now tells the duke that Marcellia has made amorous advances to him, which so inflames the duke with anger that he stabs her to death; but dying, she reveals the truth and the duke is distracted with remorse. Francisco, a price being put on his head, returns to court in the disguise of a Jewish doctor, and undertakes to restore Marcellia to life. He is discovered and tortured, but not before he has poisoned the duke.

Duke's Children, The, see Phineas Finn.

Dukeries, THE, a district in Nottinghamshire containing several ducal estates, Welbeck (duke of Portland), Clumber (duke of Newcastle), Worksop (formerly belonging to the duke of Norfolk), Thoresby (Earl Mansvers, formerly belonging to the duke of Kingston).

Dulcarnon, from an Arabic word meaning 'two-horned' (see Dhu'l-karnain), a dilemma; at dulcarnon, non-plussed. Chaucer has

I am, til God me bettere mynde sende,

At dulcarnon, right at my wittes ende,

('Troilus and Cryseyde', iii. 881.)

Dulce domum, a Latin poem, the school song of Winchester, of which the author is unknown. According to tradition 'he was a child belonging to the school who was kept at Winchester during the holidays for having committed some serious offence'. Its date is also uncertain, some authorities assigning it to the 16th, others to the 17th cents. The tune is generally accepted as the composition of John Reading, organist of Winchester College 1681–92.

Dulcinea del Toboso, the name given by Don Quixote (q.v.) to the peasant girl Alonza Lorenzo, whom he elects to be mistress of his heart. Hence the English use of the name Dulcinea for a sweetheart.

Dumaine, in Shakespeare's 'Love's Labour's Lost' (q.v.), one of the three lords attending on the king of Navarre.

DUMAS, ALEXANDRE (1803-70), French dramatist and novelist, known generally as 'Dumas père', was the son of a mulatto general of the Empire. His fame rests mainly on the long series of romantic novels in which he dealt with many periods of European history. His backgrounds are less solidly constructed than Scott's, and his characters less elaborate, but in vigour and vitality his work compares with the best of Scott's historical novels. The most famous 'groups' into which his chief novels fall are: (1) the d'Artagnan group ('Les Trois Mousquetaires', 'Vingt ans après', 'Le Vicomte de Bragelonne', &c. &c.); (2) the Chicot group ('La Dame de Monsoreau'—known in England as 'Chicot the Jester', 'Les Quarante-cinq', 'La Reine Margot'); (3) the Revolution group ('Mémoires d'un médecin', 'Le Collier de la reine', 'La Comtesse de Charny', 'Le Chevalier de Maison Rouge'). In England his 'Comte de Monte-Cristo' is perhaps as well known as the above, and is a favourite with boys; but Dumas—and his assistants—wrote endless books of which the titles here given are a very small selection.

DUMAS, ALEXANDRE, known as 'Dumas fils' (1824-95), son of A. Dumas the novelist (1803-70, q.v.), was the author of some highly successful social dramas, of which the best known are 'La Dame aux camélias', 'Le Demi-Monde', 'Francillon', and 'Denise'.

Dumb Ox of Cologne, Thomas Aquinas (q.v.), so called by his fellow monks, because of his taciturnity.

Dumbello, Lady, in A. Trollope's Barsetshire series of novels, the married name of Griselda, daughter of Archdeacon Grantly (q.v.).

Dumbledikes, THE LAIRD OF, in Scott's 'The Heart of Midlothian' (q.v.), (1) the grasping landlord of the widow Butler and Davie Deans; (2) Jock Dumbie, his son, Jeanie Deans's silent suitor.

Dun Cow, Book of the, an Irish manuscript of the 11th cent. containing mythological romances. A fragment of it survives, containing in particular many of the feats of Cuchulain (q.v.).

Dun Cow of Dunsmore, a monstrous animal slain by Guy of Warwick (q.v.).

Dun in the Mire, where 'Dun' (originally a dun horse) is a quasi-proper name for any horse, is the name of an old Christmas game (also called 'drawing Dun out of the mire'), in which the horse in the mire is represented by a heavy log, and the players compete to lift and carry it off.

If thou art Dun, we'll draw thee from the mire.

(Shakespeare, 'Romeo and Juliet', I. iv. 41.)

DUNCIAD

DUNBAR, WILLIAM (1465?-1530?), Scottish poet, was possibly M.A. of St. Andrews, and for a time a Franciscan friar. He was wrecked off Zealand while carrying out a diplomatic mission for James IV. He was pensioned in 1500. He wrote 'The Thris-sill and the Rois', his first great poem, in 1503; 'The Dance of the Sevin Deidly Synnis' between 1503 and 1508; 'The Goldyn Targe', the 'Lament for the Makaris', and 'The Twa Maryit Women and the Wedo', about 1508; and numerous minor pieces. Dunbar wrote a poem 'In Honour of the City of London', inspired by his visit with the ambassadors to the court of Henry VII during the negotiations for the marriage of Margaret Tudor. He described Queen Margaret's visit to the north of Scotland in 'The Quenis Progress at Aberdeen'. He is supposed by some to have fallen at Flodden (1513), by others to have written the 'Orisone' after 1517.

The 'Thris-sill and the Rois' (Thistle and the Rose) is a political allegory in rhyme-royal; the Rose is Margaret Tudor, married to James IV (the Thistle). The 'Twa Maryit Women and the Wedo' (widow), a conversation in which the three interlocutors relate their experiences of marriage, is a satire on women reminiscent of the 'Wife of Bath'. The 'Goldyn Targe' is an allegory in which the poet, appearing in a dream before the court of Venus, is wounded by the arrows of Beauty in spite of the shield of Reason. In the 'Dance of the Sevin Deidly Synnis', the poet in a trance sees the fiend Mahoun call a dance of unshriven outcasts, who are depicted with extreme vigour. The 'Lament for the Makaris' (makers=poets) is a splendid elegy, suggestive of Villon, with a refrain Timor mortis conturbat me, in which he bewails the transitoriness of things, and the deaths of his predecessors (beginning with Chaucer) and contemporaries. His works show much Rabelaisian humour, satirical power, and imagination.

Duncan, in Shakespeare's 'Macbeth' (q.v.), the king of Scotland murdered by Macbeth.

Duncan Gray, a poem by Burns (q.v.).

Dunciad, The, a satirical poem by Pope (q.v.), of which three books were published anonymously in 1728. Its authorship was acknowledged in 1735. The 'New Dunciad' was published in 1742, and this forms the fourth book of the complete work as it appeared in 1743. The poem had been under preparation for some years and its issue was determined by the criticisms on Pope's edition of Shakespeare contained in Theobald's 'Shakespeare Restored'. Theobald (q.v.) was made the hero of the poem in its earlier form, but in the final edition of 1743 Cibber (q.v.) was enthroned in his stead. The satire is directed against Dulness in general, and in the course of it all the authors who have earned Pope's condemnation are held up to ridicule. But the work is not confined to personal abuse, for literary vices receive their share of exposure. The argument of the poem is as follows.

Book I. The reign of Dulness is described. Bayes (i.e. Cibber) is shown debating whether he shall betake himself to the church, or gaming, or party-writing, but is carried off by the goddess and anointed king in the place of Eusden, the poet laureate, who has died.

Book II. This solemnity is graced by games, in which poets, critics, and booksellers contend. There are races, with divers accidents, in which booksellers pursue the phantom of a poet; exercises for the poets; and finally a test for the critics, to decide whether they can hear the works of two authors read aloud without sleeping. But presently spectators, critics, and all, fall fast asleep.

Book III. The king, slumbering with his head on the lap of the goddess, is transported to the Elysian shades, where, under the guidance of Elkanah Settle (q.v.), he sees visions of the past and future triumphs of the empire of Dulness, how this shall extend to the theatres and the court, the arts and the sciences.

Book IV. The realization of these prophecies is described, and the subjugation of the sciences and universities to Dulness, the growth of indolence, the corruption of education, and the consummation of all in the restoration of night and chaos.

Dundreary, LORD, a character in 'Our American Cousin' (1858) by Tom Taylor (q.v.), an indolent brainless peer, a part developed and acted with great success by E. A. Sothern in New York. His long drooping whiskers became proverbial.

Dunedin, a poetic name for Edinburgh (q.v.). 'Dun' is Gaelic for fortress, or indeed for any hill. Edinburgh is the hill on which King Edwin of Northumbria built his castle, 'Edwinstown'.

Dunkirk, EVACUATION FROM. The German army having in May 1940 invaded Holland and Belgium and broken through the French defences on the Meuse, got round the right and rear of the Allied armies in the north (which had entered Belgium) and reached Boulogne and Calais. The British army retired to Dunkirk and its beaches, and in spite of fierce German attacks on land, continuous air bombardment, torpedoes and mines, was withdrawn under protection of the R.A.F. The withdrawal was completed on 3-4 June, and was effected by 222 light warships and 665 other vessels, making repeated trips during four or five days. The number of men brought off (British and French) was 335,000.

Dunmow Flitch, THE, according to an ancient custom of the manor of Dunmow in Essex, was given to any married couple who after twelve months of marriage could swear that they had maintained perfect harmony and fidelity during that time. The antiquity of the custom is shown by the reference to it in the Prologue to Chaucer's 'Wife of Bath's Tale':

The bacoun was nought fet for hem, I trowe,

That some men fecche in Essex at Dunmowe.

The custom is said to have been instituted by Robert Fitz-Walter in 1244 and is still observed.

DUNNE, FINLEY PETER (1867-1936), American author, remembered as the creator of 'Mr. Dooley', whose shrewd and humorous sayings helped to steady American public opinion during and after the Spanish-American War of 1898.

DUNS, JOANNES SCOTUS, known as the DOCTOR SUBTILIS (1265?-1308?), a Franciscan, is said, without evidence, to have been fellow of Merton College, Oxford, and in 1301 professor of divinity at Oxford. He is also stated to have been 'a regent master at the University of Paris'. Possibly he died at Cologne, there being a tradition that he was buried alive. Duns was the author of a philosophic grammar, entitled, 'De Modis Significandi sive Grammatica Speculativa' (printed, 1499), of logical 'Quæstiones' (edited, 1474), of a work on metaphysics called 'De Rerum Principio' (edited, 1497), and of the 'Opus Oxoniense' (printed, 1481), a commentary on the 'Sententiæ' of Peter Lombard. An extreme realist in philosophy, he borrowed from Ibn Gebirol (f. 1045) the theory of a universal matter, the common basis of all existences, while, by attacking the validity of 'natural theology', he was one of the first to challenge the harmony of faith and reason, which was an essential point in the doctrine of Thomas Aquinas. He was a vigorous supporter of the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, and of the freedom of the will.

His followers, the SCOTISTS, were a predominating scholastic sect until the 16th cent. when the system was attacked, first by the humanists, and then by the reformers, as a farrago of needless entities and useless distinctions. The DUNSMEN or DUNSES, on their side, railed against the 'new learning', and the name DUNS or DUNCE, already synonymous with 'cavilling sophist', soon passed into the sense of 'blockhead incapable of learning or scholarship'.

Dunstable, the name of a town in Bedfordshire, used in such expressions as 'plain as Dunstable way', apparently referring to the road from London to Dunstable, a part of the ancient Roman Road called Watling Street, notable for its long straight stretches, and general evenness. [OED.]

Dunstable, Miss, a character in A. Trollope's 'Dr. Thorne' and 'Framley Parsonage' (qq.v.).

Dunstan, Sr. (924-88), born at Glastonbury of a noble family, was educated by the Irish scholars who had settled at that place. He became a favourite of King Æthelstan, but was expelled from the court on an accusation of being a wizard. He spent part of the period of his disgrace with Ælfheah (Elphege), bishop of Winchester, by whom he was persuaded to take the monastic vows. He is also said to have practised the arts of metal-working, painting, and transcribing. Dunstan was restored to favour by King Eadmund and appointed by him abbot of Glastonbury. He restored the abbey materially and spiritually and made it a famous school. He became one of the chief advisers of kings Eadmund and Eadred, but when King Eadwig succeeded, he incurred his disfavour by rebuking him for his vicious propensities and retired to Flanders in disgrace in 956, Count Arnulf assigning him a residence at Ghent. Eadgar recalled Dunstan to him and appointed him bishop of Worcester (957), bishop of London (959), and archbishop of Canterbury (961). Dunstan devoted his energies to restoring and reforming English monasteries and to making the Danes an integral part of the nation. He averted civil war by crowning Eadward in 975, and foretold to King Æthelred the calamities by which the nation would expiate Eadward's murder. His festival is kept on 19 May. There is a famous late story of the Devil appearing in the form of a woman to tempt Dunstan, who seized the apparition by the nose with red-hot smith's tongs.

DUNSTAN

DUNTON, JOHN (1659-1733), a publisher and bookseller, who in 1690-6 issued the 'Athenian Gazette' (afterwards 'Athenian Mercury') dealing with philosophical and other abstruse matters, and was the author of a large number of political pamphlets, and of 'The Life and Errors of John Dunton' (1705).

Duodecimo, generally abbreviated '12mo', a book in which each leaf is one-twelfth of a whole sheet. Hence applied to a person or thing of diminutive size.

Dupin, the detective in the detective tales of Poe (q.v.).

Durandal, see Durindana.

Durandarte, a hero of Spanish legend and ballad, killed at Roncesvalles. See 'Don Quixote', Pt. II, ch. xxiii. He is the subject of a ballad by M. G. Lewis (q.v.).

Durden, DAME, see Dame Durden.

Durdles, the stone-mason in Dickens's 'Edwin Drood' (q.v.).

Dürer, ALBRECHT (1471-1528), born in Nuremberg, the son of a Hungarian goldsmith. He spent most of his life at Nuremberg, but visited Italy and the Netherlands. He was not only a great painter, but also an engraver, sculptor, and architect, the greatest artist of the Renaissance in Germany. Most of his works, including his great painting of the four apostles, are in Germany. Of his engravings the best known is perhaps that of 'The Knight, Death, and the Devil'.

D'URFEY, THOMAS (1653-1723), a

DUVAL

French Huguenot by descent, familiarly known as Tom Durfey, wrote a large number of songs, tales, satires, melodramas, and farces. He was a scurrilous fellow, but the familiar friend of every one, including Charles II and James II. He replied to the strictures of Jeremy Collier (q.v.) in his 'The Campaigners', a comedy, 1698. Among his other comedies may be mentioned 'Madame Fickle' (1677) and 'The Jealous Wife' (1680). His 'Wit and Mirth, or Pills to purge Melancholy', 1719, is an interesting collection of songs and ballads.

Durham, CONSTANTIA, a character in Meredith's 'The Egoist' (q.v.).

Durham Report, The, 'on the Affairs of British North America', 1839, was made by the first earl of Durham, governor-general of the British provinces in N. America and high commissioner for the adjustment of important questions in Lower and Upper Canada. It is said to have been mostly written by his secretary, Charles Buller; it was notable for its liberal character and determined the policy of Durham's successors. There is a good life of Lord Durham ('Radical Jack') by Chester W. New (Oxford, 1929).

Durindana or DURANDAL, the sword of Roland or Orlando, which had been that of Hector of Troy.

Dutch, MY OLD, the title of a famous music-hall song, put in the mouth of a costermonger; the word 'Dutch' is an abbreviation of 'Dutchess' (old spelling of 'Duchess') and is slang for 'wife'.

Dutch courage, courage induced by liquor, an allusion to the drinking habits ascribed to the 'Dutch' (meaning perhaps little more than 'foreigners').

Dutch Courtezan, The, a comedy by Marston (q.v.), printed in 1605.

Young Freevill, being about to marry Beatrice, daughter of Sir Hubert Subboys, determines to break his connexion with Franceschina, the Dutch Courtezan. He introduces the latter to his self-righteous friend Malheureux, who becomes violently enamoured of her. She consents to gratify his passion if he will kill Freevill, and bring proof of the deed in the shape of a ring given by Beatrice to Freevill. Malheureux discloses the situation to Freevill, who consents to help him. A pretended quarrel is arranged, Freevill disappears, Malheureux takes the ring to Franceschina, who hastens to communicate the news to old Freevill and Sir Hubert Subboys. Malheureux is arrested for the murder of Freevill and sentenced to death. At the last moment Young Freevill appears, and begs forgiveness for the device that he has adopted to cure his friend of his passion. Franceschina is condemned to the whip and gaol.

Duval, CLAUDE (1643-70), a highwayman notorious for his daring and gallantry. He was born in Normandy, came to England, took to the road, and was executed. His death was the subject of a satiric ode by Samuel Butler.

Dwarf, in Scandinavian mythology, the name of a class of supernatural beings sprung from the decaying body of Ymir (q.v.). They were of diminutive form, dwelt under the earth, and their nature partook of good and evil. They were particularly skilful in working metals. It is they who kill Kvasir, from whose blood the Odhærir (q.v.) or poetic mead is made, and who forge the chain (Gleipnir) with which Fenrir (q.v.) is bound.

DYER, SIR EDWARD (d. 1607), was educated either at Balliol College or Broadgates Hall, Oxford. He was introduced by the earl of Leicester at court, where he held various official positions. His most famous poem is the description of contentment, beginning, 'My mind to me a kingdom is'. Meres mentions him as 'famous for elegy', and according to Collier he translated part of Theocritus. Sir Philip Sidney's pastoral, 'Join, mates, in mirth with me', is addressed to him and Sir Fulke Greville.

DYER, GEORGE (1755-1841), educated at Christ's Hospital and Emmanuel College, Cambridge, usher at Dedham Grammar School, and subsequently in a school at Northampton, and author of poems and critical essays. He is remembered principally as the friend of C. Lamb (q.v.), who speaks of him as a gentle and kindly eccentric. He was nearly drowned in the New River while in a fit of abstraction. See 'Amicus Redivivus' in the 'Essays of Elia'.

DYER, JOHN (1699-1758), a Welshman remembered as the author of 'Grongar Hill', a poem descriptive of the scenery of the river Towy, published in 1726. His later didactic poems, 'The Ruins of Rome' (1740) and 'The Fleece' (1757, on the unpromising subject of sheep and the wool trade), merit less notice.

Dynasts, The, An Epic-Drama of the War with Napoleon, in three Parts, nineteen Acts and one hundred and thirty Scenes, by Thomas

EADWARD THE ELDER

Hardy (q.v.), was published, Part I in 1904, Part II in 1906, Part III in 1908.

This great work is written mainly in blank verse, partly in a variety of other metres, partly in prose. The stirring events of history with which it deals are recounted in the descriptive passages and stage directions. The whole centres round the tragic figure of Napoleon. Part I opens with the year 1805, and Napoleon's threat of invasion. It presents the House of Commons discussing the repeal of the Defence Act, Napoleon's coronation at Milan, the preparations at Boulogne for invasion, the battles of Ulm and Austerlitz, Trafalgar, the death of Nelson, and the death of Pitt.

In Part II we have the defeat of the Prussians at Jena, the meeting of Napoleon and Alexander at Tilsit, the battle of Wagram, the fall of Godoy and the abdication of the king of Spain, and war in Spain (Coruña, Talavera, Torres Vedras), the divorce of Josephine, and Napoleon's marriage with Marie Louise.

Part III presents the Russian expedition of 1812, the British victories in the Pyrenees, the battle of Leipzig, Napoleon's abdication, his return from Elba, the ball in Brussels, Quatre-Bras, and Waterloo. By the side of the major scenes are little 'patches of life' seen at close quarters, episodes showing how these great events affected English rustics in Wessex, private soldiers, camp-followers, and other humble folks. And above them all, 'supernatural spectators of the terrestrial action', are 'certain impersonated abstractions or Intelligences, called Spirits', the Ancient Spirit of the Years, the Spirit of the Pities, the Spirits Sinister and Ironic, the Spirit of Rumour, with their respective choruses; also the Shade of the Earth, and the Recording Angels. At the head of them is the Immanent Will, the force, unconscious and heedless, that moves the world. They are introduced not, as the author is careful to point out in his preface, 'as a systematized philosophy warranted to lift "the burthen of the mystery" of this unintelligible world', but to give by their comments a universal signification to the particular events recounted.

Earthly Paradise, THE, see Paradise.

Earthly Paradise, The, a poem by W. Morris (q.v.), published in 1868-70, consisting of a prologue and twenty-four tales, in Chaucerian metres.

The prologue tells how a company of Norsemen, fleeing from the pestilence, set sail in search of the fabled Earthly Paradise 'across the western sea where none grow old'. They are disappointed of their quest and return after long wanderings, 'shrivelled, bent, and grey', to a 'nameless city in a distant sea' where the ancient Greek gods are still worshipped. They are hospitably received and there spend their remaining years. Twice in each month they meet their hosts at a feast and a tale is told, alternately by one of the elders of the city and one of the wanderers. The tales of the former are on classical subjects (Atalanta, Perseus, Cupid and Psyche, Alceatis, Pygmalion, the Apples of the Hesperides, Bellerophon, &c.), those of the latter from Norse and other medieval sources. Among the wanderers' tales, 'The Lovers of Gudrun' (q.v.), a version of the Icelandic Laxdæla Saga (q.v.), is the most striking. Between the tales of each month are interpolated lyrics in which the author gives expression to his sense of the effect of the changing year on the English landscape.

East India Company, THE, or the 'Company of Merchants trading to the East Indies', was incorporated in 1600, and from 1773 had the chief part in the political administration of Hindustan, until 1858. After the Mutiny the government was assumed by the Crown. It was familiarly known as 'John Company', an appellation taken over from the name JAN KOMPANIE by which the Dutch East India Company, and now the Dutch government, are known to natives in the East.

East Lynne, a novel by Mrs. H. Wood (q.v.).

Easter Day, one of the great festivals of the Christian Church, commemorating the Resurrection of Christ, and corresponding to the Jewish Passover. It is celebrated on the first Sunday after the calendar full moon which happens on or after 21 Mar. The name Easter is derived from the Saxon goddess EOSTRE, originally the dawn-goddess, whose festival was celebrated at the vernal equinox.

Easter Island, in the S. Pacific, probably discovered by Capt. Davis in 1687, but first visited by the Dutch navigator Roggeveen on Easter Day 1722, and later by Capt. Cook, when it was uninhabited. It is noted for its remarkable monolithic statues facing seawards, some of them 20 feet and more in height, erected, according to Roggeveen, for protection from enemies coming from the sea. There were, he says, special priests who served the idols. The idols had long ears, and the people had their ears dragged down to their shoulders. The date of the idols is unknown. The inhabitants of the island also used a pictographic script engraved on wooden tablets.

Eastern Empire, the more easterly of the two parts into which the Roman Empire was divided in A.D. 395. Its capital was Byzantium (Constantinople), which was taken by the Turks under Mahomet II in 1453.

Eastward Hoe, a comedy by G. Chapman, Jonson, and J. Marston (qq.v.), printed in 1605, having been previously performed by the Children of the Revels at the Blackfriars. The literary controversy between Jonson and Marston had for the time ceased. A passage derogatory to the Scots (III. iii. 40-7) gave offence at court, and the three authors were imprisoned, but released on the intercession of powerful friends. The play is particularly interesting for the light it throws on London life of the time. Like Dekker's 'Shoemaker's Holiday', it gives a sympathetic picture of a tradesman.

The plot contrasts the careers of the virtuous and idle apprentices, Golding and Quicksilver, of the goldsmith Touchstone; and the fates of his two daughters, the modest Mildred, who marries the industrious Golding, and the immodest Gertrude who, in order to ride in her own coach, marries the penniless adventurer Sir Petronel Flash. Golding soon rises to the dignity of a deputy-alderman, while Sir Petronel, having sent off his lady in a coach to an imaginary castle of his, and filched her dowry, sets off for Virginia, accompanied by the prodigal Quicksilver, who has robbed his master. They are wrecked on the Isle of Dogs, and brought up before Golding, the deputy-alderman. After some days in prison, where their mortifications lead them to repent, they are released at Golding's intercession.

Ecclesiasticus, meaning the 'Book of the Church', a name given to it in the African Church owing to its use as a book of instruction, is a book of the Apocrypha otherwise known as 'The Wisdom of Jesus the son of Sirach'. It is a collection of moral and practical maxims, dating probably from the first half of the 2nd cent. B.C.

Echidna, in Greek mythology, a monster, half woman and half snake. She was the mother of various other monsters of antiquity, such as Chimaera, Orthrus the formidable dog of Geryon, Cerberus, the Sphinx, the Hydra (qq.v.). In Spenser's 'Faerie Queene' (vi. vii), she is the mother of the Blatant Beast (q.v.).

Echo, according to Ovid was an Oread (q.v.) whose loquacity caused Juno to change her into an echo, something which cannot speak until some one else has spoken, and then must repeat the words it hears. She fell in love with Narcissus and pined away for love of him till only her voice remained.

Eckhart or Eckhard, JOHANNES, known as MEISTER ECKHART (1260?-1327?), a German philosopher and mystic. He was a Dominican and received the degree of Doctor from Boniface VIII. He was subsequently summoned before the Inquisition and made a partial recantation of his doctrines. He is regarded as the founder of German mysticism.

Eckhart, TRUSTY, the subject of a German legend and of a tale by Ludwig Tieck (translated by Carlyle). In the latter he is a follower of the duke of Burgundy who gives his son to save his master's life. He incurs unjust suspicion, and another of his sons is killed by the duke. He is reconciled with the duke as the latter lies dying and is made guardian of his children.

In the German legend of Holle or Holde (Venus) he is an old man who appears on Maundy Thursday to warn people against the monsters that rush through the streets in Holle's train on that night; or sits outside the Venusberg to warn passing knights of its dangers.

Eclectics, a class of philosophers who neither attached themselves to any school, nor constructed independent systems, but 'selected such doctrines as pleased them in every school' (Liddell and Scott). In modern use the term 'eclectic' has both the same signification and a vaguer sense of one unfettered by a narrow system in matters of opinion or practice.

Eclipse, the famous race-horse, born during an eclipse, died in 1789, aged 25 years. He was never beaten. He was the property of Colonel O'Kelly, an Irish adventurer, who, born in humble circumstances, became a count of the Holy Roman Empire. The saying 'Eclipse first and the rest nowhere' arose on the occasion of Eclipse's first race, the Queen's Plate at Winchester, when O'Kelly made his famous bet of placing the horses in order, and won it by running Eclipse first and the rest nowhere.

Eclogue, from Greek ἐκλογή, a selection, is a short poem, especially a pastoral dialogue, such as Virgil's 'Bucolics'.

Eclogue, Virgil's Fourth, see Virgil.

Eclogues, The, of A. Barclay (q.v.), written about 1515, are interesting as the earliest English pastorals, anticipating Spenser. They are moral and satirical in character, dealing with such subjects as the evils of a court life and the happiness of the countryman's lot. They are modelled upon Baptist Mantuan and the 'Miseriae Curialium' of Aeneas Sylvius (qq.v.).

Economist, The, a weekly financial and commercial review founded in 1843. James Wilson was its first editor. It advocated free trade and the repeal of the corn laws and took up a sound attitude in opposition to the reckless railway speculation of the middle of the century. Among its later editors was Bagehot (q.v.), Wilson's son-in-law.

Edda, an old Norse name of two distinct Icelandic books:

(a) The Prose or Younger Edda. A summary of Odinic mythology, followed by two treatises on poetic composition, the whole forming a manual of instruction for poets. This work is attributed to Snorri Sturlason (q.v., c. 1230).

(b) The Poetic or Elder Edda. A collection (made c. 1200) of old Norse poems on cosmogony, mythology, and traditions of Norse heroes. The name of 'Edda of Sæmund' was applied to this work, from an erroneous attribution of the compilation to Sæmund.

The Eddas are the chief source of our knowledge of Scandinavian mythology.

EDDINGTON, SIR ARTHUR STANLEY (1882-1944), educated at Owens College, Manchester, and Trinity College, Cambridge, and professor of astronomy at Cambridge, a distinguished astronomer, noted for his researches into the stellar system and the internal constitution of stars; also for his contributions to the theory of Relativity and the popularization of modern physical theory ('The Expanding Universe', 1933).

EDDY, MRS. MARY BAKER GLOVER (1821-1910), born at Bow, New Hampshire, the founder of Christian Science, of which, as expounded in 'Science and Health' (1875, several later editions), the central doctrine is that 'there is no life, truth, intelligence, nor substance in matter. All is infinite Mind and its infinite manifestation, for God is All-in-all. Spirit is immortal Truth; matter is mortal error. Spirit is the real and eternal; matter is the unreal and temporal. Spirit is God, and man is His image and likeness. Therefore man is not material; he is spiritual' (p. 468). Mrs. Eddy founded a Church to teach her principles. The successful treatment Mrs. Eddy received when ill from P. P. Quimby, a mental healer of Portland, Maine, was a factor in the development of her early interest in spiritual healing.

Maria Edgeworth was a successful novelist, and a friend of Sir W. Scott, who admired her work. Her principal novels, devoted in great part to depicting Irish life, were 'Castle Rackrent' (q.v.), published in 1800; 'Belinda' (1801), a picture of society at the end of the 18th cent., commended by Jane Austen in 'Northanger Abbey' (q.v.); 'The Absentee' (q.v.), published in 1812, one of a series of 'Tales of Fashionable Life'; 'Ormond' (q.v.), published in 1817. She is also remembered for the excellent presentation of child life in 'The Parent's Assistant' (1796-1801), 'Early Lessons' (1801), 'Moral Tales' (1801), 'Popular Tales' (1804), 'Frank' (1822), and 'Harry and Lucy' (1825).

EDINBURGH

Edinburgh, the capital of Scotland, was originally a military station established by Edwin, the first Christian king of Northumbria (617-33), from whom it takes its name. It was made a royal burgh by charter of David I (1124-53) and became the capital in the 15th cent. 'Dunedin' and 'Edina' are poetical names for Edinburgh.

Edinburgh Review, The, a quarterly periodical established in October 1802 by Francis Jeffrey, Henry Brougham, and Sydney Smith (qq.v.), and published originally by Messrs. Constable. It initiated a new era in literary criticism, adopting a higher and more independent tone than its predecessors. Though Tories (including at first Sir W. Scott) wrote for it, it assumed gradually a completely Whig attitude. It was notable for its condemnation of the school of Lake poets. Among famous contributors to it were Macaulay, Carlyle, Hazlitt, Arnold, Arthur Stanley, Sir J. Stephen, and Gladstone. The 'Edinburgh Review' came to an end in 1929.

There was an earlier 'Edinburgh Review' of 1755, but although it had distinguished contributors (including Adam Smith), only two numbers of it appeared.

Edison, THOMAS ALVA (1847-1931), born in the United States of mixed Dutch and Scottish ancestry, had a very limited education and became a newsboy on the railways at 12, and afterwards a telegraph operator, devoting his spare time to study and experiments. His first patent was taken out in 1868 and this was followed by a number of inventions, among others one that contributed an important element to the Bell telephone. His most important inventions were the 'phonograph', or original of the gramophone, in 1877, and the incandescent electric lamp in 1879. He also devised a 'kinescopic camera' for taking moving pictures, and did much to develop the transmission and storage of electrical power.

Edward I, king of England, 1272-1307.

Edward II, king of England, 1307-27.

Edward II, an historical drama in blank verse by Marlowe (q.v.), produced in 1593. It deals with the recall by Edward II, on his accession, of his favourite, Piers Gaveston; the revolt of the barons, and the capture and execution of Gaveston; the period during which Spenser (Hugh le Despenser) succeeded Gaveston as the king's favourite; the estrangement of Queen Isabella from her husband; her rebellion, supported by her paramour Mortimer, against the king; the capture of the latter, his abdication of the crown, and his murder in Berkeley Castle. 'The death-scene of Marlowe's king', wrote Charles Lamb, 'moves pity and terror beyond any scene, ancient or modern, with which I am acquainted' ('Specimens of the English Dramatists').

Edward III, king of England, 1327-77.

Edward III, The Raigne of, an historical play, published in 1506, of uncertain authorship, attributed by some, at least in part, to Shakespeare.

The two first acts are concerned mainly with the dishonourable wooing of the countess of Salisbury by the king, who is finally brought to a sense of shame by her determination to kill herself if he pursues his suit. The rest is occupied with the French wars.

Edward IV, king of England, 1461-83.

Edward V, king of England in 1483, in which year he was deposed and murdered. He was then a boy of 12, and on his accession his uncle, Richard, duke of Gloucester, was named Protector. Edward and his brother, the duke of York, were removed to the Tower, where they were put to death, probably by their uncle's order.

Edward VI, king of England, 1547-53.

Edward VII, king of England, 1901-10.

Edward VIII, king of England, 20 Jan.-11 Dec. 1936.

Edwardian, characteristic of the early years of the present century (roughly, the reign of Edward VII), a term frequently used in contrast with 'Victorian' (q.v.), as implying a reaction from some of the tendencies of the Victorian age, notably its self-satisfaction and unquestioning acceptance of authority in religion, morality, and literature. The Edwardian age is in the main an age of criticism, of questioning, and of refusal to accept established institutions. This tendency is seen, for instance, in the works of G. B. Shaw, H. G. Wells, and Arnold Bennett. From another point of view the Edwardian age appears as a time of great prosperity and glitter, of social stability and spacious ease, the halcyon period before the storm.

EDWARDS, JONATHAN (1703-58), born at Windsor, Connecticut, the philosopher, ardent divine, and formidable preacher who provoked the movement of religious revival and exaltation in New England known as the 'Great Awakening'. In his 'Treatise concerning Religious Affections' (1746) he nicely discriminated between the state of grace and the state of worldliness. His attempt to make this distinction a criterion of fitness to receive the Eucharist led to his dismissal from the charge of the church of Northampton, Mass., in 1750. He then became for six years a missionary to the Indians. His principal philosophical work, 'A Careful and Strict Enquiry into the Modern Prevailing Notions of . . . Freedom of Will' (1754), in which he combated from a predestinarian standpoint the Arminian view of liberty, occasioned Boswell's remark that 'the only relief I had was to forget it', and Johnson's aphorism, 'All theory is against freedom of the will; all experience for it'. (Boswell, 'Life of Johnson', under the year 1778, ed. G. B. Hill, iii. 291.)

EDWARDS, RICHARD (1523?-66), of Corpus Christi College and Christ Church, Oxford, was master of the children of the Chapel Royal, 1561. He composed 'Palamon and Arcite' (now lost) for Queen Elizabeth's entertainment at Oxford, 1566. The 'Excellent Comedie of . . . Damon and Pithias' (q.v.), 1571, is his only extant play. He was the compiler of the 'Paradise of Daynty Devises' (q.v.), published after his death (1576).

Edwin and Angelina, see Hermit.

Edwin Drood, The Mystery of, an unfinished novel by Dickens (q.v.), published in 1870.

The fathers of Edwin Drood and Rosa Bud, both of them widowers, have before their deaths betrothed their young children to one another. The orphan Rosa has been brought up in Miss Twinkleton's school at Cloisterham (Rochester), where Edwin, also an orphan, has an uncle, John Jasper, the precentor of the cathedral, to whom he is devoted and who appears to return the devotion. It is understood that the two young people are to marry as soon as Edwin comes of age, although this very understanding has been fatal to love between them. Jasper, a sinister and hypocritical character, gives Rosa music-lessons and loves her passionately, but inspires her with terror and disgust. There now come upon the scene two other orphans, Neville and Helena Landless. Neville and Edwin at once become enemies, for Neville admires Rosa and is disgusted at Edwin's unappreciative treatment of her. This enmity is secretly fomented by Jasper and there is a violent quarrel between the young men. On the last of Edwin's periodical visits to Cloisterham before the time of his anticipated marriage, Rosa and he recognize that this marriage will not be for their happiness, and break off the engagement. But Edwin postpones telling his uncle Jasper. That same night Edwin disappears under circumstances pointing to foul play and suggestive of the possibility that he has been murdered by Neville Landless, a theory actively supported by Jasper. But Jasper receives with uncontrollable symptoms of dismay the intelligence that the engagement of Edwin and Rosa had been broken off before Edwin's disappearance, and this betrayal of himself is noted by Mr. Grewgious, Rosa's eccentric good-hearted guardian. Neville is arrested, but as the body of Edwin is not found, is released untried. He is ostracized by public opinion and is obliged to hide himself as a student in London. The remainder of the fragment of the novel is occupied with the continued machinations of Jasper against Neville and his pursuit of Rosa, who in terror of him flies to her guardian in London; with the countermeasures prepared by Mr. Grewgious, assisted by the amiable minor canon Mr. Crisparkle, and a new ally, the retired naval officer, Mr. Tartar; also with the proceedings of the mysterious Mr. Datchery, directed against Jasper. Of the solution or catastrophe intended by the author no hint exists, beyond those which the fragment itself contains, and the statement as to the broad lines of the plot given by John Forster, the biographer of Dickens. There have been many conjectures, turning mainly on two points: whether Edwin Drood had in fact been murdered or had miraculously survived; and who was Datchery. With regard to the latter it has been suggested for instance that Datchery was Drood himself, or Grewgious, or Grewgious's clerk Bazzard, or Helena Landless, in disguise.

Besides the persons above referred to, mention should be made of some notable characters: the fatuous Mr. Sapsea, auctioneer and mayor; Mr. Honeythunder, the bullying 'philanthropist'; the grim stonemason Durdles, and his attendant imp 'Deputy'.

Efreet, see Afreet.

Égalité, the name assumed by Philippe, Duc d'Orléans, in 1792. He was a member of the Constituent Assembly and Convention, gave his vote for the death of Louis XVI, and was himself arrested and executed in 1793. He was the father of King Louis Philippe.

EGAN, PIERCE, the elder (1772-1849), is remembered as the author of 'Life in London; or the Day and Night Scenes of Jerry

EGAN

Hawthorn and his elegant friend Corinthian Tom', issued in monthly numbers from 1820 (the completed book in 1821), illustrated by George and Robert Cruikshank. The book is a description of the life of the 'man about town' of the day, interesting for the light it throws on the manners of the period and for the many slang phrases it introduces. In 1824 Egan began the issue of a weekly paper, 'Pierce Egan's Life in London and Sporting Guide', which subsequently developed into the well-known sporting journal 'Bell's Life in London'. The title of this periodical was taken from John Bell (1745-1831), printer, publisher, and journalist, one of the founders of the 'Morning Post' and proprietor of 'Bell's Weekly Messenger', whose fame and popularity had given his name a commercial value (see Stanley Morison, 'John Bell', 1930). 'Bell's Life' was in 1859 incorporated in 'Sporting Life'. Egan was also author of the successful 'Boxiana; or Sketches of Antient and Modern Pugilism' (founded on an earlier work by George Smeeton), published first in parts in 1812-13, then reprinted in volumes and added to, in 1815-29 (five volumes in all).

EGAN, PIERCE, the younger (1814-80), novelist, son of the preceding and associated with him in several of his works. He wrote a vast number of novels and is accounted a 'pioneer of cheap literature'.

Egdon Heath, the scene of Hardy's 'The Return of the Native' (q.v.).

Egéria, an Italian goddess of fountains, who had a sacred spring near the Porta Capena of Rome. According to Roman legend she was the counsellor and wife of King Numa (the successor of Romulus), who, in order that he might commend his laws to the people, declared that they were previously sanctified and approved by her.

EGERTON, SIR THOMAS, Baron Ellesmere and Viscount Brackley (1540?-1617), was lord chancellor from 1603 till his death. He befriended Francis Bacon. John Donne was his secretary for four years (1596-1601), and Samuel Daniel and John Owen addressed poems to him. He left judicial and legal treatises in manuscript.

EGGLESTON, EDWARD (1837-1902), itinerant Methodist preacher and author, born in Indiana, U.S.A. His fame rests upon 'The Hoosier School-Master' (1871), in which the author sought to depict, faithfully and realistically, the men and women of the backwoods of his native state.

Egil, in Scandinavian legend, a brother of Völunder (see Wayland Smith). He was a skilled workman and archer, and, like the William Tell of later legend, was required by King Nidhud to shoot an arrow at an apple placed on his son's head.

Egill Skallagrímsson, the hero of the Egla Saga (see Saga).

Eglantine or EGLENTYNE, MADAME, the Prioress in Chaucer's 'Canterbury Tales' (q.v.).

Eglinton Tournament, THE, an attempt to revive the ancient tourney, made in 1839 at the suggestion of the thirteenth earl of Eglinton. The tournament was held at Eglinton Castle, Ayrshire. There is a good description of it in Disraeli's 'Endymion', cc. 59 and 60.

Egolst, The, a novel by Meredith (q.v.), published in 1879.

It is 'a comedy in narrative' of which the central figure is Sir Willoughby Patterne, rich and handsome, with a great position in the county, but insufferably selfish and fatuously conceited. Laetitia Dale, a lady with brains, but poor and shy, has long cherished a romantic passion for him, which he has not discouraged. But he has proposed to and been accepted by Constantia Durham, 'the Racing Cutter', as Mrs. Mountstuart Jenkinson, a clever neighbour with a gift for descriptive phrases, calls her. Constantia soon finds out the true Sir Willoughby, and one day during the courtship it is learnt that she has eloped with an officer of hussars—Willoughby's first humiliation. Presently he discovers the qualities needed for a Lady Patterne in Clara Middleton, the daughter of an epicurean professor, and the 'dainty rogue in porcelain' of Mrs. Mountstuart, and wins her hand in a whirlwind courtship. Clara's liberation is a longer affair than that of her predecessor, and is the main theme of the book. For Clara is a woman of greater delicacy than Constantia, and Willoughby fights hard against a second jilting. He cunningly wins her father's powerful support by the charm of Patterne port, 'an aged and a great wine'. On the other side are the scholar Vernon Whitford ('Phoebus Apollo turned fasting friar'), and young Crossjay, son of Lieutenant Patterne, a gallant officer of marines and poor relative of Willoughby, whose shabby appearance has drawn on him an unforgettable insult from the baronet. Crossjay, a jolly little lad, is finally the instrument of her release, for he unintentionally overhears Willoughby, seriously threatened by Clara's recalcitrance, seeking a line of retirement by a proposal to Laetitia Dale, which the latter, with a remnant of pride, refuses. So Willoughby finds himself once more and doubly humiliated; though in the end, by sheer pressure of persistence, he obtains the hand of the reluctant Laetitia. Clara marries Vernon Whitford. Dr. Middleton was drawn from T. L. Peacock (q.v.), and Vernon Whitford from Leslie Stephen (q.v.).

Egremont, CHARLES, the hero of Disraeli's 'Sybil' (q.v.).

Egyptian thief, THE, in Shakespeare's 'Twelfth Night' (v. i. 112), is from the story of Theagenes and Chariclea in the 'Aethiopica' of Heliodorus. They were carried off by Thiamis, an Egyptian pirate, who fell in love with Chariclea, and being pursued, shut her up in a cave with his treasure. When escape seemed impossible, being determined that she should not survive him, he thrust her through, as he thought, with his sword (Aldis Wright).

Eidothea, according to Homer (Od. iv) the daughter of Proteus (q.v.). She teaches Menelaus how to seize and question her father.

Eighteenth Century, an age associated in England, in a literary connexion, with the names of Swift, Pope, Defoe, Goldsmith, Richardson, Sterne, Johnson, Bolingbroke, Berkeley, Burke, and Young; an age of prose rather than poetry, of lucidity, simplicity, and grace, rational and witty rather than humorous, and somewhat lacking in intensity.

Eikon Basilike, the Pourtraicture of His Sacred Majestie in His Solitudes and Sufferings, a book by Dr. Gauden (q.v.), purporting to be meditations by King Charles I, and accepted as such at the time, published about the date of his execution, 30 Jan. 1649 (1648 O.S.). The book appealed to the popular sentiment of the moment so strongly that forty-seven editions of it were published, and the parliament thought it necessary to issue a reply, in the form of Milton's 'Eikonoklastes', published in 1649. 'Eikon Basilike' means 'royal image', and 'Eikonoklastes', 'image-breaker'. 'Eikonoklastes' takes the 'Eikon' paragraph by paragraph, and purports to refute it, but does so in a tedious and unworthy manner.

Eikonoklastes, see Eikon Basilike.

EINHARD or EGINHARD (770?-840?), a Frankish noble in the service of Charlemagne and subsequently of Louis le Débonnaire. He wrote a biography of Charlemagne (Vita Caroli Magni) and was, according to (false) tradition, his son-in-law.

EINSTEIN, ALBERT (1879-), born at Ulm in Württemberg of German-Jewish parents, and educated at Munich and in Switzerland, became in 1902 an engineer in the Swiss Patent Office, where he remained until 1909. It was during this period that he evolved some of his principal theories, the Special Theory of Relativity, the Inertia of Energy, &c. His General Theory of Relativity followed some years later (1915-17). From 1909 to 1911 he was professor at Zürich, Prague, and finally at the Prussian Academy of Science. He is chiefly famous for his revolutionary theory of the nature of space and time, known as the Theory of Relativity, which entirely upset the Newtonian conception of the universe; but he has also done important work in other branches of physics, e.g. by providing a mathematical theory of the Brownian movement of molecules.

The Special or Restricted Theory of Relativity states broadly that natural phenomena run their course according to the same general laws in respect of two observers of whom one is moving in a uniform rectilinear manner in respect of the other. This theory appears to be substantially in accord with our observation of natural phenomena; but it conflicts with the law of the propagation of light, viz. that this takes place, in vacuo, in straight lines at a velocity of 300,000 km. a second. If it does this for one observer, it cannot do so for another observer moving, e.g., away from him with a certain additional velocity. But this conflict is based on two assumptions: (1) that the time-interval between two events is independent of the condition of motion of the observer; (2) that the space interval between two points of a rigid body is independent of the condition of motion of the observer. To maintain the theory of relativity these assumptions must be abandoned and a formula sought by which the quantities noted by the first observer may be made to correspond with the quantities noted by the second observer, so that the law of the transmission of light shall hold good for both. This formula Einstein finds in the equations of what is known as the 'Lorentz Transformation', from which it results that relatively to a stationary observer, a metre rod laid in the axis of a moving system is not one metre long but only $\sqrt{1-v^2/c^2}$ of a metre, where v is the velocity of the moving system, and c that of light; and similarly that the intervals between the beats of a clock in a moving system are not of one second but slightly more. This surprising conclusion cannot be verified by ordinary experience because the differences cannot be detected with ordinary velocities, but it is confirmed by certain experiments. The Restricted Theory of Relativity thus requires that every general law of nature must be so constituted that it applies when, instead of the space-time data of one observer, we substitute those of another in uniform rectilinear motion. And the theory so stated is borne out by many optical and electro-magnetic facts of experience.

But it appears unlikely that the laws of nature should hold good only in relation to observers in particular states of motion. The General Theory of Relativity avoids this improbability by adopting a physics such that the laws of nature hold good in all cases; in other words by such an interpretation of the properties of space and gravitational fields as will admit the general extension of the recognized laws of nature. Under this interpretation, space loses its Euclidean characteristics, and in the vicinity of matter becomes curved, gravitation and inertia become indistinguishable, the 'force' of gravitation appears an illusion, the curved path of projectiles being due to their effort to keep a straight track in a curved space. This General Theory, like the Restricted or Special Theory of Relativity, has been confirmed by observation, notably by the displaced apparent position of stars whose rays pass near the sun during a total solar eclipse.

Space, thus being curved, becomes, under the theory, not unlimited, though unbounded, like the surface of a sphere. Its geometrical properties are determined by the distribution of matter in it. If matter were uniformly distributed, space would be spherical; as it is not, space deviates from the spherical, but is, according to Einstein, necessarily finite, though expanding (Einstein, 'Relativity, A Popular Exposition', trans. by R. W. Lawson; Eddington, 'Space, Time, and Gravitation'; &c.).

EINSTEIN

Eisteddfod, a Welsh word meaning 'session', the congress of Welsh bards held annually.

El Dorado, the name of a fabulous country or city, 'The Great and Golden City of Manoa', which was believed by the Spaniards and Sir Walter Raleigh (q.v.) to exist on the banks of the Amazon or the Orinoco. It was supposed to abound in gold, whence the name, which means 'the gilded one', perhaps applied to the king of that country.

El Greco, DOMENICO THEOTOCOPULI (1545?-1614), painter, was born in Crete, studied art under Titian, and settled permanently in Spain about 1577. His work, chiefly religious pictures and portraits, is characterized by an apparent distortion of forms, and by livid colour schemes, which for generations led critics to overlook its great qualities. In recent years El Greco has come to be regarded as one of the greatest of European painters. The best collection of his works is in the Prado Museum at Madrid.

Elagabalus or HELIOGABALUS, Varius Avitus Bassianus (c. 201-22), born at Emesa, became a priest of the Syro-Phoenician sun-god Elagabalus, whose name he took. Through the intrigue of his grandmother, Julia Maesa, who pretended that he was the son of Caracalla, the troops in Syria were induced to proclaim him Roman emperor. His reign, notable for his profligacy, lasted from 218 to 222, when he was slain by the troops.

Elaine, in Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur', (1) ELAINE LE BLANC, the daughter of Sir Bernard of Astolat and known as the FAIR MAID OF ASTOLAT, who falls in love with Lancelot and dies for love of him (see under Launcelot of the Lake; also Lancelot and Elaine); (2) the daughter of King Pelles and the mother, by Lancelot, of Galahad; (3) the wife of King Nentres (Malory, I. ii); (4) the wife of King Ban (IV. i); (5) the daughter of King Pellinore (III. xv). Some or all of these may derive from the Elen, wife of Myrddin (Merlin), of British mythology.

marriage; and Brisac thereupon proposes that Angelina shall marry the younger brother, Eustace, and that Charles shall be induced to surrender the bulk of his inheritance to Eustace, who eagerly falls in with the proposal. The plan is in a fair way of accomplishment, when Charles sees Angelina and they mutually fall in love. Eustace, a poor-spirited courtier, is routed, and after various complications the lovers are united.

Eldon, JOHN SCOTT, first earl of (1751-1838), fellow of University College, Oxford, lord chancellor 1801-6 and 1807-27, famous as one of the greatest of English lawyers: famous also for the delays of his court.

Eleanor Crosses, crosses erected by Edward I at the places where the remains of his queen, Eleanor of Castile, rested when being brought for burial from Lincoln to Westminster. Among these places are said to have been Lincoln, Geddington, Northampton, Stony Stratford, Woburn, Dunstable, St. Albans, Waltham, West Cheap in London, and Charing Cross; and there were probably others.

Eleatic, the name used to describe the philosophy of Parmenides (d. c. 450 B.C.) and Zeno (fl. c. 460 B.C.), who lived or were born at Elea, an ancient Greek city on the west coast of south Italy. These philosophers held that the real universe is a single, indivisible, eternal, unchanging whole, and the only subject of knowledge; what is mutable and perishable, and phenomena such as motion, are illusions, and about them we can have only conjectures.

Elector Palatine, the ruler of a State of the old German Empire, including two territories: one on both sides of the Rhine, just south of Mainz; the other in (later) Bavaria, just north of the Danube and south of the Upper Main. He was one of the seven original electors of the empire (see Holy Roman Empire). The word 'palatine', from Lat. palatium, signified an officer of the palace or court of the German emperors.

Electra, a daughter of Agamemnon (q.v.). She incited her brother Orestes (q.v.) to avenge their father's death by assassinating Clytemnestra (q.v.). Orestes gave her in marriage to his friend Pylades. She is the subject of plays by Sophocles and Euripides.

Elegant Extracts, see Knox (V.).

Elegiac, (1) in prosody, the metre consisting of a dactylic hexameter and pentameter (qq.v.), as being the metre appropriate to elegies; (2) generally, of the nature of an elegy, which according to Coleridge 'is the form of poetry natural to the reflective mind'. It may treat, he adds, of any subject, if it does so with reference to the poet himself. In a narrow sense, an elegy is a song of lamentation for the dead.

Elegy in a Country Churchyard, a meditative poem in quatrains of ten-syllabled lines by Gray (q.v.), published in 1750, having been begun in 1742.

The churchyard referred to is perhaps that of Stoke Poges. The poet in a reflective and melancholy mood gives expression to the thoughts called up in his mind by the sight of the tombs of the 'rude forefathers of the hamlet', and compares their humble lot with the great careers from which their fate excluded them. The poem ends on a personal note, with the supposed death of the author, his burial in the churchyard, and the epitaph on his grave.

Eleusinia, the Eleusinian mysteries, the most famous of the religious ceremonies of Greece, celebrated in honour of Demeter and Persephone, at Eleusis near Athens. They arose from an agrarian festival and appear to have been originally a feast of purification and fertility having reference to the autumn sowing of the corn. With this came to be connected the idea of the gods of the lower world, the descent into Hades, and the future life. The mysteries culminated in a rite carried out in a darkened hall, where the worshippers were shown visions in flashes of light.

Eleven Thousand Virgins, THE, see Ursula.

Elf, the name of a class of supernatural beings, in Teutonic mythology supposed to possess magical powers, which they used variously for the benefit or injury of mankind. They were believed to be of dwarfish form, to cause nightmares and diseases, to steal children, &c. In modern literature elf is a mere synonym of fairy, which generally denotes a more playful and less terrible creature than the 'elf' as originally conceived. Spenser applied the word 'elf' to the knights of his allegorical 'faerie land'.

Elfrida, see Ælfthryth.

Elgin Marbles, THE, derived chiefly from the frieze and pediment of the Parthenon at Athens, the work of Pheidias (c. 440 B.C.). They were collected by the earl of Elgin (1766-1841) when envoy to the Porte (1799-1803), conveyed to England (the ship containing them was wrecked near Cerigo), and sold to the British government. They were placed in the British Museum in 1816.

Elijah, a Hebrew prophet in the reign of Ahab. He was miraculously fed by ravens at the brook Cherith; raised the dead son of the widow of Zarephath; confuted the prophets of Baal; and was carried to heaven in a chariot of fire (1 Kings xvii et seq.).

ELIOT, SIR CHARLES (1863-1931), educated at Balliol College, Oxford, was a distinguished diplomatist, vice-chancellor of Sheffield University from 1905, and principal of the University of Hong-Kong, 1912-18. He was author of 'Turkey in Europe' (published in 1901 under the pseudonym 'Odysseus'), a learned and entertaining account of Macedonia and its various races under the old régime; of 'Letters from the Far East' (1907); and of 'Hinduism and Buddhism' (1921).

ELIOT, GEORGE (MARY ANN CROSS, born EVANS) (1819-80), spent the early part of her life in Warwickshire, where her father was agent for an estate. From somewhat narrow religious views she was freed by the influence of Charles Bray, a Coventry manufacturer, and devoted herself to completing a translation of Strauss's 'Life of Jesus' (1846). In 1850 she became a contributor to the 'Westminster Review' (q.v.) and in 1851 its assistant editor, resigning the post in 1853. In 1854 she published a translation of Feuerbach's 'Essence of Christianity' and about the same time joined George Henry Lewes (q.v.) in a union, without legal form, that lasted until his death. 'Amos Barton', the first of the 'Scenes of Clerical Life', appeared in 'Blackwood's Magazine' in 1857, followed by 'Mr. Gilfil's Love-Story' and 'Janet's Repentance' in the same year; these at once excited admiration of her talent as a novelist. 'Adam Bede' (q.v.) was published in 1859, 'The Mill on the Floss' (q.v.) in 1860, and 'Silas Marner' (q.v.) in 1861. In 1860 and 1861 she visited Florence, where the story of 'Romola' (q.v.) was conceived; it was published in the 'Cornhill' in 1862-3. 'Felix Holt' (q.v.), her only novel that deals with English politics, appeared in 1866. She travelled in Spain in 1867 and her dramatic poem, 'The Spanish Gipsy', appeared in 1868. 'Middlemarch' (q.v.) was published in instalments in 1871-2, and 'Daniel Deronda' (q.v.), her last great work, in the same way in 1874-6. Among her less important writings may be mentioned the satirical 'Impressions of Theophrastus Such' (1879) and the poems, 'How Lisa loved the King' (1867), 'Agatha' (1869), 'Armigart' (1870), 'The Legend of Jubal' (1870).

In May 1880 she married John Walter Cross, but died in December of the same year. Her novels reveal an exceptional sense of the humour and pathos of human life, a deep religious conviction of the purifying effect of human trials, and wide and varied learning.

ELIOT, THOMAS STEARNS (1888-), of American birth, author and editor of the 'Criterion', whose chief works are: 'The Waste Land' (1922), 'Ash Wednesday' (1930), poems; 'Homage to John Dryden' (1924), 'For Lancelot Andrewes' (1928), 'Dante' (1929), criticism; 'Murder in the Cathedral' (1935).

Elizabeth of Hungary, St., the wife of Louis, Landgrave of Thuringia (1207-31), the subject of the dramatic poem 'The Saint's Tragedy', by C. Kingsley (q.v.).

Elizabethan Literature, a name often applied vaguely to the literature produced in the reign of Elizabeth and the first Stuarts.

Ellen, the heroine of the ballad of 'Childe Waters' (q.v.).

ELLEN ALLEYN, the pseudonym under which C. Rossetti (q.v.) produced her earlier poems.

Ellen Douglas, the 'Lady of the Lake' in Scott's poem of that name (q.v.).

Ellen Orford, one of the tales in Crabbe's 'The Borough' (q.v.). It is the melancholy story of a woman who, after a neglected childhood, is seduced and abandoned; her child turns out an idiot; she marries, her husband dies, and his death is followed by the tragic end of their children; she herself is stricken with blindness, but finds consolation in her trust in God.

Ellesmere, LORD, see Egerton (Sir T.).

Ellieslaw, RICHARD VERE, laird of, and his daughter ISABELLA, characters in Scott's 'The Black Dwarf' (q.v.).

Elliot, HOBBISS or HALBERT, a character in Scott's 'The Black Dwarf' (q.v.).

ELLIOT, JANE (1727-1805), third daughter of Sir Gilbert Elliot, of Minto, was author of the most popular version of the old lament for Flodden, 'The Flowers of the Forest', beginning, 'I've heard them liltin at our ewe-milkin'.

Elliot, SIR WALTER, his daughters ELIZABETH, ANNE, and MARY, and his heir presumptive WILLIAM WALTER ELLIOT, characters in Jane Austen's 'Persuasion' (q.v.).

ELLIOTT, EBENEZER (1781-1849), became a master-founder at Sheffield, and is remembered as the 'Corn-law Rhymer'. As poet he attracted the attention of Southey. He bitterly condemned the bread-tax, to which, in his 'Corn-Law Rhymes' (1828), he attributed all national misfortunes. His other principal long poems are 'The Village Patriarch' and 'Love', but he also wrote some lyrics of much beauty, and the well-known political 'Battle Song'. His verse was collected in 1846.

Elliott, KIRSTIE, ROBERT, GILBERT, CLEMENT, and ANDREW, characters in R. L. Stevenson's 'Weir of Hermiston' (q.v.).

Ellipsis, the leaving out from a sentence words necessary to express the sense completely.

ELLIS, GEORGE (1753-1815), was one of the founders with Canning of the 'Anti-Jacobin' (q.v.), after having previously taken a hand on the other side in the 'Rolliad' (q.v.). He published in 1805 his valuable 'Specimens of Early English Romances in Metre'. He was a friend of Sir W. Scott. His 'Poetical Tales by Sir Gregory Gander' appeared in 1778.

ELLIS, HENRY HAVELOCK (1859-1939), after some years spent as a teacher in Australia, returned to England and qualified as a physician, but devoted himself to science and literature. He edited the 'Mermaid Series' of Elizabethan dramatists (1887-9) and the 'Contemporary Science Series'. His principal works, in which he showed independence of thought and ardour for scientific social progress, were: 'The New Spirit' (1890), 'Man and Woman' (1894), 'Studies in the Psychology of Sex' (1897-1910; the first vol. published in England led to a prosecution, after which the publication was transferred to the U.S.), 'Affirmations' (1898), studies of Nietzsche, Zola, and other writers), 'The Soul of Spain' (1908), 'The Task of Social Hygiene' (1912), and some volumes of verse.

Ellwood, THOMAS (1639-1713), Quaker and friend of Milton (q.v.), to whom he suggested by a chance remark the writing of 'Paradise Regained' (q.v.).

Elmo's Fire, ST., or CORPOSANT, the ball of light sometimes seen about the masts or yard-arms of a ship in a storm. This St. Elmo is said to have been Pedro Gonzalez of Astorga (1190-1240), a Dominican who devoted himself to preaching to the mariners of Galicia.

The St. Elmo of ST. ELMO'S CASTLE at Naples is said to be a corruption of St. Ermo, or St. Erasmus, an Italian bishop martyred under Domitian and a patron of sailors in the Mediterranean.

Elohim, in Hebrew a plural form signifying 'gods', but often construed as singular, with the sense 'God'. The words 'Elohimic' and 'Elohistic' are applied to passages of the Hebrew scriptures characterized by the use of the word 'Elohim' instead of the word 'Yahveh' (Jehovah, whence Yahvistic or Jehovistic).

ELOI

Eloi or ELOY (ELIGIUS), ST. (588-659), a skilful goldsmith, who was treasurer of the French kings Clotaire II and Dagobert I, and became bishop of Noyon. He is the patron of craftsmen. 'By Saint Eloy' was the 'greatest oath' of Chaucer's Prioress. His day is 1 December.

Eloisa or Héloïse, see Abélard.

ELPHINSTONE, MOUNTSTUART (1779-1859), governor of Bombay from 1819 to 1827, was author of a classic 'History of India' (1841) and of 'The Rise of the British Power in the East' (1887).

Elshender the Recluse, or ELSHIE OF THE MUCKLESTANES, the 'Black Dwarf' in Scott's novel of that name (q.v.).

Elsinore, a seaport in Denmark, on the Sound, the scene of Shakespeare's 'Hamlet' (q.v.). Now called Helsingör.

ELTON, OLIVER (1861-1945), author of 'The Augustan Ages' in 'Periods of European Literature' (1899), and of three 'Surveys of English Literature', viz. 1780-1830 (1912), 1830-80 (1920), and 1730-80 (1928).

Elton, THE REV. PHILIP, in Jane Austen's 'Emma' (q.v.), the conceited young vicar of Highbury. He marries the rich ill-bred Miss Hawkins of Bristol, sister of Mrs. Suckling of Maple Grove.

Elvira, (1) the heroine of Dryden's 'The Spanish Fryar' (see under Dryden); (2) the mistress of Pizarro in Sheridan's 'Pizarro' (see under Sheridan, R. B.); (3) the heroine of Victor Hugo's 'Hernani' (q.v.). See also Elvire.

Elvire, the wife of Don Juan (q.v.). She figures in Browning's 'Fifine at the Fair' (q.v.).

Ely Place, see Holborn. It is also sometimes mentioned in allusion to Sir G. Lewis, of a famous firm of solicitors which has its offices there.

ELYOT, SIR THOMAS (1499?-1546), author of the 'Boke named the Governour', published in 1531, a treatise on education and politics, which displays the influence at this time of the classics, and Plato in particular, and illustrates the evolution of English prose. To this book Elyot owed his appointment as ambassador to Charles V. He wrote a number of other works, including 'The Doctrine of Princes' (translated from Isocrates, 1534), 'The Image of Governance' (translated from a Greek manuscript of Eucolpius, the secretary of the Emperor Alexander Severus, and first published 1540), and Platonic dialogues and compilations from the Fathers. His translations did much to popularize the classics in England.

Elysium, a place or island in the western ocean, where, according to Greek mythology, the souls of the virtuous enjoy complete happiness and innocent pleasures. Virgil places it in Hades.

EMBLEMS

Elzevir, the name (properly ELZEVIER) of a family of printers at Amsterdam, The Hague, Leyden, and Utrecht (1592-1680), famous chiefly for their editions of the classics, many of which are valued by collectors.

Emaré, a 14th-cent. verse romance of 1,000 lines. Emaré is the daughter of the Emperor Artus. By the order of her unnatural father, she is cast adrift in a boat, clothed in a robe beautifully embroidered with four legends. She is found on the coast of Galys and married by Sir Cador, king of that country. Her son Segramour is born. By the wiles of the king's mother she is again cast adrift with her son and robe, and reaches Rome, where she is succoured by a merchant and works embroidery. For seven years her husband laments her, and coming to Rome to do penance is reunited with her.

Emathia, a region of Macedonia, the original seat of the Macedonian monarchy. Hence 'Emathian conqueror' for Alexander the Great in Milton's sonnet, 'When the assault was intended to the City'.

Ember Days, four periods of fasting and prayer appointed by the Church to be observed respectively in the four seasons of the year. By the Council of Placentia (1095) they were appointed to be the Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday next following (1) the first Sunday in Lent, (2) Whit-Sunday, (3) Holy Cross Day, 14 Sept., (4) St. Lucia's Day, 13 Dec. The word Ember appears in the 'Laws of Æthelred' as ymbren, perhaps a corruption of OE. ymbrine, period, revolution of time. But it may be due to popular etymology working upon some vulgar Latin corruption of quatuor tempora; cf. German quatember Ember-tide. [OED.]

Emblem-book, a book containing pictorial representations whose symbolic meaning is expressed in words. This kind of literature was begun by Alciati, a Milanese, whose 'Emblematum Libellus' appeared in 1522. The best known of his English followers were Quarles and Wither (qq.v.). Emblematic verses sometimes also took the form of verses themselves shaped in various forms, such as crosses, altars, bottles, &c. Wither, for instance, wrote a rhomboidal dirge.

Emblems, a book of short devotional poems by Quarles (q.v.), published in 1635.

The poems are in various metres, each based on some scriptural text, followed by appropriate quotations from the Fathers, and an epigram, and illustrated by quaint engravings, mostly by William Marshall (fl. 1630-50), and some of them taken from Herman Hugo's 'Pia Desideria'. Some of the poems take the form of dialogues, e.g. between Eve and the Serpent, between Jesus and the Soul, and between the Flesh and the Spirit.

A 'Collection of Emblemes' was also published by Wither (q.v.), similarly illustrated, in 1634-5.

EMBLEMS OF LOVE

Emblems of Love, a volume of poems in dramatic form by Abercrombie (q.v.).

Emelye, see Emilia.

Emerald Isle, Ireland, so called on account of its verdure. Dr. W. Drennan claimed to have first used the expression in his poem 'Erin' (1795).

EMERSON, RALPH WALDO (1803-82), philosopher and poet, was born in Boston, Mass., inheriting from his parents strong religious and spiritual tendencies. He was educated at Harvard, studied theology, was ordained, and became pastor at Boston, but resigned his charge owing to his views on the nature of the sacrament, which he was unable to regard 'as a divinely appointed, sacred ordinance of religion'. He came to Europe and visited England in 1833, meeting Coleridge, Wordsworth, and Carlyle (with whom followed a long friendship and correspondence). On his return to America he lectured on literature, biography, history, and human culture, and settled at Concord in 1835. Emerson's prose essay 'Nature', on the relation of the soul to nature, was published in 1836, and earned for his philosophical doctrine the epithet 'transcendental' (q.v.), which signifies that he was an idealist with a tinge of mysticism: 'Nature is the incarnation of thought. The world is the mind precipitated.' Emerson lectured on various reforms during 1838-9, and was editor of the idealist periodical 'The Dial' (q.v.) until 1844. In this appeared his poems, 'The Problem', 'Woodnotes', 'The Sphinx', and 'Fate'. In 1841 was published the first volume of his 'Essays', the second in 1844, and a collection of poems in 1847. The first volume of the 'Essays' contains his important discourses on 'Self-reliance', 'Compensation', and 'The Over-Soul'. He again came to England in 1847 and delivered lectures in the following year. 'Representative Men' was published in 1850, and 'English Traits' in 1856. During this period he took an active part in the anti-slavery campaign. From 1857 he contributed poems and prose (including 'The Roman Girl', 'Terminus', &c.) to the 'Atlantic Monthly', of which James Russell Lowell was editor. 'The Conduct of Life', a series of essays on Worship, Fate, Power, Wealth, &c., appeared in 1860; the poem 'May-Day' in 1867; the essay 'Society: Solitude' in 1870; 'Letters and Social Aims' in 1876. 'Miscellanies' and 'Lectures and Biographical Sketches' were published posthumously. His 'Journals', published in 1909-14, contain records of his self-communion and observations on men and books, as well as chronicles of daily events.

Emilia, (1) the lady loved by Palamon and Arcite, the EMELYE of the 'Knight's Tale' (see Canterbury Tales), who figures also in Fletcher's 'Two Noble Kinsmen' (q.v.); (2) in Shakespeare's 'Othello' (q.v.), the wife of Iago.

EMPEDŌCLES

Emilia Viviani, see Epipsychidion.

Em'ly, LITTLE, a character in Dickens's 'David Copperfield' (q.v.).

Emma, a novel by J. Austen (q.v.), begun in 1814 and published in 1816.

Emma, a clever and very self-satisfied young lady, is the daughter, and mistress of the house, of Mr. Woodhouse, an amiable old valetudinarian. Her former governess and companion, Miss (Anne) Taylor, beloved of both father and daughter, has just left them to marry a neighbour, Mr. Weston. Missing her companionship, Emma takes under her wing Harriet Smith, parlour-boarder at Mrs. Goddard's school in the neighbouring village of Highbury, the natural daughter of some person unknown, a pretty but foolish girl of 17. Emma's active mind sets to work on schemes for Harriet's advancement, and the story is mainly occupied with the mortifications to which Emma is subjected as a result of her injudicious attempts in this connexion. She first prevents Harriet from accepting an eligible offer from Robert Martin, a young farmer, as being beneath her; much to the annoyance of Mr. Knightley, the bachelor owner of Donwell Abbey, Martin's landlord, the friend of the Woodhouses, and one of the few people who could see faults in Emma. She has hopes of effecting a match between Harriet and Mr. Elton, the young vicar, only to find that Elton despises Harriet, and has the presumption to aspire to her own hand. Frank Churchill, the son of Mr. Weston by a former marriage, an attractive but thoughtless young man, now appears on the scene. Emma at first fancies him in love with herself, but presently thinks that Harriet might attract him, and encourages her not to despair, encouragement which Harriet applies not to Frank Churchill, of whom she has no thought, but to the great Mr. Knightley himself, with whom Emma is unconsciously in love. Emma has the double mortification of discovering, first that Frank Churchill is already secretly engaged to Jane Fairfax, niece of Miss Bates, the kindly garrulous daughter of a former vicar of Highbury, and secondly that Harriet has hopes, which appear to have some foundation, of supplanting her in Mr. Knightley's affections. But all ends well, for Mr. Knightley proposes to a humiliated and repentant Emma, and Harriet is easily consoled with Robert Martin, on his proposing to her a second time.

Emmaus, a village 'about threescore furlongs from Jerusalem', to which two of the disciples were going on the day of the Resurrection, when Jesus himself drew near and went with them (Luke xxiv).

Empedōclēs, a learned and eloquent philosopher, of Agrigento in Sicily, who flourished about 444 B.C. It is said that his curiosity to visit the crater of Etna proved fatal to him, a legend to which Milton refers in 'Paradise Lost', iii. 471, Lamb in 'All Fools' Day', and

EMPEDŌCLĒS

Meredith in 'Empedocles'. Matthew Arnold (q.v.) also wrote a dramatic poem 'Empedocles on Etna' (first published anonymously in 1852), in which the philosopher, once powerful in Sicily, but now 'the weary man, the banished citizen', climbs to the summit of the mountain resolved to die. He muses on man's mediocre lot and his own happier days, and speculates on the fate of the soul after death, before plunging into the crater.

Empyrean, THE, in ancient cosmology, the highest heaven, the sphere of the pure element fire (from the Greek ἐμπυρος, fiery). In Christian use, the abode of God and the angels.

Enceladus, one of the Giants of Greek mythology, sons of Gæ, who rose against the gods but were defeated. Enceladus was imprisoned under Mt. Etna.

Encyclopaedia Britannica. The word encyclopaedia means instruction in the whole circle of learning. Among early precursors of the E.B. may be mentioned the 'Grand Dictionnaire' of Moréri (1643-80), the 'Dictionnaire historique et critique' of Bayle (1647-1706), the 'Cyclopaedia' of Ephraim Chambers (q.v., 1728), and the great French 'Encyclopédie' (q.v.) of the 18th cent.

The first 'Encyclopaedia Britannica' was issued by a 'Society of Gentlemen in Scotland' in numbers (1768-71), the editor being William Smellie, a printer, afterwards secretary of the Society of Scottish Antiquaries. It was a dictionary of the Arts and Sciences. The second edition (1777-84), in ten volumes, added history and biography. The third edition, in fifteen volumes, appeared in 1788-97; and the fourth edition, in twenty volumes, in 1801-10. The undertaking was taken over by Constable in 1812, and the copyright sold after the failure of that house in 1826. After some further editions it passed to Cambridge University for the publication in 1910-11 of the eleventh edition in 28 volumes. [E.B.] The tenth and eleventh editions were by Hugh Chisholm. The fourteenth edition, under the editorship-in-chief of Mr. J. L. Garvin, was published in London and New York in 1929. See also Chambers's Encyclopaedia.

Encyclopaedists, the collaborators in the

ENDYMION

Encyclopédie (q.v.) of Diderot and D'Alembert.

Encyclopédie, L', an encyclopaedia published under the direction of Diderot and (until 1758) of D'Alembert (qq.v.), in 35 volumes, between 1751 and 1776. It originated in a proposal to translate Ephraim Chambers's 'Cyclopaedia' (1728). Its contributors included Voltaire, Montesquieu, J. J. Rousseau, Buffon, Turgot, and other brilliant writers. It embodied the philosophic spirit of the 18th cent., and its attempt to give a rational explanation of the universe is marked by love of truth and contempt for superstition. Its sceptical tendencies brought upon it the hostility of the clergy and official classes, and its publication was twice prohibited.

Endeavour, The, Captain Cook's ship on his first voyage to the Pacific.

Endimion, The Man in the Moon, an allegorical prose play by Lyly (q.v.), published 1591. Endimion abandons Tellus (the earth) in consequence of a hopeless passion for Cynthia (the moon). Tellus conspires with the witch Dipsas against Endimion, who is sent to sleep for forty years. Cynthia breaks the spell and releases Endimion with a kiss. The dramatic element is slight, the allegory perhaps relating to the rivalry between Elizabeth (Cynthia) and Mary Queen of Scots (Tellus), and the favour of Elizabeth for Leicester (Endimion). This is supplemented by subordinate allegories in the quarrel of the witch Dipsas and her husband Geron (the earl and countess of Shrewsbury), and the relations of Eumenides (perhaps Sir Philip Sidney) with Semele (perhaps Lady Rich).

Endor, THE WITCH OF, the woman with 'a familiar spirit' consulted by Saul, when forsaken of God and threatened by the Philistines. At his request she calls up Samuel, who prophesies the death of Saul and the destruction of his army (1 Sam. xxviii).

Endymion, a beautiful shepherd, of whom Selene (Diana) became enamoured when she saw him sleeping on Mt. Latmos. She caused him to sleep for ever that she might enjoy his beauty, whence the proverb, 'Endymionis somnum dormire', to signify a long sleep. According to another version he obtained from Zeus eternal youth and the gift of sleeping as long as he wished.

Endymion, a poem in four books, by Keats (q.v.), published in 1818.

The poem tells, and develops with a wealth of invention, the story of Endymion, the 'brain-sick shepherd-prince' of Mt. Latmos, with whom the moon goddess (Cynthia, Phoebe) falls in love, and whom, after luring him, weary and perplexed, through 'cloudy phantasmas', she bears away to eternal life with her. With this story are mingled the legends of Venus and Adonis, of Glaucus and Scylla, and of Arethusa. The poem includes in Bk. i the great 'Hymn to Pan', and in Bk. iv the beautiful roundelay 'O sorrow'.

In his preface, Keats described this work as 'a feverish attempt rather than a deed accomplished'. It is the work of an immature genius, the product of sensation rather than thought. The allegory, which is somewhat obscure, represents the poet pursuing ideal perfection and distracted from his quest by human beauty. The poem was violently criticized in 'Blackwood's Magazine' and the 'Quarterly'.

Endymion, a novel by Disraeli (q.v.), published in 1880.

This was the last of the author's novels. Endymion and Myra are the twin children of William Pitt Ferrars, a rising politician, who, when on the point of reaching cabinet rank, is overtaken by misfortune, and, after a period spent in retirement, dies penniless. Endymion is withdrawn from Eton and obtains a clerkship at Somerset House; Myra becomes companion to Adriana, the daughter of the rich and genial banker Adrian Neuchatel (subsequently Lord Hainault). The author traces the rise to social eminence of Myra, a beautiful, proud, ambitious, and determined woman, and to political eminence of Endymion, a clever and amiable, but more passive character. Myra's success is due to her captivating and marrying first Lord Roehampton, the foreign secretary, and secondly the parvenu monarch, King Florestan. Endymion owes his success less to his own ability than to the support given him by his brother-in-law, Lord Roehampton, and to the influence exerted on him by his imperious sister and by Lady Mountfort, a leader of political society, whom he marries on the death of her first husband. The story provides a succession of cleverly drawn characters and of entertaining pictures of life in high social and political spheres. The period dealt with is, in the main, that of the administrations of Lord Melbourne and Sir Robert Peel (1834-41), and Lord Roehampton is a thinly veiled portrait of Lord Palmerston.

England expects that every man will do his duty, Nelson's famous signal before the battle of Trafalgar.

England's Helicon, a miscellany of Elizabethan verse, published in 1600, edited by Bullen in 1887 and included in Arber's 'English Scholar's Library'. It is the best collection of lyrical and pastoral poetry of the Elizabethan age, and includes pieces by Sidney, Spenser, Drayton, Green, Lodge, Raleigh, Marlowe, and others.

England's Parnassus, a collection of extracts from contemporary poets, by R. Allot, published in 1600.

English, originally the dialect of the Angles (the first to be committed to writing), and extended to all the dialects of the vernacular, whether Anglian or Saxon. OLD ENGLISH or ANGLIO-SAXON is the English language of the period which ends about 1100-50; followed by MIDDLE ENGLISH during the period to about 1500; and after this by MODERN ENGLISH, which derives from the East Midland dialect, especially that of London. KING'S or QUEEN'S ENGLISH is correct grammatical English.

Abusing of God's patience and the king's English.

(Shakespeare, 'Merry Wives', I. iv. 5.)

English Association, THE, founded in 1906 to promote the teaching and advanced study of the English language and of English literature, and to unite all those who are interested in these subjects.

English Bards and Scotch Reviewers, a satirical poem in heroic couplets by Lord Byron (q.v.), published in 1809.

Nettled by a contemptuous criticism on his 'Hours of Idleness' in the 'Edinburgh Review', Byron wrote this vigorous satire, in which he attacks not only Jeffrey, the editor of the 'Review', but Southey, Scott, Wordsworth, and Coleridge, and tilts indiscriminately at all the poets and poetasters of the romantic school, while holding up to admiration Dryden and Pope, and their followers, Campbell and Rogers, in the classical tradition.

English Place-Name Society, THE, founded in 1923 to carry out the survey of English place-names inaugurated under the auspices of the British Academy in 1922. The Survey is published county by county.

English Poets, Lives of the, originally entitled 'Prefaces biographical and critical to the Works of the English Poets. By Samuel Johnson' (q.v.), published in 1779-81.

The work was undertaken at the request of certain London booksellers, to serve as biographical prefaces to a reprint, which they contemplated, of the works of the English poets. The selection of the poets was made by them, and includes authors of very different merit, and no poet earlier than Milton. The 'Lives' contain much interesting biographical matter, but are not always trustworthy and have been superseded in this respect. The criticism is unequal. At its best, it is some of the finest in the language; it is at its worst when Johnson is dealing with authors with whom he is out of sympathy, such as Milton and Gray. His condemnation of Milton's 'Lycidas' on the grounds of its artificiality and insincerity is well known.

English Traveller, The, a romantic drama by T. Heywood (q.v.), printed in 1623.

Geraldine, returning from his travels, finds that the lady whom he loves has been married to Wincot, a worthy old gentleman, to whom he is under obligations. He and the lady bind themselves, she that she will marry him after Wincot's death, he that he will remain single till then. A base plot by his treacherous friend Delavil leads to Geraldine's discovery that Delavil has seduced Wincot's wife. Heartbroken, Geraldine decides to leave the country. Before doing so he attends a farewell feast given him by Wincot. Wincot's wife hypocritically taxes him with his desertion of her, whereupon he reveals his discovery and upbraids her as an adulteress. She, in contrition and despair, dies.

There is a humorous under-plot, borrowed from the 'Mostellaria' of Plautus: the prodigal son who wastes his father's substance during the latter's absence on a voyage, the father's unexpected return, the tricks of a resourceful servant to postpone the discovery of the prodigal's doings, and the final pardon and general reconciliation.

Enid, see Geraint and Enid.

Enlitharmon, in the mystical poems of Blake (q.v.), a minister of Urizen (q.v.); she conveys his moral laws to mankind. In some parts she is the equivalent of Space, and nearly always the feminine counterpart of Los (q.v.).

Enjambment, a technical term in verse, signifying the carrying on the sense of a line or couplet into the next.

Enna, the name of the vale in Sicily in which Proserpine (q.v.) was gathering flowers when she was carried off by Pluto.

Enneads, see Plotinus.

ENNIUS, QUINTUS (239-169 B.C.), born at Rudiae in Calabria, a town in touch with Hellenism. He was the originator of Roman epic poetry, introducing the hexameter and the Homeric mode of treatment, in which he was followed by Virgil. His most important work was 'Annalium Libri xviii', a history of Rome from the arrival of Aeneas in Italy, in the form of an epic poem. Of this and of his tragedies only fragments survive.

Enobarbus [Domitius Ahenobarbus], in Shakespeare's 'Antony and Cleopatra' (q.v.), Antony's follower.

Enoch, the sixth in descent from Adam and father of Methuselah; he did not die, but was translated to heaven (Gen. v. 24). To his authorship are ascribed two apocryphal works, the 'Book of Enoch' and the 'Book of the Secrets of Enoch'. The former is an important collection of Pharisaic fragments, dating from the 2nd or 1st cent. B.C. The second is of later date and was perhaps written by a Hellenistic Jew of Alexandria. These writings deal with a multitude of subjects, astronomical, physical, historical, and apocalyptic.

Enoch Arden, a poem by A. Tennyson (q.v.), published in 1864.

Enoch Arden, Philip Ray, and Annie Lee are children together in a little seaport town. Both the boys love Annie, but Enoch, more resolute, wins her, and they live happily for some years, till Enoch, under temporary adversity, accepts an offer to go as boatswain in a merchantman. He is shipwrecked and for more than ten years nothing is heard of him. Annie is reduced to poverty, and Philip, who has faithfully loved her throughout, convinced of the death of Enoch, renews his wooing and finally makes her his wife. Then Enoch, rescued from a lonely island, returns. He witnesses, unknown, the happiness of Annie and his children and Philip. Broken-hearted, he finds strength to resolve that they shall not know of his return until after his death.

Enquiry concerning the Principles of Morals, by Hume, see Treatise of Human Nature.

Enquiry into the Present State of Polite Learning, An, a treatise by Goldsmith (q.v.), published in 1759.

This was Goldsmith's first considerable piece of writing, but the subject was hardly suited to his genius. In it he examines the causes of the decline of polite learning from ancient times, through the dark ages, to its present state in France, Italy, Holland, Germany, and England. He attributes the existing literary decay in England to the pedantry, solemnity, and lack of naturalness of poets, to the restrictions to which dramatic writers are subject, and to the defective system of the English universities.

Entail, The, a novel by Galt (q.v.), published in 1823, the story of the iniquitous disinheritance, by Claud Walkinshaw, a successful packman, of his eldest son in favour of his second son, a 'natural', because he is enabled thereby to reconstitute the ancestral property of the Walkinshaws. The disastrous consequences of this act recoil on himself, and on his children and grandchildren. The melancholy story is enlivened by many racy and humorous passages, such as the description of the judicial inquiry into the fatuity of the 'natural', and by the admirable portraits of the Walkinshaw family.

Entelechy, an Aristotelian term meaning the realization or complete expression of some function; used by later writers to signify that which gives perfection to anything, the informing spirit, the soul. In Rabelais, v. xix, 'Entelechy' is the kingdom of the lady Quintessence.

Entente Cordiale, The, the political understanding between Great Britain and France established about 1904. It was rendered possible by the agreement arrived at in that year on certain outstanding subjects of dispute, notably Egypt and Morocco.

Eolus, see Aeolus.

EON, CHEVALIER D' (1728-1810), a French political adventurer, who assumed at times the dress of a woman and was employed by Louis XV as a secret agent at the court of Elizabeth of Russia and later in London. Havelock Ellis has introduced the word Eonism into psycho-pathology as the generic term for cases of Transvertism, or the mania of men for wearing women's clothes.

Eos, see Aurora.

Edthen, see Kinglake.

Ephesiasts, inhabitants of Ephesus, a word used by Shakespeare ('2 Henry IV', II. ii, 'Merry Wives', IV. v) for boon companions. Shakespeare uses 'Corinthian' (q.v.) in much the same sense.

For 'Diana of the Ephesians' see Diana.

Ephesus, SEVEN SLEEPERS OF, see Seven Sleepers of Ephesus.

Ephialtes, a demon supposed to cause nightmare, probably derived from a Greek verb meaning 'to leap upon'.

Epic, AN, a poem that celebrates in the form of a continuous narrative the achievements of one or more heroic personages of history or tradition. Among the great epics of the world may be mentioned the 'Iliad', 'Odyssey', and 'Aeneid' of classical, and the 'Mahabharata' and 'Ramayana' of Hindu literature; the 'Chanson de Roland'; the 'Poema del Cid'; Milton's 'Paradise Lost'; Boiardo's 'Orlando Innamorato'; Ariosto's 'Orlando Furioso'; Tasso's 'Gerusalemme Liberata'; and Camoens's 'Lusiads' (qq.v.).

Epic of Hades, The, a poem in blank verse by Sir L. Morris (q.v.), published in 1876-7.

It consists of monologues put in the mouths of some of the principal characters of Greek mythology, such as Marsyas, Helen, Psyche, Andromeda, Narcissus, Laocoon, whom the poet encounters as he visits successively Tartarus, Hades, and Olympus.

Epic of the Wheat, The, the name given to an unfinished trilogy of novels by the American author Frank Norris (q.v.).

Epicede or EPICEDUM, a funeral ode.

Epicæne, or The Silent Woman, a comedy by Jonson (q.v.), first acted in 1609, and one of the most popular of his dramas. Morose, an egotistic bachelor with an insane aversion to noise, proposes to disinherit his nephew Sir Dauphine Eugenie, whom he suspects of ridiculing him, and to marry, if he can find a Silent Woman. Cutbeard, his barber, has found such a one in Epicæne. Immediately after the marriage Epicæne recovers the vigorous use of her tongue, to the dismay of Morose, which is increased by the arrival of his nephew and friends, with a party of 'Collegiate Ladies' and musicians to celebrate the bridal. Driven frantic by the hubbub, and having in vain consulted a pseudo-divine and a canon lawyer as to possible grounds of divorce, he accepts his nephew's offer to rid him of Epicæne for five hundred pounds a year and the reversion of his property. Whereupon Sir Dauphine pulls off Epicæne's peruke and reveals her as a boy whom he has trained for the part (the word 'Epicæne' means 'with characteristics of either sex').

Among the characters who contribute to the humour of the play are Captain Otter, who always speaks under correction when his wife is present; Sir Amorous La-Foole, a braggart and coward; the Collegiate Ladies (q.v.), and Sir John Daw, a braggart knight, who pretends to learning and collects the titles of classical works without knowing their contents.

Epictétus, Stoic philosopher (c. A.D. 60-140) of Hierapolis in Phrygia, a freedman of Epaphroditus, himself a freedman of Nero. He taught at Rome and subsequently at Nicopolis in Epirus, and is said to have been lame and poor. He wrote nothing himself, and the 'Enchiridion', or collection of his principles, was compiled by his disciple Arrian (q.v.). According to Epictetus, virtue consists in endurance and abstinence. Riches and honours are foreign to man and independent of him; but the true good and evil of life are within his control.

Epicurean, The, a prose romance by T. Moore (q.v.), published in 1827.

This is the story of Alciphron, a Greek Epicurean philosopher, who goes to Egypt in A.D. 257 to learn the secret of eternal life. He there assists a young Egyptian priestess, Alethe, who is secretly a Christian, to escape. By her and by an anchorite he is converted to Christianity. Alethe suffers martyrdom, and Alciphron himself is sentenced to hard labour and dies in the mines.

EPICÛRUS (341-270 B.C.), the founder of the school of philosophy that bears his name, was the son of an Athenian father. He was brought up in Samos, and after teaching philosophy in various places finally established his school in Athens. His will and some fragments of his writings survive, but his philosophy may be best read in the 'De Rerum Natura' of Lucretius. He adopted the atomic theory of Democritus (q.v.), concerning the universe, and in ethics regards the absence of pain—árapáfiá, or repose of mind—as the greatest good. Since virtue produces this repose, it is virtue that we should pursue.

Epidaureus, a town on the NE. coast of the Peloponnese and a centre of the worship of Aesculapius (q.v.), whom Milton refers to as 'the God in Epidaureus' ('Par. Lost', ix. 506).

Epigóni, 'the Descendants', the name given in Greek mythology to the sons of the seven heroes who perished in the expedition against Thebes (see Eteocles). Ten years after this expedition the Epigoni, led by Adrastus (q.v.), attacked Thebes to avenge their fathers, and razed it to the ground. The name is also applied to the heirs of Alexander the Great's successors (the Diadochi).

Epigram, originally an inscription, usually in verse, e.g. on a tomb; hence a short poem ending in a witty turn of thought; hence a pointed or antithetical saying.

EPIMÉNIDES, a semi-mythical Cretan poet and soothsayer, who is said to have visited Athens the 6th cent. B.C. to purify the city from the taint of a sacrilege. Legend relates that while tending his father's flocks in his boyhood, he one day entered a cave, fell asleep, and did not awake for 57 years, when to his surprise he found his brother grown an old man. The quotation in Titus i. 12, Kopfes del phoboras, &c., is said to be from his works.

Epiméthéüs, in Greek mythology, brother of Prometheus (q.v.). Less wise than his brother, he married Pandora (q.v.) and opened her box, whence issued the train of evils which have since vexed mankind.

Epiphany, THE, meaning 'manifestation', the festival commemorating the manifestation of Christ to the Gentiles in the persons of the Magi; observed on 6 Jan. Hence 'Twelfth-night', the festival of the 'Three Kings'.

Epipsychidion, a poem by P. B. Shelley (q.v.), published in 1821.

The poem is addressed to Emilia Viviani, a lady in whom the poet thought he had found the visionary soul in perfect harmony with his own ('Epipsychidion' would mean 'a soul upon a soul', that is 'a soul that is complementary to a soul'). The poem is an exposition and defence of free love, not only Platonic but passionate.

Epistolæ Obscurorum Virorum ('Epistles of Obscure Men'), published in 1515-17, are an anonymous collection of letters in medieval Latin purporting to be written by various bachelors and masters in theology to Ortuinus Gratius, a famous opponent of the new learning, in which they incidentally expose themselves to ridicule and to scurrilous charges. The letters are attributed principally to Ulrich von Hutten (1488-1523), soldier, humanist, and supporter of Luther, and were written in connexion with the celebrated Reuchlin-Pfefferkorn (qq.v.) controversy.

Epithalamion, a splendid hymn by Spenser (q.v.), perhaps in celebration of his marriage with Elizabeth Boyle in 1594. The poem was printed with the 'Amoretti' (q.v.) in 1595. The name is Greek, 'upon the bride-chamber'.

Epode, (1) a kind of lyric poem invented by Archilochus, in which a long line is followed by a shorter one, in metres different from the elegiac (q.v.), as in Horace's 'Epodes'; (2) the part of a lyric ode sung after the strophe and antistrophe (q.v.).

Eponymous, that gives his name to anything, used especially of the mythical personages from whose names the names of places or peoples are reputed to be derived.

Epopée, an epic poem, or the epic species of poetry.

Eppe, in G. Eliot's 'Silas Marner' (q.v.), the daughter of Cass and adopted child of Silas (abbreviation of Hephzibah, 'if it's nowise wrong to shorten the name').

ERASMUS

Eppur si muove, see Galileo.

Epsom, in Surrey, became famous for the races held on the neighbouring downs from the time (1779-80) when the Oaks and the Derby (qq.v.) were instituted, although races were run there much earlier. A mineral spring, from which EPSOM-SALT (magnesium sulphate) was first extracted, was discovered at Epsom in 1618.

Equality State, Wyoming, see United States.

Er the son of Armenius, The Myth of, in the 10th book of Plato's 'Republic' (q.v.). Er, having been killed in battle, came to life again on the twelfth day and related what he had seen in the other world. The story is told to illustrate the rewards that await the just after death.

ERASMUS, DESIDERIUS (1466-1536), the great Dutch humanist, was born at Rotterdam. Under pressure of his guardians he became an Augustinian monk, but thanks to the protection of the bishop of Cambrai was allowed to leave the cloister and travel extensively in Europe. He came more than once to England, where he was welcomed by the great scholars of the day, More, Colet, and Grocyn, and was induced by Fisher to lecture at Cambridge on Greek (he was appointed Lady Margaret Reader) from 1511 to 1514. He received from Archbishop Warham the benefice of Aldington in Kent, and on his resigning it, a pension which was continued until his death. His principal works were the 'Novum Instrumentum', a new Latin version of the New Testament, with a commentary (1516); 'Moriae Encomium' ('The Praise of Folly'), 1509, a satire written at the suggestion of Sir Thomas More, principally directed against theologians and Church dignitaries; 'Enchiridion Militis Christiani' (1503, a manual of simple piety according to the teaching of Jesus Christ, which was translated by Tyndale into English, and also into other languages), 'Institutio Christiani Principis' ('Education of a Christian Prince'), the vivid and entertaining 'Colloquia' and letters furnishing autobiographical details and pictures of contemporary life, which have been drawn upon by C. Reade in 'The Cloister and the Hearth' (q.v.) and by Sir W. Scott in 'Anne of Geierstein' (q.v.). His 'Adagia', a collection of Latin and Greek proverbs, traced to their source with witty comments, one of the first works of the new learning (1500), was much drawn upon by Rabelais among others. Erasmus prepared the way for the Reformation by his writings—his version of the New Testament, the scathing comments on Church abuses that accompanied it, and his 'Encomium Moriae'. With the movement itself he sympathized at first. But he refused to intervene either for or against Luther at the time of the Diet of Worms, although invoked by both sides. He urged moderation on both and disclaimed sympathy with Luther's violence and extreme conclusions, and at a later stage (1524, in his tract on 'Free Will') entered into controversy with him. The standard edition of the 'Letters' of Erasmus, by P. S. and H. M. Allen, is in course of publication.

Erastian, a name applied to the doctrine, attributed to Erastus, of the subordination of the ecclesiastical to the secular power. Erastus, or Liebler, was a physician of Heidelberg in the 16th cent. His actual efforts were mainly directed against the use of excommunication, which was exercised tyrannically by the Calvinistic churches. [OED.]

Eräto, one of the Muses (q.v.), who presided over love-poetry.

ERCELDOUNE, THOMAS OF, called also the RHYMER and LEARMONT (fl. 1220?-97?), seer and poet, is mentioned in the chartulary (1294) of the Trinity House of Soltra as having inherited lands in Erceldoune, a Berwickshire village. He is said to have predicted the death of Alexander III, king of Scotland, and the battle of Bannockburn, and is the traditional fountain of many (fabricated) oracles, one of which 'foretold' the accession of James VI to the English throne. He is the reputed author of a poem on the Tristram story, which Sir Walter Scott considered genuine; it probably emanated from a French source. The romance of 'True Thomas' and the 'ladye gaye', popularly attributed to him, may be placed after 1401 (edited by Dr. J. A. H. Murray, 1875).

ERCKMANN-CHATRIAN, the joint name adopted by ÉMILE ERCKMANN (1822-99) and ALEXANDRE CHATRIAN (1826-90), Lorrainers, authors of a series of novels treating of the wars of the French Revolution and the Napoleonic period, as seen from the standpoint of the humble soldier. The best known of them are the 'Histoire d'un conscrit' (1864), 'Waterloo' (1865), and 'Histoire d'un paysan' (1868). 'L'Ami Fritz' (1876), which falls outside this cycle, was also a successful work.

Erēbus, in Greek mythology, a place of nether darkness, on the way to Hades.

Erebus and the Terror, The, the ships of Sir John Franklin's expedition, which sailed in 1845 in search of the North-West Passage. They were abandoned in 1848 after having been for 18 months beset in the ice. Both ships had been employed by Sir James Clark Ross in his Antarctic voyage of 1839-41. Hence the great volcano Mt. Erebus was named.

Erechthēus, a mythical king of Athens, either identical with, or the grandson of, the equally mythical Erichthonius. In a war of the Athenians against the Eleusinians and their ally Eumolpus, son of Poseidon, he was advised by the Delphic oracle that in order to be victorious he must sacrifice one of his daughters, which he did. The Eleusinians were defeated, but Poseidon in anger destroyed Erechtheus and all his house. This legend is the subject of a tragedy in the Greek form by Swinburne (q.v.).

Erewhon (pronounced as three short syllables, 'ē-rē-whōn'), a satirical romance by S. Butler (1835-1902, q.v.), published in 1872.

The narrator, having crossed an unexplored chain of mountains in a remote part of a colony (Butler had in mind New Zealand), comes upon the land of Erewhon (an anagram of 'nowhere'). The institutions that he finds there and describes are a vigorous satire on the hypocrisy, compromise, and mental torpor that Butler was ever inveighing against. The most notable feature in the Erewhonian system is the paradoxical substitution for moral obliquity of physical ailment as a proper subject for punishment. Whereas pulmonary consumption is a crime, embezzlement is a matter for condolence and curative treatment. In the Musical Banks, the Birth Formulae, &c., we have satires on ecclesiastical institutions and parental tyranny. There is an ingenious description of the development of machinery to the point when it had to be completely abolished lest it should 'take charge' and overwhelm the inhabitants. Finally the narrator escapes from the country in a balloon of his own construction, accompanied by an Erewhonian lady with whom he has fallen in love.

Erewhon Revisited, a sequel to 'Erewhon' (q.v.) by S. Butler (1835-1902, q.v.), published in 1901.

Higgs (to adopt the name by which the narrator of Erewhon was known to the Erewhonians), driven by an overmastering desire to revisit that country, does so after an interval of twenty years, to discover that his ascent in a balloon has been held miraculous, that a religious myth has grown up round it, that he is himself now worshipped as the child of the sun, and that a great temple is on the point of being dedicated to him. The way in which public credulity has been exploited by the professors Hanky and Panky, and the new religion adopted by the 'musical banks', is told with consummate irony. Horrified at the mischief he has done, and goaded by Hanky's sermon at the dedication, Higgs reveals himself, but is hustled away by friendly hands. An amusing conference follows between all concerned to decide what is to be done about 'Sunchildism', as the new religion is called; and Higgs is then smuggled out of the country.

Eric, a legendary king of Sweden, who could control the direction of the wind by turning his cap.

Erl-King, the German Erl-könig (alder-king), an erroneous rendering of the Danish eller-konge, king of the elves, a malignant goblin, who in German legend, and in Goethe's poem on the subject, haunts the Black Forest, and lures people, particularly children, to destruction. Goethe's poem was the foundation of one of Schubert's best-known songs ('Erlkönig', written in 1816), and was translated by Sir W. Scott.

Ermeline, in 'Reynard the Fox' (q.v.), Reynard's wife.

Ermensul, see Irmisul.

Ermine Street or ERMING STREET or ERMYN STREET, the name of a road corresponding in parts with the old Roman road from London through Huntingdon to Lincoln. The derivation is uncertain. Dr. Guest connected it with the names of the Ermings or Fenmen. It has been suggested that it is from 'Irmin', the Teutonic god whose name appears in 'Irmisul' (q.v.).

Ernani, see Hernani.

Ernest Maltravers, and Alice, or The Mysteries, a novel and its sequel by Bulwer Lytton (q.v.), published in 1837 and 1838.

The author, in his preface, states that he is indebted to Goethe's 'Wilhelm Meister' for the idea of a moral education set forth in these books. Ernest Maltravers, a young man of wealth and position, benighted on a moor, seeks refuge in the hovel of Luke Darvil, a villainous cut-throat. He is saved from murder and robbery by Darvil's daughter Alice, a beautiful, uneducated, and morally undeveloped child, who at the same time escapes from her father's cruel treatment. Touched by her helplessness, Ernest constitutes himself her protector, but finally yields to his passion for her. Alice thereafter remains faithful to Ernest, though circumstances separate them for many years. During these Ernest loves a number of women, and twice becomes engaged, but the marriages are prevented by the designs of his unscrupulous enemy, Lumley Ferrers. Finally Ernest is reunited and married to Alice. With this story is woven the tragedy of the unfortunate Castruccio Cesarini, the disappointed Italian poetaster, who becomes the tool and finally the murderer of Ferrers.

Ernulf or ERNULPHUS (1040-1124), bishop of Rochester, and author of the 'Textus Roffensis', a collection of laws, papal decrees, and documents relating to the church of Rochester. The comprehensive curse or excommunication of Ernulphus figures in Bk. III, chs. x, xi of Sterne's 'Tristram Shandy' (q.v.).

Eros, see Cupid. Eros in Shakespeare's 'Antony and Cleopatra' (q.v.) is the faithful attendant of Antony, and kills himself to avoid killing his master. It is also the name given to the winged figure of an archer over the bronze fountain in Piccadilly Circus, by Alfred Gilbert, R.A., erected in 1893 as a memorial to the Earl of Shaftesbury (1801-85), the philanthropist.

Erostratus or ERATOSTRATUS, see Herostratus.

Erotokritos, of Vincenzo Kornaros, a medieval Greek epic, edited (1929) by J. Mavrogordato.

ERRA-PATER, the assumed name of the author of an astrological almanac first published in 1535, referred to by Butler in 'Hudibras', l. i, and by Congreve in 'Love for Love' (qq.v.).

Esculapius, see Aesculapius.

Escorial or ESCORIAL, THE, a vast and gloomy edifice on the Sierra NW. of Madrid, designed as a palace, a convent, and a tomb by Philip II, who erected it in accomplishment of a vow made in a moment of panic at the battle of St. Quentin (1557). San Lorenzo, to whom the vow was made, was burnt to death on a slow fire, and the plan of the building resembles a gridiron. Philip II died there (1598), after having lived there fourteen years. The origin of the name is uncertain.

Esdras, the reputed author of two of the books of the Apocrypha: the first mainly a compilation from Chronicles, Nehemiah, and Ezra; the second a record of angelic revelations and visions, pointing to the destruction of the wicked and the salvation of the righteous.

Esmond, The History of Henry Esmond, Esquire, a novel by Thackeray (q.v.), published in 1852.

The History is narrated by Henry Esmond himself. He is the son (supposed to be illegitimate) of the 3rd Viscount Castlewood, who was killed fighting for King James at the battle of the Boyne. Henry then comes under the protection of the 4th viscount, in whose household he serves as page. He is kindly treated by Lord Castlewood, and particularly by Lady Castlewood, for whom he conceives a profound devotion. He has the misfortune to bring the small-pox into the household, by which Lady Castlewood loses some of her beauty, and in consequence much of her husband's love. The unprincipled Lord Mohun takes advantage of the estrangement between them to attempt to seduce Lady Castlewood. This attempt is discovered by Lord Castlewood, and in spite of Henry's endeavour to take the quarrel on himself, a duel follows, in which Lord Castlewood is mortally wounded. On his death-bed he reveals to Henry that the 3rd viscount was married to Henry's mother and that Henry is the rightful owner of the title and property. Henry decides to sacrifice himself and not claim his rights, so as not to injure Lady Castlewood and her son Frank. But Lady Castlewood, in her passionate grief for her lord's death, bitterly upbraids Henry for allowing the duel to take place, and banishes him from her house.

Henry joins the army and serves with distinction in Marlborough's campaigns, from Blenheim to Malplaquet. In the course of his service he returns to England, and hearing a false rumour that Lady Castlewood is about to marry her chaplain, the square-toed Tom Tusher, hurries to see her. The scene of their reunion, in Winchester Cathedral, is one of the most touching and dramatic passages in Thackeray's works. In spite of her petulance, Lady Castlewood has given her heart to Henry, and henceforth loves him tenderly. But meanwhile her two children, Frank, the present viscount, and Beatrix his sister, have grown up. The latter is a girl of extraordinary beauty, but vain of her beauty and ambitious. Henry falls deeply in love with her, but she is too proud to consider an alliance with one whom she regards as of illegitimate birth. She becomes affianced to the duke of Hamilton, but he is murdered by Lord Mohun before the marriage can take place. Finally she causes the failure of a scheme promoted by Henry for the proclamation of the Pretender, by flirting with the Prince and luring him to Castlewood at the moment when his presence in London is necessary. Completely disillusioned, Henry abandons her and marries Lady Castlewood, his act of self-sacrifice having before this become known both to her and to her son and daughter. Henry and his wife migrate to Virginia and their subsequent history in that country is referred to in 'The Virginians' (q.v.). Beatrix, it appears from the latter work, subsequently married Tom Tusher (who became a bishop) and, after his death, Baron Bernstein. Thackeray gives a vivid picture of English society in the early years of the 18th cent., introducing Dick Steele and his Prue, Marlborough and his Duchess, Swift, and Addison.

Esmond, BEATRIX, one of the principal characters in Thackeray's 'Esmond' and 'The Virginians' (qq.v.).

Esop, see Aesop.

Esotéríc, a word used by Lucian, who attributes to Aristotle a classification of his own works into 'esoteric', i.e. designed for, or appropriate to, an inner circle of advanced or privileged disciples, and 'exoteric', i.e. popular, untechnical. Later writers use the word to designate the secret doctrines said to have been taught by Pythagoras to a select few of his disciples.

Esperanto, a universal language introduced in 1887 by Dr. L. L. Zamenhof, and now somewhat widely used.

Esplandian, the son of Amadis of Gaul (q.v.) and Oriana. In his childhood he was suckled by a lioness by which he had been carried off, but being recovered by his parents became a doughty knight, performed great exploits against the Turks, and married Leonorina, the daughter of the Greek emperor.

Esprillella, Letters of, see Southey.

Esprit d'escalier, French, a tardy wit, which thinks of a smart retort or witticism too late, when its owner is going downstairs, on his way out of the house.

ESQUEMELING, EXQUEMELING, or OEXMELIN, ALEXANDER OLIVIER, a Dutch physician, who lived with the buccanera (q.v.), 1668-74, and published an account of them (including Morgan) and their doings. This was translated into Spanish, French, and English.

Essay concerning Human Understanding, a philosophical treatise by Locke (q.v.), published in 1690 (2nd edition, 1694; 4th, 1700; 5th, 1706; each with large additions).

The Essay is an examination into the nature of knowledge, as calculated to guide us to the proper use of our understanding. Locke begins by refuting the doctrine of 'innate ideas', and maintaining that all knowledge is of empiric origin. The materials or objects of understanding are termed by him ideas, and after giving an account of the origin, sorts, and extent of our ideas, he considers what knowledge the mind derives from them. The source of ideas is experience, the observation of external objects or the internal operations of the mind, i.e. sensation or reflection. Sensation is always of a quality. Qualities are either primary—extension, figure, mobility, and number; or secondary—not really belonging to things, but imputed to them, depending on our subjective perception, and inscrutably connected with the primary qualities, which alone really belong to things. A number of simple ideas being constantly found to go together, the mind is led to suppose a substratum for them, and this we call substance, but have no other idea of its nature. We are equally ignorant of spiritual substance, the substratum of the operations of the mind. We do not even know whether material and spiritual substance are the same or different. The idea of cause or power is derived from experience, principally of the workings of the mind. The idea of infinity is a negative idea derived from experience of the absence of any limit to the power of imagination to extend space, time, or number.

Knowledge consists in the perception of the agreement or disagreement of ideas, and is either intuitive and direct, or demonstrative (through the interposition of a third idea). Knowledge in matters of real existence is limited to two certainties, of our own existence, by intuition, and of the existence of God, by demonstration. For, as regards the latter, we have intuitive certainty that bare nothing cannot produce any real being. Therefore from eternity there has been something to which thinking perceiving beings owe their powers, that is God, Eternal Mind.

We have a lesser degree of certainty of the existence of finite beings without us, of which the mind perceives nothing but its own ideas, and cannot know that they agree with the things themselves. Locke advances various arguments for the objective validity of sensitive knowledge, but points out that even if we admit its validity, this knowledge is narrowly limited: we know only of the existence together, here and now, of collections of simple ideas; we cannot demonstrate the necessity of their coexistence. There are therefore very few general propositions, carrying with them undoubted certainty, to be made concerning substances; a perfect science of natural bodies is unattainable. Experience and history is all we can attain to, from which we may derive advantages of ease and health. Still less can we attain to 'scientific' knowledge of spirits. Knowledge at once general and real must be, not of the relations of ideas to reality, but of ideas to each other, e.g. mathematics, and also moral science (though on the latter point he is more doubtful in his 'Reasonableness of Christianity'). The faculty that God has given us in place of clear knowledge is judgement, whereby the mind takes a proposition to be true or false without demonstration. Locke discusses the relations of faith and reason. Unlike Bacon and Hobbes, he holds that faith is nothing but the firm assent of the mind, which cannot be accorded to anything except on good reason. Revelation must be judged by reason. But the field of knowledge being so limited, it must be supplemented by faith, and this is the basis of Locke's 'Reasonableness of Christianity' published in 1695.

Essay of Dramatic Poesie, by Dryden (q.v.), published in 1668, and probably written at Charlton, near Malmesbury, in Wiltshire, whither the poet betook himself during the plague.

It takes the form of a dialogue between four interlocutors, Eugenius (Dorset), Crites (Sir Robert Howard), Lisideius (Sir Charles Sedley), and Neander (Dryden himself). The four friends have taken a boat on the Thames on the day of the engagement between the English and Dutch fleets in the mouth of the river (3 June 1665). At first the friends are mainly occupied with this stirring event, but presently, as the sound of firing becomes more distant, their talk turns to literary subjects, and they discuss the comparative merits of the English and French drama, and of the old and the new English drama. The Essay is largely concerned with a defence of the use of rhyme in drama. It also contains an admirable appreciation of Shakespeare.

Essay on Criticism, a didactic poem by Pope (q.v.), in heroic couplets, published anonymously in 1711. It begins with an exposition of the rules of taste and the authority to be attributed to the ancient writers on the subject. The laws by which a critic should be guided are then discussed, and instances are given of critics who have departed from them. The work is remarkable as having been written when Pope was only twenty-one.

Essay on Man, a philosophical poem in heroic couplets by Pope (q.v.), published in 1732-4.

It consists of four epistles, addressed to Henry St. John, Lord Bolingbroke, and perhaps to some extent inspired by his fragmentary philosophical writings. It is part of a larger poem projected but not completed. Its object is to vindicate the ways of God to man; to prove that the scheme of the universe is the best in spite of appearances of evil, and that our failure to see the perfection of the whole is due to our limited vision. Epistle I treats of the nature and state of man with respect to the universe; Epistle II, of man with respect to himself as an individual; Epistle III, of man with respect to society; Epistle IV, of man with respect to happiness. Dugald Stewart expressed the view that the Essay is 'the noblest specimen of philosophical poetry which our language affords' ('Active and Moral Powers', Works, 7. 133), a judgement which would now hardly be endorsed. Dr. Johnson's verdict was very different: 'Never were penury of knowledge and vulgarity of sentiment so happily disguised.'

Essays and Reviews, a collection of essays on religious subjects from a broad church standpoint, published in 1860. The editor was the Rev. Henry Bristow Wilson (author of 'The Communion of Saints', 1851), and the other contributors were Frederick Temple (the future archbishop), Mark Pattison (q.v.), Jowett (q.v.), Rowland Williams, Baden Powell, and C. W. Goodwin.

The essays, which were, in general, critical of doctrine, and in some instances provocative in form, occasioned much offence. Wilson and Williams were tried in the court of arches (q.v.) and found guilty of heresy, but were acquitted on appeal. The only essay that has much interest to-day is Pattison's, on the 'Tendencies of Religious Thought in England, 1688-1750'.

Essays, or Counsels, Civill and Morall, The, of F. Bacon (q.v.), are collections of reflections and generalizations, and extracts from previous authors, woven together, for the most part, into counsels for the successful conduct of life and the management of men.

Three editions of the essays were published in Bacon's lifetime. The first, that of 1597, contained ten essays; the second, that of 1612, contained thirty-eight essays; and the third, that of 1625, contained fifty-eight. Of these some deal with questions of state policy, such as the essay on 'Greatness of Kingdoms'; some with personal conduct, such as those on 'Wisdom for a Man's Self' and 'Cunning'; some on abstract subjects, such as 'Truth', 'Death', and 'Unity'; while some reveal Bacon's delight in Nature, such as the pleasant essay on 'Gardens'.

Essays contributed to the Edinburgh Review, Critical and Historical, by T. B. Macaulay (q.v.), a collection published in 1843 and later editions.

The 'Essays' deal with the following subjects (the date of original publication is appended): Milton (1825), Machiavelli (1827), Hallam's Constitutional History (1828), Southey's Colloquies on Society (1830), Robert Montgomery's Poems (1830), Southey's Edition of the Pilgrim's Progress (1830), Civil Disabilities of the Jews (1831), Moore's Life of Byron (1831), Croker's Edition of Boswell's Life of Johnson (1831), Lord Nugent's Memorials of Hampden (1831), Burleigh and his Times (1832), War of the Succession in Spain (1833), Horace Walpole (1833), the Earl of Chatham (1834), Mackintosh's History of the Revolution (1835), Lord Bacon (1837), Sir William Temple (1838), Gladstone on Church and State (1839), Lord Clive (1840), Ranke's History of the Popes (1840), Comic Dramatists of the Restoration (1841), Lord Holland (1841), Warren Hastings (1841), Frederic the Great (1842), Madame d'Arlay (1843), Addison (1843), the Earl of Chatham (second article, 1844). They take, as a rule, the form, not so much of a review of the books named at the head of each, but of a general survey, biographical, political, or literary, of the subject of that book. They are occasionally truculent, as that on Croker's 'Boswell', and misleading (it is said), as those on Bacon and Hastings. The best are those on Chatham, Clive, and Sir William Temple.

Essays in Criticism, see Arnold (M.).

Essays of Elia, The, miscellaneous essays by C. Lamb (q.v.), of which the first series appeared in the 'London Magazine' between 1820 and 1823, and were republished in a separate volume in the latter year. The second series was published in 1833. Lamb adopted the pseudonym Elia (to be pronounced, according to Lamb himself, 'Ell-ia') to save the susceptibilities of his brother John, still a clerk in the South-Sea House, which is the subject of the first of the 'Essays'. The name was that of an Italian clerk formerly in the service of that institution.

The 'Essays' are largely autobiographical; they deal with mankind at large as seen through the medium of Lamb's own experiences and impressions. They present, with exquisite humour and pathos, and in a brilliant and inimitable style, characters that the author has known (such as Samuel Salt, his father's employer, in 'Some of the Old Benchers of the Inner Temple'), recollections of childhood (as in 'Christ's Hospital' and 'Blakesmoor') or of later life (as in 'The South-Sea House'), personal experiences (as in 'The Superannuated Man'), the productions of a playful or melancholy fancy (as in 'A Dissertation upon Roast Pig' and 'Dream Children'), and general comments and criticism.

Essenes, a Jewish sect, dating from before the Christian era, whose name is perhaps derived from a Syriac word meaning 'pious'. They held certain speculative opinions, grafted on their Judaism, regarding the soul and the future life, and offered prayers to the sun. They lived a monastic and ascetic life, renouncing marriage, and had community of goods.

Este, HOUSE OF, one of the most celebrated of the princely families of Italy. Albert Azzo, lord of Este in Italy, born about 996, said to be descended from Odoacer, king of Italy (476), married first Cunegonda of the house of Guelf, by whom he became the ancestor of the houses of Brunswick and Hanover, and secondly Gersonda, whose descendants were the Estes, lords of Ferrara and Modena. The house of Este is exalted in Ariosto's 'Orlando Furioso' (q.v.), where Ruggiero (Roger, q.v.) is represented as its ancestor.

Esther Summerson, a character in Dickens's 'Bleak House' (q.v.), and narrator of part of the story.

Esther Waters, a novel by G. Moore (q.v.), published in 1894.

It is the story of the life of a religiously minded girl, a Plymouth Sister, driven from home into service at 17 by a drunken stepfather. She obtains a situation at Woodview, the house of the Barfields, where a racing-stable is kept, and all above- and below-stairs (except Mrs. Barfield, a Plymouth Sister like Esther) are wrapt up in gambling on races. There, in a moment of weakness, she is seduced by a fellow servant and deserted. She has to leave her place, though kindly treated by Mrs. Barfield. Then follows a poignant tale of poverty, hardship, and humiliation: the lying-in hospital, service as wet-nurse, other miserable situations, even the workhouse, in the mother's brave struggle to rear her child. Her seducer re-enters her life, marries her, and makes a good husband. But he is a book-maker and public-house keeper; exposure to weather at the races ruins his health, and trouble with the authorities over betting at his house causes the latter to be closed. He dies, and leaves his wife and son penniless. Finally Esther returns to Woodview, where she finds peace at last, with Mrs. Barfield, now a widow, living alone and impoverished in a corner of the old house.

Estienne (STEPHANUS), the name of a family of French printers of the 16th cent. Henri Estienne (d. 1520), of a Provençal family, came to Paris in 1502 and started printing. Of his sons, Robert (1503-59), a scholar as well as a printer, who adopted the device of the olive tree, printed a number of important works, a critical Latin New Testament (1523), a Latin Bible (1528), a 'Thesaurus linguae Latinae' (1532, the best Latin dictionary of the time), and 'Ecclesiasticae Historiae' with Garamond Greek type (1544). He moved to Geneva in 1551. Henri Estienne (1531-98), the son of Robert, did valuable work in collecting and collating manuscripts in Italy. He printed at Geneva works of Greek authors and a 'Thesaurus Graecae Linguae' (1572). He was the father-in-law of Isaac Casaubon (q.v.).

Estmere, KING, the subject of an ancient legend preserved in one of the ballads in Percy's 'Reliques' (q.v.).

King Estmere is a king of England who with his brother Adler goes to the court of King Adland to ask the hand of his daughter, but learns that Sir Bremor, 'a foule paynim', king of Spain, has forestalled him. The lady, however, accepts him. While preparations are making for the wedding, the king of Spain arrives and claims his bride. Estmere returns disguised as a harper, slays the king of Spain, drives off the 'Kempy men' (i.e. the fighting men), and marries the lady.

Esto Perpetua Club, THE, founded in 1784, consisted of supporters of Fox against Pitt, including Dr. French Laurence, George Ellis, the antiquary, General Richard Fitzpatrick, and Lord John Townshend. The idea of 'The Rolliad' (q.v.) originated with this club.

Estotiland, a mythical tract in North America, supposed to lie near the Arctic circle, east of Hudson Bay. It is mentioned by Milton, 'Paradise Lost', x. 686.

Estrildis, a German maiden brought to England by King Humber (q.v.), loved by Locrine, king of Britain, and mother by him of Sabrina. She and her daughter were drowned in the Severn by Locrine's angry queen, Gwendolen. The story is told by Geoffrey of Monmouth and reappears in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene' (II. x), also in Swinburne's 'Locrine'. In Wace and Layamon, the name of Æstrild's daughter is Abren, and she is drowned in the river Auren, which Sir F. Madden (note in his edition of Layamon, l. 2498) thinks is the Avon (flowing into the sea at Christchurch). The Welsh name of the Severn is Hauren.

Etëoclës, son of Oedipus (q.v.) and Jocasta, and brother of Polyneices. After their father's death it was agreed that the brothers should reign in Thebes in alternate years; but Eteocles refused to give up the throne at the appointed time. Polyneices, assisted by Adrastus, king of Argos, and the Argive army headed by seven heroes, marched against Thebes, and was opposed by Eteocles. After indecisive fighting, it was decided that the struggle should be settled by the brothers in single combat. In this they slew each other. The Argive chiefs were slain with the exception of Adrastus. This war was known as that of 'The Seven against Thebes', the subject of a tragedy by Aeschylus.

ETHEREGE or ETHEREDGE, SIR GEORGE (1634?-91?), perhaps son of Capt. George Etheredge, an early planter in the Bermudas, spent part of his early manhood in France. He produced 'The Comical Revenge, or Love in a Tub' (q.v.) in 1664. The serious portions are in rhymed heroica, setting a fashion that was followed for some years, while the comic underplot in prose with its lively realistic scenes was, as Gosse has pointed out, the foundation of the English comedy of Congreve, Goldsmith, and Sheridan. In this Etheredge drew his inspiration from Molière. In 1668 he produced 'She would if she could', and in 1676 'The Man of Mode' (q.v.), two further comedies. Etheredge, thanks to the protection of Mary of Modena, was sent in 1685 as envoy to Ratisbon, where he remained for some years, a period of his life on which his manuscript 'Letter-book', discovered by Sir Edmund Gosse (and since published), throws an interesting light.

Eton College, near Windsor, was founded by Henry VI, as a preparatory school for King's College, Cambridge, the charter of foundation being dated 1440 and followed by various charters of endowment. The College included, in addition to some 300 sons of noblemen and gentlemen, 70 king's scholars on the foundation, who passed by seniority to King's College, Cambridge (see also under Montem). In 1443 Waynflete, headmaster of Winchester, was induced by the king to migrate to Eton, and was accompanied by five fellows and thirty-five scholars of Winchester.

Among the many names eminent in literature, connected with Eton, may be mentioned those of Edward Hall, the historian, Thomas Tusser, Sir Henry Wotton, Edmund Waller, Henry More, Bishop Pearson, Bolingbroke, Henry Fielding, Thomas Gray, Horace Walpole, George Canning, Richard Porson, Shelley, Praed, Gladstone, Hallam, Milman, Swinburne, and Robert Bridges (qq.v.).

Etruscans, THE, a people of uncertain origin, who inhabited in early times a portion of NW. Italy and in the 8th cent. B.C. developed a system of powerful city states and a flourishing civilization of which many remains have been discovered. Their language, known to us in inscriptions, is still unread except for some names and isolated words. The Etruscans formed a small ruling class in most of the cities they dominated; at the height of their power in the 7th cent. B.C. their influence extended from the Po to Campania, Rome being governed during some part of the time by the Etruscan family of the Tarquinii. After 500 B.C. the political strength of the Etruscans began to decline, though the influence of their more highly developed art and civilization continued to be felt in Rome.

Etzel, the name given in German legend to Attila, king of the Huns.

EUCLID (EUCLEIDĒS), the celebrated geometrician, lived at Alexandria in the reign of the first Ptolemy (323–283 B.C.), but the place of his birth is not known. His great work on elementary geometry and arithmetic survives. It was Euclid who told Ptolemy that there was no 'royal road' to geometry.

Euclio, in the 'Aulularia' of Plautus, an old miser, on whom Molière modelled his Harpagon (in 'L'Avare').

Eugene Aram, a novel by Bulwer Lytton (q.v.), published in 1832. It is based on the story of Eugene Aram, a schoolmaster of Knareborough, a man said to have been of unusual ability and gentle disposition, who in 1759 was tried and executed at York for the murder of one Clarke.

In the novel Eugene Aram is represented as a romantic character, who under pressure of dire poverty consents to the murder, which is done by his accomplice Houseman. From this moment Aram suffers the torments of remorse. He settles in a remote village and falls in love with Madeline Lester, a woman of noble character. Their marriage is about to take place when Houseman reappears and betrays Aram, who is imprisoned, tried, and sentenced to death, while Madeline succumbs to the shock.

Eugene Aram, The Dream of, a poem by Hood (q.v.), based on the same story as the preceding.

Eugenius, a character in Sterne's 'Tristram Shandy' (q.v.), the friend of Yorick. He represents John Hall Stevenson (q.v.).

EUHĒMĒRUS, a Sicilian in the service of Cassander of Macedonia (311–298 B.C.). He wrote a 'Sacred History' in which he advanced the theory (for which he professed to have found documentary evidence in an imaginary island in the Indian Ocean) that the Greek gods were human kings or heroes, deified after their death by those whom they had ruled over or benefited. This method of explaining mythological stories was called after him EUHĒMERISM.

Eulenspiegel, TILL, the name of a German, born according to tradition about 1300, the son of a peasant, and the subject of a collection of satirical tales, German or Flemish in origin, published in 1519 (Flemish version 1520–1). He is a scapegrace whose knaveries and escapades are carried on under a pretence of simplicity and stupidity, and are directed against noblemen, priests, tradesmen, and innkeepers. One of these incidents figures in Chaucer's 'Sompnour's Tale'. The book was translated into many languages, among others into English in an abridged form by William Copland, under the title of 'Howleglass', about 1560. See 'The Marvellous Adventures . . . of Master Tyll Owlglass', transl. by K. R. H. Mackenzie, 1860.

Euphrōsýnē, one of the Graces (q.v.).

Euphues, a prose romance by Lyly (q.v.), of which the first part, 'Euphues: the Anatomy of Wit', was published in 1578, and the second, 'Euphues and his England', in 1580. The plot of each is very slender and little but a peg on which to hang discourses, conversations, and letters, mainly on the subject of love. The work is largely based on North's 'Diall of Princes' (q.v.). In the first part Euphues, a young Athenian, visits Naples, where he makes the acquaintance of Philautus, an Italian, and a friendship develops between them. None the less Euphues proceeds to oust Philautus from the affections of Lucilla, to be in turn ejected by one Curio. Euphues and Philautus, after upbraiding one another, unite in holding Lucilla 'as most abominable', and part friends, Euphues returning to Greece and leaving behind him a pamphlet of advice to lovers, which he terms 'a cooling Carde for Philautus'.

In Pt. II Euphues and Philautus travel to England, where their adventures are even less entertaining than at Naples. They are largely concerned with the love-affairs on which Philautus embarks, in spite of the advice of Euphues to use circumspection in his dealings with English ladies; and much space is occupied by a discussion on such questions as 'whether in love be more required secrecie or constancie'. Finally Euphues is recalled to Greece. From Athens Euphues addresses a letter to the ladies of Italy, 'Euphues' glass for Europe', in which he describes England, its institutions, its ladies, its gentlemen, and its queen; and a final letter of general advice from Euphues to Philautus completes the work.

'Euphues' is famous for its peculiar style, to which it has given the name 'Euphuism'. Its principal characteristics are the excessive use (1) of antithesis, which is pursued regardless of sense, and emphasized by alliteration and other devices; and (2) of allusions to historical and mythological personages and to natural history (probably drawn from the writings of Erasmus). Scott has satirized Euphuism in the character of Sir Piercie Shafton in 'The Monastery' (q.v.), and C. Kingsley has defended 'Euphues' in 'Westward Ho!' (q.v.).

The work is interesting for its place in the evolution of the English novel, and it had a stimulating effect on the writers of the age, such as Lodge and Greene.

Eurēka, a Greek word (more correctly 'heurēka') meaning 'I have found it', the exclamation uttered by Archimedes (q.v.) when he discovered, by observing in his bath the water displaced by his body, the means of testing (by specific gravity) whether base metal had been introduced in Hiero's crown.

EURIPIDES (480-406 B.C.), the youngest and most 'modern-minded' of the three great Attic tragedians, said to have been born at Salamis on the day of the defeat of the Persians in the naval battle off that island. The characteristics of his plays are their human quality (men and women are represented in them as they are in everyday life), their poignant realism, and the frequent introduction, to conclude the drama, of a god ex machina. His extant plays, the survivals of some ninety that he is said to have written, are the following: 'Alceas', 'Medea', 'Hippolytus', 'Hecuba', 'Andromache', 'Ion' (the founder of the Ionian race), the 'Suppliants' (the refusal of Creon of Thebes to bury the Argive warriors), the 'Heracleidae'

(the children of Heracles persecuted by Eurystheus), the 'Mad Heracles', 'Iphigenia among the Tauri', the 'Trojan Women', 'Helen', the 'Phoenissae' (the story of Eteocles and Polyneices, with a chorus of Phoenician maidens), 'Electra', 'Orestes', 'Iphigenia at Aulis', the 'Bacchae' (the destruction of King Pentheus by the Bacchantes), and the 'Cyclops', a 'satyr play' dealing with the story of Odysseus and Polyphemus. Euripides was made much fun of by the comic poet Aristophanes.

Eurōpa, daughter of Agēnor, king of Phoenicia, of whom Zeus became enamoured. He assumed the shape of a beautiful bull and mingled with the herds of Agenor. Europa caressed him and sat upon his back. Zeus thereupon carried her off to Crete, where she became the mother of Minoas, Rhadamanthus, and Sarpēdon (qq.v.).

Eurysthēus, a king of Argos, in whose service Hercules (q.v.) executed his twelve labours.

EUSDEN, LAURENCE (1688-1730), poet laureate from 1718 until his death. He had celebrated the marriage of the duke of Newcastle, who gave him the laureateship. Pope refers to him in the 'Dunciad' (q.v.):

Know Eusden thirsts no more for sack or praise;

He sleeps among the dull of ancient days.

EUSEBIUS of Caesarea in Palestine (A.D. 265-340), bishop of Caesarea, and a celebrated historian and theologian. His 'Chronicle' in Greek (of which we have a Latin version by Jerome) contains an epitome of universal history and chronological tables, the foundation of much of our knowledge of the dates of events in Greek and Roman history. He was involved in the Arian controversy, was one of the leaders at the Council of Nicaea, and voted for the 'Nicene formula'. He was a voluminous writer, and a valuable authority on the early church, showing diligence and sincerity. His 'History of the Christian Church', which earned him the title of 'Father of Church history', was completed c. 325. His 'De Vita Constantini', often tacked on to the 'History' but evidently written earlier, is of especial interest; for the question whether Constantine was ever actually baptized rests upon Eusebius.

Eustace, FATHER, a character in Scott's 'The Monastery' (q.v.), the energetic sub-prior of Kennaquhair.

Eustace Diamonds, The, a novel by A. Trollope (q.v.), reprinted from the 'Fortnightly Review' in 1873.

of the wealthy Sir Florian Eustace, who soon leaves her a widow. He has given her a diamond necklace that has been for generations in his family, and is worth £10,000. The story centres on this necklace, which the lawyer of the Eustace family is determined to recover as an heirloom, while Lizzie is equally determined to retain it. She intends at the same time to marry the worthy Lord Fawn, who insists on the surrender of the necklace. Lizzie is finally exposed, and having failed to catch any of her other admirers is reduced to marrying Mr. Emilius, a popular preacher, but suspected to be a Bohemian Jew, with a wife already at Prague.

Evalak or EVELAKE, king of Sarra in the legend of the Grail (q.v.).

Evan Harrington, a novel by Meredith (q.v.), published in 1861.

Evan Harrington is the son of Melchizedek Harrington, the glorified tailor of Lympport, 'the great Mel', 'the Marquis', as he is known, a man of distinguished appearance and fine manners. Evan's sisters have married, one an officer of Marines, one a rich brewer, Andrew Cogglesby, and one a Portuguese nobleman, the Count de Saldar. The sisters are all anxious to forget their connexion with tailordom—'Demogorgon' as the countess calls it—and to establish Evan in a good position by a grand marriage. Evan has been staying with the countess in Lisbon, has been employed as temporary secretary to the British envoy, the Hon. Melville Jocelyn, and has fallen in love with his niece Rose. Evan's father has just died, leaving heavy debts. The novel tells the story of the gallant fight made by the countess, with endless resource and audacity, to launch Evan in 'high life' and conceal the undesirable connexion, in the face of the honest Evan's reluctance, of the determination of their mother, 'a woman of mark and strict principle', that Evan shall carry on the tailoring business, and of various disconcerting incidents. The whole truth of course comes out, but Evan has by that time confessed to Rose and won her heart. And now the countess overreaches herself. She adopts a dishonourable device for the discomfiture of Ferdinand Laxley, Evan's rival and enemy, of which Evan feels in honour bound to assume the guilt. He is dismissed the house and his engagement with Rose broken off. Meanwhile Juliana Bonner, the sickly cousin of Rose, and immediate heiress of the Jocelyn property, has fallen in love with Evan, whose innocence she discovers. Rejected by him, on her death-bed she makes the truth known to Rose, and bequeaths the whole Jocelyn property to Evan. His renunciation of this in favour of the Jocelyn family, coupled with the clearing of his character and the financial support of his eccentric old bachelor uncle, Tom Cogglesby, leads to a happy conclusion of the story. Among the minor characters may be mentioned Evan's friend, Jack Raikes, the butt of old Cogglesby's farcical humour.

It should be remembered that Meredith was himself the grandson of a famous Portsmouth tailor.

Evandale, Lord, a character in Scott's 'Old Mortality' (q.v.).

Evangelical, a term applied from the 18th cent. to that school of Protestants which maintains that the essence of 'the Gospel' consists in the doctrine of salvation by faith in the atoning death of Christ, lays more stress on faith than on works or on sacramental grace, and upholds the verbal inspiration of the Bible. As a distinct party designation, the term came into general use, in England, at the time of the Methodist revival; and it may be said, with substantial accuracy, to denote the school of theology which that movement represents.

Evangeline, a narrative poem in hexameters, by Longfellow (q.v.), published in 1847.

Gabriel Lajeunesse and Evangeline Bellefontaine, son and daughter of two well-to-do peasants of Grandpré in Acadia, have recently been betrothed, when the inhabitants are driven from their homes for disaffection to the English rule. By accident the lovers embark on different ships and are carried to widely distant destinations. Gabriel and his father become prosperous farmers in Louisiana. Evangeline, her father having died of grief, travels to seek Gabriel, and at length reaches his farm, only to find that he has migrated to the western prairies. After years of fruitless search she becomes a sister of mercy and tends the sick. At length she finds Gabriel, at the point of death, in an almshouse, and the lovers are united as he dies. The poem is notable for its descriptions of American scenery and its idyllic simplicity.

EVANS, SIR ARTHUR JOHN (1831–1941), son of Sir J. Evans (q.v.), educated at Harrow and Brasenose College, Oxford, and at Göttingen, was made keeper of the Ashmolean Museum in 1884, and from 1893 was engaged on archaeological investigations in Crete, which resulted in the discovery of the pre-Phoenician script and an entire new civilization. From 1900 he devoted himself to the excavation of the Palace of Knossos, Crete. His chief publications were: 'Through Bosnia, &c.' (1895), 'Antiquarian Researches in Illyricum' (1883–5), 'Cretan Pictographs and Pre-Phoenician Script' (1896), 'Further Discoveries of Cretan and Aegean Script' (1898), 'The Mycenaean Tree and Pillar Cult' (1901), 'Scripta Minos' (vol. i, 1909), and 'The Palace of Minos at Knossos' (1922–35).

EVANS

EVANS, SIR HUGH, a Welsh parson in Shakespeare's 'Merry Wives of Windsor' (q.v.). He is the 'Sir Hugh' referred to in Lamb's 'Amicus Redivivus' ('Essays of Elia').

EVANS, SIR JOHN (1823–1908), archaeologist and numismatist, was president of the Geological, Numismatic, and Antiquarian Societies, and was author of several learned works: 'Flint Implements of the Drift' (1860), 'The Coins of the Ancient Britons' (1864), 'The Ancient Stone Implements, Weapons, and Ornaments of Great Britain' (1872), and 'The Ancient Bronze Implements, Weapons, and Ornaments of Great Britain and Ireland' (1881).

EVANS, MARY ANN, see Eliot (G.).

EVANS, SEBASTIAN (1830–1909), brother of Sir J. Evans (q.v.), educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, was editor of the 'Birmingham Daily Gazette', 1867–70, and part founder and editor of the 'People', 1878–81. He was also an artist and exhibited at the Royal Academy. In literature he is remembered as an ardent medievalist, as the author of 'Brother Fabian's Manuscripts' (1865), 'Songs and Etchings' (1871), 'In the Studio' (1875), and as translator of 'The High History of the Holy Graal' (1898–1903, 1910); he also wrote an original study of the Grail ('In quest of the Holy Grail', 1898).

Evans's, in the NW. corner of the Piazza, Covent Garden, originally the residence of the earl of Orford (d. 1727), converted into an hotel in 1774. In 1844 it passed under the management of one Paddy Green and became famous for its musical parties and suppers. Thackeray's 'Cave of Harmony' is partly drawn from it. It was subsequently, for a time, the home of the National Sporting Club.

Eve of St. Agnes, The, a poem by Keats (q.v.) written in 1819. Madeline has been told the legend that on St. Agnes' Eve maidens may have visions of their lovers. Her lover Porphyro is of hostile lineage, and she is surrounded by 'hyena foemen, and hot-blooded lords'. Yet he steals in on this night, and when she wakes from dreams of him, she finds him by her bedside. Together they escape from the castle.

A. Tennyson (q.v.) also wrote a poem, 'St. Agnes' Eve', describing the rapture of a nun in her convent garden on that night.

Evelina, a novel by Fanny Burney (q.v.), published in 1778

Sir John Belmont, disappointed of the fortune which he expected to receive with his wife, abandons her and her child Evelina, who is brought up in seclusion by a guardian, Mr. Villars. Evelina, who has grown up a beautiful and intelligent girl, goes to visit a friend, Mrs. Mirvan, in London, where she is introduced into society and falls in love with the handsome and dignified Lord Orville, but is exposed to much mortification by reason of her vulgar grandmother, Mme Duval, her ill-bred relatives, and the pursuit of her pertinacious lover, Sir Clement Willoughby. An attempt is made to induce Sir John Belmont to recognize Evelina as his daughter, which is met by the surprising announcement that his daughter had been conveyed to him by the woman who had attended Lady Belmont in her last illness and had been in his care since infancy. It is now discovered that this nurse had passed her own child off on Sir John. Evelina is recognized as his heir, and marries Lord Orville.

EVELYN, JOHN (1620–1706), educated at Balliol College, Oxford, was a man of means, of unblemished character, and a dilettante, who helped to advance English civilization. He published in 1661 'Fumifugium or The inconvenience of the Air and Smoke of London dissipated'; in 1662, 'Sculptura', a book on engraving; 'Sylva', a book on practical arboriculture, which exerted great influence, in 1664; 'Navigation and Commerce' in 1674; and a number of translations from the French on architecture, gardening, &c. He is remembered principally by his 'Diary', describing his travels on the Continent and containing brilliant portraits of his contemporaries; it covers his whole life. It was first published in 1818, but never printed in its entirety (a complete edition is in preparation). Evelyn's 'Life of Mrs. Godolphin' was first printed in 1847, and various other minor works have been published in recent times.

Every Man in his Humour, a comedy by Jonson (q.v.), performed at the Curtain Theatre (with Shakespeare in the cast) in 1598.

Kitely, a merchant, is the husband of a young and pretty wife, and his 'humour' is jealousy. His house is resorted to by his young brother with a crowd of riotous but harmless gallants, and these he suspects of designs on his wife. One of these young men is Edward Knowell, whose father's 'humour' is excessive solicitude for his son's morals. Dame Kitely, though not suspicious by nature, becomes highly credulous when her suspicions are aroused. Bridget, Kitely's sister, is merely a young woman easily wooed and won. Bobadill, one of Jonson's greatest creations, a 'Paul's man' (q.v.), is a boasting cowardly soldier, who associates with the young gallants above mentioned. Out of these elements, by the aid of the devices and disguises of the mischievous Brainworm, Knowell's servant, an imbroglia is produced in which Kitley and his wife are brought face to face at a house to which each thinks the other has gone for an improper purpose; Bobadill is exposed and beaten; young Knowell is married to Kitley's sister; and poetasters and 'gulls' are held up to ridicule. The misunderstandings are cleared up by the shrewd and kindly Justice Clement.

EVERY MAN IN HIS HUMOUR

The prologue contains an exposition of Jonson's dramatic theory.

Every Man out of his Humour, a satirical comedy by Jonson (q.v.), first acted in 1599 at the Globe Theatre, in which the poet holds up to ridicule various absurd characters and fashions of the day: Fastidious Brisk, the spruce fashionably-dressed courtier; Fungoso, a student, whose aim in life is to be a courtier, but who is always behind the fashion; Sordido, his father, a countryman, whose recreation is reading almanacs and his felicity bad weather, because his barns are full; Sogliardo, Sordido's brother, whose ambition is to be taken for a man of quality; Deliro, who dotes absurdly on his wife; Puntarvolo, a vainglorious knight, who makes a ridiculous insurance on the safe return of his cat and dog from a voyage to Constantinople. They are all put 'out of humour' with their various predilections.

Everyman, the title of a popular morality (q.v.) of the 15th cent., of Dutch origin. The characters are God, Messenger, Death, Everyman, Fellowship, Kindred, Good Deeds, Goods, Knowledge, Beauty, Strength, and similar abstractions. The theme is the summoning of Everyman by Death. Everyman finds that no one of his friends except Good Deeds will accompany him.

EWING, Mrs. JULIANA HORATIA (1841-85), née GATTY, a notably successful writer of books for the young. Among these may be mentioned 'A Flat Iron for a Farthing' (1873), 'Lob-lie-by-the-Fire' (1873), 'The Miller's Thumb' (in 'Aunt Judy's Magazine', 1873, republished as 'Jan of the Windmill', 1884), 'Jackanapes' (1884), 'The Story of a Short Life' (1885).

Ex pede Herculem, 'judge the size of Hercules from his foot'. Aulus Gellius (i. i) quotes Plutarch as stating (in a work now lost) that Pythagoras calculated the stature of Hercules by comparing the length of the stadium of Olympia with the stadia in other parts of Greece. The former was 600 ft. in length as measured by Hercules; the latter 600 ft. as measured by ordinary men. Cf. the similar expression, 'ex ungue leonem' ('judge the lion from its claw').

Examination of Sir William Hamilton's Philosophy, a treatise by J. S. Mill (q.v.), published in 1865, and amplified in subsequent editions.

The most important part of the work is the doctrine developed by Mill in regard to the external world (expressed in the famous phrase 'permanent possibility of sensation') and the mind or self. 'If we speak of the Mind as a series of feelings, we are obliged to complete the statement by calling it a series of feelings which is aware of itself as past and future; and we are reduced to the alternative of believing that the Mind, or Ego, is something different from any series of feelings, or possibilities of them, or of accepting the paradox, that something which ex hypothesi is but a series of feelings, can be aware of itself as a series.' 'I ascribe a reality to the Ego—to my own Mind—different from that real existence as a Permanent Possibility, which is the only reality I acknowledge in Matter.'

Examiner, The, a Tory periodical started by Viscount Bolingbroke (q.v.), in the autumn of 1710, and conducted by Jonathan Swift until June 1711. Prior was a contributor. Some forty numbers appear to have been published. It engaged in controversy with Steele's 'Guardian' (q.v.) and Addison's 'Whig Examiner'.

Examiner, The, a weekly periodical launched in 1808 by John Hunt and his brother Leigh Hunt (q.v.), dealing with literature and politics, which by its independent attitude exercised a considerable influence on the development of English journalism. From 1821 to 1849 it was edited by Albany Fonblanque, a radical; then by John Forster and Henry Morley. It lasted until 1880.

Excalibur, a corrupt form of 'Caliburn' (the name used in Geoffrey of Monmouth), was King Arthur's sword, which he drew out of a stone when no one else could draw it (Malory, i. iv), or which was given him by the Lady of the Lake (Malory, ii. iii). Malory says that the word is equivalent to 'cut-steel'. 'The Welsh form in the Mabinogion is Caledvwlch, which has a resemblance, that cannot well be accidental, to Caladbolg, the name of a famous sword in Irish legend' [OED.]. When Arthur was mortally wounded in the last battle, he ordered Sir Bedivere to throw Excalibur into the water. A hand rose from the water, caught the sword, and vanished.

Excelsior, Latin 'higher', the motto adopted (in defiance of Latin grammar) by the State of New York in 1778; used by Longfellow (as an expression of incessant aspiration after higher attainment) for the refrain of a well-known poem.

EXCHANGE

Exchange, THE LONDON STOCK, for the sale and purchase of securities (shares, stocks, and bonds) was originally conducted at Jonathan's coffee-house in Change Alley, and subsequently in a room taken by the brokers in Sweeting's Alley, which was given the name of the Stock Exchange Coffee House. In 1801 joint stock capital was raised to provide premises on the present site of the Stock Exchange in Capel Court. These premises have since been extended.

Exchange, THE NEW, a bazaar on the south side of the Strand, a popular resort in the 17th-18th cents., frequently referred to in the drama of the period.

Exchange, THE ROYAL, London, was originally founded by Sir T. Gresham (q.v.) in 1566 and opened by Queen Elizabeth. It was destroyed in the Great Fire of 1666. Its successor was likewise burnt in 1838. The present building was opened in 1844.

Excursion, The, a poem in nine books by Wordsworth (q.v.), published in 1814. This is the middle portion of a great philosophical poem 'on man, on nature and on human life', in three parts, designed by the author, but of which this alone was completed. The whole work was to be entitled 'The Recluse', 'as having for its principal subject the sensations and opinions of a poet living in retirement'. It was planned in 1798, when Wordsworth was living at Alfoxden, near Coleridge.

The story is very slight. The poet travelling with the Wanderer, a philosophic pedlar, meets with the latter's friend, the pessimistic Solitary. The source of the latter's despondency is traced to his want of religious faith and of confidence in the virtue of man, and is reproved in lengthy arguments. Another character, the Pastor, is introduced, who illustrates the harmonizing effect of virtue and religion by narratives of the lives of persons interred in his churchyard. They visit the pastor's house, and the Wanderer draws his general philosophical and political conclusions from the discussions that have passed. The last two books deal in particular with the industrial expansion of the early part of the century and the degradation of the humbler classes that followed in its train. The remedy is found in the provision of proper educational facilities for the children. Book I embodies the beautiful 'Story of Margaret' or 'The Ruined Cottage', originally written as a separate poem.

Exeter Book, THE, a famous collection of old English poems, copied about 975, given by Bishop Leofric (d. 1072) to Exeter Cathedral, where it still remains. The book contains many important works, including 'Widsith' and 'Deor' (qq.v.).

Exeter Hall, a large hall in the Strand, London, opened in 1831, for meetings of religious and philanthropic bodies, concerts, &c. It was noted for the religious services held there in 1856 by the Rev. C. Spurgeon (q.v.). It was for many years the centre of the Young Men's Christian Association. The name is used allusively of Evangelicalism.

Exhibition, THE GREAT, the first international exhibition of the products of industry, promoted by Prince Albert, and held in 1851 in Hyde Park in the Crystal Palace (afterwards removed to Sydenham).

F

FABER, FREDERICK WILLIAM (1814-63), educated at Shrewsbury, Harrow, and Balliol College, and a friend of Coleridge and Newman. He was received into the Roman Catholic Church in 1845, having previously been rector of Elton. With Father Hutchison he founded the London Oratory. He published many hymns (including 'Pilgrims of the Night' and 'The Land beyond the Sea') and devotional treatises.

Fabian, in Shakespeare's 'Twelfth Night' (q.v.), a servant of Olivia, who joins in the schemes against Malvolio and Sir Andrew Aguecheek.

FABIAN, ROBERT, see Fabyan.

Fabian Society, a society founded in 1884 consisting of socialists who advocate a 'Fabian' policy (see Fabius) as opposed to imme-diolate attempts at revolutionary action. The 'Fabian Essays' of the society were issued in 1889. The names of Sidney Webb and Mrs. Webb, and of G. B. Shaw (q.v.), are especially associated with it.

Fabtolat, or the Church of the Catacombs, a novel of early church history published in 1854, by Nicholas Wiseman (1802-65), the cardinal archbishop of Westminster.

Fabius, Quintus Fabius Maximus, nicknamed Cunctator or 'the delayer', was appointed dictator at Rome after the great victory won by Hannibal over the Romans in 217 B.C. He carried on a defensive campaign against Hannibal, avoiding direct engagements, and harassing the enemy. Hence the expressions, 'Fabian tactics', 'Fabian policy'.

FABLE OF THE BEES

Fable of the Bees, or Private Vices, Public Benefits, see under Mandeville (B. de).

Fables, Ancient and Modern, by Dryden (q.v.), published in 1699.

They are verse paraphrases of tales by Chaucer, Boccaccio, and Ovid. From Chaucer Dryden took 'Palamon and Arcite', 'The Cock and the Fox', 'The Wife of Bath's Tale', and the 'Character of the Good Parson'; from Boccaccio, 'Sigismonda and Guiscardo', 'Theodore and Honoria', 'Cymon and Iphigenia'; from Ovid he took some of the 'Metamorphoses'.

Fabliau, a short tale in verse, almost invariably in octosyllabic couplets, dealing for the most part from a comic point of view with incidents of ordinary life (Saintsbury). The fabliau was an important element in the French poetry of the 12th-13th cents.

Fabricius, Gaius Fabricius Luscinus, who was consul in 282 and 278 B.C., was, like Cincinnatus (q.v.), a typical example of ancient Roman honesty, simplicity, and frugality. As censor in 275 he was distinguished for the severity with which he endeavoured to repress the growing tendency to luxury.

FABYAN, ROBERT (d. 1513), chronicler, was sheriff of London in 1493. He expanded his diary into 'The Concordance of Histories', a compilation extending from the arrival of Brutus in England (see Brute) to the death of Henry VII (first printed, 1516; edited by Ellis in 1811). His chronicles are of importance with respect to the history of London.

Face, a character in Jonson's 'The Alchemist' (q.v.).

Factotum, see Johannes Factotum.

Fadladeen, the pompous chamberlain in Moore's 'Lalla Rookh' (q.v.).

Faerie Queene, The, the greatest work of Spenser (q.v.), of which the first three books were entrusted to the printer in November 1589, and the second three were published in 1596.

The general scheme of the work is expounded in the author's introductory letter addressed to Sir Walter Raleigh. By the Faerie Queene the poet signifies Glory in the abstract, and Queen Elizabeth in particular (who also figures under the names of Belpheobe, Mercilla, and Gloriana). Twelve of her knights, the 'patrons' or examples of twelve different virtues, undertake each an adventure, on the twelve successive days of the Queen's annual festival. Prince Arthur symbolizes 'magnificence', in the Aristotelian sense (says the author) of the perfection of all the other virtues (he must have meant not 'magnificence' but 'magnanimity', μεγαλοψυχία, or 'gentlemanliness', καλοκαγαλία). Arthur has a vision of the Faerie Queene, and, determining to seek her out, is brought into the adventures of the several knights and carries them to a successful issue. But this explanation, given in the introduction, does not appear from the poem itself; for the author starts at once with the adventures of the knights, intending to give his account of their origin in the last of the twelve books which the work was to contain, but this was never written. Spenser published only six books, of which the subjects are as follows:

(i) the adventures of the Red Cross Knight of Holiness (the Anglican Church), the protector of the Virgin Una (truth, or the true religion), and the wiles of Archimago (q.v.) and Duessa (q.v.);

(ii) the adventures of Sir Guyon, the Knight of Temperance, his encounters with Pyrocles and Chymocles, his visit to the cave of Mammon and the House of Temperance and his destruction of Acrasia (q.v.) and her Bower of Bliss. Canto x of this Book contains a chronicle of British rulers from Brute to Elizabeth;

(iii) the legend of Chastity, exemplified by Britomart and Belpheobe;

(iv) the legend of Triamond and Cambell, exemplifying Friendship; together with the story of Scudamour and Amoret;

(v) the adventures of Artegall, the Knight of Justice, in which allegorical reference is made to various historical events of the reign of Queen Elizabeth: the defeat of the Spaniards in the Netherlands, the recantation of Henri IV of France, the execution of Mary Queen of Scots, and the administration of Ireland by Lord Grey de Wilton;

(vi) the adventures of Sir Calidore, exemplifying Courtesy.

We have also a fragment on Mutability, being the sixth and seventh cantos of the legend of Constance, which was to have formed the seventh Book. This fragment contains a charming description of the Seasons and the Months.

The work as a whole, modelled to some extent on the 'Orlando Furioso' of Ariosto, suffers from a certain monotony, and its chief beauties lie in the particular episodes with which the allegory is varied and in descriptions, such as those of the Cave of Mammon and the temptation of Sir Guyon by the Lady of the Idle Lake, in Book ii. The meaning of many of the allusions, which must have added to the interest of the work for contemporaries, is now lost. The poem is written in the stanza invented by Spenser (and since utilized by Thomson, Keats, Shelley, and Byron), in which a ninth line of twelve syllables is added to eight lines of ten syllables, rhyming a b a b b c b c c.

Fafnir, in the Volsunga Saga (q.v.), the dragon who guards the Nibelungs' hoard of gold, and is slain by Sigurd.

Fag, Captain Absolute's servant in Sheridan's 'The Rivals' (q.v.).

Fagin, a character in Dickens's 'Oliver Twist' (q.v.).

Fainall and Mrs. Fainall, characters in Congreve's 'The Way of the World' (q.v.).

FAINÉANT

Fainéant, French word meaning 'do-nothing'. Rois fainéants is a designation of the later Merovingian kings, whose authority was superseded by that of the 'Mayors of the Palace'.

Fair Maid of Perth, Valentine's Day, or the, a novel by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1828, as the second of the 'Chronicles of the Canongate'.

The scene is laid at Perth in the turbulent times at the close of the 14th cent. when the mild Robert III was king of Scotland; and the story opens with an attempt by the profligate young duke of Rothsay, the king's son, aided by his villainous Master of the Horse, Sir John Ramorny, to break into the house of an honest burgher, Simon Glover, and carry off his daughter Catharine, the Fair Maid of Perth. The attempt is defeated by the sturdy armoured, Henry Smith or Gow, who, in the affray, hacks off the hand of Ramorny. Henry is as strong and skilful in the use of weapons as in their forging, and his addiction to fighting mars his prospect of winning the hand of the gentle Catharine, though he has a vigorous advocate in her father. This incident is followed by the endeavours of Ramorny to wreak his vengeance first on the armourer, in which he is unsuccessful, then on his patron Rothsay, by whom he considers himself betrayed. At the instigation of the crafty duke of Albany, the king's ambitious brother, the unfortunate Rothsay is lured by Ramorny, with Catharine as bait, to the tower of Falkland, where he is done to death. Meanwhile a Highland apprentice of Simon Glover, the fiery youth Conachar, has become, by the death of his father, chief of the clan Quhele. He passionately loves Catharine, and bitter enmity has arisen between him and the armourer. A feud between the clan Quhele and the clan Chattan is to be settled by mortal combat between thirty representatives of each clan, among whom the chiefs are necessarily included. But here enters a tragic element; for Conachar's hot temper is strangely blended with constitutional cowardice, of which the youth is grievously conscious. One of the champions of the clan Chattan having at the last moment defaulted, his place is taken by the armourer, who eagerly grasps the opportunity of finding himself face to face with Conachar. After a fearful battle during which Conachar has been protected by the devotion of his foster-father, Torquil of the Oak, and his eight sturdy sons, most of the combatants lie dead or wounded on the field, and Conachar is finally confronted by Henry Smith. His courage, hitherto painfully maintained, now gives way, and he turns and flees, to hide his disgrace in suicide. Henry, sickened with the carnage, vows to hang up his broadsword for ever, and is accepted by Catharine.

Fair Maid of the West, The, or A Girl's worth Gold, a comedy of adventure, in two parts, by Heywood (q.v.), printed in 1631.

FAIRCHILD FAMILY

The play opens with a vivid scene at Plymouth, where Essex's expedition is on the point of sailing for the Azores (1597), and gallant Master Spencer has the misfortune to kill a man while protecting Besse Bridges, 'the flower of Plymouth', from insult. He has to fly the country, but first makes provision for Besse, by handing over to her the Windmill Tavern at Fowey, which she subsequently conducts with equal spirit and decorum. Meanwhile Spencer, who has sailed to the Azores, is wounded to the point of death in trying to stop a quarrel. He sends a message to Besse, bidding her adieu and devising all his property to her. Besse employs part of this to fit out a privateer, in which she sets sail to bring home his body. Instead she rescues Spencer himself, who has recovered and been captured by Spaniards. After many adventures Besse is finally united to her lover. The first part, at least, makes a breezy and entertaining melodrama.

Fair Penitent, The, a tragedy in blank verse by Rowe (q.v.), produced in 1703.

The plot of the play is that of Massinger and Field's 'Fatal Dowry' (q.v.), shortened and somewhat modified at the end. Charalois becomes Altamont; Beaumelle, Calista; Rochfort, Sciolto; Romont, Horatio; and Novall, Lothario. The play was extremely successful and was constantly revived until the early 19th cent. The 'haughty, gallant, gay Lothario' has become proverbial, and was the model on which Richardson drew Lovelace in his 'Clarissa Harlowe' (q.v.). In revivals of the play Garrick acted Lothario, and subsequently Mrs. Siddons, Calista. Johnson said of it that 'there is scarcely any work of any poet at once so interesting by the fable, and so delightful by the language'. He observes, however, with reference to the title of the play, that Calista 'may be reasonably suspected of feeling pain from detection rather than from guilt'.

Fair Quarrel, A, a comedy by Middleton (q.v.) and W. Rowley (q.v.), published in 1617.

Captain Ager receives from a fellow officer an insult which reflects on his mother's virtue. A duel is arranged, but Ager is too conscientious to fight unless he is satisfied that his cause is a just one. He tells his mother of the accusation, which she at first indignantly denies, but presently, in order to prevent the duel, admits to be true. Ager then declines to fight, and is branded by his adversary as a coward. Having now what he considers an adequate reason, he fights and defeats his enemy. They are reconciled and all ends well. The offensive under-plot of the play calls for no special notice. The treatment by the authors of the problem presented in the main plot was made the subject of a warm eulogy by Charles Lamb in his 'Specimens'.

FAIRFIELD

Fairfield, LEONARD, a character in Bulwer Lytton's 'My Novel' (q.v.).

Fairford, ALAN, a character in Scott's 'Redgauntlet' (q.v.).

Fairservice, ANDREW, in Scott's 'Rob Roy' (q.v.), a gardener at Osbaldistone Hall, employed as servant by Francis Osbaldistone, a sanctimonious, self-important, cowardly rascal, who by his loquacity and disloyalty adds to his master's difficulties.

Faithful, in Bunyan's 'Pilgrim's Progress', the companion of Christian; he is put to death at Vanity Fair.

To deal faithfully is to treat in the manner in which Faithful dealt with Talkative; Christian observes 'There is but little of this faithful dealing with men nowadays, and that makes religion to stink so in the nostrils of many as it doth'.

Faithful, JACOB, see Jacob Faithful.

Faithful Shepherdess, The, a pastoral play by J. Fletcher (q.v.), printed not later than 1610.

It deals with the love-affairs of various shepherds and shepherdesses. Clorin, the Faithful Shepherdess, skilled in simples and strong in her chastity, has vowed fidelity to her dead lover and lives by his tomb. Thenot is in love with her, but only so long as she remains faithful to her dead lover. Perigot is in love with Amoret, and Amarillis with Perigot. Amarillis being repulsed, enlists the services of the Sullen Shepherd to cross Perigot's love for Amoret. The wanton Cloe, seeking a lover, finds Daphnis too coy, and makes an assignation with Alexis.

The various couples assemble at night in the forest, and Amarillis, by dipping in a magic well, assumes the form of Amoret. Complications follow, and are finally resolved. Though without much dramatic interest, the play is full of passages of poetic beauty, and ranks, as a pastoral, with Ben Jonson's 'Sad Shepherd' and Milton's 'Comus'.

Falconer, ALGERNON, a character in Peacock's 'Gryll Grange' (q.v.).

FALCONER, WILLIAM (1732-69), author of 'The Shipwreck', a poem in three cantos recounting the wreck of a ship on the coast of Greece, which had considerable vogue in its day. It appeared in 1762 (revised versions in 1764 and 1769). Falconer was drowned at sea.

Falernian, a wine celebrated among the ancient Romans, made from the grapes of the Falernian territory in Campania.

Falkland, one of the principal characters in Godwin's 'Caleb Williams' (q.v.). See also Faulkland.

Falkland, LUCIUS CARY, second Viscount (1610?-43), a famous Royalist, 'a man learned and accomplished, the centre of a circle [at Great Tew, near Oxford] which embraced the most liberal thinkers of his day, a keen reasoner and an able speaker, whose convictions still went with the Parliament, while his wavering and impulsive temper, his love of the Church, his passionate longings for peace, led him to struggle for a king whom he distrusted, and to die for a cause that was not his own' (J. R. Green). He fell at Newbury.

Falkland Islands, THE, were seen by Davis in 1592, and by Hawkins in 1594. Capt. Strong in 1690 sailed through the sound between them, naming it Falkland Sound. In 1764 De Bougainville took possession of the islands for France, which subsequently ceded them to Spain. Meanwhile Commodore Byron had occupied one of the small islands of the group. Spain renounced her claim in favour of Great Britain in 1771. The neighbouring ocean was the scene of the naval action of 8 Dec. 1914, in which the squadron of Admiral von Spee was (with the exception of one ship) destroyed by the British squadron commanded by Sir Doveton Sturdee.

FALKNER (originally FAULKNER), WILLIAM (1897-), born at New Albany, Mississippi, one of the most remarkable of the younger American novelists. Of his books the following have been published in England: 'Soldiers' Pay' (1930), 'The Sound and the Fury' (1931), 'Sanctuary' (1931), 'Sartoris' (1932).

Fall of Robespierre, The, a drama (1794) written by Coleridge (Act I) and Southey (Acts II and III) in collaboration, of little value.

Falls of Princes, see Lydgate.

False One, The, a tragedy attributed to J. Fletcher (q.v.), in which Massinger may also have had a share, printed in 1647; the date of production is uncertain.

The play deals with the joint occupation of the throne of Egypt by Ptolemy and his sister Cleopatra, and the intrigues of Photinus relating thereto; the treacherous murder of Pompey by Septimius; the entanglement of Caesar by the charms of Cleopatra; the revolt of the Alexandrians; the further treachery and hanging of Septimius ('The False One'); the suppression of the revolt by Caesar; the death of Ptolemy; and the reconciliation of Caesar with Cleopatra.

Falstaff, SIR JOHN, in Shakespeare's 'Henry IV' (q.v.), a fat, witty, good-humoured old knight, loving jests, self-indulgent, and over-addicted to sack; a braggart who, when exposed, has presence of mind and resource enough to find some shift to save his face; he seems to exaggerate and boast his vices in order to bring out their humorous side. The Falstaff of Shakespeare's 'Merry Wives of Windsor' (q.v.), written to command, presents a very different character. A mere designing knave, with but few sparks of his former ingratiating humour, he cuts a sorry figure in the indignities and mortifications to which his vices expose him. The character was originally called Oldcastle, but objection was taken by Lord Cobham, a descendant of the original Sir John Oldcastle (q.v.), 'for he died a martyr'.

Falstaff, Original Letters of Sir John, and his Friends; now first made public by a Gentleman, a Descendant of Dame Quickly, by James White (1775-1820), a friend of C. Lamb, who collaborated in their production. They were published in 1796.

Fanny's Way, Pretty, see Parnell (T.).

FANSHAWE, ANNE, LADY (1625-80), wife of Sir Richard Fanshawe, who was a devoted adherent to, and sufferer for, the Royalist cause, and after the Restoration was ambassador to Portugal and subsequently to Spain. Lady Fanshawe shared her husband's wanderings and wrote interesting 'Memoirs', first printed in 1829.

FANSHAWE, CATHERINE MARIA (1765-1834), poetess, remembered on account of her riddle on the letter H, which has often been attributed to Byron. The opening line originally ran "'Twas in heaven pronounced, and 'twas muttered in hell'; but the accepted reading—and the alteration is generally assigned to James Smith (q.v.)—now is "'Twas whispered in heaven, 'twas muttered in hell'".

Far from the Madding Crowd, a novel by Hardy (q.v.), published in 1874.

The theme, which recurs in other of Hardy's novels, is the contrast of a patient and generous devotion, with selfish unscrupulous love and with violent passion. Gabriel Oak, the shepherd, serves the capricious Bathsheba Everdene for many years with a humble unselfish devotion. Sergeant Troy, the gallant fascinating soldier, who deserts Fanny Robin and lets her die in childhood in a workhouse, wins Bathsheba for his wife and then ill-treats her. Troy is murdered by Farmer Boldwood, who is impelled by a furious longing for Bathsheba. Boldwood becomes a lunatic, and Gabriel and Bathsheba are at last united.

FARADAY, MICHAEL (1791-1867), the eminent physicist, was the son of a blacksmith and was apprenticed as a bookbinder. He attracted the attention of Sir H. Davy (q.v.) and was engaged by him as an assistant in 1812. Faraday made notable contributions to nearly all branches of physical science; but his greatest achievement was the discovery of magneto-electricity. He propounded the theory of 'lines of force', developed electrochemistry, and originated the theory of the atom as a 'centre of force'. His 'Experimental Researches in Electricity', reprinted from 'Philosophical Transactions', were published in 1839-55; his 'Life and Letters' in 1870. It was said that 'Sir H. Davy's greatest discovery was Michael Faraday'.

Farce (from a metaphorical use of the word farce, stuffing), was originally applied to explanatory or additional matter introduced into the liturgy; thence to the impromptu buffoonery which the actors were wont to insert in the text of religious dramas. It now means a dramatic work designed solely to excite laughter. It should be distinguished from Extravaganza (q.v.), with which it is sometimes confused.

Fardorougha, the Miser, a novel by W. Carleton (q.v.) published in 1839.

It is a powerful study of an Irish farmer torn between the passion of avarice and the love for a son who has come late in his married life. The villainous Bartle Flanagan, to revenge himself on the old usurer, who has been the cause of his ruin, enters his service and cunningly fixes the guilt of a crime he has committed on Fardorougha's son, Conor, and gets him transported; finally attempting, with the help of the lodge of Ribbonmen (q.v.) to which he belongs, to abduct his victim's sweetheart. He overreaches himself, and is hanged, but not before he has, in the terror of death, exculpated Conor. There are many humorous passages in this sombre tale.

Farmer George: George III was caricatured as 'Farmer George' on account of the simplicity of his tastes and his interest in agriculture.

Farmer's Boy, The, see Bloomfield.

Farnese, the name of an Italian family which rose to importance through the elevation of Alexander Farnese to the papal see as Paul III (1534). He created the duchy of Parma for his son Pietro.

The FARNESSE BULL is a group of statuary by the brothers Apollonius and Tauriscus of Tralles (c. 150 B.C.) showing Dirce tied to a wild bull by Zethus and Amphon (see under Antiope). The sculpture was found in the Baths of Caracalla and placed in the Farnese palace.

The FARNESSE HERCULES is a statue by the Athenian sculptor Glycon (1st cent. B.C.) of the hero leaning on his club, perhaps copied from an original by Lysippus.

FARQUHAR, GEORGE (1678-1707), was a sizar at Trinity College, Dublin, and after being an officer in the army became an actor, but gave up the stage in consequence of accidentally wounding a fellow player. He took to writing comedies, and produced 'Love and a Bottle' in 1699, 'The Constant Couple, or a Trip to the Jubilee' (q.v.) in 1700, 'Sir Harry Wildair' in 1701, 'The Inconstant' and 'The Twin Rivals' in 1702, 'The Stage Coach' (with Motteux, q.v.) in 1704, 'The Recruiting Officer' (q.v.) in 1706, and 'The Beaux' Stratagem' (q.v.) in 1707. The last two are the best of his plays, and are marked by an atmosphere of reality and genial merriment very different from that of the artificial comedy of the period. They reveal the good-natured and easy-going character of the author, though his satire is sometimes pungent. He is said to have been deceived by his wife, from love of him, about her fortune, but to have always treated her with tenderness and indulgence. He died in poverty. A present of twenty guineas from the actor Robert Wilks gave him the means of writing his last play, 'The Beaux' Stratagem', and he lived just long enough to hear of its success.

Farrago, CAPTAIN, an American Don Quixote and hero of the satirical novel 'Modern Chivalry', by H. H. Brackenridge (q.v.). The role of Sancho Panza is played by Captain Farrago's man Teague.

Fascist (pron. fashist), from Italian fascisti, which is derived from fascio (Latin fascis), a sheaf or bundle, used metaphorically in fascio delle forze in the sense of union or association of forces. In this sense the word fascio was adopted by the Italian socialists at the end of the 19th cent., particularly in Sicily, where certain socialist groups called Fasci Siciliani became well known. Early in 1913 a group of Italian revolutionary socialists led by Mussolini and Corridoni separated themselves from the official party and formed a Fascio interventista, advocating intervention in the War. This had 'Il Popolo d'Italia' as its organ in the press, and obtained a rapidly increasing membership. After the peace, weak governments allowed the official socialists to intensify their communistic propaganda, to pour scorn on the leaders of the army and the combatants in the War, and to emphasize the economic difficulties that had resulted from intervention. In March 1919, Mussolini, who had himself fought in the War, and many of whose friends and followers had been killed, disgusted with this attitude, formed at Milan a small group of daring young men called Fascio nazionale di combattimento, with the object of resisting by every means, including violence, the communistic movement. The activities of the Fascisti, as the members of this Fascio were called, were so effective in checking the Communists, that many constitutional Italians felt justified in supporting them, and the membership of the Fascio spread rapidly over Italy. Its success was due to strong organization and leadership and the fine fighting qualities of the fascisti, a large number of whom met their death in conflicts with the Communistic forces. At the end of 1921, when the government of the day seemed inclined to declare the Fasci to be unlawful armed bands, a party was formed (Partito nazionale fascista) which absorbed the old Fascio di combattimento and took as its symbol the Roman fasces. It was this party that in October 1922 marched on Rome and accomplished the Fascist revolution. (The above is based on an article in S.P.E. Tract XIX.) See also Mussolini.

FATAL MARRIAGE

Fashion, SIR NOVELTY and YOUNG, characters in Vanbrugh's 'The Relapse' (q.v.), who reappear in Sheridan's adaptation ('A Trip to Scarborough').

Fastidious Brisk, a character in Jonson's 'Every Man out of his Humour' (q.v.).

Fastolf, SIR JOHN (1378-1459), a distinguished warrior in the French wars of Henry V, who contributed towards the building of the philosophy schools at Cambridge and bequeathed funds which were devoted to the foundation of Magdalen College, Oxford. The few coincidences between the careers of Fastolf and Shakespeare's Sir John Falstaff are accidental.

Fastrade (764-94), queen of France, fourth wife of Charlemagne. She is mentioned by Longfellow in the 'Golden Legend', vi.

Fat Boy, THE, Joe, Mr. Wardle's servant in the 'Pickwick Papers' (q.v.).

Fata Morgana, see Morgan le Fay. (The word fata in Italian means 'fairy'.)

Fatal Curiosity, The, a tragedy by Lillo (q.v.), published in 1736, based on an old story of a Cornish murder. Old Wilmot, under stress of poverty and urged by his wife, murders a stranger who has deposited a casket with them, only to find that the murdered man is his son, supposed to have been lost in a shipwreck.

The Fatal Curiosity is also another name for the episode in 'Don Quixote' of 'The Curious Impertinent'.

Fatal Dowry, The, a tragedy by Massinger and Field (qq.v.), printed in 1632. The text as we have it is corrupt.

When the play opens, Charalois's father, the distinguished marshal of Charles, duke of Burgundy, has just died in debt, and his creditors refuse to allow his body to be buried. Charalois offers to go to prison if the creditors will release the body. The offer is accepted; Charalois goes to prison with his friend, the blunt soldier Romont. Rochfort, ex-president of the parliament, touched by the piety of Charalois and the honesty of Romont, procures their release, and moreover gives Charalois his daughter, Beaumelle, to wife. She is presently found by Romont exchanging kisses with her former suitor, the mean-spirited fop Novall. Charalois, at first incredulous, presently himself finds Beaumelle and Novall together, and forcing a duel on the latter kills him. He calls upon Rochfort to judge his daughter. The father himself condemns her, and Charalois stabs her. But the father immediately turns on Charalois and upbraids him for his lack of mercy. Charalois is tried for the murder of Novall and Beaumelle, and acquitted, but killed by a friend of Novall, who in turn is killed by Romont.

Rowe's 'Fair Penitent' (q.v.) is founded on this play.

Fatal Marriage, The, or the Innocent

FATAL MARRIAGE

Adultery, a tragedy by Southerne (q.v.), produced in 1694.

Biron, having married Isabella against his father's wish, is sent by him to the siege of Candy, and reported killed. His widow is repudiated by the father and brought to misery. During seven years she is courted by Villeroy, and finally, from gratitude for his devotion and urged by Carlos, Biron's younger brother, she marries him. Biron, who has all this time been a captive, now returns and reveals himself to Isabella. Carlos, it now appears, had known that Biron was alive, but had concealed his knowledge, wishing to oust him from the succession. For the same reason he had urged the marriage of Isabella, in order finally to ruin her and her son in his father's estimation. Carlos waylays and mortally wounds Biron. Isabella, already distracted by the situation in which she finds herself, takes her own life. The guilt of Carlos is exposed.

The play is founded on Mrs. Aphra Behn's novel 'The Nun or the Perjur'd Beauty'. Isabella was one of Mrs. Barry's (q.v.) most effective parts. The play was revived (with alterations) by Garrick under the title 'Isabella, or the Fatal Marriage'.

Father Brown, see Brown (Father).

Father O'Flynn, a popular Irish song, by A. P. Graves (q.v.).

Fathers, THE APOSTOLIC, the Fathers of the Church (q.v.) who were contemporary, or nearly contemporary, with the apostles, as Clement, Hermas, Barnabas, Polycarp, Papias, and Ignatius.

Fathers of the Church, the early Christian writers, a term usually applied to those of the first five centuries. Sometimes the Greek and Latin fathers are distinguished, the former including Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Cyprian, Athanasius, Basil the Great, Gregory Nazianzen, and Chrysostom; the latter Tertullian, Jerome, Ambrose, Augustine, Gregory (Pope Gregory I), and Bernard.

Fatima, the daughter of Mohammed (q.v.) and the wife of the Caliph Ali (q.v.). Her descendants, known as the FATIMIDS, include the rulers of Egypt from 959 to 1171. In fiction Fatima is the name of the last wife of Bluebeard (q.v.).

Faulconbridge, ROBERT and PHILIP THE BASTARD, his half-brother, characters in Shakespeare's 'King John' (q.v.).

Faulkland, a character in Sheridan's 'The Rivals' (q.v.).

Faulkner, WILLIAM, see Falkner (William).

Faunus, an ancient Italian nature-god, worshipped as the guardian of herds and patron of rural pursuits; developed from an earlier conception of a number of Fauni, spirits of the countryside and assimilated to the Satyrs (q.v.) of Greek mythology.

FEAST OF FOOLS

Faust, the subject of the great dramas of Marlowe and Goethe, was a wandering conjurer, who lived in Germany about 1488-1541 (H. G. Meek, 'Johann Faust', Oxford University Press) and is mentioned in various documents of the period. (Not to be confused with Johann Fust or Faust the printer, q.v.) For Marlowe's play see Doctor Faustus. 'Faust', the drama by Goethe, was begun by him about the year 1770 and not completed till just before his death in 1832. It consists of two parts, the first of which was published in 1808, the second in 1832. It begins with a Prologue in Heaven, in which Mephistopheles obtains permission to try to effect the ruin of the soul of Faust, the Lord being confident that he will fail. The play itself opens with a soliloquy by Faust, disillusioned with the world and despairing. Mephistopheles having presented himself, Faust enters into a compact to become his servant if Faust should exclaim, of any moment of delight procured for him, 'Stay, thou art so fair'. Then follow the attempts of Mephistopheles to satisfy Faust, culminating in the incident of Gretchen (Margaret), whom Faust, at the Devil's instigation, though not without some rebellion by his better self, seduces, bringing about her miserable death. This is the end of Pt. I, Faust being left remorseful and dissatisfied.

The story of Pt. II is extremely complex and its symbolism obscure. It consists in the main of two portions, of which the first is the incident of Helen, originally written as a separate and complete poem. Helen, symbolizing perfect beauty as produced by Greek art, is recalled from Hades and ardently pursued by Faust, but finally reft from him. Euphorion, their son, personifying poetry and the union of the classical and the romantic, and at the end representing Lord Byron, vanishes in a flame. In the second portion (Acts IV and V), the purified Faust, pursuing the service of man, reclaims from the sea, with the help of Mephistopheles, a stretch of submerged land. But Care attacks and blinds him. Finally satisfied in the consciousness of a good work done, he cries to the fleeting moment, 'Ah, stay, thou art so fair', and falls dead. Hell tries to seize his soul, but it is borne away by angels.

Faustus, DOCTOR, see Doctor Faustus.

Favonius, the Latin name of the zephyr or west wind. Also of a celebrated Derby winner (1871).

Fawnia, see Pandosto.

Feast of Fools, a medieval festival originally of the sub-deacons of the cathedral, held about the time of the Feast of the Circumcision (i.e. 1 Jan.), in which the humbler cathedral officials burlesqued the sacred ceremonies. A lord of the feast was elected, styled bishop, cardinal, abbot, &c., according to the locality (cf. Boy Bishop). The Feast of Fools had its chief vogue in the French cathedrals, but there are records of it in a few English cathedrals, notably at Lincoln, and at Beverley Minster.

FEAST OF FOOLS

Feathernest, Mr., in Peacock's 'Melincourt' (q.v.), a caricature of Southey.

Federal States, the name given to those northern States in the American War of Secession (1861-5) which resisted the attempt of the Southern or Confederate (q.v.) States to secede.

Feeble, in Shakespeare's '2 Henry IV', III. ii, 'most forcible Feeble', 'a woman's tailor', one of the recruits brought up before Falstaff.

Feenlx, COUSIN, a character in Dickens's 'Domby and Son' (q.v.), the nephew of Mrs. Skewton, and cousin of Edith, Domby's second wife.

Feet of Fines: 'fine' here means the compromise of a collusive suit for the possession of lands, a procedure formerly in use as a mode of conveyance where the ordinary modes were unsuitable (cf. 'Recovery', the process, based on a legal fiction, by which entailed estate was commonly transferred from one party to another. 'A great buyer of land, with . . . his fines, his double vouchers, his recoveries'; Shakespeare, 'Hamlet', v. i. 121-3). The person to whom the land was to be conveyed sued the holder for wrongfully keeping him out of possession; the defendant acknowledged the right of the plaintiff; the compromise was entered on the records of the court; and the particulars of it were set out in a document called 'the foot of the fine', one of the parts of a tripartite indenture, which remained with the court, the other two being retained by the parties. It was at the 'foot' of the undivided parchment, so that its indentation was at the top. [OED.] The collection of feet of fines is continuous from the time of Richard I and almost coeval with the royal court. Conveyance by fine was looked upon with great respect. It was said in parliament in 1291 that 'in this realm there is neither provided nor devised a greater or more solemn assurance, nor one through which a man may have a more secure estate . . . than a fine levied in the court of our lord the king' (Holdsworth, 'History of English Law').

Felix, see Hildeheim.

Felix Holt the Radical, a novel by G. Eliot (q.v.), published in 1866.

Felix Holt is a noble-minded young reformer, an example of self-sacrifice, with the courage of his political convictions, who deliberately chooses the life of a humble artisan in order to bring home to his fellow workers that the hope of an improvement in their conditions lies in education and learning to think for themselves, and not in this or that legislative programme. With him is contrasted the conventional radical politician, the rich Harold Transome, a decent good-natured fellow, whose political convictions, however, when he stands for parliament, are not incompatible with 'treating' and other demoralizing practices. The heroine, Esther, supposed to be the daughter of old Lyon, the Independent minister, is brought by circumstances to a choice between the two men and the contrasted lives they offer her, and after a struggle chooses Felix and poverty. The story is complicated by the involved legal question of the ownership of the Transome estate, and marred for many readers by melodramatic and improbable elements.

Felix the Cat, the subject of a series of remarkable cinema films representing the ridiculous adventures of an imaginary cat. The films, instead of being photographed from actual scenes, are obtained from large numbers of successive drawings ('cartoons') each differing minutely from the last, so that their sequence represents movement. The drawings were by Pat Sullivan (d. 1933). 'Micky Mouse' was the subject of a more recent series by Walt Disney.

FELL, DR. JOHN (1625-86), successively dean of Christ Church, Oxford, and bishop of Oxford, is chiefly to be remembered in a literary connexion as the enthusiastic patron and promoter of the Oxford University Press (q.v.), to the development of which he greatly contributed, procuring for it from abroad the matrixes and punches of the best types that could be found (from which the 'Fell types' are still cast), undertaking with three other University men the financial responsibility for the printing work (previously leased to craft printers), and arranging every year for the publication of some classical author. Fell was author of a critical edition of Cyprian, and edited with many arbitrary alterations the 'Historia Universitatis Oxoniensis' of Anthony à Wood (q.v.). He built the tower over the principal gateway of Christ Church, to which he transferred the re-cast bell 'Great Tom'.

It is curious that the name of so considerable a benefactor of letters should be principally associated with the widely known jingle,

I do not love thee, Dr. Fell,

The reason why I cannot tell, a translation of Martial, Epigrams, i. 32, by Thomas Brown (q.v.), one of the undergraduates of his college. 'Doctor Fell' has thus come to be used to describe a type of vaguely unamiable person against whom no precise ground of dislike can be adduced.

FELLTHAM, OWEN (1602?-68), published c. 1620, when 18 years of age, 'Resolves', a series of moral essays. He contributed to 'Jonsonus Virbius' (q.v.).

Felton, JOHN (1595?-1628), assassin of the duke of Buckingham (1592-1628, q.v.).

Female or FEMININE Rhymes, see Rhymes.

Female Quixote, The, or The Adventures of Arabella, a romance in imitation of 'Don Quixote' by Mrs. Charlotte Lennox (1720-1804), a lady who was flattered and befriended by Dr. Johnson. It was published in 1752.

FEMALE QUIXOTE

Fencible, a person capable of making defence, fit and liable to be called on for military service. 'The Fencibles' was the name of bodies of militia raised at various times, and particularly of a force of some 15,000 men raised in 1794 and in subsequent years for service in any part of Great Britain during the war with France. 'Sea-Fencibles' were similarly raised for coast defence.

Fenella or ZARAH, a character in Scott's 'Peveril of the Peak' (q.v.), suggested to the author by Goethe's 'Mignon' (q.v.).

Fenellan, DARTREY and SIMON, characters in Meredith's 'One of our Conquerors' (q.v.).

FÉNELON, FRANÇOIS DE SALIGNAC DE LA MOTHE- (1651-1715), French divine, tutor of the duc de Bourgogne (the son of the Dauphin), and archbishop of Cambrai. He came into conflict with Bossuet (q.v.) by reason of his religious views. 'The apostle of interior inspiration', as opposed to the inflexible dogmatism of Bossuet, he expounded his Quietist (q.v.) doctrine in the 'Maximes des Saints' (1697), of which Bossuet obtained the condemnation by Rome. Fénelon at once submitted. His best-known work is 'Télémaque' (1699), a graceful narrative in admirable prose of the imaginary adventures of Telemachus, written for the instruction of his pupil, as were also his 'Dialogues des morts' (1700-18) and 'Examen de la conscience d'un roi' (1734). His numerous other writings include a 'Traité de l'éducation des filles' (1687) and some excellent critical works: 'Lettre sur les occupations de l'Académie Française', 'Dialogues sur l'éloquence', &c.

Fenians, originally a semi-mythical, semi-historical military body said to have been raised for the defence of Ireland against Norse raids. Finn (q.v.), in his day, was its chief. The force was exterminated by King Cairbré, it is said, at the end of the 3rd cent. The Fenians of modern times were an association formed among the Irish in the United States and in Ireland in the middle of the 19th cent. for promoting the overthrow of the English government in Ireland. Their activity was greatest between 1865 and 1870, when they attempted invasions of Canada, and caused a disastrous explosion at Clerkenwell, but it continued to the end of the century and a Fenian plot to blow up public buildings in London was discovered in 1883.

Fenrir or the FENRIS-WOLF, in Scandinavian mythology, a monster, the son of Loki (q.v.). He is fettered by Tyr (q.v.) with the chain, Gleipnir, made by the Dwarfs, but breaks loose at Ragnarök (q.v.), helps to defeat the gods, and is slain by Vidar (q.v.).

Fenton, a character in Shakespeare's 'Merry Wives of Windsor' (q.v.).

Feramorz, in Moore's 'Lalla Rookh' (q.v.), the name assumed by the king of Bucharia.

FERIDUN

FERBER, EDNA (1887-), American novelist. Her books published in England are: 'So Big' (1924), 'Show Boat' (1926), 'Mother Knows Best' (1927), 'Cimarron' (1930), 'American Beauty' (1931), 'A Peculiar Treasure' (autobiography, 1939).

Ferdinand, (1) in Shakespeare's 'Tempest' (q.v.), son of the king of Naples; (2) in Shakespeare's 'Love's Labour's Lost' (q.v.), the king of Navarre.

Ferdinand Count Fathom, The Adventures of, a romance by Smollett (q.v.), published in 1753.

This is the story of an unmitigated villain, whose mother was a camp-follower in Marlborough's army, and who took the title of count without any right to it. Endowed with talents and adroitness, but with no spark of honour or decency, he is received and brought up in the family of the German Count Melville, whose benevolence he repays by attempting to beguile his daughter into marriage, and, when he fails, by organizing with his confederate, the daughter's maid, a series of thefts on the family. Fathom passes from fraud to fraud, and seduction to seduction, in repulsive succession. His principal achievement is the betrayal of the honest Renaldo, his benefactor's son, and his attempt to seduce Monimia, the woman whom Renaldo is about to marry, and who only escapes his violence by feigning death. Finally Fathom is detected in his crimes and imprisoned; and Monimia, whom Renaldo had mourned as dead, is restored to her lover. But the author relents and saves Fathom from the fate he has richly merited, by an unconvincing repentance.

FERGUSON, SIR SAMUEL (1810-86), educated at Trinity College, Dublin, deputy-keeper of the records of Ireland. He came into notice as a poet by his 'Forging of the Anchor' contributed to 'Blackwood' in 1832, wrote a fine elegy on Thomas Davis, the nationalist leader, in 1845, and his epic 'Congal' (on the last stand of Irish paganism against Christianity) in 1872. 'Conary' (q.v.), perhaps his finest poem, and 'Deirdre', appeared in 1880. 'Ogham Inscriptions in Ireland, Wales, and Scotland' (1887) is his most important antiquarian work.

FERGUSON, ROBERT (1750-74), educated at St. Andrews, and subsequently employed in the commissary clerk's and sheriff clerk's offices, published a volume of poems in 1773, which were much praised by Burns and Stevenson. His lyrics are interesting as an anticipation of the manner of Burns, and as giving a vivid and racy picture of the life and amusements of the Edinburgh poor.

Feridun, one of the principal heroes of the 'Shahnameh' of Firdusi (q.v.), a legendary king of Persia, who overthrew and succeeded Zohak, the slayer of Jamshid. He divided his dominions among his three sons, Salm, Tur, and Iraj. Their quarrels represent the frequent wars between the Iranians and Turanians.

FERN SEED

Fern seed: before the mode of reproduction of ferns was understood, they were popularly supposed to produce an invisible seed, which was capable of communicating its invisibility to any person who possessed it.

'We have the receipt of fern-seed, we walk invisible.'

(Shakespeare, '1 Henry IV', II. i. 96.)

Ferney, a village near Geneva, but within the French frontier, where Voltaire (q.v.) spent the last twenty years of his life. He is in consequence frequently referred to as the 'Philosopher of Ferney'.

Ferragus, (1) in the tale of 'Valentine and Orson' (q.v.), the giant from whose power their mother Bellissant is rescued; (2) the giant (also called Ferracute) whom Roland fights and slays in Charlemagne's Spanish war. He figures as FERRAU (q.v.) in the 'Orlando Innamorato' (q.v.).

Ferrar, NICHOLAS (1592-1637), educated at, and fellow of, Clare College, Cambridge, was a member of parliament, and active in the affairs of the Virginia Company. In 1625 he retired to Little Gidding, received holy orders, and acted as chaplain there to a small Anglican community, composed of his brother's and brother-in-law's families, who devoted their lives to contemplation and prayer. The community was dispersed and their house and church ransacked by the parliamentary troops in 1646. A record of its activities survives in the 'Little Gidding Story Books', five manuscript volumes bound by Mary Collett, a member of the community, of which a part was printed in 1899, containing romances and pious discourses. An interesting picture of the community is given in 'John Inglessant' (q.v.).

Ferrara, see Andrea Ferrara.

Ferrars, WILLIAM PITT, ENDYMION, and MYRA, characters in Disraeli's 'Endymion' (q.v.).

Ferrau or FERRAGUS, in the 'Orlando Innamorato' (q.v.), a Moorish knight of Spain, one of the suitors for the hand of Angelica (q.v.), and the slayer of her brother Argalia. He is killed by Orlando.

Ferrers, GEORGE, see Mirror for Magistrates.

Ferres and Porrex, see Gorboduc.

FERRIER, JAMES FREDERICK (1808-64), nephew of Susan Ferrier (q.v.), educated at Edinburgh University and Magdalen College, Oxford, studied German philosophy at Heidelberg, and was successively professor of civil history at Edinburgh (1842-5) and of moral philosophy and political economy at St. Andrews (1845-64).

His idealist philosophy, connected with that of Berkeley, is set forth in 'The Institutes of Metaphysics' (1854) and 'Lectures on Greek Philosophy and other Philosophical Remains' (1866). The principal positions of his philosophy are two: firstly, that 'Along with whatever any intelligence knows, it must, as the ground or condition of its knowledge, have some cognisance of itself'. Nor can it know itself except in relation with objects. Mind and matter, per se, are unknowable. Secondly, that we can be ignorant only of what is capable of being known. From these positions he reaches his ontological conclusion: 'Speculation shows us that the universe . . . is incapable of self-subsistency, that it can exist only cum alio, that all true and cogitable and non-contradictory existence is a synthesis of the subjective and the objective; and then we are compelled, by the most stringent necessity of thinking, to conceive a supreme intelligence as the ground and essence of the Universal whole. Thus the postulation of the Deity is not only permissible, it is unavoidable.' In substance, Ferrier's conclusions closely resemble those of Hegel (q.v.), though reached independently and from a different starting-point. They are well set out in his 'Introduction to the Philosophy of Consciousness' (1838-9) and in his 'Berkeley and Idealism' (1842). He is a vigorous and stimulating writer.

FERRIER, SUSAN EDMONSTONE (1782-1854), a friend of Sir W. Scott, and the authoress of three good novels of Scottish life, 'Marriage' (q.v.) published in 1818, 'The Inheritance' (q.v.) published in 1824, and 'Destiny' published in 1831, all marked by a sense of humour and high comedy.

Ferumbras, Sir, a Middle English metrical version of the French Charlemagne romance Fierabras. Ferumbras is the son of the sultan of Babylon. He captures Rome and removes the holy relics. He is overcome in single combat by Oliver (q.v.) and baptized. His sister Floripas, for love of the Christians, obtains the care of Roland and Oliver, whom the pagans have taken prisoners, and helps them to kill many pagans at a feast. The sultan besieges the Christians. Charlemagne comes to their help and is caught between the gates of the city, but is rescued by Ferumbras. Floripas is baptized and marries Guy of Burgundy. The holy relics are recovered. The same story is told in the 'Sowdone of Babylon', a paraphrase (of about the year 1400) of a lost French poem.

Fescennine Verses, an ancient Italian form of verse, originally embodying rustic banter at harvest festivals, supposed to have the power of averting misfortune. Such verses long continued to be sung at marriages and triumphs. The name is perhaps derived from Fescennium in Etruria.

Fesolè, the modern Fiesole, a hill and small town adjoining Florence.

The moon, whose orb
Through optic glass the Tuscan artist views
At evening from the top of Fesolè,
Or in Valdarno.

(Milton, 'Paradise Lost', l. 228.)

FESTE

Feste, the fool in Shakespeare's 'Twelfth Night' (q.v.).

Festin de Pierre, La, see Don Juan.

Festus, a poem by P. J. Bailey (q.v.), first published in 1839. Successive editions appeared, and the poem gradually increased in length, until the fiftieth anniversary edition (1893) contained some 40,000 lines. The work was at one time immensely popular. It is written in blank verse, interspersed with couplets and lyrics, and takes the form of dialogues distributed over some fifty scenes.

The story is on the lines of that of Faust. Lucifer receives from God permission to tempt Festus, and accompanies him through life, as does also Festus's guardian angel. But the bulk of the dialogue is carried on, sometimes in speeches of tremendous length, between Festus and Lucifer. Together they perambulate the universe, from the Interstellar Space, Heaven, and Hell, to 'An Apartment in a Mansion' and 'A Garden, and Bower by the Sea'. In the supra-mundane scenes Festus converses with the great spirits of those regions, Luniel, Martiel, &c. In the terrestrial scenes he enjoys the society of a succession of fair ladies and other companions. With one of the ladies designed for Festus's temptation, Elissa, Lucifer has the misfortune himself to fall in love; another, Festus finally marries under pressure from his guardian angel. At the bidding of Festus, Lucifer reveals to him all the mysteries of the universe, and finally makes him lord of the earth; for the aim of Festus, who never wholly yields to Lucifer's temptations, is to unite all peoples in peace and brotherly love. But immediately after this consummation of his desires, the end of the world supervenes, all mankind dies, and Festus likewise; and the long work ends with the Last Judgement and the admission of Festus among the Elect Spirits.

The poem is 'a sketch of world-life and a summary of its combined moral and physical conditions, estimated on a theory of spiritual things opposed as far as possible to that of the . . . sceptic; not only in regard to the creation and government of the world, but in its views as to the origin of moral evil; and in its general positions known as universalist' (Author's preface to the fiftieth anniversary edition). Watts-Dunton claimed for it that it contains 'lovely oases of poetry' among 'wide tracts of ratiocinative writing'.

Festus, PORCIUS, Roman procurator of Judaea c. A.D. 60-2, before whom the apostle Paul was brought. He declared that Paul had done nothing worthy of death, but as he had appealed to Caesar, sent him to Rome (Acts xxv and xxvi).

Fetter Lane, from Fleet Street to Holborn, London, probably a corruption of Faitours Lane, from faitour, an impostor, vagabond; 'so called of the fewters or idle people lying there' (Stow).

FEUCHTWANGER, LION (1884-).

FIELD

German novelist, best known as the author of 'Die hässliche Herzogin' (1923, 'The Ugly Duchess') and 'Jud Süß' (1925, 'Jew Süß').

Feuilleton, a portion of French newspapers marked off by a rule and appropriated to light literature, criticism, &c. Also, incorrectly, used in England for a serial or short story in a daily paper.

Fezziwig, Mr. and Mrs., characters in Dickens's 'A Christmas Carol' (q.v.).

Flammetta, the name given by Boccaccio (q.v.) to the lady whom he loved, one Maria, illegitimate daughter of Robert, king of Naples, and wife of a Count d'Aquino.

FICHTE, JOHANN GOTTLIEB (1762-1814), German philosopher, a pupil of Kant (q.v.), from whose dualism he subsequently dissented. He became professor of philosophy at Jena in 1793, but was accused of atheism and dismissed in 1799. He subsequently taught at the University of Berlin. Fichte's philosophy is a pure idealism. He rejected the noumena of Kant and retained the human mind, the thinking self or ego, as the only reality. This ego, in defining and limiting itself, creates the non-ego, the world of experience, as its opposite, the medium through which it asserts its freedom. This doctrine he expounded in his principal work, 'Wissenschaftslehre', published in 1794. In his later writings ('Das Wesen des Gelehrten', 1805) Fichte sought reality, not in the ego, but in the 'divine idea which lies at the base of all experience', and of which the world of the senses is the manifestation.

Fidèle, in Shakespeare's 'Cymbeline' (q.v.), the name assumed by Imogen when disguised as a boy.

Fidelio, Beethoven's opera, see Leonora.

Fidessa, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', i. ii, the name assumed by the fair companion of Sansfoy (q.v.), whom the Red Cross Knight takes under his protection after slaying that 'faithless Sarazin'. She turns out to be the false Duessa (q.v.).

FIELD, EUGENE (1850-95), American poet, author of 'A Little Book of Western Verse' (1889), 'With Trumpet and Drum' (1892), 'The Love Affairs of a Bibliomaniac' (1896).

FIELD, MICHAEL, the pseudonym of Katharine Bradley (1846-1914) and Edith Cooper (1862-1913). The following are among their joint works: 'Calirrhoe' (1884), 'The Father's Tragedy' (1885), 'Brutus Ultor' (1886), 'Canute the Great' (1887), 'Deirdre' (1918), 'In the Name of Time' (1919).

FIELD, NATHANIEL (1587-1633), actor and dramatist, acted in plays by Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, and Beaumont and Fletcher. His name is made synonymous with 'best actor' in Jonson's 'Bartholomew Fair'. He wrote two comedies of some merit, the first of which shows the influence of Jonson, 'A Woman's a Weathercock' (1612) and 'Amends for Ladies' (1618). But he is remembered chiefly as having collaborated in Massinger's 'The Fatal Dowry' (q.v.).

Field of Cloth of Gold, the meeting-place of Henry VIII and Francis I of France, near Calais, in 1520, so called from the magnificence of the display made by the two monarchs. The meeting was the preliminary to the long struggle between François and the Emperor Charles V, when each was endeavouring to secure the support of Henry VIII.

Field of the Forty Footsteps, The, a story by A. M. Porter (q.v.) embodying a legend about a field behind the present British Museum, at the north-east corner of what is now Upper Montagu Street, where two brothers met in a sanguinary duel at the time of the duke of Monmouth's rebellion. It was believed that no grass would grow where they had trodden.

Fielding, Mrs. and MAY, characters in Dickens's 'The Cricket on the Hearth' (q.v.).

FIELDING, HENRY (1707-54), was born at Sharpsham Park in Somerset, was educated at Eton (where he was contemporary with the elder Pitt and the elder Fox), and studied law at Leyden. He supported himself in London by writing for the stage, mostly comedies and farces, which contain some spirited songs, but of which the only ones that are remembered are his burlesque of the popular playwrights of the day, 'The Tragedy of Tragedies, or Tom Thumb' (q.v., 1730), and his two political and social satires, 'Pasquin' (1736) and 'The Historical Register for 1736' (1737). He reverted to the study of the law and was called to the bar in 1740. In 1734 he had married Charlotte Cradock, from whom Sophia Western (in 'Tom Jones') and Amelia were drawn. She died in 1744, and in 1747 Fielding married her maid, Mary Daniel. During 1739-41 he conducted the 'Champion' periodical (q.v.). The publication of Richardson's 'Pamela' (q.v.) provoked Fielding to parody it and led to the publication in 1742 of 'The History of the Adventures of Joseph Andrews and his friend Mr. Abraham Adams' (q.v.). Fielding was also perhaps the author of 'Shamela' (1741). In 1743 he published three volumes of 'Miscellanies', including his powerful satire 'Jonathan Wild the Great' (q.v.), and 'A Journey from this World to the Next' (q.v.). He now took up political journalism and by the help of his patron, Lord Lyttelton, was made justice of the peace for Westminster, where he was specially active in suppressing ruffianism. In 1749 appeared his great novel 'Tom Jones' (q.v.), and in 1751 'Amelia' (q.v.). In 1752 he started 'The Covent Garden Journal' (q.v.) under the pseudonym Sir Alexander Drawcansir; this contains some of his best miscellaneous essays. His health now broke down, and in 1754, in an attempt to recover it, he made a voyage to Portugal, of which he has left a pleasant account in his 'Journal of a Voyage to Lisbon', published posthumously. He died at Lisbon. He contributed powerfully to determine the form of the English novel. An essentially honest, manly, and humane character, he poured contempt on hypocrisy, meanness, and vanity.

FIELDING, SARAH (1710-68), sister of Henry Fielding (q.v.), and authoress of romances, including 'The Adventures of David Simple in search of a Faithful Friend' (q.v.), published in 1744. She translated Xenophon's 'Memorabilia' and 'Apologia' (1762). Fierabras or FIEREBRAS, see Ferumbras.

Fiery Cross or FIRE-CROSS, a signal used anciently to summon the clansmen of the Scottish Highlands to a rendezvous on the outbreak of war. It consisted of a cross of wood, burnt at one end and dipped in blood at the other—symbolical of fire and sword—which was handed from clansman to clansman. [OED.]

Fifine at the Fair, a poem by R. Browning (q.v.), published in 1872.

The poet puts into the mouth of a Breton 'Don Juan' a defence of inconstancy in love, on the occasion of a visit to a fair, where he is fascinated with the beauty of the rope-dancer, Fifine. He expatiates on her charms, discusses her deficiencies, contrasts her with Helen and Cleopatra, avows himself a lover of novelty, and strives to reassure his wife Elvire by proclaiming her superiority to them all. He discourses interminably on the ethics of love, and then leaves Elvire with a lie on his lips—to join Fifine. He finds his punishment in the epilogue.

Fifteen, THE, the Jacobite rising of 1715.

Fifth Monarchy Men, English fanatics of the 17th cent. who believed that the second coming of Christ was at hand, and that it was the duty of Christians to be prepared to assist in establishing his reign by force, and in the meantime to repudiate allegiance to any other government. The Fifth Monarchy is the last of the five great empires referred to in the prophecy of Daniel (Dan. ii. 44), identified by the above with the millennial reign of Christ predicted in the Apocalypse. [OED.]

Fig Sunday, a dialectal name for Palm Sunday (q.v.).

Figaro, the barber in Beaumarchais's 'Barbier de Séville' and the hero of his 'Mariage de Figaro', a witty resourceful fellow, and a rebel against the abuses of the ancien régime.

Filler, a canting churl in Dickens's 'The Chimes' (q.v.).

Filloque, the Latin word meaning 'and from the Son' irregularly inserted in the Western version of the Nicene creed to assert the doctrine of the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Son as well as from the Father. More than anything else it prevented the reunion of the Western and Eastern Churches.

FILOMENA

Fiilomena, Santa, a poem by Longfellow, in which the poet celebrated Florence Nightingale. A note to the poem states that 'at Pisa the church of San Francisco contains a chapel added recently to St. Filomena. Over the altar is a picture by Sabatelli representing the saint . . . floating down from heaven . . . and beneath in the foreground the sick and maimed, who are healed by her intercession.'

Filustrato, a poem in ottava rima on the story of Troilus and Cressida, by Boccaccio (q.v.), of special interest as the source of Chaucer's 'Troilus and Cryseyde'.

Finch, ANNE, see Winchilea (Countess of).

Fine and Recovery, see Fest of Fines.

Fingal, the name given by Macpherson (q.v.) in his Ossianic poems to the hero Finn (q.v.). He is the son of the giant Comhal, and king of Morven, the land of the north-west Caledonians. In the epic entitled 'Fingal' he crosses to Ireland and aids Cuthullin, viceroy of the Irish kingdom during Cormac's minority, against Swaran, the Scandinavian king of Lochlin, who invades Ireland. Swaran is defeated and captured by Fingal. The story is continued in the further epic 'Temora' (q.v.). Fingal moreover figures, chiefly as a righter of wrongs and defender of the oppressed, in many of the other Ossianic poems. It is noteworthy that Macpherson brings together Fingal and Cuthullin (the Irish Cuchulain, q.v.), who according to legend were divided by centuries, and makes the Irish Finn into a Scot.

Fingal's Cave, a vast natural cavern in the island of Staffa, in a stratum of columnar basalt, described by Sir W. Scott in his 'Lord of the Isles' (Canto iv).

FINLAY, GEORGE (1799-1875), studied law at Glasgow and Göttingen, and went to Greece in 1823, where he took part in the war of independence. At the close of this he bought an estate in Attica and died at Athens. His 'History of Greece' covers the period from its conquest by the Romans (146 B.C.) to modern times, thus covering the Byzantine Empire and the long period of Greece's subjugation. It appeared in sections between 1844 and 1861, and was published collectively in 1877. In his later years he wrote from Greece to 'The Times' letters chronicling the political developments of that country.

Finn or FIONN, the principal hero of the southern or later cycle of Irish legends, also called the Fenian or Ossianic cycle. Finn Mac Coul has been thought an historical personage by some modern authorities; others regard him as mythical. He was the son of Cumal (Comhal) and father of Ossian (q.v.), and is supposed to have lived in the 3rd cent. A.D., a contemporary of King Cormac. The king appointed him chief of the Fianna (pron. Fēna) or Fenians, a military body composed of men of exceptional strength and prowess, of whose heroic or romantic deeds there are endless tales. Finn was chosen their leader not for surpassing physical qualities, but on account of his truth, wisdom, and generosity. He is said to have perished in an affray with mutinous Fenians in A.D. 283.

For the story of Finn, Grainne, and Diarmait, see Grainne.

Finsburh, the name given to a fragment (of 50 lines) of an Old English epic poem, dealing with a portion of the tale of Finn and Hildeburh sung by the minstrel in the poem 'Beowulf' (q.v.).

Finsbury, a district north of the old city of London, so called from the fen or marsh formed there probably by the interruption of water-courses when the city wall was built. It adjoins Moorgate and Moorfields.

FIONA MACLEOD, see Sharp (W.).

Fionnuala, the subject of one of Moore's 'Irish Melodies', is a daughter of Lir (q.v.), transformed by supernatural power into a swan and condemned to wander over the waters of Ireland until the coming there of Christianity.

Fir Bolgs, legendary early invaders of Ireland, according to tradition of an Iberian tribe, who were driven into Arran, Islay, and the Hebrides, by the Milesians (q.v.).

FIRDUSI or FIRDAUSI, ABUL KASIM MANSUR (c. 950-1020), Persian poet, and author of the 'Shahnameh', the great epic recounting the deeds of Persian heroes and kings from the earliest times. He is said to have been shabbily treated by the Sultan Mahmud of Ghazni (q.v.), who had promised him a piece of gold for every line of the 'Shahnameh', but gave him silver instead, and repented too late. He is believed to be buried near Meshed. For the subject of the 'Shahnameh' see Feridun, Isfendiyar, Jamshid, Rustem.

Fire of London, THE GREAT, in 1666, broke out in a baker's house in Pudding Lane, and in four days (Sept. 2-6) destroyed the buildings on some 400 acres, including St. Paul's and 87 churches, and over 13,000 houses. It extended from the Tower to the Temple and northwards as far as Cripplegate.

Fire-drake, a fiery dragon of Germanic mythology, used in a transferred sense of a person with a fiery nose, as in Shakespeare, 'Henry VIII', v. iv. 46, 'That fire-drake did I hit three times on the head'.

Fire-worshippers, The, see Lalla Rookh.

Firmilian, see Aytoun.

Firmin, DR. GEORGE BRAND and PHILIP, the principal characters in Thackeray's 'The Adventures of Philip' (q.v.); Dr. Firmin had previously figured in his 'A Shabby Genteel Story'.

Firouz, a Persian prince, the hero of one of the tales in the 'Arabian Nights' (q.v.). An Indian provides him with a magic horse, on which he is transported to Bengal. There he falls in love with a princess and brings her back to Persia. The Indian, being defrauded of the recompense stipulated for the horse, carries her off to Cashmere, where the sultan cuts off his head and proposes to marry the princess himself. She feigns madness and is rescued by Firouz in the guise of a physician.

First Gentleman of Europe, GEORGE IV, so called on account of the gracious manner he could assume, and his deportment in public.

First of June, THE GLORIOUS, the date of a naval battle in which, in 1794, Lord Howe defeated a French fleet some distance out from Ushant.

FIRTH, SIR CHARLES HARDING (1857-1936), historian and literary critic; Regius professor of modern history at Oxford, 1904-25 (and Emeritus professor since 1925); fellow of the British Academy. His writings include 'Oliver Cromwell' (1900); he contributed many articles to the 'Dictionary of National Biography'. A bibliography of his writings was published in 1928.

FISHER, DOROTHY CANFIELD (1879-), an American writer, born in Kansas, who is known chiefly for her novels 'The Bent Twig' (1915) and 'The Brimming Cup' (1921), and for her translation of Papini's 'Life of Christ'.

FISHER, JOHN (1459-1535), was educated at Michaelhouse (absorbed in Trinity College, 1546), Cambridge, of which he was appointed master in 1497. He became chancellor of the university and bishop of Rochester, 1504, and was president of Queens' College, Cambridge, from 1505 to 1508. He was a patron of Erasmus (q.v.) and induced him to lecture on Greek at Cambridge from 1511 to 1514. He wrote three treatises against the Lutheran reformation and was fined for denying the validity of the divorce of Queen Catharine, 1534. He was committed to the Tower for refusing to swear to the Act of Succession, and the pope did not improve his chances of escape from death by sending him a Cardinal's hat while he was in prison. Fisher was deprived, attainted, and beheaded, 1535, for refusing to acknowledge the king as supreme head of the Church. His Latin theological works were issued in 1597; vol. i of his collected English works appeared in 1876, and no other has since been published. His English prose style showed a great advance, in point of rhetorical artifice and effect, on that of his predecessors. He was canonized in 1935.

FITZ-BOODLE, GEORGE SAVAGE, a pseudonym assumed by Thackeray (q.v.) in the 'Fitz-Boodle Papers' contributed to 'Fraser's Magazine', 1842-3.

Fitz-Fulke, HENRY, Duchess of, a character in Byron's 'Don Juan' (q.v.).

FITZGERALD, EDWARD (1809-83), educated at Bury St. Edmunds and Trinity College, Cambridge, lived a retired life in Suffolk and was a friend of Carlyle, Thackeray, and the Tennysons. His chief work was the English poetic version (from the Persian) of the 'Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám' (q.v.), published in 1859 anonymously. In 1851 had appeared his 'Euphranor', a dialogue on systems of education set in the scenery of Cambridge. In 1852 he published 'Polonius', a collection of aphorisms, and in 1853 'Six Dramas of Calderon', free translations in blank verse and prose (he subsequently translated two more). He likewise made English versions of the 'Agamemnon' of Aeschylus and of the two 'Oedipus' tragedies of Sophocles. He also wrote a biography of his father-in-law, Bernard Barton, the poet and friend of Charles Lamb, for an edition of some of his poems, and compiled 'Readings from Crabbe' (1879). His charming letters were published in 1889. Fitzgerald collected the materials for a Dictionary of the dramatis personae of Mme de Sévigné's letters. This Dictionary was edited by his great-niece in 1914 and contains much that is useful to the English reader of the letters.

Fitzpiers, EDRED, a character in Hardy's 'The Woodlanders' (q.v.).

FITZRALPH, RICHARD (d. 1360), frequently referred to as 'Armachanus', was chancellor of Oxford (1333) and archbishop of Armagh (1347). He had great reputation as a preacher, attacked the friars, and was cited in 1357 to defend his opinions before the pope at Avignon, which he did in his 'Defensio Curatorum'. He also wrote a treatise against the friars' doctrine of obligatory poverty, 'De Pauperie Salvatoris', in which he discussed 'dominion' or 'lordship', expressing the view on this subject that Wycliffe (q.v.) adopted.

FITZROY, VICE-ADMIRAL ROBERT (1805-65), commanded the 'Beagle' in the surveying expedition to Patagonia and the Straits of Magellan (1828-36), having Darwin as naturalist for the last five years. With Darwin he wrote a narrative of the voyage. He became chief of the meteorological department of the Board of Trade in 1854 and is regarded as the founder of meteorological science. He suggested the plan of the Fitzroy barometer and instituted a system of storm warnings, the first weather forecasts.

FITZSTEPHEN, WILLIAM (d. 1190?), author of a life of Thomas à Becket, which contains a valuable account of early London.

Fitzwilliam Museum, THE, at Cambridge, was founded by Richard Viscount Fitzwilliam (1745-1816), who left his collection of pictures and books to the university, together with £100,000 for the construction of a building to house them. Extensive collections representing classical and medieval European archaeology have since been added; and a recent benefaction by Mr. Courtald has splendidly enlarged the Museum.

FIVE NATIONS

Five Nations, The, a collection of poems by Kipling (q.v.) published in 1903. The 'Five Nations' are the chief component parts of the British Empire.

In America the Five Nations were a league of five tribes of Iroquois Indians, living in Central New York State, formed in the 16th cent. shortly before the arrival of white settlers. The Tuscarora Indians joined them in 1715, and they then formed the 'League of Six Nations'.

Five Towns, THE, in the novels of Arnold Bennett (q.v.), Tunstall, Burslem, Hanley, Stoke-upon-Trent, and Longton, now forming the federated borough of Stoke-on-Trent. These are represented in the novels by Turnhill, Bursley, Hanbridge, Knype, and Longshaw.

Fizkin, HORATIO, in Dickens's 'Pickwick Papers' (q.v.), the Buff candidate in the Eatonswill election.

FLACCUS, see Horace.

Flagellants, a sect of fanatics that arose in Europe in the 13th cent., and again in 1348 as a consequence of the Black Death, asserting that self-flagellation was necessary to appease the divine anger. They were declared heretics by Clement VI in 1349, but the sect survived for a time and some of them were burnt in 1414.

Flamborough, FARMER and the MISSSES, characters in Goldsmith's 'The Vicar of Wakefield' (q.v.).

Flamboyant, in architecture, a style characterized by waved flame-like lines, which prevailed in France in the 15th and early 16th cents. It is rare in England, where Gothic developed a 'Perpendicular' style.

Flaming Tinman, THE, a character in Borrow's 'Lavengro' (q.v.).

Flaminian Way, THE, the great northern road of Rome. It was constructed in the censorship of Gaius Flaminius (220 B.C.) and ran from Rome northwards across the Apennines to Ariminum (Rimini) on the Adriatic. It was extended thence under the name of the Aemilian Way through the heart of Cisalpine Gaul.

Flanders, MOLL, see Moll Flanders.

Flanders Mare: Henry VIII said of Anne of Cleves, his fourth wife, on the day after first meeting her at Rochester, that she was 'no better than a Flanders mare'. He married and divorced her in 1540. T. Fuller (1732) gives as a proverb, 'Like Flanders mares, fairest afar off'.

FLATMAN, THOMAS (1637-88), scholar of Winchester, and scholar and fellow of New College, Oxford, much esteemed as a painter of miniatures. He also wrote poems, 'A Thought of Death', 'Death, a Song', and some hymns ('Poems and Songs', 1674).

FLAUBERT, GUSTAVE (1821-80), French novelist, remarkable for his highly finished style and for the impersonal, objective, carefully sculptured method of narrative which he introduced into the novel. His most famous novel, 'Madame Bovary', a realistic sordid tale of bourgeois life, was published in 1856. His other principal works were 'Salammbô', a Carthaginian story (1862), 'L'Éducation sentimentale' (1869), 'La Tentation de Saint-Antoine' (1874), and the unfinished 'Bouvard et Pécuchet' (1881).

Flavius, in Shakespeare's 'Timon of Athens' (q.v.), the faithful steward of Timon.

Fleance, in Shakespeare's 'Macbeth' (q.v.), the son of Banquo.

FLECKER, (HERMAN) JAMES ELROY (1884-1915), educated at Uppingham and Trinity College, Oxford, entered the consular service and spent two years at Beirut. But his health broke down and he died of consumption in Switzerland. He published 'The Bridge of Fire' (1907), 'Forty-Two Poems' (1911), 'The Golden Journey to Samarkand' (1913), and 'The Old Ships' (1915). His 'Collected Prose', of less importance, appeared in 1920. His two plays, 'Hassan' and 'Don Juan', were published posthumously in 1922 and 1925. The former has attained celebrity.

FLECKNOE, RICHARD (d. 1678?), said to have been an Irish priest, printed privately several poems and prose works, including 'A Relation of Ten Years' Travel in Europe, Asia, Affrique, and America' (1656) and 'A short Discourse on the English Stage' (1664). He was the subject of a lampoon by Andrew Marvell (1645), which suggested to Dryden his satire on Shadwell, 'Mac Flecknoe' (q.v.).

Fledgeby, in Dickens's 'Our Mutual Friend' (q.v.), a cowardly villain, who conceals his money-lending business under the description 'Pubsey and Co.'.

Fleece, GOLDEN, see Golden Fleece.

Fleet Prison, THE, stood in the neighbourhood of the present Farringdon Street, London, alongside of the Fleet river. It was built in the time of Richard I, and long afterwards served as a place of imprisonment for persons condemned by the Star Chamber. After the abolition of the latter in 1640, it served mainly as a debtors' prison, until demolished in 1848. As a debtors' prison it figures in Dickens's novels, notably in 'Pickwick' (q.v.).

In the early part of the 18th cent. the notorious FLEET MARRIAGES were celebrated by accommodating parsons confined in its precincts, without licence or banns, until the practice was stopped by the Marriage Act of 1753. Its evils are depicted in 'The Chaplain of the Fleet' by Besant (q.v.) and Rice.

Fleet Street, now the head-quarters of London journalism, takes its name from the old Fleet river, which, running south from Hampstead, along the line of the Farringdon Road, flowed into the Thames at Blackfriars, passing under the Fleet Bridge at what is now Ludgate Circus. In its upper course it appears to have been known as the Hole Bourne (Holborn), or the Turnmill (q.v.) Brook. Boats could ascend the Fleet as far as the Holborn Bridge as late as the 16th cent. (Stow). Wren in his plan for rebuilding London after the Great Fire proposed to canalize it as far as Holborn Bridge.

Fleet Street Eclogues, see Davidson.

Fleetwood, THE EARL OF, a character in Meredith's 'The Amazing Marriage' (q.v.).

FLEMING, MARGARET (1803-11), 'Pet Marjorie', the daughter of James Fleming of Kirkcaldy, was a youthful prodigy and a pet of Sir Walter Scott. She wrote a quaint diary, a poem on Mary Queen of Scots, and other verses, and she was the subject of an essay by Dr. John Brown (q.v.).

Fleming, (1) ROSE and AGNES, characters in Dickens's 'Oliver Twist' (q.v.); (2) ARCH-DEACON, in Scott's 'The Heart of Midlothian'; (3) LADY MARY, in Scott's 'The Abbot'; (4) SIR MALCOLM, in Scott's 'Castle Dangerous'; (5) PAUL, in Longfellow's 'Hyperion'; (6) FARMER, RHODA, and DAHLIA, in Meredith's 'Rhoda Fleming' (qq.v.).

Flemish School of Painting. Painting in the 'Low Countries' (outside Holland) had two great periods. The School of Bruges (1366-1550) produced painters of religious subjects much influenced by Italian art; the brothers van Eyck, Hans Memling, Rogier van der Weyden, Quentin Matsys, and Mabuse, were the masters of this period. The second great period belongs to the 17th cent., and produced such portraitists as Rubens and Vandyck, as well as genre painters such as David Teniers.

Fleshly School of Poetry, The, the title of an article in the 'Contemporary Review' (Oct. 1871), in which Robert Buchanan (q.v.), under the pseudonym of 'Robert Maitland', attacked the Pre-Raphaelites (q.v.), especially D. G. Rossetti. This attack was the prelude to a long and bitter controversy.

Fleta, a Latin treatise on the common law of England, largely a summary of Bracton (q.v.), published anonymously c. 1290.

FLETCHER, GILES, the elder (1549?-1611), educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow in 1568, was sent as envoy to Russia in 1588. His book on Russia (1591), suppressed, and only partially printed in Hakluyt and Purchas, was published entire in 1856 (ed. Bond). 'Licia, or Poemes of Love' (1593), printed by Grosart, 1871, is of some importance as one of the first collections of sonnets that followed the appearance of Sidney's 'Astrophel and Stella'. He was uncle of John Fletcher (q.v.), the collaborator of Beaumont.

FLETCHER, GILES, the younger (1588?-1623), the younger son of Giles Fletcher the elder (q.v.), was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. He was rector of Alderton, Suff.

folk, and a poet of the Spenserian School, who dealt with religious themes allegorically. His 'Christ's Victorie and Triumph in Heaven and Earth' (1610) has been several times reprinted.

FLETCHER, JOHN (1579-1625), was born at Rye in Sussex, of which place his father (who subsequently was chaplain at the execution of Mary Queen of Scots and became bishop of Bristol and of London) was then minister. John Fletcher was nephew of Giles Fletcher the elder (q.v.) and cousin of Giles the younger and Phineas Fletcher (qq.v.). He was educated at Benet College, Cambridge. He died of the plague and was buried at St. Saviour's, Southwark. Fletcher collaborated with Francis Beaumont from about 1606 to 1616 in the production of plays, the exact number of which is not known, but does not exceed fifteen. He was sole author of not less than sixteen plays, and collaborated with Massinger, Rowley, and others in yet other plays.

The principal plays of which Fletcher was author or part author are the following:

Probably by Fletcher alone: 'The Faithful Shepherdess' (q.v.), printed by 1610; 'Wit without Money', a comedy, printed in 1639; 'Valentinian' (q.v.), acted before 1619; 'The Loyal Subject' (q.v.), acted in 1618; 'The Mad Lover', acted before 1619; 'The Humorous Lieutenant' (q.v.), acted in 1619; 'Women Pleased', a comedy, c. 1620, printed in 1647; 'The Wild Goose Chase' (q.v.), 1621, printed in 1652; 'The Pilgrim', a comedy, 1621, printed in 1647; 'The Island Princess', 1621, a romantic comedy; 'Monsieur Thomas', 1619, printed in 1639; 'The Woman's Prize, or The Tamer Tamed', a comedy (the taming of Shakespeare's Petruchio), written before 1625, printed in 1647; 'A Wife for a Month', a romantic drama, acted in 1624; 'Rule a Wife and have a Wife' (q.v.), acted in 1624; 'The Chances' (q.v.), 1620, printed in 1647.

Certainly or probably by Beaumont and Fletcher: 'Four Plays in One', four short plays (two founded on Boccaccio, one on Bandello, one an allegory about false and true friends), probably acted c. 1608; 'The Knight of the Burning Pestle' (q.v.), 1609, printed in 1613; 'The Scornful Lady', 1610, printed in 1616; 'Philaster' (q.v.), 1611, printed in 1620; 'The Maid's Tragedy' and 'A King and no King' (qq.v.), 1611, printed in 1619; 'The Coxcomb', a romantic comedy, acted in 1612, printed in 1647; 'Cupid's Revenge', a tragedy based on material in the second Book of Sidney's 'Arcadia', acted in 1612, printed in 1615; 'The Captain', a comedy, acted in 1612-13; 'The Honest Man's Fortune', printed in 1647; 'Bonduca' (q.v.), 1614, printed in 1647; 'The Knight of Malta', a tragi-comedy, acted before March 1619, printed in 1647; 'Thierry and Theodoret' (q.v.), printed in 1621; 'Love's Cure', printed in 1647.

Probably by Fletcher and some other dramatist: 'Love's Pilgrimage' and 'The Double

FLETCHER

FLETCHER

Marriage, comedies printed in 1647; 'Sir John van Olden Barnavelt' (q.v.), acted in 1619; 'The False One' (a Cleopatra play), 'The Little French Lawyer' (q.v.), 'The Custom of the Country' (q.v.), and 'The Laws of Candy', all printed in 1647; 'The Spanish Curate' (q.v.) and 'The Beggar's Bush' (q.v.), acted in 1622. In all the above Fletcher certainly or probably collaborated with Massinger. The romantic drama, 'The Lovers' Progress' (q.v.), produced in 1623 and printed in 1647, was an adaptation by Massinger of an earlier play by Fletcher. 'The Maid in the Mill' was written by Fletcher and Rowley (licensed in 1623). 'The Elder Brother' (q.v.), printed in 1637, is thought to have been written by Fletcher and revised by Massinger. 'The Fair Maid of the Inn', printed in 1647, was probably the result of similar collaboration, with perhaps assistance from Jonson and Rowley. 'The Nice Valour', a comedy, printed in 1647, was probably written by Fletcher and Middleton. It contains the lyric 'Hence all you vain delights', which suggested 'Il Penseroso' to Milton. In 'The Bloody Brother, or Rollo, Duke of Normandy' (q.v.), Fletcher is supposed to have had the assistance of Jonson (in the astrological scene) and others; this tragedy was probably produced about 1616. It contains the lyric 'Take, oh take those lips away', which occurs with certain changes in Shakespeare's 'Measure for Measure'. 'The Noble Gentleman', a comedy acted in 1626, is by Fletcher with Beaumont, or perhaps Rowley. 'The Two Noble Kinsmen' (q.v.), printed 1634, was probably the work of Fletcher and Shakespeare. It is probable also that Fletcher had a share in the composition of Shakespeare's 'Henry VIII'.

FLETCHER, PHINEAS (1582-1650), the elder son of Giles Fletcher the elder (q.v.), was educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, and was rector of Hilgay, Norfolk, 1621-50. Like his brother Giles, he was a poet of the Spenserian School. His chief work, 'The Purple Island', an allegorical poem on the human body, the mind, and the virtues and vices, was published in 1633; 'The Locusts or Apollyonists', an attack on the Jesuits, in 1627; and 'Elisa', an elegy on the death of Sir Antony Irby, in 1633. 'Britain's Ida', 1628, seems to be his.

Fleur and Blanchefleur, see Flores and Blanchefleur.

Flibbertigibbet, probably in its original form 'flibbergib', which Latimer uses in a sermon for a chattering or gossiping person. Harsnet in his 'Popish Impostures' (1603) gives 'Fliberdigibbet' as the name of a devil or fiend. And Shakespeare in 'King Lear' III. iv has 'Flibbertigibbet', 'the foul fiend' who walks at night, 'gives the web and the pin, squints the eye, and makes the hare-lip'. Scott, in 'Kenilworth' (q.v.), gives the nickname 'Flibbertigibbet' to Dickie Sludge.

FLORES

Flickertail State, North Dakota, see United States.

Flintwinch, a character in Dickens's 'Little Dorrit' (q.v.). His wife was known as Affery.

Flippanta, a character in Vanbrugh's 'The Confederacy' (q.v.).

Flite, Miss, a character in Dickens's 'Bleak House' (q.v.).

Flodden or FLODDON Field, the battle of Flodden, in Northumberland, fought on 9th Sept. 1513, when the earl of Surrey on behalf of Henry VIII (then in France) defeated James IV of Scotland, the latter sovereign being killed on the field. It was made the subject of poems, of rejoicing or lament, on both sides of the border. Skelton's 'Against the Scots' is a rude song of exultation on the English victory, and several English ballads appeared, of which one by Thomas Deloney (q.v.) is printed in Ritson's collection. On the Scottish side there is the beautiful lament, 'The Flowers of the Forest', of which the most popular version is by Jane Elliot (q.v.). The battle is described in the 6th canto of Scott's 'Marmion, A Tale of Flodden Field' (q.v.).

FLODOARD (894-966), of Rheims in France, left valuable chronicles of the period 919-66, and a 'Historia Remensis Ecclesiae'.

Flora, the goddess of flowers and spring of the ancient Romans.

Florac, COMTE DE, in Thackeray's 'The Virginians' (q.v.), a young French officer who rescues George Warrington from the Indians; in 'The Newcomes' (q.v.) an émigré from France. His wife (who had been loved as a girl by Thomas Newcome), son, and daughter-in-law figure in the same novel.

Flordelis, in the 'Orlando Furioso' (q.v.), the devoted wife of Brandimarte, the paladin killed in the great fight with Agramant and Gradasso at Lipadusa.

Flordespina, in the 'Orlando Furioso' (q.v.), a princess who falls in love with Bradamante, being led by her armour to take her for a man.

FLORENCE OF WORCESTER (d. 1118), a monk of Worcester who was author of a 'Chronicon ex Chronicis' (based upon the work of Marianus, an Irish monk), extending to 1117, which was continued by other hands till 1295 (Cambridge MS.). It was first printed in 1592, and translated for Bohn (1847) and for Stevenson's 'Church Historians' (1853).

Florent or FLORENTIUS, the subject of a tale in Gower's 'Confessio Amantis' (q.v.), and of the 'Wife of Bath's Tale' in Chaucer's 'Canterbury Tales' (q.v.).

Flores (pron. Flô'rês), the westernmost island of the Azores off which Sir Richard Granville fought his great sea fight with the Spaniards in 1591, celebrated in Tennyson's 'The Revenge'.

FLORES AND BLANCHEFLOUR

Flores and Blancheflour, a metrical romance of the Middle English period, relating the adventures of Blancheflour, a Christian princess carried off by the Saracens and brought up with the Christian prince Flores. They fall in love and are separated, but Blancheflour gives Flores a ring which will tarnish when she is in danger. Blancheflour is threatened by a false accusation, and Flores, warned by the ring, finds her in a seraglio in Egypt, whither she has been sent as a slave. The lovers are pardoned by the Emir and all ends well. A version of this story forms the subject of Boccaccio's 'Filocopo'.

Florestan, KING, a character in Disraeli's 'Endymion' (q.v.).

Florimell, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', Bks. III and IV, the type of chastity and virtue in woman. She is in love with the knight Marinell, who 'sets nought' by her. She takes refuge from her pursuers in the sea and is imprisoned by Proteus. Finally the heart of Marinell is touched by her complaint, and Neptune orders Proteus to release her.

Florin, the English name of a gold coin first issued at Florence in 1252, so called because it had a flower stamped upon it. The name was applied to two English gold coins (known also as 'leopards' and 'double leopards') of the value of 3s. and 6s., issued by Edward III, of the weight of one and two Florentine florins respectively. The English silver coin worth 2s. called a florin was first minted in 1849.

Florinda, a character in Southey's 'Roderick' (q.v.).

FLORIO, JOHN (1553?-1625), son of an Italian Protestant refugee, was born in London and educated at Magdalen College, Oxford. He was reader in Italian to Queen Anne, 1603, and groom of the privy chamber, 1604. His Italian-English dictionary appeared in 1598. He published a translation of Montaigne's 'Essays' in 1603, which had an important influence on English literature and philosophy. It is marked by a certain extravagance and eccentricity of language, but he loved his author and made a vivid work of the translation. Florio married Rosa Daniel, the sister of Samuel Daniel (q.v.), the Rosalind of Spenser's 'Shepheards Calender'.

Florisando, see Amadis of Gaul.

Florismart, in the Charlemagne romances, one of the paladins, and friend of Roland.

Florizel, a character in Shakespeare's 'Winter's Tale' (q.v.), the lover of Perdita. 'Florizel' was the name adopted by George IV, when Prince of Wales, in his correspondence with Mary Robinson (q.v.), the actress, with whose performance as Perdita he had been captivated.

Florizel, PRINCE, the chief character in the 'New Arabian Nights' of R. L. Stevenson (q.v.).

Flosky, MA., a character in Peacock's

FOIBLE

'Nightmare Abbey' (q.v.), who illustrates the transcendentalism of Coleridge.

Flower and the Leaf, The, an allegory of 600 lines in rhyme-royal, formerly attributed to Chaucer, in which the poet wandering in a grove sees the white company of knights and ladies of the leaf (Diana, goddess of chastity), and the green company of the flower (Flora), the 'folk that loved idleness' and had delight 'of no businesse, but for to hunt and hauke, and pley in medes', and witnesses their processions and sports.

Linguistic characteristics suggest that this poem is of later date than Chaucer or was extensively re-written. The spirit of the poem is thoroughly Chaucerian.

Flowers of the Forest, see Elliot (Jane).

FLUDD, ROBERT (1574-1637), physician and rosicrucian (q.v.), was as a writer a medical mystic of the school that looked to the Bible for secret clues to science. He vindicated the fraternity of the Rosy Cross in several treatises.

Fluellen, in Shakespeare's 'Henry V' (q.v.), a brave, choleric, and pedantic Welsh officer.

Flute, in Shakespeare's 'Midsummer Night's Dream' (q.v.), a bellows-mender, who takes the part of Thisbe in the play of 'Pyramus and Thisbe'.

Flutter, SIR FOPLING, a character in Etherege's 'The Man of Mode' (q.v.).

Flying Childers, reputed the fastest racehorse ever bred, the son of Darley Arabian (q.v.), was bred in 1715 by the duke of Devonshire, and died in 1741.

Flying Dutchman, The, a phantom ship, which, in consequence of a murder committed on board, is supposed to haunt the sea in a perpetual endeavour to make Table Bay. It is seen in stormy weather off the Cape of Good Hope, and forebodes disaster. Capt. Marryat's novel 'The Phantom Ship' and a music-drama by R. Wagner (q.v.) are founded on this legend.

Flying Fox, a famous racehorse belonging to the duke of Westminster, which (in 1899) won the 'Triple Crown', that is to say, the Two Thousand Guineas, the Derby, and St. Leger.

Foedera, Conventiones, et cujuscunque generis Acta Publica, a collection of public records in twenty volumes, by Rymer (q.v.) and Robert Sanderson, published in 1704-35 (vols. xvi-xx were prepared by Sanderson, the first of these chiefly from Rymer's materials). The documents (treaties, conventions, letters, &c. between the kings of England and foreign sovereigns and states) extend down to 1654, and provided for the first time a scientific basis for the writing of history.

Fogg, PHILEAS, the hero of Jules Verne's 'Round the World in Eighty Days'.

Foible, in Congreve's 'The Way of the World' (q.v.), Lady Wishfort's woman.

FOIGARD

Folgard, FATHER, in Farquhar's 'The Beaux' Stratagem' (q.v.), a pretended French priest; 'his French shows him to be English, and his English shows him to be Irish'.

Foker, HARRY, a character in Thackeray's 'Pendennis' (q.v.).

FOLENGO, TEOPHILO (1496?–1544), an Italian monk, who wrote, under the pseudonym Merlin Coccai, a long burlesque-heroic poem, 'Opus Macaronicum', in macaronic (q.v.) verse. Its hero is Baldus, who has for followers the giant Fracassus and the cunning Cingar. Rabelais's Panurge (q.v.) is partly modelled on the latter.

Folio, a sheet of paper folded once only, or a volume made up of sheets so folded (consequently of the largest size).

Folio, TOM, a pedantic bibliophile, the subject of one of Addison's essays.

Folk-lore, the traditional beliefs, legends, and customs, current among the common people; and the study of them. The term was first introduced by W. J. Thoms in the 'Athenaeum' (1846).

Follott, THE REV. DOCTOR, a character in Peacock's 'Crotchet Castle' (q.v.).

Fomors, THE, the sea-giants of Gaelic mythology. They are represented as more ancient than the gods (the Tuatha Dé Danann), and as having been ousted by them and destroyed at the battle of Moytura (C. Squire, 'Mythology of the British Islands'). See also Balor.

Fondlewife, one of the characters in Congreve's 'The Old Bachelor' (q.v.).

Fontarabla, now FUENTERRABIA, in Spain at the mouth of the Bidassoa. Milton appears to have confused it with Roncesvalles, some forty miles away, where the rout of the rear-guard of Charlemagne's army is generally supposed to have occurred:

When Charlemagne with all his peerage fell
By Fontarabia.

('Paradise Lost', i. 587.)

Scott, in 'Marmion', vi. 33, refers to 'Fontarabian echoes' in connexion with the defeat at Roncesvalles.

Fonthill, see Beckford.

Fool of Quality, The, a novel by H. Brooke (q.v.), published 1766–72.

The 'fool of quality' is Henry, second son of an earl of Moreland, and so called because he appears to his parents of less intelligence than his elder brother. He is banished from their house and brought up by his foster-mother and subsequently by his uncle, and develops not only great physical beauty and athletic prowess, but a high degree of virtue and generosity, which he displays in the relief of the poor, sick, and oppressed. The incidents of the story are neither very probable nor very interesting, but they are oddly diversified by discourses on a great variety of subjects (in the latter part of the book on the mystical aspects of Christianity), and by discussions between the author and a 'friend' on passages in the book itself. The work breathes the spirit of Rousseau, the revolt against oppression and suffering, and anticipates the doctrines of Godwin and Paine (qq.v.). It was highly admired by John Wesley, who edited it for Methodist use, and by Charles Kingsley (q.v.), who contributed a laudatory preface to the edition of 1859.

FOOTE, SAMUEL (1720–77), actor and dramatist, was educated at Worcester College, Oxford, where he dissipated a fortune. As an actor he was particularly successful in comic mimicry; acting in his own plays, he caricatured his fellow actors and various well-known persons. He wrote a number of short dramatic sketches of two or three acts, depending largely for their success on topical allusions, of which 'Taste' (1752) was the first. 'The Minor' (1760), a satire directed against the Methodists, in which Foote mimicked George Whitefield ('Dr. Squintum'), was his most powerful work. 'The Liar' (1762) is a lively farce in which Young Wilding is the liar, constantly exposed, and constantly gay and unabashed. 'The Mayor of Garret' (q.v.) appeared in 1764. In 'The Maid of Bath' (1771) Foote pilloried Squire Long, the unscrupulous sexagenarian lover of Miss Elizabeth Linley, the lady who subsequently married Sheridan. 'The Nabob' (1772) was aimed at the directors and servants of the East India Company. One of his plays, 'A Trip to Calais' (1776), involved him in a quarrel with the duchess of Kingston, and was altered to 'The Capuchin' (the offending character of 'Lady Kitty Crocodile' being replaced by another). Foote had a leg amputated in 1766, but this did not quell his spirit. He received as compensation a patent for a theatre, and built the new Haymarket in 1767. He was known to his contemporaries as the English Aristophanes, counsel in a libel action having likened his client to Socrates and Foote to Aristophanes.

Fopling Flutter, SIR, a character in Etherege's 'The Man of Mode' (q.v.).

Foppington, LORD, a character in Vanbrugh's comedy 'The Relapse' (q.v.) and Sheridan's 'A Trip to Scarborough' (q.v.); also in Colley Cibber's 'The Careless Husband' (q.v.).

FORCELLINI, EGIDIO (1688–1768), lexicographer; author, with J. Faccioliati, of the famous 'Totius Latinitatis Lexicon' (1771), commonly known as 'Forcellini-Faccioliati'.

Ford and Mrs. Ford, characters in Shakespeare's 'Merry Wives of Windsor' (q.v.).

FORD, FORD MADOX (formerly Ford Madox Hueffer, 1873–1939), author. Among his chief works are: 'The Spirit of the People' (1907), 'Mr. Apollo' (1908), 'Ladies Whose Bright Eyes' (1911), 'The Marsden Case' (1923), 'Mr. Bosphorus' (1923), 'Some Do Not' (1924), 'No More Parades' (1925), 'A Man Could Stand Up (1926), 'Last Post' (1928), all novels; 'Henry James' (1913), a critical study; and 'Collected Poems' (1914). Also books on the English novel and on Conrad; he collaborated with Conrad in 'The Inheritors' (1901) and 'Romance' (1903).

FORD, JOHN (fl. 1639), was born in Devonshire, and was admitted at the Middle Temple in 1602. He probably spent his last years in Devonshire. Some of his plays have perished (four were destroyed by Warburton's cook). Of those which have survived the chief are the 'Lover's Melancholy' (q.v., 1629), 'Love's Sacrifice' (q.v., 1633), 'Tis Pity she's a Whore' (q.v., 1633), 'The Broken Heart' (q.v., 1633), 'Perkin Warbeck' (q.v., 1634), 'The Ladies' Trial' (1638). He collaborated with Dekker and Rowley in 'The Witch of Edmonton' (q.v.). The best edition of his collected works is Dyce's reissue of Gifford's edition (1869). The principal characteristic of his work is the powerful depiction of melancholy, sorrow, and despair. A vivid little portrait of him has been preserved in the couplet, from the 'Time-Poets' ('Choice Drollery', 1656):

Deep in a dump John Ford was alone got,
With folded arms and melancholy hat.

FORD, PAUL LEICESTER (1865-1902), an American author, born in Brooklyn, is chiefly known for his novels, 'The Honorable Peter Stirling' (1894) and 'Janice Meredith' (1899).

FORD, RICHARD (1796-1858), educated at Winchester and Trinity College, Oxford, a contributor to the 'Quarterly', 'Edinburgh', and 'Westminster Reviews', is remembered as the author of the 'Handbook for Travellers in Spain' (1845), a work agreeable by its charming style and rendered exceptionally interesting by the author's sympathetic knowledge of the people and the frequent references to incidents of the Peninsular War. His 'Gatherings from Spain' (1846) is a no less agreeable work. His 'Letters' have been edited (1905) by Lord Ernle.

Ford Car, an efficient inexpensive American motor-car, the result of the application by Mr. Henry Ford of mass-production methods to motor manufacture; in novels the typical cheap car.

Foresight, the foolish old astrologer in Congreve's 'Love for Love' (q.v.).

Forester, SYLVAN, a character in Peacock's 'Melincourt' (q.v.).

FORTECUES

There is a remarkable invocation of forgers and impostors in ch. xx of Anatole France's 'M. Bergeret à Paris'.

Fornarina, LA, 'the bakeress', the name given to the picture (in the Palazzo Barberini, Rome) of a woman, whose bracelet bears the name 'Raphael Urbinas'. It is supposed to represent the mistress of Raphael, the painter, said to have been one Margherita, daughter of a baker.

Forrest, The, a collection of miscellaneous short poems, odes, epistles, and songs, by Jonson (q.v.), printed in the folio of 1616. It includes the beautiful songs: 'Drink to me only with thine eyes', and 'Come, my Celia, let us prove'.

Fors Clavigera, a collection of letters to the workmen and labourers of Great Britain, by Ruskin (q.v.), published in 1871-84.

This remarkable collection deals with a great variety of subjects, though the underlying motive—the redress of poverty and misery—is present throughout. 'For my own part', he writes, 'I will put up with this state of things not an hour longer. . . . I simply cannot paint, nor read, nor look at minerals nor do anything else that I like . . . because of the misery that I know of, and see signs of where I know it not.' He sets out to show the causes of the evil and the means of remedying it. His practical contribution was the founding of the Guild of St. George (see under Ruskin, John). The title of the work is explained by the author: 'Fors Clavigera' is fortune bearing a club, a key, and a nail, symbolizing the deed of Hercules, the patience of Ulysses, and the law of Lycurgus.

FORSTER, EDWARD MORGAN (1879-), author, whose chief works are: 'Where Angels Fear to Tread' (1905), 'The Longest Journey' (1907), 'A Room with a View' (1908), 'Howards End' (1910), 'The Celestial Omnibus' (1911), 'A Passage to India' (1924), 'Aspects of the Novel' (1927).

FORSTER, JOHN (1812-76), educated at Newcastle Grammar School and University College, London, contributed to Lardner's 'Cyclopaedia' 'Lives of the Statesmen of the Commonwealth' (1836-9), that of Sir John Eliot being issued separately in an expanded form in 1864. He edited the 'Foreign Quarterly Review' in 1842-3, the 'Daily News' in 1846, and the 'Examiner' in 1847-55. He was subsequently a lunacy commissioner. Forster wrote a number of biographical works: 'Life and Adventures of Oliver Goldsmith' (1848), lives of his friends Walter Savage Landor (1869) and Charles Dickens (1872-4), and the first volume of a 'Life of Swift' (1876). His other works include 'Historical and Biographical Essays' (1858), 'The Arrest of the Five Members' and 'The Debates on the Grand Remonstrance' (1860).

Forsythe Saga, see Galsworthy.

FORTECUE, Sir JOHN (1394?-1476?).

FORTESCUE

chief justice of the king's bench under Henry VI, and the earliest English constitutional lawyer. He was a Lancastrian during the Wars of the Roses, but having been captured at Tewkesbury in 1471, was pardoned and made a member of the council on recognizing Edward IV (1471). His principal works were a Latin treatise 'De Natura Legis Naturae' (1461-3), distinguishing absolute from constitutional monarchy; an English treatise on the same subject ('Monarchia' or 'The Difference between an Absolute and a Limited Monarchy'); a Latin treatise, 'De Laudibus Legum Angliae' (1471); and an English work 'On the Governance of England'. His recantation of his Lancastrian views is contained in 'A Declaration upon Certain Wrytings' (1471-3).

FORTESCUE, HON. SIR JOHN (1859-1933), librarian of Windsor Castle, 1905-26, author of a 'History of the British Army' (1890-1929) and other works of military history.

Forties, THE HUNGRY, a term applied to a period of acute distress among the poorer classes of England, resulting from a series of bad harvests beginning in 1837, coupled with the taxation of imported wheat. This distress culminated in 1842, and was marked by the Chartist and Anti-Corn-Law agitations, and a good deal of turbulence and intimidation.

Forties, THE ROARING, the exceptionally rough part of the Ocean between 40° and 50° of north latitude; also occasionally applied to the part of the Ocean between 40° and 50° of south latitude.

Fortnightly Review, The, was founded in 1865, as the organ of advanced liberalism, and edited successively by G. H. Lewes, John Morley (1867-83), T. H. S. Escott, Frank Harris, Oswald Crawford, and W. L. Courtney. It was at first, as its name implies, issued fortnightly, but before long only once a month.

Fortunate Isles, THE, in the belief of the ancient Greeks and Romans, lay west of the Pillars of Hercules in the Atlantic Ocean. They are supposed to be the Canary Islands. They were represented as the seat of the blessed, where the souls of the virtuous were placed after death.

Fortunes of Nigel, The, a novel by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1822.

The young Nigel Oliphant, Lord Glenvarloch, threatened with the loss of his ancestral estate if he is unable promptly to redeem a heavy mortgage, comes to London to endeavour to recover from James I a sum of 40,000 marks advanced to the latter at a crisis in his fortunes by Nigel's father. The king is induced to sign an order on the Scottish treasury for the amount in favour of Nigel. But the estate is coveted by Prince Charles and the duke of Buckingham, and Nigel finds great difficulties opposed to his recovery of the money. Lord Dalgarno, the favourite of Charles and Buckingham, a dissembling villain, lures Nigel into evil ways, keeps him from the court, and spreads false rumours about him. Nigel, discovering his treachery, challenges him in St. James's Park, and strikes him, an offence for which he is liable to lose his right hand. He takes sanctuary in Alsatia (q.v.), the strange and lawless society of which is vividly described. He is subsequently imprisoned in the Tower. Meanwhile Margaret Ramsay, the pretty, petulant daughter of an old clockmaker in the City, has fallen deeply in love with Nigel. She takes secret steps to effect his rescue, and moreover, in the disguise of a page, seeks an interview with James himself, to advance the cause of the man she loves and at the same time to secure reparation for her patroness, Lady Hermione, who has been grievously wronged by her husband Lord Dalgarno. She is successful in her endeavours. Nigel is released, and, touched by the devotion of Margaret, marries her. He recovers his estate, and Lord Dalgarno is killed by robbers as he proceeds to Scotland in a last attempt to seize the property.

The novel contains a number of interesting characters, including the pedantic freakish James I; Richard Monplies, Nigel's concited servant; Dame Ursula Suddlechop, milliner and secret agent; the miser Trapbois and his austere daughter; the rattling Templar, Lowestoffe; and the treacherous embittered courtier, Sir Mungo Malagrowth.

Fosse Way, THE, a Roman road running across England from Bath to Lincoln. It intersects Watling Street at High Cross, sometimes called the centre of England.

Foster, ANTHONY, a character in Scott's 'Kenilworth' (q.v.).

Fotheringay, MISS, the stage name of Emily Costigan, a character in Thackeray's 'Pendennis' (q.v.).

FOUL PLAY

Foul Play, a novel by C. Reade (q.v.), published in 1869.

The story turns on the scuttling in the Pacific of a ship, supposed to be carrying a large consignment of gold, by the design of the owner, Arthur Wardlaw, in order to defraud the underwriters. Unfortunately, Arthur's sweetheart, Helen Rolleston, is on board, and also Robert Penfold, who has been transported for a forgery committed by Arthur. The two are thrown together on a Pacific island, and the story, a good example of Reade's narrative power, ends in the exposure of the villain and the marriage of Robert and Helen.

Foulls, Robert (1707-76), originally named Faulls and a barber's apprentice at Glasgow. With his brother Andrew he visited Oxford and France in 1738-40 collecting rare books, and started as bookseller and printer at Glasgow. He printed for the university their first Greek book (1743) and the 'immaculate' Horace (1744). He issued a number of other remarkable books, the fine folio 'Iliad' of 1756, 'Odyssey' (1758), the Olivet Cicero (1749), the small folio Callimachus (1755), the quarto edition of Gray (1768), and 'Paradise Lost' (1770). (See James MacLehose, 'The Glasgow University Press', 1931.)

Fountain of Youth, fontaine de jouvence, in the 'Roman d'Alexandre' (see under Alexander the Great), a magic fountain (a sidestream of the Euphrates) in which Alexander and his army bathe, and are thereby restored to the prime of life.

The belief in a fountain possessing this magical property was widespread in the Middle Ages. After the discovery of America it was supposed to be situated in the Bahamas, and Juan Ponce de Leon (a companion of Columbus in 1493 and the discoverer of Florida) received in 1512 authority to discover and settle Bimini, a mythical island, in which the Fountain of Youth was supposed to be.

Fourth Estate, The, the Press. The use of the expression in this sense is attributed by Carlyle to Burke, but not traced in his speeches. A correspondent of 'N. and Q.' (1st Series, xi. 452) attributes it to Brougham.

Fourth of June, an Eton College celebration.

Fourth of July, 'Independence Day', a national holiday in the United States, being the anniversary of the day on which, in 1776, was signed the Declaration of Independence, by which the original thirteen States of the union broke their allegiance to the British crown.

FOWLER, H. W. and F. G., lexicographers and grammarians; joint authors of 'The King's English' (1906), 'The Concise Oxford Dictionary' (1911), and 'The Pocket Oxford Dictionary' (1924). 'A Dictionary of Modern English Usage' (1926) is the work of H. W. Fowler (d. 1933). F. G. Fowler d. 1918.

FOX, CHARLES JAMES (1749-1806), third son of the first Lord Holland and 'our first great statesman of the modern school' (Sir G. Trevelyan), was educated at Eton and Hertford College, Oxford. He became M.P. for Midhurst in 1768, making his mark by his speeches against Wilkes in 1769, and was a lord of the Admiralty under Lord North in 1770; but his independent attitude brought him into disfavour with the king, and he was dismissed from the ministry in 1774. Fox took a leading part in opposition to North's American policy, in debates on economical reform, and in support of Roman Catholic relief. In spite of great pecuniary distress he refused to be bribed by the emoluments of office and continued his attacks on the government. In 1782 he was appointed foreign secretary in Lord Rockingham's ministry, but was thwarted by Shelburne and resigned when the latter became premier. In 1783 he formed a coalition with North, becoming joint-secretary of state with him under the duke of Portland, but was dismissed in the same year. He was one of the managers of the proceedings against Warren Hastings, and opened the Benares charge in a speech of nearly five hours. Fox was a constant opponent of the policy of Pitt (during the first long ministry of the latter), on the commercial treaties with Ireland and France, the Eastern question, the French Revolution, &c., and made a three hours' speech in favour of peace in 1803. But when Napoleon obviously threatened invasion and stood forth as a conqueror unabashed, Fox saw how dangerous the situation was; he showed himself a patriot and was willing to serve with Pitt in the 1804 Ministry, but the prejudice of George III excluded him. After Trafalgar he held that the danger was over, and was willing to receive (as foreign secretary under Grenville) overtures from France. But he soon found out Napoleon's duplicity, and his last act was to knit up close relations with Russia against France. Fox was a man of great personal charm, noted for his love of letters and his scholarship; also for his passion for gambling and for the bad influence he exercised over the Prince of Wales.

For the 'Early History of Charles James Fox' see under Trevelyan (Sir George).

FOX, GEORGE (1624-91), son of a Leicestershire weaver, and founder of the Society of Friends (q.v.). His 'Journal', revised by a committee under William Penn's superintendence and published in 1694, is a narrative, in simple and direct style, of his spiritual experiences and of the troubles to which he and his followers were exposed by the persecution of the authorities. A 'Collection of . . . Epistles' was issued in 1698 and his 'Gospel Truth' in 1706.

FOX, JOHN, Jr. (1863-1919), American novelist, whose best work deals with the life of the Kentucky mountain folk among whom he was bred. His chief novels are: 'The Little Shepherd of Kingdom Come' (1902) and 'The Trail of the Lonesome Pine' (1908).

FOX, JOHN (1516-87), the martyrologist, was born at Boston, Lincolnshire, and was educated at Oxford, where he became a fellow of Magdalen College, but resigned his fellowship in 1545, being unwilling to conform to the statutes in religious matters. In 1554 he retired to the Continent, and issued at Strasburg his 'Commentarii' (the earliest draft of his 'Actes and Monuments'). From 1555 to 1559 he was employed at Basle as reader of the press by Oporinus (Herbst), who published Foxe's 'Christus Triumphans' in 1556, his appeal to the English nobility on toleration in 1557, and the first issue of his 'Rerum in ecclesia gestarum . . . Commentarii' in 1559. On his return to England he was ordained priest by Grindal in 1560, and in 1564 joined John Day, the printer, who in 1563 had issued the English version of the 'Rerum in ecclesia gestarum . . . Commentarii' as 'Actes and Monuments' (q.v.), popularly known as the 'Book of Martyrs'. He became a canon of Salisbury in 1563, but objected to the use of the surplice and to contributing to the repairs of the cathedral. He preached at Paul's Cross a famous sermon 'On Christ Crucified' in 1570. His 'Reformatio Legum' appeared in 1571. He was buried in St. Giles's Church, Cripplegate. Four editions of the 'Actes and Monuments' (1563, 1570, 1576, and 1583) appeared in the author's lifetime; of the posthumous issues, that of 1641 contains a memoir of Foxe, attributed to his son, but of doubtful authenticity.

Fra Angelico, the name by which Guido di Pietro of Fiesole (1387-1455) is usually known, a monk of the order of the Predicants, and a celebrated Italian painter of religious subjects.

Fra Diavolo ('Brother Devil'), the popular name of an Italian brigand, Michele Pezza (1771-1806), who was connected with the political movements in southern Italy for the recovery of Naples from the French at the beginning of the 19th cent. He was leader of a troop of guerrillas, and was arrested and shot. He is the subject of the famous opera by Auber which bears his name.

Fra Lippo Lippi, a poem by R. Browning (q.v.), included in 'Men and Women', published in 1855.

The painter monk (he lived in fact 1412?-69), who has broken out of Cosimo dei Medici's house on a night frolic, with much humour narrates his life: his entry as a half-starved child into a Carmelite convent, where his talent for painting led to his employment to embellish the church; the different views on art of the prior and himself; and his present mode of life, painting under the influence of the prior's doctrine, but breaking bounds at times.

Fra Rupert, see Andrea of Hungary.

Fradubio, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', i. ii. 32 et seq., 'the doubter', the lover of Fraelissa; he doubts whether her beauty is equal to that of Duessa. Duessa transforms Fraelissa into a tree, obtains Fradubio's love, and when he discovers her deformity, turns him also into a tree.

Frail, Mrs., a character in Congreve's 'Love for Love' (q.v.).

Fram, The, the specially constructed steamer in which Nansen (q.v.) attempted to reach the North Pole in 1893-6.

Framley Parsonage, a novel by A. Trollope (q.v.), published in 1861.

This was the fourth of the Barsetshire series. Mark Robarts, a young clergyman, the close friend of Lord Lufton, is appointed to the living of Framley by the widowed Lady Lufton, the latter's mother. He is brought by Lord Lufton into relations with Mr. Sowerby, an unscrupulous spendthrift, and the disreputable duke of Omnium, obtains by their influence a prebendal stall at Barchester, after weakly consenting to back bills for Mr. Sowerby, and generally conducts himself so as to incur the disapproval of his patroness, Lady Lufton. Meanwhile Lord Lufton falls in love with Robarts's sister Lucy, a young lady of insignificant appearance but endowed with much character and vivacity. Lady Lufton vigorously opposes the match, and Lucy tells her lover she will not marry him unless asked to do so by his mother. His pertinacity and Lucy's self-sacrificing character finally win over Lady Lufton, and she complies with Lucy's condition. Meanwhile Robarts is rescued from his grave embarrassments by Lord Lufton, and having learnt his lesson, forswears his dangerous courses. Sowerby, whose estates are heavily mortgaged to the duke of Omnium, endeavours to escape from ruin by proposing to the rich Miss Dunstable, who refuses him and marries Dr. Thorne (q.v.). Bishop and Mrs. Proudie again appear, and also Archdeacon and Mrs. Grantly, whose beautiful daughter Griselda is married to Lord Dumbello, the heir of the marquis of Hartleap. The Rev. Josiah Crawley, the hero of the 'Last Chronicle of Barset' (q.v.), makes his first appearance.

FRAMLEY PARSONAGE

FRANCE, ANATOLE, the pseudonym of FRANÇOIS ANATOLE THIBAUT (1844-1924), French man of letters, the son of a bookseller. His first book of stories 'Jocaste et le chat maigre' appeared in 1879, followed in 1881 by 'Le Crime de Sylvestre Bonnard', which established his reputation as a novelist. He thereafter produced a long series of witty, graceful, and satirical tales, of which the best known are the following: 'Le Livre de mon ami' (1885); 'Thaïs' (an historical novel of which Alexandria in the first century is the scene, 1890); 'L'Étui de nacre' (1892); 'Les Opinions de Jérôme Coignard' (1893); 'La Rôtisserie de la Reine Pédauque' (1893); 'Sur la pierre blanche' (containing the story of Gallio, 1905); the four political satires with the figure of M. Bergeret as the centre, 'L'Orme du Mail' (1897), 'Le Mannequin d'osier' (1897), 'L'Anneau d'améthyste' (1899), 'M. Bergeret à Paris' (1901); 'Crainquebille' (1904); 'L'Île des pingouins' (1908); 'La Révolte des anges' (1914); 'Le Petit Pierre' (1918).

France, ILE DE, (1) a region of old France comprising the modern departments of Aisne, Oise, Seine, Seine-et-Oise, Seine-et-Marne, and part of Somme, with Paris as its capital, which was constituted a province in the 15th cent.; (2) the name given by the French to the island of Mauritius, when they occupied it in 1715. The island was taken by the English in 1810, and the old name Mauritius, given to it by its discoverers, the Dutch, in honour of their stadholder Prince Maurice, was restored.

Francesca da Rimini, see Paolo and Francesca.

Franceschini, COUNT GUIDO, a character in Browning's 'The Ring and the Book' (q.v.).

Francis, SIR PHILIP (1740-1818), the son of the Philip Francis who was Gibbon's schoolmaster at Esher and tutor of Charles James Fox, was educated at St. Paul's School with Woodfall, subsequently the publisher of the letters of Junius. He became a junior clerk in the office of the secretary of state in 1756, and clerk or amanuensis to General Edward Blich, Lord Kinnoul, and the elder Pitt. From 1762 to 1772 he was a clerk in the War Office, but retired owing to some disagreement with Lord Barrington, secretary at war. On the latter's recommendation, however, he became one of the four newly appointed councillors of the governor-general of India in 1774. He opposed Warren Hastings, charging him with corruption in the case of Nuncomar, and was wounded in a duel with him. He left India in 1780, became a member of parliament, and assisted Burke to prepare the charges against Hastings. He quarrelled with Fox for refusing to appoint him viceroy. He was intimate with the Prince Regent and was created a K.C.B.

There is strong evidence, but falling short of certainty, for identifying Francis with the author of the letters of 'Junius' (q.v.). It rests upon the acquaintance of 'Junius' with the affairs of the secretary of state's office and the war office, his displeasure at the removal of Francis from the latter, coincidence between the silences of Junius and the absences from London of Francis, private letters to Woodfall the publisher, expert evidence on handwriting, and moral resemblance. Against the identification are adduced the denial of Woodfall, and the malignity of 'Junius' towards some of Francis's friends and benefactors.

Francis of Assisi, St., GIOVANNI FRANCESCO BERNARDONE (1181?-1226), experienced as a young man a spiritual crisis while on a military expedition, in consequence of which he lived for a time in solitude and prayer and devoted himself to the relief of the poor, the sick, and the lepers. He was joined by disciples, the first of the Franciscan order, for whom he drew up the rule. He preached in Italy, and went to the Holy Land and Spain. The special note of his teaching was joyousness and love of nature (St. Francis preaching to the birds is a favourite subject in art). Two years before his death, after a period of fasting on Mt. Alverno, he is said to have discovered on his body the marks of Christ's crucifixion (the stigmata).

The 'Fioretti di San Francisco' ('Little Flowers of St. Francis') is a 14th-cent. Italian narrative, partly legendary, of the doings of St. Francis and his first disciples.

Franciscans, an order of friars founded by St. Francis of Assisi (q.v.) about 1209. Their rules require chastity, poverty, and obedience, and special stress is laid on preaching and ministry to the sick. They came to England about 1220, where they were known as Minors, Minorites, or Greyfriars (from the colour of their dress). See also Cordeliers, Observants, Capuchins, Recollects.

Frank Fairleigh, a novel by Smedley (q.v.).

Frankenstein, or the Modern Prometheus, a tale of terror by Mary W. Shelley (q.v.) published in 1818. The preface records the circumstances under which the work was produced. Byron and the Shelleys spent part of a wet summer in Switzerland in reading and writing ghost stories. 'Frankenstein', developed into a long story at her husband's suggestion, was Mrs. Shelley's contribution.

Frankenstein, a Genevan student of natural philosophy, learns the secret of imparting life to inanimate matter. Collecting bones from the charnel-houses he constructs the semblance of a human being and gives it life. The creature, endowed with supernatural size and strength, but revolting in appearance, inspires loathing in whoever sees it. Lonely and miserable, it is filled with hatred for its creator, and murders Frankenstein's brother and his bride. Frankenstein pursues it to the Arctic regions to destroy it, but is himself murdered by the monster, which then disappears.

Frankie and Johnny, or FRANKIE AND ALBERT, the most popular specimen of modern American balladry. It is of Negro origin and is known to exist in more than two hundred variants. The refrain is of the type:

He was her man, but he done her wrong.
Frankie revenged the wrong by shooting her lover.

FRANKLIN, BENJAMIN (1706-90), born in Boston, Mass., the son of a tallow-chandler and largely self-educated, was apprenticed when twelve to his brother, a printer, and when seventeen managed for a time the 'New England Courant' newspaper. He subsequently acquired the 'Pennsylvania Gazette', obtained official appointments, and was sent on a political mission to England in 1757. This was the beginning of his long diplomatic career in Europe as the agent of the American colonies, in the course of which he at first strove to avert the breach between them and Great Britain, but afterwards negotiated the alliance between them and France, and finally appeared as one of the signatories to the treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain.

He wrote voluminously, on political, economic, and scientific subjects (he was an experimenter and inventor). He was a man of cool calculating reason and broad humanity in politics, rather than of high moral principle. Several editions of his collected works have appeared (the edition of A. H. Smyth, New York, 1905, is the latest). Among his writings mention may be made of his ironical 'Edict by the King of Prussia' and 'Rules by which a Great Empire may be reduced to a Small One', which appeared in the 'Gentleman's Magazine' in 1773; and of his 'Autobiography' (the first authentic edition was that of Bigelow, 1868; imperfect texts had appeared from 1793). See also Poor Richard's Almanac.

FRANKLIN, SIR JOHN (1786-1847), Arctic explorer, was author of two remarkable 'Narratives' of voyages to the Polar Sea, published in 1823 and 1828. Franklin started on his last voyage of discovery, with the 'Erebus' and 'Terror', in 1845, and never returned. Numerous expeditions to search for his ships were organized, and Sir Leopold McClintock's 'Fox' finally solved the problem (so far as it could be solved) and proved that Franklin had in fact discovered the 'N.W.

FREDERICK BARBAROSSA

Passage', but that no use could be made of it.

FRASER, ALEXANDER CAMPBELL (1819-1914), a pupil of Sir William Hamilton (q.v.) at Edinburgh University, succeeded him as professor of logic and metaphysics in 1856, a position which he held until 1891. His first book, 'Essays in Philosophy' (reprints of contributions to the 'North British Review'), appeared in 1856. He is remembered chiefly as the editor of the standard edition of Berkeley (1871) and of Locke's Essay (1894), and as the author of monographs on these two philosophers. Holding a middle position between agnosticism and Hegelian idealism, he insisted on the element of faith which must lie at the basis of all our conclusions, and this is the standpoint of his Gifford lectures on 'The Philosophy of Theism' (1895-6). In 1898 he published a monograph on Thomas Reid (q.v.), and in 1904 'Biographia Philosophica', an interesting retrospect of a long life and a restatement of his philosophical conclusions.

Fraser's Magazine, founded in 1830 by Maginn (q.v.) and Hugh Fraser. Among the notable early contributors to it were Carlyle, Lockhart, Theodore Hook, Hogg, Coleridge, Harrison Ainsworth, Thackeray, Southey, and Barry Cornwall. It was taken over by Longmans in 1863, and ceased to appear in 1882. It was edited by J. A. Froude (q.v.), 1860-74, and by W. Allingham, 1874-9.

Fraternitÿe of Vacabones, a tract by John Awdeley (fl. 1559-77), published in 1561, in two parts, the first dealing with thieves' cant and the devices of beggars to excite compassion; the second with the methods employed by well-dressed impostors.

Fraunces' Tavern, New York, the meeting-place of the committee which issued the call for a congress of the Colonies in 1774. It was also the scene of Washington's farewell to his officers in 1783. The tavern still stands, only the ground floor being now used as a restaurant.

FRAZER, SIR JAMES GEORGE (1854-1941), fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, held the chair of social anthropology at Liverpool, 1907-22. His publications include: 'Totemism' (1887), 'The Golden Bough' (q.v.), of which the first volume appeared in 1890 and the twelfth and last in 1915; a translation with commentary of Pausanias's 'Description of Greece' (1898), 'Pausanias and other Greek Sketches' (1900), 'Letters of William Cowper' (1912), and a large number of other works on anthropology and folklore. His 'Fasti of Ovid' (with translation and commentary) appeared in 1929.

FREDERICK II

Frederick II, Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire (1220–50), grandson of Frederick Barbarossa (q.v.), 'the greatest single human force in the middle ages' (H. A. L. Fisher). A skilful soldier and resourceful statesman, he endeavoured to make Italy and Sicily a single united kingdom within the Empire. In this purpose he was defeated by Pope Gregory IX and Innocent IV. See also Stupor Mundi.

Frederick the Great, Friedrich II of Prussia (1712–86), son of Friedrich Wilhelm I and Sophia Dorothea, daughter of George I of England, ascended the throne in 1740. He engaged in prolonged wars with Austria, the dominions of which had passed to Maria Theresa by virtue of the Pragmatic Sanction; and was supported by England, mainly through subsidies, in the Seven Years War (q.v., 1756). By his military talent he raised Prussia to the position of a powerful state, while his intellectual interests were shown by his long intimacy with Voltaire (q.v.). See also Carlyle (T.).

Freeman, Mrs., the name under which the duchess of Marlborough corresponded with Queen Anne. The latter called herself Mrs. Morley.

FREEMAN, EDWARD AUGUSTUS (1823–92), scholar and probationary fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, and Regius professor of modern history at Oxford from 1884 to 1892, was a regular contributor to the 'Saturday Review' and other periodicals, and an historian of eminence (particularly in regard to the eleventh and twelfth centuries of English history). His principal work was the 'History of the Norman Conquest' (1867–79), in which he maintained the general position that the Norman Conquest produced no fundamental change either in the character of the population of England or in the Germanic type of the country's institutions. Freeman also wrote the 'History and Conquests of the Saracens' (1856), 'Growth of the English Constitution' (1872), 'Historical Geography of Europe' (1881–2), 'The Reign of William Rufus and the Accession of Henry I' (1882), 'Methods of Historical Study' (1886), 'Chief Periods of European History' (1886), a 'History of Sicily to 300 B.C.' (1891–4), and the first volume of a 'History of Federal Government' (1863). This volume, part of a much larger scheme, dealt with the history of federalism in ancient Greece. Freeman, a most voluminous writer, also published, in collaboration with G. W. Cox, 'Poems, Legendary and Historical' in 1850, and was the author of numerous historical and architectural essays (of which four series were published in 1871–92), lectures, and sketches of travel. In his historical works Freeman relied wholly on printed chronicles and knew nothing of manuscripts. Many of his conclusions have in consequence been upset.

FREEMAN, MARY E. WILKINS (1852–

FRENCH REVOLUTION

1930), American author, born at Randolph, Massachusetts, distinguished for her realistic stories of New England life. Her best-known books are: 'A Humble Romance and Other Stories' (1887), and 'A New England Nun and Other Stories' (1891).

FREEMAN, RICHARD AUSTIN, see Thorndyke.

Freemason, originally a member of a certain class of skilled workers in stone who travelled from place to place, finding employment wherever important buildings were being erected, and had a system of secret signs and passwords by which they could be recognized. The term first occurs in the 14th cent. Early in the 17th cent. the societies of freemasons began to admit honorary members, known as ACCEPTED MASONS, who were admitted to a knowledge of the secret signs and instructed in the legendary history of the craft. In 1717, under the guidance of the physicist, J. T. Desaguliers, four of these societies or 'lodges' in London united to form a 'grand lodge', whose object was mutual help and the promotion of brotherly feeling among its members. The London 'grand lodge' became the parent of other lodges in Great Britain and abroad, and there are now powerful bodies of freemasons, more or less recognizing each other, in most countries of the world. [OED.]

MASON'S MARKS, usually called 'Banker Marks'—the marks cut upon the various dressed stones of a masonry building to identify the stone-cutter who prepared the stone, so-called from the 'Banker' or stone bench at which the stone-cutter works. Nearly universal in the Middle Ages. In the 17th cent., when others besides working masons were admitted to the lodges of the masonic guilds, they too received identifying banker marks, which were preserved in the register of the lodge. The custom is now obsolete.

Freischütz, DER, in German folk-lore, a man who has made a compact with the Devil by which he gains possession of a number of bullets which unerringly hit whatever they are aimed at. But the Devil retains control of one of them. The legend is the subject of Weber's opera of this name (1821).

French, INSPECTOR, the detective in Freeman Wills Croft's detective stories, a member of the C.I.D.

French Revolution, THE, is generally regarded as beginning with the meeting of the States General in May 1789. The Bastille was stormed on 14 July 1789, and the royal family was removed from Versailles to Paris in October of the same year. The king's attempted flight from Paris took place in June 1791. The Legislative Assembly sat from October 1791 to September 1792, when, under the menace of the allied advance, it was replaced by the National Convention, and the Republic was proclaimed. The king was brought to trial in December 1792, and executed 21 Jan. 1793. The institution of the

FRENCH REVOLUTION

Committee of Public Safety and of the Revolutionary Tribunal immediately followed. The Reign of Terror developed during the summer of 1793 and lasted until the fall of Robespierre, 27 July (9 Thermidor) 1794. The Convention in October 1795 gave place to the Directory, which in turn gave place to the Consulate in 1799. Napoleon became emperor in May 1804.

French Revolution, Reflections on the, by Edmund Burke, see Revolution in France.

French Revolution, The, A History, by T. Carlyle, published in 1837.

The work was written in London. The manuscript of the first volume, while in the keeping of John Stuart Mill, was accidentally destroyed, but the author courageously set to work to re-write it. The history, beginning with the death of Louis XV in 1774, deals with the reign of Louis XVI, the period which included the assembly of the States General, the fall of the Bastille, the Constituent and Legislative Assemblies, the flight of the king to Varennes, the Convention, the trial and execution of the king and queen, the reign of terror, the fall of Robespierre, and extends to 5 Oct. 1795, when Buonaparte quelled the insurrection of Vendémiaire. The work, said to be a very partial view of the Revolution, may be regarded as the poetic unrolling of a great historical drama, illustrating the nemesis that comes upon the oppression of the poor. It offers in addition a gallery of magnificent portraits (Mirabeau, Lafayette, Danton, Robespierre), and stamps upon the memory such episodes as the march to Versailles, the fall of the Bastille, and the flight to Varennes.

FRENEAU, PHILIP (1752–1832), American poet and pamphleteer, born in New York City. He was a founder, with Madison, of the American Whig Society, and editor of 'The Freeman's Journal'. His 'Poems' first appeared in 1786.

FRERE, JOHN HOOKHAM (1769–1846), educated at Eton and Caius College, Cambridge, was a friend of Canning and British envoy at Lisbon (1800–2), at Madrid (1802–4), and with the Junta (1808–9). While at Eton, Frere wrote a translation of 'Brunanburh' (q.v.). He was one of the founders of 'The Microcosm' periodical (1786–7), and contributed to 'The Anti-Jacobin' (q.v.) most of the 'Loves of the Triangles' and parts of 'The Friend of Humanity and the Knife-grinder' and 'The Rovers'. He collaborated in Ellis's 'Specimens of the Early English Poets' (1801) and in Southey's 'Chronicle of the Cid' (1808), and was one of the founders of the 'Quarterly Review' (q.v.). He published metrical versions of Aristophanes' 'Frogs' (1830) and 'Acharnians', 'Knights', and 'Birds' (1840); also 'Theognis Restitutus' (1842). His mock-romantic Arthurian poem, written under the pseudonym 'Whistlecraft', of which four cantos appeared in 1817–18, provided a model for Byron's 'Don Juan' and 'Beppo' (qq.v.).

FRIAR RUSH

Freud, SIGMUND (1856–1939), born at Freiberg in Moravia, of a Jewish family, is known as the inventor of psycho-analysis. He studied under the great neurologist Charcot in Paris, and undertook with Dr. Breuer the investigation of hysteria from a psychological standpoint. The study of neurotic ailments led him to various conclusions relating to the normal mind, which are the basis of psycho-analysis, such as the existence of an unconscious element in the mind which influences consciousness, and of conflicts in it between various sets of forces (including repression); also the importance of a child's semi-consciousness of sex as a factor in mental development.

Frey or FREYR, in Scandinavian mythology, one of the Vanir (q.v.), the son of Njörd, and the god of fertility and dispenser of rain and sunshine. He is the husband of Gerda (q.v.), the frozen earth, and king of the Elves.

Freya or FREYJA, in Scandinavian mythology, one of the Vanir (q.v.), the most beautiful of the goddesses, the northern Venus, the goddess of love and of the night. She is the sister of Frey and wife of Odhr, from whom, however, she is separated. She is sometimes indistinguishable from Frigga (q.v.), the wife of Odin.

Friar Bungay, see Bungay (T.).

Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay, The honorable history of, a comedy in verse and prose by Greene (q.v.), acted in 1594. The play is based on a prose pamphlet 'The famous history of Friar Bacon', embodying legends relating to Roger Bacon and Thomas Bungay (qq.v.). Bacon with the help of Friar Bungay makes a head of brass, and conjuring up the Devil, learns how to give it speech. It is to speak within a month, but 'if they heard it not before it had done speaking, all their labour should be lost'. After watching day and night for three weeks, Bacon hands over the duty of watching to his servant Miles and falls asleep. The head speaks two words 'Time is'. Miles, thinking his master would be angry if waked for so little, lets him sleep. The head presently speaks again, 'Time was'; and finally 'Time is past', when it falls down and breaks. Bacon awakes, and heaps curses on Miles's head. The above is diversified with the pleasant story of the loves of Edward Prince of Wales (afterwards Edward I) and Lord Lacy for the fair Margaret, the keeper's daughter of Freshingfield, and the prince's surrender of her to Lacy. There is also an amusing scene where Bacon, Bungay, and a German rival display their respective powers before the German emperor and the kings of England and Castile.

Friar Rush, the Bruder Rausch of German folk-lore, a devil disguised as a friar who takes service in a monastery to lead the monks astray. An English translation of the legend was published in 1568 and frequently reprinted. The story is given in W. C. Hazlitt's 'Tales and Legends'. Scott, perhaps misled by Milton's 'L'Allegro' ('by Friar's lantern led'), confuses Friar Rush with the Will-o'-the-Wisp:

Better we had . . . Been lanthorn-led by Friday, MAN, see Robinson Crusoe.

Friends, SOCIETY OF, a religious society founded in 1648-50 by George Fox (q.v.), distinguished by peaceful principles and plainness of dress and manners. See Quakers.

Frigga, in Scandinavian mythology, the wife of Odin (q.v.), the goddess of married love and of the hearth. Our 'Friday' is named from her. See also Freya.

Friscobaldo, ORLANDO, see Orlando Frisco-baldo.

Frith, MARY, see Moll Cutpurse.

Frithiof, the hero of an Icelandic saga assigned to the 14th cent.

Frobisher, SIR MARTIN (1535?-94), navigator, made his first expedition in search of the North-West Passage in 1576, and further expeditions in 1577 and 1578. He commanded the 'Triumph' against the Spanish Armada, and was vice-admiral in Sir John Hawkins' expedition to the Portuguese coast in 1590. He died of a wound received in an expedition sent for the relief of Brest.

FROISSART, JEAN (1337?-c. 1410), a French chronicler, of Hainault, who spent most of his life at the courts of princes. He visited England after the peace of Bretigny (1360) and was received at the court of Edward III and Queen Philippa his countrywoman. His travels, in which he untiringly sought information about historical events, extended to Scotland, Italy, and Belgium. His 'Chroniques' cover the period 1325-1400; they deal with the affairs of Flanders, France, Spain, Portugal, and England. Three editions of them were issued at different periods of his life. They are the work of a literary artist rather than a trustworthy historian (he was dependent on oral testimony), but give a faithful picture of the broad features of his period, and are instinct with the spirit of chivalry. They were admirably translated into English by John Bouchier, Lord Berners (q.v.), 1523-5.

Fronde, THE, the name given to the rebellion which took place (1648-52) in France against

FROUDE

Mazarin and the Court during the minority of Louis XIV. The word fronde means a sling.

FROST, ROBERT (1875-), American poet; born in San Francisco; moved at an early age to New England. From 1912 to 1915 he lived in England, where his first book was published. Returning to the States he devoted himself to poetry and teaching. His works include: 'A Boy's Will' (1913), 'North of Boston' (1914), 'Mountain Interval' (1916), 'New Hampshire' (1923), 'West-Running Brook' (1928).

Froth, LORD and LADY, characters in Congreve's 'The Double Dealer' (q.v.).

FROUDE, JAMES ANTHONY (1818-94), was educated at Westminster and Oriel College, Oxford, where, like his brother, R. H. Froude (q.v.), he took part in the Tractarian Movement and came under the influence of Newman; but on the latter's secession he reacted towards scepticism. He became a friend of C. Kingsley, and made the acquaintance of Carlyle in 1849, subsequently becoming his chief disciple. In 1856-70 he published his 'History of England from the Fall of Wolsey to the Defeat of the Spanish Armada', which has been criticized on the score of inaccuracy and prolixity. Froude was editor of 'Fraser's Magazine' from 1860 to 1874, and wrote for various other periodicals, some of his best essays being republished in 'Short Studies on Great Subjects' (1867-83), dealing with matters of theology, travel, history, and including some good fables. In 1872-4 he published 'The English in Ireland in the Eighteenth Century', which met with severe criticism, from Lecky among others. In 1874-5 he visited South Africa on a mission from the government to ascertain the obstacles to federation among the South African states. From 1881 to 1884 he was engaged, as Carlyle's literary executor, in issuing biographical remains of Carlyle and his wife, the frankness with which he discharged this task provoking much indignation. Froude visited Australia in 1884-5, and published 'Oceana, or England and her Colonies' in 1886; he visited the West Indies in 1886-7, and published 'The English in the West Indies' in 1888. He was appointed Regius professor of modern history at Oxford in 1892. His lectures appeared as 'The Life and Letters of Erasmus' (1894), 'English Seamen in the Sixteenth Century' (1895), and 'The Council of Trent' (1896).

FROUDE, RICHARD HURRELL (1803-36), brother of J. A. Froude (q.v.), was educated at Ottery, Eton, and Oriel College, Oxford, of which he became a fellow. He was intimate with Newman, with whom he wrote the poems contained in 'Lyra Apostolica' (1836), and greatly influenced the Tractarians, contributing three of the 'Tracts for the Times' (see under Oxford Movement). His 'Remains' (1838-9), including strictures on the Reformation, contributed to rouse public hostility against the Tractarian movement.

Frugal, SIR JOHN and LEEKE, characters in Massinger's 'The City Madam' (q.v.).

Fry, MRS. ELIZABETH (1780-1845), née GURNEY, a quaker reformer and successful preacher, celebrated for her efforts to improve the state of the prisons, the condition of convicts on their voyage to Australia, and the lot of vagrants in London and Brighton.

Fudge Family in Paris, The, satirical verses by T. Moore (q.v.), published in 1818.

These light verses take the form of letters written by or to various members of the Fudge family when visiting Paris in 1817, shortly after the restoration of the Bourbon dynasty. They include mock letters from and to Castle-reagh. In them the author endeavoured to collect the 'concentrated essence of the various forms of cockneyism and nonsense of those groups of ridiculous English who were at that time swarming in all directions throughout Paris'.

Fugger, the name of a German family of merchants and bankers famous in the 16th cent. for their wealth, which they acquired by trade and by lending money to the emperors and other sovereigns. Johann Fugger, the founder of the family, was a master weaver in Augsburg in the 14th cent. The Fuggers played an important part in the election of Charles V to be emperor.

Fugger News-letters, a collection of news-letters, consisting of about 36,000 pages of manuscript, collected at random and copied by professional clerks; they were sent mostly to Count Philip Edward Fugger (1546-1618), son of Count George Fugger and Ursula von Leichtenstein, and a member of the family referred to in the previous entry. The letters cover the period 1568-1605; most of them are in German, but Italian is well represented; French is rarely met with, and Spanish hardly at all. Latin reports, in the worst church- and dog-Latin, are more frequent. Two series of the Letters have been published in English: the first series (1924) being translated from a Vienna edition by P. de Chary, the second (1926), never before published, translated by L. S. R. Byrne.

Fulgens and Lucrece, a 15th-cent. secular play by Henry Medwall (fl. 1486); important in dramatic history as the earliest known English secular play. It was edited by F. S. Boas and A. W. Reed in 1926.

FULLER, MARGARET (1810-50), American author, born at Cambridge, Mass., whose name is associated with the New England Transcendentalists, and with the movement for 'women's rights', in which she was a pioneer. Moving to Boston in 1835 as a teacher of languages, she became interested in the Brook Farm experiment, and numbered among her intimates Emerson, Hawthorne, and W. H. Channing. With Emerson and George Ripley she founded in 1840 the Transcendental organ of opinion, 'The Dial', which she edited for two years. Later she moved to New York to write for Horace Greeley's 'Tribune', published a volume of critical essays, travelled in Europe, and settled in Italy, where she married the Marquis Ossoli in 1847. Sailing from Leghorn for America in 1850, she and her husband perished when their ship was wrecked just short of its destination.

FUNERAL

FULLER, THOMAS (1608-61), was born at Aldwinkle St. Peter's in Northamptonshire (Dryden was born at Aldwinkle All Saints, the other division of the village), and was educated at Queens' and Sidney Sussex Colleges, Cambridge. He became a prebendary of Salisbury in 1631, and rector of Broadwindsor, Dorset, in 1634. Shortly before the war he was made preacher at the Savoy, and followed the war as chaplain to Sir Ralph Hopton. He was a moderate Royalist and an Anglican, but after his return to London, on the surrender of Exeter, was allowed to preach on sufferance. After the Restoration he resumed his canonry and lectureship at the Savoy and became 'chaplain in extraordinary' to the king. He published his 'History of the Holy Warre', viz. the crusades, in 1640; 'The Holy State and the Profane State' (q.v.), 1642; 'A Pisgahsight of Palestine', 1650; his 'Church History of Britain', and 'History of Cambridge University', 1655. 'The Worthies of England' (q.v.), his best-known and most characteristic work, appeared after his death, in 1662. His 'Good Thoughts in Bad Times' (q.v., 1645), followed by two sequels, contain much 'sound, shrewd good sense, and freedom of intellect' (Coleridge). His writings, which were highly approved by Southey, Coleridge, and Lamb, are marked by humour and a quaint wit, sometimes a little incongruous with the subject.

Fum or FUNG, a fabulous bird, one of the symbols of the imperial dignity in China. Moore wrote a poem on 'Fum and Hum, the Two Birds of Royalty', and Byron in 'Don Juan', xi. 77, refers to George IV as 'Fum the fourth.'

Funeral, The, or Grief à-la-Mode, a comedy by R. Steele (q.v.), produced in 1701.

Lord Brumpton has disinherited his son, Lord Hardy, owing to the misrepresentations of his wife, the young man's stepmother; he has left her all his property, as well as two wards, the ladies Sharlot and Harriot. When the play opens Lord Brumpton has, as is generally believed, just died. He has in fact, however, recovered from a 'lethargical slumber', a fact known only to himself and to Trusty, his steward. At Trusty's instance, he remains in concealment, and thus discovers his supposed widow's unseemly rejoicing at her release, her machinations against her stepson, and her unscrupulous design to dispose profitably of Sharlot and Harriot. The widow is exposed, Lord Hardy reinstated, and the ladies bestowed on their true lovers, Lord Hardy and his friend. The devices by which these results are effected are somewhat clumsy; but the play is notable as marking a change of moral tone in the drama after the licentiousness of the Restoration period.

Funeral Oration, The, of Pericles, at the celebration of the Athenians who had fallen in the first year of the Peloponnesian War (431 B.C.). In it Pericles reviews the Athenian character and policy. It is given in Thucydides, ii. 35 et seq.

Fungoso, a character in Jonson's 'Every Man out of his Humour' (q.v.).

Furies, or EUMENIDES, or ERINYES, THE, in Greek mythology, the avenging deities, Allecto, Megaera, and Tisiphone, who executed the curses pronounced upon criminals, tortured the guilty with the stings of conscience, or inflicted famines and pestilences. 'Eumenides', 'the kindly ones', is a euphemism used with a propitiatory purpose.

FURNIVALL, FREDERICK JAMES (1825-1910), educated at University College, London, and Trinity Hall, Cambridge, was a member of the Philological Society from 1847 and became in 1861 editor of its suggested English Dictionary, which developed into the 'Oxford English Dictionary' (q.v.). He was founder of the Early English Text Society, the Chaucer Society, the Ballad and New Shakespere Societies, and the Shelley, Wiclif, and Browning Societies. He edited Chaucer's works and the 'Percy Ballads'. He was an enthusiastic oarsman, and helped to found the Working Men's College in London (1854).

Furred Law-cats, THE (chats fourrés), in Rabelais, V. xi et seq., the magistrates, so called from their furred gowns, the embodiment of the administration of the criminal law in France, the object of the author's most ferocious satire.

Fusbos, a character in Rhodes's burlesque 'Bombastes Furioso' (q.v.).

Fust or FAUST, JOHANN (d. 1466), a German pioneer of printing. He advanced money to Gutenberg (q.v.), for the purpose of his experiments in printing, and subsequently took over his press, which he carried on with Peter Schöffer. He printed a Psalter in 1457. R. Browning wrote a dialogue, 'Fust and his Friends' (in 'Parleyings with certain People').

Futhorc, the Runic alphabet, so named from its first six letters (th = þ; cf. 'ye' a survival of 'þe').

Futurism, a 20th-cent. movement in Italian art, a development of Cubism (q.v.), designed to represent nature not in a static but a dynamic state, to give in other words a cinematographic effect. It is sought to produce this in the case, e.g. of an arm in motion, by painting a number of arms in successive positions. Séverin's 'Bal Tabarin' (1912) is regarded as a good illustration of the method. The Italian publicist Marinetti has done much to advertise and explain Futurism. The movement was so named as being a glorification of youth and the future as against the academic past.

G

G.O.M., the initial letters of 'Grand Old Man', a current journalistic appellation for W. E. Gladstone from 1882, said to have been first applied to him by Lord Rosebery.

Gabble-ratchet, see Gabriel.

Gabelle, a word of Teutonic origin (cf. OE. gafol), meaning a tax. The term was originally applied in France to taxes on all commodities, but was gradually limited to the tax on salt. The tax was first imposed in 1286 and gradually became one of the most hated and grossly unequal of taxes in the country; it was not abolished until 1790.

Gaberlunzie, a wandering mendicant; in Scotland a public almsman or licensed beggar. There is a spirited ballad of 'The Gaberlunzie Man' in Percy's 'Reliques', which is attributed to King James V. It relates the adventure of a Gaberlunzie and a country lass.

GABORIAU, ÉMILE (1835-73), French novelist, a pioneer in the romance of crime and its detection, and the creator of Monsieur

Lecoq and Père Tabaret. His best-known works are: 'L'Affaire Lerouge' (1866), 'Le Dossier No. 113' (1867), 'Le Crime d'Orival' (1868), 'Monsieur Lecoq' (1869), and 'Les Esclaves de Paris' (1869).

Gabriel, the name of one of the archangels (Dan. ix. 21 and Luke i. 19, 26). Also in the Mohammedan religion one of the four principal angels. Milton makes him 'Chief of the angelic guards' ('Paradise Lost', iv. 550).

GABRIEL-HOUNDS, GABRIEL-RACHET, GABBLE-RACHET, a name applied to wild geese, whose cry is heard as they fly high through the air; hence, perhaps, the technical sporting term, 'a gaggle of geese' (for a flock).

Gabriel Lajeunesse, a character in Longfellow's 'Evangeline' (q.v.).

Gadarene Swine, THE MIRACLE OF THE, related in Mark v, was the subject of a celebrated controversy between Huxley and Gladstone (qq.v.), in the 'Nineteenth Century' (1890-91), echoed in Gladstone's 'Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture' and Huxley's 'Science and Christian Tradition'.

GADSHILL

Gadshill, near Rochester, the scene of Falstaff's famous exploit ('1 Henry IV', II. ii), and also the name of one of Falstaff's companions. Gadshill was the home of Dickens in his later years.

Gael, from old Irish Gaidel, Goidel, a Scottish Highlander or Celt. The word in more recent times has also been applied to the Irish branch of the Celtic race.

Gahagan, MAJOR, see Major Gahagan.

Gaheris, SIR, in Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur', son of King Lot and Morgause, sister of Arthur. He was brother of Gawain, Agravain, and Gareth; and was by mishap slain by Sir Launcelot.

Gai saber, a provençal term, the gay science, the poetry of the troubadours.

Gainsborough, THOMAS (1727-88), a great portrait and landscape painter, was the youngest son of a Sudbury (Suffolk) wool manufacturer. Among his best-known works are 'The Harvest Waggon' and 'The Blue Boy'. He painted portraits of Garrick, Quin, Foote, Chatterton, Richardson, Sterne, Mrs. Siddons, and the duchess of Devonshire.

GAIRDNER, JAMES (1828-1912), an official in the Public Record Office, was associated with J. S. Brewer in the preparation of the voluminous 'Calendar of Letters and Papers of the Reign of King Henry VIII' for the Rolls Series, and completed the work after Brewer's death. He published the standard edition of the Paston Letters (q.v.) in 1904, and lives of Richard III and Henry VII (1878 and 1889). He contributed the volume on the period 1509-59 to Stephens's and Hunt's 'History of the English Church' (1902), and in 1908 began to publish his longest work, 'Lollardy and the Reformation in England', of which vol. iv was issued after his death.

GAIUS (c. A.D. 110-180), a celebrated Roman jurist, who flourished in the reigns of Antoninus Pius and Marcus Aurelius and was author of works on Roman Law, including four books of 'Institutiones'.

Galafron, in the 'Orlando Innamorato' and 'Orlando Furioso' (qq.v.), the king of Cathay and father of Angelica.

Galahad, SIR, in Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur', is (by enchantment) the son of Launcelot and Elaine, daughter of King Pelles. He is predestined by his immaculate purity to achieve the quest of the Holy Grail (see Grail).

Galahalt or GALAHAULT, SIR, described in Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur' as the 'haut prince' of Surluse and the Long Isles, is, in the story of the early loves of Launcelot and Guinevere, as told in a 13th-cent. French romance, the knight who introduces Launcelot to the queen. He is the Galeotto of Dante's reference to this story ('Inferno', v. 137).

Galaor, brother of Amadis of Gaul (q.v.), a gay knight, light of love.

Galapas, in Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur',

GALL

v. viii, a Roman giant slain by King Arthur. 'He shorted him and smote off both his legs by the knees, saying, Now art thou of a better size to deal with than thou were, and after smote off his head.'

Galaphron, see Galafron.

Galatea, a sea-nymph, loved by the Cyclops Polyphemus (q.v.), whom she treated with disdain, while Acis, a Sicilian shepherd, enjoyed her affection. The jealous Cyclops crushed his rival with a rock while in the arms of Galatea; and she, since she could not restore him to life, changed him into a river at the foot of Mt. Etna. Also the name given to the statue wrought by Pygmalion (q.v.) and brought to life.

Galathea, a play by Lyly (q.v.).

GALEN or GALENUS, CLAUDIUS (c. A.D. 129-199), a celebrated physician, born at Pergamum in Asia Minor, and a friend of Marcus Aurelius. He is said to have written no fewer than 500 treatises. Of these a great part were burnt in the temple of Peace at Rome where they were deposited, but over a hundred survive. He wrote in Greek. Linsacre (q.v.) translated six of his works, and there are references to him in Chaucer.

Galeotti, MARTIUS, in Scott's 'Quentin Durward' (q.v.), the astrologer of Louis XI.

Galeotto, see Galahalt.

Galerie des Glaces, see Versailles.

Galignani, GIOVANNI ANTONIO (d. 1821), founded in Paris in 1814 'Galignani's messenger', which had a wide circulation among English residents on the Continent. The paper was carried on by his sons, John Anthony (1796-1873) and William (1798-1882), who were born in London. As publishers in Paris they issued reprints of English books.

GALILEO GALILEI (1564-1642), Italian astronomer and physicist, was born at Pisa of a Florentine family. He made important discoveries (the isochronism of the pendulum, Jupiter's satellites, the libration of the moon) and experiments, proving, e.g., that unequal weights drop with equal velocity, by making the experiment from the leaning tower of Pisa. His observations brought him into conflict with the Inquisition, and in 1633 he was compelled to repudiate the Copernican theory ('eppur si muove', he is said to have muttered after his recantation, 'and yet it [the earth] moves'), and was sent to prison. His principal works were a dialogue 'Delle nuove Scienze' and another 'Ai Due Massimi Sistemi'.

Gall, FRANZ JOSEPH (1758-1828), a German physician, the founder, with his disciple Kaspar Spurzheim, of phrenology, the theory that the various faculties of an individual have each their organ and location in a definite region of the surface of the brain, the size and development of which is commensurate with the degree of development of the faculty itself.

GALLAGHER

GALLAGHER, WILLIAM DAVIS (1808-94), American author, born in Philadelphia. His works include: 'Erato' (1835), 'Poems' (1846), 'Miami Woods, A Golden Wedding, and Other Poems' (1881).

Gallimambic, the metre of the 'Attis' of Catullus, imitated by Tennyson in his 'Boadicea' and by G. Meredith in his 'Phaethon'. It is so called because it was the metre used by the Galli or priests of Cybele in their songs.

Galligantus, a giant slain by Jack the Giant-killer (q.v.).

Gallio, in Acts xviii, the proconsul of Achaia (and brother of Seneca), who, when Paul was brought before him by the Jews, dismissed the case as 'a question of words and names, and of your law'. Then the Greeks took Sosthenes, the chief ruler of the synagogue, and beat him before the judgement-seat, 'and Gallio cared for none of these things'; hence 'a careless Gallio', a term of reproach in the Puritan literature of the 17th cent.

GALSWORTHY, JOHN (1867-1933), of a Devonshire family, was educated at Harrow and New College, Oxford. His purpose as a novelist was to throw light on the dark places, the evils and abuses, of life, for the guidance of others; and to do so impartially, showing the good at the same time as the bad (see 'A Novelist's Allegory' in 'The Inn of Tranquillity' (1912), and the discussion of this in A. C. Ward, 'Twentieth-century Literature').

Galsworthy's most important work was the series of novels, including 'The Man of Property' (1906), 'In Chancery' (1920), and 'To Let' (1921), collectively entitled 'The Forsyte Saga', of which the main theme is the possessive instinct, embodied to an exaggerated degree in Soames Forsyte, a man with a passion for acquiring all things desirable, and for exercising his proprietary rights to the utmost, even over his reluctant wife. The record of the Forsyte family extends over the later Victorian period, and is resumed in 'A Modern Comedy' (1929), containing 'The White Monkey' (1924), 'The Silver Spoon' (1926), and 'Swan Song' (1928). In these the author depicts a society whose foundations have been shattered by the Great War, left without faith or principles, whose only purpose is 'to have a good time because we don't believe anything can last', but in which the Victorianism of a glum Soames Forsyte here and there survives. The 'Forsyte Saga' includes two 'Interludes': 'Indian Summer of a Forsyte' (1918) and 'Awakening' (1920); and there are two in 'A Modern Comedy': 'A Silent Wooing' (1927) and 'Passers By' (1927). In 1930 appeared a collection of 'apocryphal Forsyte tales' under the title 'On Forsyte Change'. Among Galsworthy's other best-known novels are 'The Island Pharisees' (1904), 'The Country House' (1907), 'Fraternity' (1909), 'The Patrician' (1911).

Of Galsworthy's plays the most notable are: 'The Silver Box', 1909; 'Strife' (an industrial dispute in which reconciliation is occasioned by the death of the wife of the men's leader), 1909; 'Justice' (a criticism of the existing prison system), 1910; 'The Skin Game' (a conflict between a parvenu manufacturer and an old-established aristocrat), 1920; and 'Loyalties', 1922.

GALT, JOHN (1779-1839), born at Irvine in Ayrshire, was employed for some time in the custom-house at Greenock. While travelling on the Continent he made the acquaintance of Byron (of whom he published a life in 1830), and subsequently of Carlyle, by whom he was favourably noticed. In 1824 he visited Canada as secretary of a land company, which obtained no immediate profit, and Galt was presently superseded. Galt did a great amount of miscellaneous writing. His poems, dramas, historical novels, and travels call for no special notice. But he also wrote three admirable studies of country life in Scotland, by which he deserves to be remembered: 'The Ayrshire Legatees' (q.v., 1821), 'Annals of the Parish' (q.v., 1821), and 'The Entail' (q.v., 1823). 'The Provost' (1822) is an amusing picture of life and character in a Scottish municipality.

Galvani, LUIGI (1737-98), of Bologna, the discoverer of electricity produced by chemical action. It is said that his wife first observed the convulsive movement in the muscles of frogs when brought into contact with two different metals. Hence 'galvanic', 'galvanism'.

Galway Blazers, a celebrated Irish pack of foxhounds.

Gama, KING, in Tennyson's 'The Princess' (q.v.), the father of Princess Ida.

Gama, VASCO DA (c. 1469-1524), a great Portuguese navigator, who was the first to double the Cape of Good Hope (1497) and sailed to India, the hero of the 'Lusiads' of Camoens (q.v.). He died at Cochín on Christmas Day 1524.

Gamaliel, a Pharisee, 'a doctor of the law, had in reputation among all the people', who dissuaded the Jews from slaying the Apostles. The apostle Paul was 'brought up at his feet' (Acts v. 34 and xxii. 3). He was president of the Sanhedrim.

Game and Play of the Chesse, a translation by Caxton (q.v.) from Vignay's French version of the 'Liber de ludo scacchorum' of Jacobus de Cessolis, and probably the second book printed at Caxton's press, about 1475.

Game of Chesse, A, a comedy by T. Middleton (q.v.), produced in 1624 and chiefly interesting in its political connexion.

It deals allegorically with the rivalry of England and Spain (the White House and the Black House), and the project of the 'Spanish Marriage' (1623). It places on the stage the sovereigns of the two countries, Charles, Prince of Wales, Buckingham, and the Spanish Ambassador Gondomar, and represents the discomfiture of the Black House. The play, reflecting the popular aversion to the Spanish Match, was enthusiastically received, but gave great offence to the Spanish Ambassador and to King James. Proceedings were taken against the actors and author, and the performance of the play was prohibited.

Gamelyn, The Tale of, a verse romance of about 1350, containing some 900 lines. Gamelyn is the youngest of three sons of Sir John de Boundys, who leaves his property to them in equal shares. The eldest brother maltreats Gamelyn and robs him of his property. Gamelyn asserts his rights by force, defeats the champion wrestler, and kills the porter of the castle. He allows himself to be bound to a post, breaks away, and with the help of Adam the 'spencer', belabours the clergy who are at a feast given by his brother and have refused to help him. The sheriff comes to arrest him. Gamelyn and Adam take to the forest and Gamelyn becomes lieutenant and subsequently chief of a band of outlaws. His eldest brother becomes sheriff. Gamelyn comes to the moot hall and is cast in prison. Ote, the second brother, goes bail for him till next gaol delivery. Gamelyn returns to the forest but promises to present himself for trial. At the trial Ote appears in fetters. The hero arrives, releases him, throws the justice over the bar and takes his place. Justice, sheriff, and jurors are hanged. Gamelyn and Ote make their peace with the king, Ote becomes a justice, and Gamelyn Chief Justice of the Free Forest.

The piece is interesting because apparently Chaucer intended to make it his 'Cook's Tale of Gamelyn' in the 'Canterbury Tales' (q.v.); also as providing materials for Shakespeare's 'As You Like It', and as connected with the Robin Hood story.

Gamester, The, a comedy by James Shirley (q.v.), acted in 1633, printed in 1637.

The main plot, somewhat coarse in tone and incident, is that of a story in Margaret of Navarre's 'Heptameron'. Wilding is in love with Penelope, his ward and the relative of his wife, whom he does not scruple to inform of this illicit affection. By the contrivance of Mrs. Wilding, Penelope makes an assignation with Wilding. When the time comes, Wilding, deeply engaged in a gambling bout, sends his friend Hazard in his place, secure that the deception will not be discovered in the darkness. He learns from his wife next day that she has taken Penelope's place. To escape humiliation he persuades Hazard to marry Penelope, only to discover that he has been doubly cheated and that the meeting between Hazard and the lady never took place. There is a romantic underplot concerned with the loves of Violante and Leonore, while young Barnacle, who aspires to be a 'roarer' (see Roaring Boys), provides some amusing scenes. The play was adapted by Garrick in his 'Gamesters'.

The Gamester is also the title of a play by

GANYMÉDES

Mrs. Centlivre (q.v.), and of a tragedy by Edward Moore (q.v.).

Gammer Gurton's Needle, the second English comedy in verse (the first being 'Ralph Roister Doister', q.v.), was published in 1575, having previously been acted, in 1566, at Christ's College, Cambridge. Its authorship is attributed to J. Still (q.v.) on inconclusive evidence. It is written in rhymed long doggerel, and deals farcically with the losing and finding of the needle used to mend the garments of Hodge, Gammer Gurton's man. The other characters, besides Hodge and the Gammer, are Tib and Cock, their maid and boy; Diccon the Bedlam; Dame Chat and Doll, her maid; Master Baily and his servant, Spendthrift; Doctor Rat the curate; and Gib the cat. The mischievous Diccon persuades the Gammer that Dame Chat has taken the needle; a quarrel ensues and Doctor Rat is called in, but gets his head broken. Finally Hodge becomes acutely aware that the needle is in the seat of his breeches. The play includes the famous old drinking-song with the refrain:

Back and side go bare, go bare,
Both foot and hand go cold;
But Belly, God send thee good ale enough,
Whether it be new or old!

Gamp, SARAH, a character in Dickens's 'Martin Chuzzlewit' (q.v.). Her large cotton umbrella has given rise to the expression 'a gamp', for an umbrella, especially an untidy one; also for a midwife.

Gandalin, in Amadis of Gaul (q.v.), the son of a knight of Scotland and squire of Amadis. Don Quixote (t. xx) reminds Sancho that Gandalin 'always spoke to his master cap in hand, his head inclined and his body bent, in the 'Turkish fashion'.

Gandercleugh, the imaginary place of residence of Jedediah Cleishbotham (q.v.) in Scott's 'Tales of my Landlord'.

Gandershelm, NUN or, see Hrotsvitha.

Gandish's, in Thackeray's 'The Newcomes' (q.v.), Professor Gandish's 'Academy of Drawing', where young Clive studies art.

Ganelon or GANO, in the Charlemagne romances and the 'Morgante Maggiore' of Pulci: count of Mayence, the villain and traitor who schemes for the defeat of the rearguard at Roncesvalles. He figures in Dante's 'Inferno' (xxxii. 122) and Chaucer's 'Nun's Priest's Tale'.

Ganesh or GANESHA, in Hindu mythology, the god of wisdom and prudence, who is invoked when any important undertaking or written composition is begun. He is the son of Siva, and is represented with the head of an elephant.

Ganlesse, in Scott's 'Peveril of the Peak' (q.v.), a name taken by Edward Christian.

Ganymedēs or GANYMEDF, a beautiful youth of Phrygia. As he was tending his father's flocks on Mt. Ida he was carried up into heaven by an eagle at the command of Zeus, and became cup-bearer to the gods in place of Hebe. 'Catamite' is a corrupt form of his name.

Garamantes, a people mentioned by Herodotus (iv. 183), whose capital was Garama in Phazania (probably Fezzan in N. Africa), whence was the shortest road to the Loto-phagi (Lotus-eaters). In the country of the Garamantes were found the oxen which as they graze walk backwards, because their horns curve outward in front of their heads.

Garamanta in the 'Orlando Innamorato' (q.v.) is a country in Africa whose wizard king prophesies to Agramant the destruction of the Saracen host.

Garamond, CLAUDE (d. 1561), born in Paris, a famous type-founder, who first substituted roman for gothic characters in printing, and cut admirable roman type. He also cut the type of which R. Estienne (q.v.) made use for his Greek editions.

Garcias, PEDRO: in the preface to the 'Gil Blas' (q.v.) of Le Sage there is a story of two students who, on their way to Salamanca, observe a tombstone on which is inscribed: 'Here is enclosed the soul of Pedro Garcias'. One of the students laughs at the absurdity and goes away. The other lifts the stone and finds a leather purse with a hundred ducats and the direction, 'Be my heir, thou who hast been clever enough to interpret the inscription, and make better use than I did of my money.' The reader of the adventures of Gil Blas is like one or other of the students, as he perceives or not their moral instruction.

GARCILASSO DE LA VEGA (1503-36), Spanish poet and friend of Boscan (q.v.); the names of the two poets are coupled in Byron's 'Don Juan' (i. 95). With Boscan he brought about the renaissance of poetry in Spain, writing in his short and active life (he was a soldier in the armies of Charles V and received his death in battle) sonnets, eclogues, and odes, which won the praise of Cervantes ('Don Quixote', II. lviii).

Garden, The, a poem by Marvell (q.v.).

Garden of Cyrus, a treatise on the merits of the quincunx (∴), by Sir Thomas Browne (q.v.), published (with 'Urn Burial', q.v.) in 1658.

This is a lighter work than its companion piece, treating quaintly of the Gardens of Antiquity and in particular of those of Cyrus as described by Xenophon, and of the garden of Paradise (with the Tree of Knowledge in the centre). From this the author passes to the use of the quincunx in a multitude of other connexions, such as architecture and military tactics, returning to plantations and certain mysterious properties of the number five.

Garden State, New Jersey, see United States.

GARETH AND LYNETTE

Gardiner, COLONEL JAMES, a character in Scott's 'Waverley' (q.v.). For the original of the character see under Doddridge (Philip). He was also commemorated in a song by Sir Gilbert Elliot (1722-77).

GARDINER, SAMUEL RAWSON (1829-1902), educated at Christ Church, Oxford, of which he became student in 1850. He settled in London to study the history of the Puritan revolution, supporting himself meanwhile by teaching. In 1872 he became lecturer and subsequently professor of modern history at King's College, London. Gardiner was offered the Regius professorship of history in succession to Froude, but declined it. He was elected a fellow of All Souls in 1884, and of Merton in 1892. As Ford lecturer in 1896 he lectured on 'Cromwell's place in history'. The first instalment of his great 'History' of the first Stuarts and Cromwell appeared in 1863 as the 'History of England from the Accession of James I to the Disgrace of Chief Justice Coke'. Successive instalments followed, and in 1883-4 appeared a second edition of all these, entitled a 'History of England from the Accession of James I to the Outbreak of the Civil War, 1603-42'. The 'History of the Great Civil War' (1886-91) and the 'History of the Commonwealth and Protectorate' (1894-1901) carried the record down to the year 1656 (an additional chapter was published posthumously). Gardiner published many other historical works, including 'The Thirty Years War' (1874) and a 'Student's History of England' (1890-1). His historical writing shows minute accuracy and impartiality, but is, perhaps necessarily, lacking in picturesque quality. He was very proud of his descent from Bridget, daughter of Oliver Cromwell and wife of Henry Ireton.

Gareth, SIR, in Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur', nicknamed 'Beaumains' by Sir Kay the steward. For his story see under Gareth and Lynette below.

✓ Gareth and Lynette, one of Tennyson's 'Idylls of the King' (q.v.), published in 1872.

This idyll shows Arthur's court in its early days of innocence and promise. Gareth, son of Lot, king of Orkney, and Bellicent his wife, obtains his mother's reluctant permission to go to the court on the condition that he will hire himself for a year there as a scullion. He presents himself in disguise and serves as a kitchen knave under Kay the Seneschal, until released from his vow by his mother. Lynette comes to the court to ask that Lancelot may release her sister Lyonors, besieged in her castle by four knights. The kitchen knave claims the adventure and to Lynette's disgust is granted it by the king. On the way she bitterly reviles him, but is gradually won over as he conquers the first three knights. Before his encounter with the fourth, named Death, she even trembles for his safety, and would have Lancelot take his place. But Gareth clings to his task, which, it turns out, has already been accomplished, for the fourth knight proves a mere boy masquerading in hideous armour.

And he that told the tale in older times
Says that Sir Gareth wedded Lyonors,
But he, that told it later, says Lynette.

Gargamelle, in Rabelais's 'Gargantua' (q.v.), the wife of Grandgousier and mother of Gargantua.

Gargantua, originally the name of a beneficent giant of French folk-lore, connected with the Arthurian cycle. It is probably to this folk-lore giant that Shakespeare refers in 'As You Like It', III. ii. 239. In the prologue to his 'Pantagruel' Rabelais refers to a chap-book (the 'Grandes Cronicques') embodying the legends about him, which he had himself perhaps written or edited. This probably suggested to him his own story of 'La Vie très horricque du Grand Gargantua', published in 1534, as a preliminary volume to 'Pantagruel' (q.v.), which had appeared in 1532. In this, Gargantua is presented as a prince of gigantic stature and appetite, the son of Grandgousier and Gargamelle. His education is described first under the scholastic system, and when this proves a failure, under a reformed system advocated by Rabelais. Then follows the war between Grandgousier and Picrochole, an episode suggested by a local quarrel in Touraine over certain water-rights, in which Rabelais's father was involved. Finally comes the description of the Abbey of Theleme (q.v.), granted to Friar John by Grandgousier to reward him for his prowess in the above war.

So far as the book had a serious purpose, it was to illustrate the trivial causes that might give rise to devastating wars, and the author's views on the reform of education and of the monastic system. Gargantua himself is represented as a mighty eater and drinker, as befits a giant, but also as a studious, athletic, good-humoured, and peace-loving prince.

Gargery, Joe, a character in Dickens's 'Great Expectations' (q.v.).

Garibaldi, GIUSEPPE (1807-82), the celebrated Italian patriot and hero of the Risorgimento (q.v.). Having been exiled from Italy for political reasons he spent the years 1836-48 in S. America, in the service of the republics of Rio Grande do Sul and Uruguay. During 1850-4 he was in the United States, and returned in the latter year to Italy. He commanded a volunteer force on the Sardinian side in the campaign of 1859 against Austria. He organized expeditions by which he made himself master of Sicily, expelled Francis II from Naples, and finally marched (unsuccessfully) against Rome (1860-2). His independent course of action was frequently embarrassing to Cavour, but he was devoted to Victor Emmanuel, whose orders he unquestioningly obeyed. He was enthusiastically received in England in 1864. Garibaldi's campaigns have been narrated by G. M. Trevelyan (q.v.).

GARRICK

Garland, Mr. and Mrs., characters in Dickens's 'The Old Curiosity Shop' (q.v.).

GARLAND, HAMLIN (1860-1940), American author, best known for his realistic studies of the Middle West. His chief works are: 'Rose of Dutcher's Coolly' (1895), 'Main-Travelled Roads' (1891), 'Prairie Folks' (1893), 'A Son of the Middle Border' (1917), and 'A Daughter of the Middle Border' (1921).

Garm, (1) in Scandinavian mythology, the dog that guards the entrance to Helheim; (2) a bull-terrier, the subject of a story by Kipling (q.v., 'Actions and Reactions').

GARNETT, RICHARD (1835-1906), keeper of printed books in the British Museum, published in 1862 'Relics of Shelley', and in 1888 'The Twilight of the Gods' (pleasant apoloques in Lucian's vein). He also wrote brief biographies of Milton and Carlyle (1877), Emerson (1888), Edward Gibbon Wakefield (1898), Coleridge (1904), and a 'History of Italian Literature' (1897), as well as several volumes of original and translated verse.

Garratt, a village in Surrey near Wandsworth, of which the villagers in the latter part of the 18th cent. made a practice of electing a 'mayor' when a general election took place, in reality a chairman of a local body for the defence of their rights. Samuel Foote wrote a farce, 'The Mayor of Garret', produced in 1764, in which Jerry Sneak, a miserable henpecked creature, is elected mayor.

Garraway's, a celebrated coffee-house in Change Alley, Cornhill, founded by one Thomas Garway, a tea, coffee, and tobacco merchant, in the 17th cent. It was a meeting-place of dealers in stocks and shares, notably in the days of the South Sea Bubble, and contained an auction-room (referred to in the 'Tatler', No. 147).

GARRICK, DAVID (1717-79), was S. Johnson's pupil at Edial, and accompanied him when he left Lichfield for London. His mythological burlesque 'Lethe' was performed at Drury Lane in 1740. He first appeared as an actor at Ipswich in 'Oroonoko' in 1741, and in the same year made his reputation in the part of Richard III. He subsequently proved his versatility by many triumphs in both tragic and comic parts. In 1747 he joined Lacy in the management of Drury Lane, where he produced a large number of Shakespeare's dramas. He made his last appearance in 1776 and sold a moiety of his patent to Sheridan and two others for £35,000. He collaborated with Colman in writing 'The Clandestine Marriage' (q.v.), and also wrote a number of lively farces, including 'The Lying Valet' (1741), 'Miss in her Teens' (1747), 'The Irish Widow' (1772), and 'Bon Ton, or High Life above Stairs (1775). He was a member of Johnson's Literary Club, and his portrait was painted by Reynolds, Hogarth, and Gainsborough. He married in 1749 the dancer, Eve Marie Violetti (1724-1822). He was buried in Westminster Abbey. His interesting correspondence with many of the most distinguished men of his day was published in 1831-2. See also Lichtenberg.

Garrick Club, THE, founded in 1831 as a club in which 'actors and men of education and refinement might meet on equal terms'. Its original premises were at 35 King Street, Barham, Count d'Orsay, Samuel Rogers (qq.v.) were among its first members. It was much frequented by Thackeray, and possesses a famous collection of portraits of actors and actresses.

Garter, ORDER OF THE, the highest order of English knighthood. The institution of the order is attributed on the authority of Froissart to Edward III about the year 1344. By the time of Selden it was traditionally asserted that the garter was that of the countess of Salisbury, which fell off while she danced with the king, who picked it up and tied it on his own leg, saying to those present Honi soit qui mal y pense. The Garter as the badge of the order is a ribbon of dark blue velvet, edged and buckled with gold and bearing the above words embroidered in gold, and is worn below the left knee. [OED.]

Garter King of Arms, also known as GARTER, the principal king of arms. The two provincial kings of arms are Clarenceux and Norroy (qq.v.). See Heralds' College.

GARTH, SIR SAMUEL (1661-1710), a physician, and a member of the Kit-Cat Club (q.v.), is remembered as the author of 'The Dispensary' (1690), a burlesque poem in which he ridiculed the opposition of the apothecaries to the supply of medicines to out-patients' dispensaries. Pope described him as 'the best good Christian without knowing it'.

GARVICE, CHARLES (d. 1920), novelist, dramatist, and journalist. His novels include 'Eve' (1873), 'Her Heart's Desire' (1900), 'Just a Girl' (1902), 'Linked by Fate' (1905), 'Love the Tyrant' (1905), and 'The Waster' (1919).

GASCOIGNE, GEORGE (1525?-77), a man of a good Bedfordshire family, educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, entered Gray's Inn and represented Bedfordshire in parliament. His 'Supposes', an adaptation of Ariosto's 'Suppositi', our earliest extant comedy in prose, was acted at Gray's Inn in 1566. Gascoigne saw military service in Holland, 1572-5, and was captured by the Spaniards. An unauthorized book of poems by him was published in his absence, and in 1575 he issued 'The Posies of G. Gascoigne, corrected and completed', containing 'Jocasta' (paraphrased from the 'Phoenissae' of Euripides), the second earliest tragedy in English in blank verse. The book also contained 'Certain Notes of Instruction concerning the making of verse', the earliest English critical essay. He published his 'tragical comedie', the 'Glaspe of Government', a 'prodigal son' play, in 1575. His other works include 'The Steele Glas' (q.v.), a satire, published in 1576, 'The Droomme of Doomesday', and the posthumously published 'Tale of Hemetes'. Gascoigne is notable as a pioneer in various branches of literature.

Gascoigne, SIR WILLIAM (1350?-1419), appointed chief justice of the king's bench in 1400, figures in that capacity in Shakespeare's '2 Henry IV'. The story taken by Hall from Sir T. Elyot's 'Governour' of his committing Henry V when Prince of Wales is unfounded.

Gashford, a character in Dickens's 'Barnaby Rudge' (q.v.).

GASKELL, ELIZABETH CLEGHORN (1810-65), daughter of William Stevenson, Unitarian minister and keeper of the Treasury records, was brought up by her aunt at Knutsford in Cheshire, which is the original of Cranford, and of Hollingford (in 'Wives and Daughters'). In 1832 she married William Gaskell, minister at the Cross Street Unitarian chapel in Manchester, with whom her life was one of calm and perfect harmony. In 1848 she published 'Mary Barton' (q.v.), her first novel, based on the industrial troubles of the years 1842-3. This was severely criticized by W. R. Greg and others as hostile to the employers, but was highly popular. It brought her into relations with Dickens, for whose 'Household Words' and 'All the Year Round' she subsequently wrote much. To the former of these (after publishing 'The Moorland Cottage' in 1850) she contributed in 1851-3 the famous series of papers subsequently republished under the title of 'Cranford' (q.v.). In 1853 appeared 'Ruth' (q.v.), also the subject of some controversy (on ethical grounds); followed by 'North and South' (q.v.) in 1855, which reflects the easier industrial conditions that then prevailed. In 1857 Mrs. Gaskell produced her remarkable 'Life of Charlotte Brontë', some of the statements in which gave rise to complaint and were withdrawn. 'My Lady Ludlow' appeared in 'Household Words' in 1858 and was republished in 1859 in the 'Round the Sofa' collection; 'Lois the Witch' (q.v.) in 1859; and 'Sylvia's Lovers' (q.v.) followed in 1863-4. 'Wives and Daughters' (q.v.), like its predecessor, was first printed in the 'Cornhill Magazine', appearing in 1864-6, but Mrs. Gaskell died before the work was quite completed. The Knutsford edition of her collected works was issued in 1906.

Gaspar, one of the three Magi (q.v.) or 'Wise Men of the East'. He is represented as an Ethiopian, king of Tarshish.

GASSENDI, PIERRE (1592-1655), French mathematician, astronomer, and philosopher, a friend of Galileo and Pascal. He was an opponent of the philosophy of Aristotle

GASSENDI

(against whom he wrote 'Paradoxical Exer-citations') and of Descartes, revived that of Epicurus, and attempted to reconcile the theory of atoms with Christianity. He wrote lives of Copernicus and Regiomontanus.

Gaster, THE REV. DR., a character in Peacock's 'Headlong Hall' (q.v.).

Gastrolaters, in Rabelais, iv. lvii, a people visited by Pantagruel, whose god is their belly. They represent greedy monks. They have a ridiculous idol Manduce, whose eyes are bigger than its belly. The author gives a formidable list of the flesh and fowl, and 'on the interlarded fish days' of the caviare, botargoes, and the like, that 'these idle lob-cocks sacrifice to their gorbelled god'.

Gates of Dreams, see Dreams.

GAUDEN, DR. JOHN (1605-62), educated at St. John's College, Oxford, became bishop of Worcester. He claimed to be the author of 'Eikon Basilike' (q.v.).

Gauguin, PAUL, see Post-Impressionism.

Gaunt, JOHN OF, see John of Gaunt.

Gautama, see Buddha.

Gautier, MARGUERITE, heroine of 'La Dame aux Camélias' of Alexandre Dumas fils (q.v.).

GAUTIER, THÉOPHILE (1811-72), French poet and novelist of the Romantic movement, whose best poetry is contained in his 'Émaux et Camées' (1852). As a novelist he is remembered by his 'Mademoiselle de Maupin' (1835), 'Le Capitaine Fracasse' (1863), and his short stories, a kind of writing in which (with Mérimée, q.v.) he was a pioneer.

Gavroche, a character in 'Les Misérables' of Victor Hugo (q.v.), whose name has been adopted as typifying the Parisian street-arab.

Gawain (WALWAIN), is associated as a hero with King Arthur in the earliest of the Arthurian legends. He is the perfect knight, courageous, pure, and courteous. In the later developments of the story, however, his character shows deterioration. Gawain is the son of the king's sister Morgause (wife of King Lot of Orkney) and brother of Agravain, Gaheris, and Gareth. In Geoffrey of Monmouth's narrative he is Arthur's ambassador to Rome and bears himself bravely in the ensuing combat. In Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur' he becomes the bitter enemy of Launcelot because the latter has killed his three brothers. He is killed when Arthur lands at Dover to recover his kingdom from Mordred. It is noteworthy that Gawain's strength increased daily until noon and then declined (Malory, viii. xviii), the characteristic of a solar deity. For his relation to Gwalchmei, the sun-god of Welsh mythology, see Rhys, 'Arthurian Legend'. The north portal of Modena Cathedral has a sculpture said to be early 12th cent., on which are mounted figures of Artus de Bretani, Galvagus (i.e. Gawain), and others, so inscribed (R. S. Loomis, 'Celtic Myth and Arthurian Romance'). The principal single adventure of Gawain is perhaps that described in 'Gawain and the Green Knight' (q.v.). See also Ywain and Gawain.

GAY

Gawain and the Green Knight, Sir, an alliterative poem of 2,500 lines of the 14th cent.

On New Year's Day Arthur and his knights sit feasting at Camelot. A giant knight, Bertilak de Hautdesert, comes in clad in green. Gawain accepts his challenge to give him a stroke with the axe and take one in return. Gawain beheads the knight at one blow, but the trunk picks up the head and rides off, appointing Gawain to meet him a year hence at the Green Chapel in North Wales. On the next Christmas Eve, in a dreary forest, Gawain sees a great castle where he is welcomed by the lord and lady. Gawain and the lord agree to exchange what they get by hunting or otherwise. The lady tempts Gawain on three successive nights, but he accepts only kisses and a girdle that makes him invulnerable. Gawain gives the lord the kisses but not the girdle. On New Year's Day Gawain goes to the Green Chapel and meets the Green Knight. He is wounded, and the knight reveals that he is lord of the castle and that he and his wife had agreed to tempt Gawain. As the latter has emerged successfully from the trial, save in the matter of the girdle, he has saved his life but suffered a wound. Gawain tells his story to the court at Camelot and all the knights and ladies agree to wear like girdles of green. The poem may be connected with the creation of the order of the garter (q.v.). The same story, in a later version, is used to account for the foundation of the order of the bath.

Gawry, see Peter Wilkins.

GAY, JOHN (1685-1732), born at Barnstaple, was apprenticed for a time to a London mercer. In 1708 he published an indifferent poem 'Wine', denying the possibility of successful authorship to water-drinkers. He was secretary to the duchess of Monmouth during 1712-14. In 1713 he issued 'Rural Sports' on the model of Pope's 'Windsor', and contributed to Steele's 'Guardian'. His 'Shepherd's Week' (q.v.), the first work that showed his real ability, appeared in 1714. His first play, 'What d'ye Call it', a satirical farce, was produced in 1715, and his 'Trivia' (q.v.) was published in 1716. With Pope and Arbuthnot he wrote 'Three Hours after Marriage', a comedy, which was acted in 1717. He speculated disastrously in South Sea funds with the proceeds of the publication of his poems, and his hopes of advancement under the new king were disappointed. He became an inmate of the household of the duke and duchess of Queensberry, and in 1727 brought out the first series of his 'Fables', which were very popular. His 'Beggars' Opera' (q.v.) met with remarkable success in 1728, and was followed by the publication of its sequel 'Polly' (q.v.). The production of the latter on the stage was forbidden. These two plays contain many of Gay's pleasant ballads, but 'Sweet William's Farewell to Black-eyed Susan' was published separately, and 'Twas when the seas were roaring' is from his first play. Some of his 'Eclogues' and the 'Epistles', including 'Mr. Pope's Welcome from Greece' on the completion of Pope's 'Iliad', deserve notice. He wrote the libretto of Handel's 'Acis and Galatea' in 1732, and 'Achilles', an opera produced at Covent Garden in 1733. The second series of his 'Fables' appeared in 1738 after his death. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, and on his monument is inscribed the epitaph written by himself:

Life is a jest, and all things show it;
I thought so once, and now I know it.

Gay, WALTER, a character in Dickens's 'Dombey and Son' (q.v.).

Gayferos, DON, in Spanish romance, a kinsman of Roland (q.v.) and husband of Melisenda, Charlemagne's daughter. The latter is carried off by the Moors and rescued by Gayferos. The legend is referred to in 'Don Quixote', II. xxvi, where it is the subject of a puppet play.

Gaylord, MARCIA, the heroine of W. D. Howells's 'A Modern Instance' (q.v.), and the best of the author's female characters.

Gazette, from the Italian gazzetta, apparently so called from the coin of that name, which may have been the sum paid either for the paper itself or for the privilege of reading it. [OED.] The gazzetta was a news-sheet first published in Venice about the middle of the 16th cent., and similar news-sheets (see Coranto) appeared in England in the 17th cent., giving news from foreign parts.

The OXFORD GAZETTE was the first real newspaper, other than a newsletter, to be published in England. It appeared in November 1665, the court being then at Oxford owing to the great plague, and was started by Henry Muddiman (q.v.) under the direction of Sir Joseph Williamson (q.v.), as a supplement to Muddiman's newsletters. It later became the 'London Gazette', which still survives. The 'London Gazette' is not now a newspaper, but a record of official appointments, notices of bankruptcies, &c., and in war time it is the official register of casualties.

Gazetteer, a geographical index or dictionary. A work of this kind by L. Echard (ed. 2, 1693) bore the title 'The Gazetteer's or Newsman's Interpreter; Being a Geographical Index', intended for the use of 'gazetteers' or journalists.

Gē or GABA, in Greek mythology, the personification of the Earth, a divine being, the wife of Uranus (q.v.), and mother of the Titans (q.v.).

GEBER, an Arabian, thought to have been born at Seville at the end of the 8th cent. Certain Latin works on alchemy are regarded as translations from his Arabic text. Whether they are so, or who their Latin author was, and what were his relations with the Arabian Geber, is uncertain. Burton, in the Preface to the 'Anatomy of Melancholy', speaks of him as 'that first inventor of Algebra', which implies an erroneous derivation of the latter word.

Gebir, an epic poem by W. S. Landor (q.v.), published in 1798.

Gebir, an Iberian prince, invades Egypt, but his conquest is arrested by his love for its young queen Charoba. By the treachery of her nurse, Dalica, he is slain amid the marriage feast, and the city that he is founding is destroyed by magic. Tamar, his shepherd brother, whose only ambition is to win the love of a sea-nymph, is carried away by her beyond the world of mortals.

Parts of the poem were first written in Latin, and the author subsequently published a Latin version, 'Gebirus'. The English poem contains the often-quoted passage on a shell:

Apply

Its polish'd lips to your attentive ear;
And it remembers its august abode,
And murmurs as the ocean murmurs there.

Geddes, JENNY, supposed name of the woman who threw a stool at Bishop Lindsay in St. Giles's, Edinburgh, when the new service was introduced, temp. Charles I.

Gehazi, the covetous servant of Elisha, who was punished with leprosy for deceitfully obtaining, in his master's name, a present from Naaman (2 Kings v. 20-7).

Gehenna, originally a place-name, ge ben hinnom, the valley of the son of Hinnom, near Jerusalem, which was at one time the scene of the idolatrous worship of a god named in the Hebrew text Molek. This worship was abolished in the religious reforms of Josiah, and the valley desecrated (2 Kings xxiii. 10). Thereafter it was used as a place for casting refuse, and the dead bodies of animals and criminals. Fires were kept burning there to prevent infection. Hence the name was used figuratively for hell.

Gelert, see Bethgelert.

Gellatley, DAVIS, in Scott's 'Waverley' (q.v.), the 'innocent' dependant of the Baron Bradwardine, in whose mouth the author places some of his finest lyrics.

GELLIUS, AULUS, a Latin grammarian of the 2nd cent. A.D., author of twenty books of 'Noctes Atticae', so named because they were written in a house near Athens on winter nights. They form a miscellany, important as containing extracts from many lost authors, on many topics, literature, history, philosophy, philology, and natural science.

Gem, The, a literary annual, edited by T. Hood (q.v.), 1829-32.

Gem State, Idaho, see United States.

Gemara, the later of the two portions of the Talmud (q.v.), consisting of a commentary on the older part (the Mishna).

GEMINI

Gemini ('the twins'), a constellation, otherwise known as 'Castor (q.v.) and Pollux'; also the third sign of the zodiac with which this constellation was anciently identical.

General, Mrs., in Dickens's 'Little Dorrit' (q.v.), the lady companion to Mr. Dorrit's daughters, the inventor of the formula 'prunes and prism' (q.v.).

Genesis, meaning origin, creation, is the first in order of the books of the Bible, containing the account of the creation of the world. The name was given to it by the Greek translators. For the OE. poem 'Genesis' see under Cædmon and Heliland.

Genesis and Exodus, poems in rhymed couplets, written about the middle of the 13th cent., relating scriptural history down to the death of Moses in popular form, based not on the Bible, but mainly on the 'Historia Scholastica' of Petrus Comestor; and important as the first instance in English of the iambic dimeter frequently used by later poets, e.g. by Coleridge in 'Christabel'.

GENEST, JOHN (1764-1839), educated at Westminster and Trinity College, Cambridge, author of 'Some Account of the English Stage from the Restoration in 1660 to 1830' (1832), an exceptionally trustworthy book of reference.

Geneva, in Switzerland, used allusively for the League of Nations, of which it was the headquarters.

Geneva or GIN, a spirit distilled from grain and flavoured with the juice of juniper (French genièvre) berries, whence the name. When made in Holland, it is known as Hollands or Hollands Geneva.

Geneva Bible, see Bible (The English).

Geneva gown, a black gown such as was worn by the Calvinist clergy when preaching.

Genevieve, the heroine of S. T. Coleridge's poem 'Love', first published in the 'Morning Post' (1799) and included in the second edition of 'Lyrical Ballads' (q.v.).

Geneviève, St. (c. 419-512), the patron saint of Paris, was born at Nanterre and went to Paris, where she lived an austere life. At the time of Attila's invasion (451) she encouraged the panic-stricken inhabitants and urged them to repentance; and Attila turned away from Paris towards Orléans.

Genghis Khan (1162-1227), the great Mongol conqueror, whose empire at his death extended from the shores of the Pacific to the northern shores of the Black Sea.

Genius, in classical pagan belief, the tutelary god or attendant spirit allotted to every person at his birth, to govern his fortunes and determine his character; also the tutelary spirit similarly connected with a place (whence the expression genius loci), an institution, &c. A person's good, or evil, genius are the two mutually opposed spirits by whom every person was supposed to be attended throughout life. [OED.]

Genii, the plural, is also used as a rendering of the Arabic jinn (q.v.). A genie or jinnee is one of the jinn.

Genre, a style of painting in which scenes and subjects of ordinary life are depicted.

GENTILIS, ALBERICUS (1552-1608), an Italian, the most learned lawyer of his time, and D.C.L. of Perugia, was obliged to leave Italy on account of heretical opinions. He was appointed Regius professor of civil law at Oxford in 1587 and practised as a barrister in England. He was the author of 'De Legationibus' (1584), a treatise on diplomatic privilege, and 'De Jure Belli' (1588-98). Gentilis was one of the founders of the system of international law, and Grotius (q.v.) owed much to him.

Gentle Art of Making Enemies, The, a collection, published in 1890, of the pungent letters and comments of J. McN. Whistler (q.v.) on criticisms of his works. The first subject dealt with is Whistler's libel action against Ruskin in respect of a passage in 'Fors Clavigera'.

Gentle Shepherd, The, see under Ramsay (A.).

Gentleman Dancing-Master, The, a comedy by Wycherley (q.v.), produced in 1673.

This is the most entertaining of Wycherley's plays. Hippolita, daughter of Mr. Formal, is about to be married to her cousin, who has just returned from France, affects the French dress and language, and calls himself Monsieur de Paris. She despises him, but has been kept closely pent up by her aunt, Mrs. Caution, and knows no other man. By a trick she induces her cousin to send Gerrard, a young gentleman, to pay her a secret visit, and they fall in love with one another. Her father, just returned from Spain, who affects the Spanish dress and punctilio, and calls himself Don Diego, surprises them together, whereupon Hippolita passes off Gerrard as her dancing-master. There follow a number of diverting scenes in which Gerrard is constantly on the point of being betrayed by his incompetence as a dancing-master, but is saved by the squabble between Mrs. Caution, who sees through the trick, and Don Diego, who cannot conceive that any one should fool him. Finally, in the turmoil caused by Gerrard's ultimate exposure, the lovers avail themselves of the services of the parson who has arrived to marry Hippolita to her cousin.

Gentleman Usher, The, a tragi-comedy, by Chapman (q.v.), printed in 1606, and probably acted about 1602.

The Duke Alphonso and his son Vincentio are both in love with Margaret, daughter of Earl Lasso. The daughter loves Vincentio, who is ordered into exile. Margaret in despair disfigures herself with a poisonous unguent.

GENTLEMAN USHER

The duke, remorseful, surrenders Margaret, who on account of her disfigurement refuses to marry Vincentio. But the doctor provides a remedy and solves the difficulty. The name of the play is taken from the usher, Bassiolo, a conceited major-domo, somewhat after the kind of Malvolio, who acts as go-between for the lovers and is fooled and made ridiculous.

Gentleman's Journal, a periodical edited by Motteux (q.v.) from 1691 to 1694, containing the news of the month and miscellaneous prose and poetry. It was the germ of the modern magazine.

Gentleman's Magazine, The, a periodical founded in 1731 by Cave (q.v.), under the pseudonym Sylvanus Urban. Its original intention was to reproduce monthly from the journals such news, essays, or other matter as appeared most interesting. Hence the use for the first time of the word 'magazine' in this sense. By January 1739 original matter had largely replaced such extracts; the magazine assumed a more serious character, and included parliamentary reports, maps, music, and a record of publications. The change in the character of the paper was in accordance with suggestions made to the editor by Samuel Johnson (q.v.), who at this time became a regular contributor (until 1744), with considerable influence on its management. He at first edited, and subsequently wrote, the parliamentary reports. The 'Gentleman's Magazine' lasted until 1914.

GEOFFREY CRAYON, see Crayon.

GEOFFREY OF MONMOUTH, Gaufridus Monemutensis (1100?-1154), probably a Benedictine monk of Monmouth, studied at Oxford, and was attached to Robert, earl of Gloucester. He is said to have been archdeacon of Llandaff, and he was appointed bishop of St. Asaph in 1152.

In his 'Historia Regum Britanniae' he purports to give an account of 'the kings who dwelt in Britain before the incarnation of Christ' and especially of 'Arthur and the many others who succeeded him after the incarnation'. For this purpose he states that he drew upon a 'most ancient book in the British tongue' handed to him by Walter, archdeacon of Oxford, also known as Walter Calenius (q.v.); but this book is unknown to any chronicler of the time. There is reason to suppose that this alleged work was in the main a mystification; his contemporary, William of Newburgh (q.v.), condemns it as such in strong terms. Geoffrey's veracity was also challenged by Ranulf Higden ('Polychronicon'). Geoffrey drew on Bede and Nennius, on British traditions, perhaps on Welsh documents now lost, and probably for the rest on a romantic imagination. He is the creator of King Arthur as a romantic hero. His 'Historia' was translated into Anglo-Norman by Gaimar and Wace, and into English by Layamon and Robert of Gloucester; it was first printed in 1508 (Paris). There is a good modern translation (1903) by Sebastian Evans. Geoffrey's 'Prophetia Anglicana Merlini Ambrosii Britanni' was first printed in 1603. See also Edmond Faral, 'La Légende arthurienne; des origines à Geoffroy de Monmouth...', 3 vols., published in 1929 by Champion.

George I, king of England, 1714-27.

George II, king of England, 1727-60.

George III, king of England, 1760-1820.

George IV, king of England, 1820-30.

George V, king of England, 1910-36.

George VI, king of England from 11 Dec. 1936.

George, GUILD OF ST., see Ruskin.

GEORGE, HENRY (1839-97), American writer on political economy and sociology, author of 'Progress and Poverty' (1879), 'The Land Question' (1883), 'Social Problems' (1884), 'Protection or Free Trade' (1886). George was an advocate of the nationalization of land and of the 'single tax' on its increment value.

George, St., patron saint of England, Portugal, and formerly of Aragon and the republic of Genoa, is said to have been a native of Cappadocia, who, according to Metaphrastes, the Byzantine hagiologist, rose to high military rank under Diocletian. He was arrested on account of his Christian religion, tortured, and executed at Nicomedia in A.D. 303, his remains being subsequently transferred to Lydda. The legend is open to criticism, but it is probable that there was an officer of his name in the Roman army who suffered martyrdom under Diocletian. Gibbon adopted, it appears wrongly, the view that St. George was identical with a certain Arian bishop of Alexandria, a man of discreditable antecedents as a purveyor of provisions to the army ('Decline and Fall', xxiii). St. George's connexion with the dragon is of much later date and its origin is obscure. The saint is perhaps the inheritor of some local myth, such as that of Perseus (q.v.) who slew at Joppa (near Lydda) the monster that threatened Andromeda. Sir Wallis Budge ('George of Lydda') regards the dragon as merely symbolical of the powers of evil. St. George has been recognized as the patron saint of England from the days of Edward III, perhaps because of having been regarded as the patron of the order of the garter. He is commemorated on 23 April.

George and Vulture, THE, a hostelry in George Yard, Lombard Street. It was the temporary abode of Mr. Pickwick and Sam Weller when the action of Bardell and Pickwick was impending ('Pickwick Papers', ch. xxvi, xxxi, &c.). It is said to have been previously a coffee-house, frequented by Swift, Addison, and Steele, and at a later period by Hogarth and Wilkes.

GEORGE BARNWELL

George Barnwell, The History of, or The London Merchant, a domestic tragedy in prose by Lillo (q.v.), produced in 1731.

In this play, for the first time, everyday commercial life is made the theme of a tragedy. The play was a great success, was translated into French, German, and Dutch, and was highly commended by Diderot (q.v.) and by Lessing (q.v.), who modelled on it his 'Miss Sara Sampson'. The story was parodied in the 'George Barnwell Travestie' of the 'Rejected Addresses' (q.v.), and caricatured by Thackeray in 'George de Barnwell'. It is based on an old ballad of 'George Barnwell', and deals with the seduction of an apprentice by the heartless courtesan Millwood. He becomes so infatuated that he not only robs his employer, Thorowgood, but is even induced by Millwood to murder his uncle, for which crime he and Millwood are brought to execution.

George Plays, St., see Mummers' Play.

George-a'-Green, the merry pinner or pinder (pound-keeper) of Wakefield. The story is given in W. C. Hazlitt's 'Tales and Legends'. George-a'-Green wins the pinder-ship by defeating all competitors at quarter-staff, defies the messenger who comes from Prince John (during Richard I's absence) demanding a contribution from Wakefield, and elopes with Justice Grymes's daughter. Maid Marian provokes Robin Hood to challenge him, but George-a'-Green defeats both Robin and his companions.

He is the subject of a play (licensed for publication, 1595; the earliest known edition appears to be that of 1599, in the Bodleian) probably by Robert Greene (q.v.).

George's, St., HANOVER SQUARE, one of the fifty new churches built after the Fire of London, completed in 1724, frequently referred to as the scene of fashionable weddings, where the duke of Wellington gave away many brides.

Georgian Poetry, an anthology of contemporary verse initiated in 1912 by a group consisting of Rupert Brooke, John Drinkwater, Harold Monro, Wilfrid Wilson Gibson, Arundel del Ré, and Edward Marsh, of which five volumes appeared between 1912 and 1922, containing poems by Rupert Brooke, William H. Davies, W. de la Mare, John Drinkwater, D. H. Lawrence, John Masefield, Robert Graves, James Elroy Flecker, and others.

Georgics, The, a didactic poem by Virgil (q.v.) in four books, on agriculture, the care of domestic animals, and the keeping of bees.

Geraint and Enid, one of Tennyson's 'Idylls of the King', originally forming with 'The Marriage of Geraint' a single idyll, 'Enid'. The story is taken from Lady Charlotte Guest's 'Mabinogion' (q.v.) and had been previously treated in Chrétien de Troyes's 'Erec'. It was published in 1859.

In this idyll the baneful influence of the sin of Guinevere is first indicated. Geraint, one of Arthur's knights and a tributary prince of Devon, the husband of Enid, daughter of earl Yniol, fearing the contaminating influence of Guinevere upon his wife, withdraws from the court to his own lands. A word spoken by Enid ('Oh, me! I fear that I am no true wife') and misunderstood by him, confirms this fear and provokes him to senseless suspicion of her fidelity. He now rides out into bandit-haunted lands, making her ride before and forbidding her to speak to him. Her devotion to him in successive encounters, in meeting the dishonourable proposal of Earl Limours, and in the hall of Earl Doorm when he lies wounded, gradually convinces him of her innocence and wins back his love.

Geraldine, THE FAIR, see Surrey.

Gerard, the hero of Reade's 'The Cloister and the Hearth' (q.v.).

GERARD, JOHN (1545-1612), a herbalist and superintendent of Burghley's gardens, was author of the celebrated 'Herball or generall Historie of Plantes' (1597), in a large measure adapted from the 'Pemptades' of Rembert Dodoens. A revised edition of the 'Herball' was issued by Thomas Johnson in 1633. The work gives a description of each plant, the localities in which it is found, and its medical virtues (correcting superstitions, e.g. about the mandrake); discusses nomenclature; and contains a large number of beautiful woodcuts, many of which had appeared in an earlier work.

Gerbert of Aquitaine, Pope Sylvester II (999-1003), the greatest figure in the 10th-11th cents., reckoned a magician for his knowledge, inventor, mathematician, scholar. He was archbishop successively of Rheims and Ravenna before his election to the papal see.

Gerd or GERDA, in Scandinavian mythology, the frozen Earth, whom Frey (q.v.) marries.

Germ, The, Thoughts towards Nature in Poetry, Literature, and Art, a periodical of which the first number appeared on 1 Jan. 1850. It was the organ of the 'Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood' (q.v.). The title was changed in the third number to 'Art and Poetry, being Thoughts towards Nature'. Only four numbers in all appeared.

Gernutus, the Jew of Venice, an old ballad included in Percy's 'Reliques', embodying a story (somewhat resembling that in Shakespeare's 'Merchant of Venice') in which a Jew wagers a pound of his flesh that certain property which he has insured has not been lost.

Géronte, in Molière's comedies, the typical old man whose absurdities are held up to ridicule. In 'Les Fourberies de Scapin' he is a miser, outwitted by Scapin. In 'Le Médecin malgré lui', he is a credulous fool, imposed upon by Sganarelle.

Gerontius, Dream of, see Newman.

GERRYMANDER

Gerrymander, so to arrange election districts that a particular political party shall obtain a representation out of proportion to its numerical strength. The word is derived from Elbridge Gerry, governor of Massachusetts, who in 1812 so arranged the boundaries of the constituencies in that state that the map of Essex county presented the appearance, someone said, of a salamander. 'Gerry-mander', another exclaimed, and the word became a proverb. [OED.]

Gertrude, the queen of Denmark in Shakespeare's 'Hamlet' (q.v.).

Gertrude of Wyoming, a poem by Campbell (q.v.), in the Spenserian stanza, published in 1809.

The poem centres in the desolation in 1778 of the settlement of Wyoming, in Pennsylvania, by a force of Indians under one Brandt, a Mohawk, and the destruction of the felicity of a home by the death of Gertrude, the newly married wife of Henry Waldegrave, and of her father Albert. Campbell subsequently withdrew the charge of cruelty against Brandt.

Gerusalemme Liberata, see Jerusalem Delivered.

Geryon, a monster with three bodies or three heads, who lived in the island of Gades. He owned numerous oxen, guarded by the two-headed dog Orthrus and the giant Eurytion. All three were destroyed by Hercules (q.v.), who carried away the oxen.

In Dante's 'Inferno' (xvii-xviii) he is the symbol of Fraud and guardian of the Eighth Circle of Hell, the place of punishment of traitors. He has the face of a just man, two hairy arms, and a forked tail.

Geryoneo, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', v. x and xi, a giant who represents Philip II of Spain, the Spanish power in the Netherlands, and the Inquisition.

GESNER, JOHANN MATHIAS (1691-1761), a German pioneer of humanistic studies, author of the 'Novus Linguae et Eruditionis Romanae Thesaurus' (1749) and editor of various classics; a precursor of Lessing and Goethe.

Gessler, see Tell.

Gesta Francorum, a chronicle in medieval Latin, the first known to have been written by a layman. It gives the story of the First Crusade. Its actual author is unknown. It has been edited by Hagenmayer (1890), and by Miss B. Lees for the Clarendon Press (1924).

Gesta Romanorum, a collection of tales in Latin, some of Eastern origin, romances of chivalry, and legends of saints, originally compiled on the Continent in the 14th cent. and first printed about 1472. An English translation was printed by Wynkyn de Worde (q.v.). Though Roman emperors are mentioned in some of these, they are not true Ghost of Abel, The, see Blake.

Ghost-words, a term used by Skeat (q.v.) to signify words which have no real existence, 'coinages due to the blunders of printers or scribes, or to the perfervid imaginations of ignorant or blundering editors' ('Trans. Philol. Soc.', 1885-7, ii. 350).

Glafar, see Ja'far.

Glaffir, in Byron's 'The Bride of Abydos' (q.v.), the father of Zuleika.

Giant Pope, in Bunyan's 'Pilgrim's Progress' (q.v.), a giant by whose power and tyranny many men have in old time been cruelly put to death, but who is grown so crazy and stiff in his joints that he can now do little more than sit in his cave's mouth, grinning at the pilgrims as they go by, and biting his nails because he cannot come at them.

Giants or GIGANTES, THE, according to Greek mythology, were children of Gē (q.v.), of great stature and strength, frequently confused with the Titans (q.v.). They are said to have conspired to dethrone Zeus, and heaped Pelion on Ossa in order to scale the walls of heaven. They were defeated and imprisoned in the earth.

Giaour, The, a poem by Lord Byron (q.v.), published in 1813. Eight editions of the work appeared in the last seven months of that year, increasing in length from 685 lines to 1334.

The word 'giaour' (pronounced 'dja-oor') is a term of reproach applied by Turks to non-Moslems, especially Christians. The tale is of a female slave, Leila, who is unfaithful to her Turkish lord, Hassan, and is in consequence bound and thrown into the sea. Her lover, the Giaour, avenges her by killing Hassan. The story is told in fragments, at first by a Turkish fisherman, who witnesses some of the events, and finally in the Giaour's confession to a monk.

Gibble, GOOSE, in Scott's 'Old Mortality' (q.v.), a half-witted lad, of very small stature, who kept Lady Margaret Bellenden's poultry.

GIBBON, EDWARD (1737-94), born at Putney-on-Thames, of a good family, was educated at Westminster and Magdalen College, Oxford, but derived little benefit from either. At the age of sixteen he became a Roman Catholic, and was sent by his father to Lausanne, where he was reconverted to Protestantism and read widely. Here he became attached to Suzanne Curchod (afterwards Madame Necker), but in deference to his father broke off the engagement. He returned to England in 1758 and published his 'Essai sur l'étude de la littérature' in 1761, of which an English version appeared in 1764. From 1759 to 1763 he served in the Hampshire militia, and in 1764, during a tour in Italy, while 'musing amid the ruins of the Capitol', formed the plan of his 'History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire' (q.v.). The death of his father, who had wasted his wealth, left him in some embarrassment, but enough remained from the wreck to enable him to settle in London in 1772 and proceed with his great work.

He entered parliament in 1774, voted steadily for Lord North, and was made a commissioner of trade and plantations; but his parliamentary career added nothing to his reputation, though he regarded it as 'a school of civil prudence'. In 1776 appeared the first volume of his 'History', which was very favourably received; but his chapters on the growth of Christianity provoked criticisms, of which the most weighty were those of Lord Hailes and Porson. To his theological critics Gibbon replied in 'A Vindication of some Passages in the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Chapters'. The second and third volumes appeared in 1781, but were less warmly received. He retired to Lausanne in 1783, where he completed the work, of which the last three volumes were published in 1788. Gibbon returned to England and passed most of his remaining days under the roof of his friend the earl of Sheffield (John Baker Holroyd). He died in London, and was buried in the church of Fletching (Sussex). His 'Memoirs', put together by Lord Sheffield from various fragments by Gibbon, were published in 1796, together with his 'Miscellaneous Works' (1796-1815). An edition of the 'Decline and Fall' with preface and notes by H. H. Milman was published in 1838-9; another, with notes by Milman, Guizot, and William Smith, in 1854; and a standard edition, by J. B. Bury, in 1909-13.

Gibbons, GRINLING (1648-1720), wood-carver and statuary, was discovered by Evelyn (q.v.) in 1671 working at Deptford on his carving of Tintoretto's 'Crucifixion', which was shown to Wren and Pepys. He was employed by Wren to carve stalls in St. Paul's Cathedral and various new London churches, and by the king at Windsor, Whitehall, &c. He executed statues of Charles II at the Royal Exchange and of James II at Whitehall. He was buried in St. Paul's, Covent Garden.

Gibbons, ORLANDO (1583-1625), composer, especially of madrigals.

Gibraltar, from gebel-el-Tarik, the hill of Tarik, a Saracen commander who, after probably landing there, defeated Roderick, king of the Goths, in 711. It was known to the ancients as Calpe, or, with Abyla on the opposite coast, as the Pillars of Hercules. It was captured by the British under Sir George Rooke in 1704, besieged in 1705-6, assigned to England by the Treaty of Utrecht, again besieged in 1726, and gallantly defended against the French and Spaniards by General Eliott (Lord Heathfield), 1779-83.

Gibson, DR., MRS., and MOLLY, characters in Mrs. Gaskell's 'Wives and Daughters' (q.v.).

GIDE, ANDRE (1869-1951), French novelist, author of 'L'Immoraliste' (1903), 'Les Caves du Vatican' (1914), 'Les Faux Monnaieurs' (1926), 'Si le grain ne meurt' (1921, autobiography).

GIFFORD, WILLIAM (1756-1826), the son of a glazier at Ashburton and a shoe-maker's apprentice (see under Apelles and the Cobbler), was sent by the help of William Cookesley, a surgeon, to Exeter College, Oxford. He published in 1794 and 1795 two satires, 'The Baviad' and 'The Maeviad', against the Della Cruscan (q.v.) school of poets and the contemporary drama. He became editor of 'The Anti-Jacobin' (q.v.) in 1797, and in 1809 first editor of the 'Quarterly Review' (q.v.). Gifford's rigorous adherence, as a literary critic, to the old school in literature and his hatred of radicals, coupled with constant ill health, gave bitterness to his judgements of the rising authors. He translated Juvenal (1802) and Persius (1821), and edited some of the older English dramatists. A short autobiography is prefixed to the translation of Juvenal.

Gifford Lectures, on natural theology without reference to creeds, founded in the universities of Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, and St. Andrews by the bequest of £80,000 by Adam, Lord Gifford (1820-87), a Scottish Judge.

Gigadibs, MR., in R. Browning's 'Bishop Blougram's Apology' (q.v.), the bishop's interlocutor.

Gil Blas of Santillane, The Adventures of, a picaresque romance by Le Sage (q.v.), published 1715-35.

Gil Blas, the son of humble parents, at seventeen is sent off on a mule, with a few ducats in his pocket and little in the way of scruples or morality, to the University of Salamanca. He never reaches it, but falls in with robbers, by whom he is detained. This is the beginning of a long series of adventures, in the course of which he takes service with Dr. Sangrado (a quack physician) and becomes a physician himself, with the archbishop of Granada (who after inviting Gil Blas's criticism of his sermons, resents it when given), and with a variety of other persons. He finally becomes the secretary and confidant of Olivares, the prime minister of Spain, and attains prosperity, having acquired worldly wisdom, and even some tincture of benevolence and morality, from his experiences. The work gives an admirable and consolatory picture of life with its vicissitudes and recoveries. Pitt, we are told, regarded it as the best of all novels. It was translated into English (or the translation was revised) by Smollett (q.v.) in 1749.

'Gil Blas' is also the title of a comedy by E. Moore (q.v.).

Gil Morrice, the subject of an old Scottish ballad, included in Percy's 'Reliques'. He is the natural son of an earl and Lady Barnard. A message he sends to his mother leads Lord Barnard to think that he is his wife's lover, and to fall on him and slay him. The ballad is the same as that of 'Child Maurice' in the 'Oxford Book of Ballads', where 'Lord Barnard' is 'John Steward'.

GILBERT, SIR HUMPHREY (1539?-83), half-brother of Sir Walter Raleigh, made his first voyage of discovery with the latter in 1578. In 1583 he left Plymouth with five ships for Newfoundland, where he founded the first British colony in North America. On his return journey his ship the 'Squirrel' was lost in a storm off the Azores. Hakluyt (q.v.) gives a striking narrative of his end. Gilbert was the author of a 'Discourse of a Discoverie for a new passage to Cataia', published in 1576, urging the search for the North-West Passage.

GILBERT, WILLIAM (1540-1603), physician to Queen Elizabeth and James I. He declared the earth to be a magnet in his 'De Magnete' (1600), the first great scientific book to be published in England.

GILBERT, SIR WILLIAM SCHWENCK (1836-1911), after service as an officer in the militia and as a clerk in the Education Department, began his literary career in 1861 as a regular contributor to 'Fun'. He excelled as a writer of humorous verse, and his 'Bab Ballads' (q.v.), originally contributed to 'Fun' and published in volume form in 1869-73, were very popular. His first dramatic work was 'Dulcamara' (1866), a successful burlesque. He wrote a blank-verse fairy comedy 'The Palace of Truth' (1870), 'Pygmalion and Galatea' (1871), and various serious dramas in verse. His very successful comedy 'The Happy Land' (1873) was written in collaboration with Gilbert Arthur à Beckett. He collaborated with Sir Arthur Sullivan for D'Oyly Carte's opera company in a long series of comic operas (see Gilbert and Sullivan Operas), with Alfred Cellier in 'The Mountebanks' (1892), and with Edward German in 'Fallen Fairies' (1909). 'The Hooligans', a serious sketch, appeared in 1911.

Gilbert and Sullivan Operas, comic operas, including much social and topical satire, written in collaboration by Sir W. S. Gilbert and Sir A. Sullivan (qq.v.) for Richard D'Oyly Carte (1844-1901). The operas are: 'Trial by Jury' (1875), 'The Sorcerer' (1877), 'H.M.S. Pinafore' (1878),

GILES

'The Pirates of Penzance' (produced in New York, 1879, and in London, 1880), 'Patience' (1881), 'Iolanthe' (1882), 'Princess Ida' (1884), 'The Mikado' (1885), 'Ruddigore' (1887), 'The Yeomen of the Guard' (1888), 'The Gondoliers' (1889), 'Utopia, Limited' (1893), and 'The Grand Duke' (1896). They are known as the 'Savoy Operas' because from 'Iolanthe' onwards they were produced at the Savoy Theatre.

Gilbert Markham, in Anne Brontë's 'Wildfell Hall' (q.v.), the narrator of the story, and one of the principal characters.

Gilbert of Sempringham, St. (1083?-1189), the founder of the Gilbertine order (c. 1135), with head-quarters at Sempringham in Lincolnshire, which included both monks and nuns, numbered thirteen houses, and did good educational work. He was held in great regard by Henry II and Queen Eleanor, lived to be over 100, and was canonized by Innocent III.

Gilbertian, a word derived from the name of Sir W. S. Gilbert (q.v.) to signify the kind of humorous absurdity and topsy-turvydom which distinguishes many of the characters and situations in the librettos of the Gilbert and Sullivan operas.

Gilbertines, see Gilbert of Sempringham.

GILCHRIST, ALEXANDER (1828-61), author of a 'Life of Etty' (1855) and of a 'Life of Blake'. The latter was finished by his widow, Anne Gilchrist (1828-85), and published in 1863. She also published a 'Life of Mary Lamb' (1883) and essays on Walt Whitman's poetry.

GILDAS, a British historian, who lived in the west of England and wrote in Latin shortly before 547 a sketch of the history of Britain, 'De Excidio et Conquestu Britanniae', followed by a castigation of the degraded princes and clergy of his day. In the historical portion he says nothing of Arthur, but refers to the victory of Mount Badon (q.v.).

Gilderoy, a famous Scottish highwayman, whose real name was Patrick Macgregor (of the same clan as Rob Roy), who carried on depredations in Perthshire. He was hanged in 1636 at Edinburgh. He is the subject of one of the ballads in Percy's 'Reliques', and of a ballad by T. Campbell (a lament for Gilderoy by his wife).

Gildippe, in Tasso's 'Jerusalem Delivered' (q.v., ix. 71 and xx. 32), a female warrior in the Christian host.

Giles, BROTHER, of Assisi (d. c. 1261), convert and friend of St. Francis of Assisi (q.v.). An account of his life is given in 'Blessed Giles of Assisi', by W. W. Seton (1918), and (in verse) by James Rhoades (in 'Little Flowers of St. Francis and Brother Giles', 1925).

Giles (Aegidius), St. (fl. 7th cent.), is said to have been of Athenian parentage and to have gone to France, where, from devotion to spiritual things, he established himself in the wilderness near the mouth of the Rhône, in a dense forest, with a hind for sole companion. After a time he received disciples, and built a monastery. He died early in the 8th cent. with a high repute for sanctity, and came to be regarded as the patron of cripples and lepers. His festival is celebrated on 1 Sept.

Giles' Bowl, Sr.: at St. Giles' Hospital in Holborn, the prisoners on the way to execution at Tyburn were presented with a great bowl of ale, 'thereof to drink at their pleasure, as to be their last refreshing in this life' (Stow).

Giles's Fair, Sr., at Oxford, is held on the Monday and Tuesday after the first Sunday after St. Giles's day (1 Sept.) in Saint Giles's Street. It is an institution of great antiquity, at one time a mart for the neighbouring Midlands, now degenerated into a mere pleasure fair. There was a St. Giles's Fair at Winchester, which was originally granted by William the Conqueror to the bishop of Winchester and endured until the 19th cent. During the fair, the jurisdiction of the corporation of Winchester was in abeyance and was replaced by that of officials appointed by the bishop, to whom the keys of the city were surrendered. [E.B.]

Gillfil, THE REV. MAYNARD, see Scenes of Clerical Life.

Gilles de Retz or RAIS (1404-40), a marshal of France, who accompanied Joan of Arc to Orleans and fought by her side. Later in life he engaged in necromancy, kidnapped children and murdered them, was arrested on a charge of heresy and murder, confessed, and was absolved. He had only one wife, Catherine de Thouars, who left him. His name is connected with Blue Beard (q.v.) in the local traditions of Brittany, where he had large estates. Probably the French folk-lore tale concerning the latter has come to be attached to the name of Gilles de Retz as a perpetrator of atrocities.

Gillray, JAMES (1757-1815), caricaturist. He is said to have etched a caricature at 12. He treated at first anonymously social subjects, turning to political themes after 1780. Among the fifteen hundred pieces that he executed were many ridiculing the habits of the royal family. He depicted Pitt, Fox, Sheridan, and Burke; other caricatures dealt with Napoleon, Nelson, and the Revolution. His serious work included two portraits of Pitt and the miniature of himself in the National Portrait Gallery.

Gills, SOLOMON, a character in Dickens's 'Dombey and Son' (q.v.).

Gilpin, JOHN, see John Gilpin.

GILPIN, WILLIAM (1724-1804), educated at Queen's College, Oxford, subsequently a schoolmaster and vicar of Boldre, is remembered for his series of illustrated picturesque tours ('The Wye and South Wales', 1782;

GIRALDUS DE BARRI

'The Lakes', 1789; 'Forest Scenery', 1791; 'The West of England and the Isle of Wight', 1798; 'The Highlands', 1800), which were parodied by William Combe (q.v.) in his 'Dr. Syntax'.

Giltspur Street, London, just outside the ancient Newgate, was, according to Stow, 'called Giltspur or Knightriders Street, of knights and others riding that way to Smithfield' (q.v.).

Gines de Passamonte, in 'Don Quixote' (I. xxii), a noted cheat and robber whom Don Quixote releases as he is being conveyed to the galleys.

Ginevra, (1) a character in the 'Orlando Furioso' (q.v.). Her story is that of Hero in Shakespeare's 'Much Ado about Nothing' (q.v.); (2) of the Orsini family, married to Francesco Doria, who on her wedding-day in playful mood hid herself in a trunk, of which the lid closed with a spring lock. Fifty years later her skeleton was discovered there (Rogers, 'Italy'). Thomas Haynes Bayly treated the same subject in his ballad, 'The Mistletoe Bough'.

Ginn, see Jinn.

Ginnungagap, in Scandinavian mythology, the chasm or void between Niflheim and Muspellheim (qq.v.).

Gloconda, LA, or LA JOCONDE, names given to the famous portrait of Mona Lisa (q.v.) by Leonardo da Vinci.

Giotto's O: Giotto (1266-1336), the shepherd-boy painter, while studying with Cimabue, was summoned to Rome by Boniface VIII. When the Pope's messenger asked for some drawing which might be shown to his Holiness as proof of the artist's skill, Giotto with a single sweep of his brush drew a perfect circle on a panel, and gave this as sufficient testimony.

Giovanna of Naples, see Andrea of Hungary.

Giovanni, DON, Italian for Don Juan (q.v.).

Gipsy, a corruption of 'Egyptian', a member of a wandering race, by themselves called ROMANY, of Hindu origin, which first appeared in England about the beginning of the 16th cent. and was then believed to have come from Egypt. Their language is a greatly corrupted dialect of Hindi, with a large admixture of words from various European languages. [OED.] A GITANO is a Spanish gipsy, a TZIGANE a Hungarian gipsy.

Giralda, the great tower of the cathedral of Seville, so called from the weather-vane (Sp. giralda) in the form of a statue of Faith on its summit. See Carrasco.

GIRALDUS DE BARRI, called CAMBRENSIS (1146?-1220?), born in Pembrokeshire and son of Angharad, a Welsh princess. As a churchman he had a stormy career. He was archdeacon of Brecon, and twice (1176 and 1198) a nominee for the see of St. David's, but was rejected, as a Welshman, first by Henry II, then by Archbishop Hubert. He appealed to Rome, sought the support of the Welsh, was outlawed, fled abroad, and was imprisoned at Châtillon. He was finally reconciled to the king and archbishop, and was buried at St. David's. In 1184 he accompanied Prince John to Ireland. From 1192 to 1198 he led a student's life at Lincoln. His works (edited by J. S. Brewer and J. F. Dimock, 1861-77) include 'Topographia Hibernica', 'Expugnatio Hibernica', 'Itinerarium Cambriae', 'Gemma Ecclesiastica', 'De Rebus a se gestis', and lives of St. Hugh of Lincoln, St. David, and others. The 'Topographia' is an account of the geography, fauna, marvels, and early history of Ireland; the 'Expugnatio', a narrative of the partial conquest of Ireland (1169-85); the 'Itinerarium' (the most important of his works), a description of the topography of Wales; the 'Gemma', a charge to the clergy of his district, affording interesting information as to the conditions then prevailing. See also Glastonbury.

GIRALDUS DE BARRI

GIRAUDOUX, JEAN (1882-1944), French novelist and essayist, author of 'Siegfried et le Limousin', 'Bella', &c.

Girondists, the moderate republican party in the French Legislative Assembly of 1791-2 and the Convention of 1792-5, whose leaders were the deputies from the Gironde district.

Girton College, a college for women, which owes its existence mainly to the energy of Sarah Emily Davies (1830-1921), a pioneer in the cause of the higher education of women. The college was opened at Hitchin in 1869 and transferred to Cambridge in 1873.

Gisborne, MARIA (1770-1836), née James, a friend of Shelley (q.v.). She refused William Godwin, and married John Gisborne in 1800. Shelley's 'Letter to Maria Gisborne' was written in 1820.

Gismond of Salerne, see Tancred and Gismund.

GISSING, GEORGE ROBERT (1857-1903), was educated at Owens College, Manchester, but left it, owing to an unfortunate marriage in 1875, for London and subsequently for America, where he experienced the extreme poverty and misery reflected in many of his novels. After a short period at Jena, where he studied philosophy, he returned to London, and in 1880 published his first novel 'Workers in the Dawn', making a precarious livelihood by private tuition, and finding an appreciative employer in Mr. Frederic Harrison. He published 'The Unclassed' in 1884, 'Demos' in 1886, and other novels illustrating the degrading effects of poverty on character. 'A Life's Morning' appeared in 1888, 'The Nether World' in 1889, 'The Emancipated' in 1890, 'New Grub Street' (q.v.) in 1891, 'Born in Exile' in 1892, and 'The Odd Women' in 1893. A visit to

GLANVILL

Italy led to the publication in 1901 of impressions and experiences under the title 'By the Ionian Sea', and the preparation during several years of the historical novel 'Veranilda' (of which Italy in the 6th cent. is the scene), which was published posthumously in 1904. On his return to England he wrote 'The Town Traveller' (1898), 'The Crown of Life' (1899), 'Our Friend the Charlatan' (1901), and 'Will Warburton' (1905). Of a different character was 'The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft' (1903), the imaginary journal of a recluse, who enjoys release from poverty and worry, amid books, memories, and reflection; it represents Gissing's own aspirations. Mention should also be made of his critical study of Charles Dickens, an author by whom Gissing had been deeply influenced, published in 1898. 'Human Odds and Ends', a collection of short stories, appeared in the same year, and a second collection, 'The House of Cobwebs', posthumously in 1906.

Gitano, see Gipsy.

Gludecca or JUDECCA, (1) in Dante's 'Inferno' (canto xxxiv), the lowest ring in the ninth circle of Hell, so named after Judas Iscariot, who is confined there, together with Satan himself; (2) an island at Venice, at one time the Jewish quarter.

Gjallar, in Scandinavian mythology, the horn of Heimdal (q.v.), with which he gives warning of any one approaching the bridge Bifröst (q.v.), and summons the gods to Ragnarök.

Gladshelm, in Scandinavian mythology, the abode of Odin (q.v.).

GLADSTONE, WILLIAM EWART (1809-98), the great Liberal statesman, is principally remembered in literary history for his 'Studies on Homer and the Homeric Age' (1858), a subject further dealt with in his 'Juventus Mundi' (1869) and 'Homeric Synchroism' (1876). 'Translations' by him and Lord Lyttelton appeared in 1863. His political writings include 'The State in its Relations with the Church' (1838), in which he defended the principle of a single state religion, a principle that he was later to abandon; 'Letters to the Earl of Aberdeen' on the Neapolitan Government (1851); 'The Vatican Decrees in their Bearing on Civil Allegiance' (1874); 'Vaticanism' (1875); 'Bulgarian Horrors and the Question of the East' (1876); and 'Lessons in Massacre' (1877). Gladstone's minor political writings and contributions to periodicals were republished as 'Gleanings of Past Years' (7 vols., 1879, with a supplementary volume, 1890). John Morley's 'Life of Gladstone' was published in 1903. There is an interesting description of Gladstone as a young man by Macaulay, in his review of 'The State . . .', in the 'Edinburgh Review', April 1839.

GLANVILL, JOSEPH (1636-80), educated at Exeter College and Lincoln College, Oxford, was rector of the Abbey Church at Bath, and held other benefices. He attacked the scholastic philosophy in 'The Vanity of Dogmatizing' (1661), a work that contains the story of the 'Scholar Gipsy' (q.v.). He defended the belief in the pre-existence of souls in 'Lux Orientalis' (1662), and the belief in witchcraft in 'Saducismus Triumphatus' (1681).

GLANVILL

GLANVILLE, RANULF DE (d. 1190), chief justiciar of England. The authorship of the first great treatise on the laws of England, 'Tractatus de Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliae', has been doubtfully ascribed to him on the evidence of Roger of Hoveden.

Glasgerion, an old English ballad of a king's son who is a harper and wins the favour of the king's daughter of Normandy. By a trick his page takes his place at an assignation. When the lady learns the deceit she takes her own life, and Glasgerion cuts off the lad's head and kills himself. The ballad is included in Percy's 'Reliques'.

GLASGOW, ELLEN (1874-1945), American novelist prominently identified with the modern 'Southern School'. Among her chief works are 'The Battle-Ground' (1902), 'The Deliverance' (1904), 'The Builders' (1919), 'One Man in His Time' (1922), 'Barren Ground' (1925), 'The Romantic Comedians' (1926).

GLASSE, HANNAH (fl. 1747), author of 'The Art of Cookery made Plain and Easy' (1747), 'The Compleat Confectioner' (1770), and 'The Servant's Directory or House-keeper's Companion' (1770). She was habit-maker to the Prince of Wales. The authorship of 'The Art of Cookery' has been erroneously attributed to Dr. John Hill.

Glastonbury, in Somerset, famous as the place where, according to legend, Joseph of Arimathea founded Glastonbury Abbey, and where, according to Giraldus Cambrensis (q.v.), the tomb of Arthur and Guinevere was discovered in the reign of Henry II. (A leaden cross, he states, was found in it, with an inscription relating to 'inclitus rex Arthurus cum Wenneveria uxore sua secunda'.)

The name Glastonbury, according to William of Malmesbury, is derived from one Glasteing, who, searching for his lost sow, came to an apple-tree by the old church, and, liking the spot, settled there with his family. William does not connect the place with Arthur. But Giraldus Cambrensis and Ralph of Coggeshall (fl. 1207) identify Glastonbury with Avalon, which they say meant the 'isle of apples'. (For a discussion of the whole question see Sir Edmund Chambers, 'Arthur of Britain'.)

Glatissant, in Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur' (q.v.), the name of the 'questing beast'.

Glaucé, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', III. ii. 30, &c., the nurse of Britomart.

Glaucus: (1) in Greek mythology, a god of the Sea, originally a Boeotian fisherman who became immortal through eating a marvellous herb. 'Glaucus, or the Wonders of the Shore' is the title of a natural history work by C. Kingsley (1855). (2) Glaucus of Potniae in Boeotia, another legendary figure, who was torn to pieces by his own mares. (3) Son of Sisyphus and father of Bellerophon (qq.v.). (4) In Homer's 'Iliad', the grandson of Bellerophon, an ally of King Priam. He meets Diomedes in battle, who, on the plea that they are old guest-friends, exchanges his bronze armour with the golden armour of Glaucus, for 'Zeus son of Cronos took from Glaucus his wits'.

Glegg, Mr. and Mrs., characters in G. Eliot's 'The Mill on the Floss' (q.v.).

GLEIG, GEORGE ROBERT (1796-1888), educated at Glasgow and Balliol College, Oxford, became Chaplain General of the Forces. He served with the 85th in the Peninsula. He is remembered as the author of 'The Subaltern', written for 'Blackwood' in 1826.

Gleipnir, in Scandinavian mythology, the chain made by the Dwarfs to bind Fenrir (q.v.).

Glenallan, EARL and DOWAGER COUNTESS OF, characters in Scott's 'The Antiquary' (q.v.).

Glenarvon, see Lamb (Lady C.).

Glencoe, in Argyllshire, memorable for the massacre of the inhabitants (Macdonalds) in 1692, under the orders of William III, obtained by Sir John Dalrymple, Master of Stair, their enemy. The massacre was carried out by Campbell of Glen Lyon and 120 soldiers, after these had lived for twelve days on friendly terms with the clansmen. The ground for this cruel and treacherous act was the failure of Maclan, chief of the clan, to take the oath of allegiance by the appointed day.

Scott wrote a poem on the subject, published in Thomson's 'Select Melodies' (1814), and Talfourd a play (1840), and there is an echo of it in Campbell's 'Pilgrim of Glencoe'. Aytoun's 'Widow of Glencoe' is also well known.

Glendinning, HALBERT, EDWARD, and DAME ELSPETH, characters in Scott's 'The Monastery' and 'The Abbot' (qq.v.).

Glendoveer, one of a race of beautiful sprites in Southey's artificial quasi-Hindu mythology ('Curse of Kehama', VI. ii), a word avowedly altered from Grandower, which occurs in Sonnerat, 'Voyage aux Indes' (1782).

Glendower, OWEN (1359?-1416?), the leader of the Welsh rebellion against Henry IV, who figures in Shakespeare's '1 Henry IV'.

Glenlivet, a famous Scotch whisky, so named from the place of its manufacture in Banffshire.

Glenmire, LADY, a character in Mrs. Gaskell's 'Cranford' (q.v.).

GLENNACQUOICH

Glennacquoich, the seat and title of Fergus Mac-Ivor, in Scott's 'Waverley' (q.v.).

Glenvarloch, LORD, the title borne by Nigel Oliphant in Scott's 'Fortunes of Nigel' (q.v.).

Globe Theatre, THE, the Burbages' theatre on the Bankside in Southwark, erected in 1599 with materials from the old Theatre on the north side of the river. It was a large circular building, thatched, with the centre open to the sky. The thatch caught fire in 1613, owing to the discharge of a peal of ordnance at an entry of the king in the play of 'Henry VIII', and the whole building was destroyed. It was rebuilt in 1614. Shakespeare had a share in the theatre and acted there.

Gloria, a name for each of several formulae in Christian liturgical worship. (a) GLORIA PATRI, the doxology beginning 'Glory be to the Father'. (b) GLORIA TIBI, the response 'Glory be to thee, O Lord', following the announcement of the Gospel. (c) GLORIA IN EXCELSIS, the hymn 'Glory be to God on high' in the communion service or mass. [OED.]

Gloriana, one of the names under which Queen Elizabeth is indicated in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene'.

Glorious First of June, THE, see First of June.

Glorious John, a familiar designation of Dryden (q.v.).

Glossin, GILBERT, a character in Scott's 'Guy Mannering'.

Gloucester, EARL OF, a character in Shakespeare's 'King Lear' (q.v.).

Gloucester, ROBERT, EARL OF, see Robert Earl of Gloucester.

GLOVER, RICHARD (1712-85), was M.P. for Weymouth, 1761-8, and an opponent of Walpole. He published much blank verse: 'Leonidas' (1737), in nine books, and 'The Athenaid' in thirty, and produced two plays, 'Boadicea' and 'Medea', in 1753 and 1763 respectively. But he is remembered only as the author of 'Hosier's Ghost', a ballad included in Percy's 'Reliques'. This was a party song, contrasting the fate of Admiral Hosier (sent in 1726 with a fleet to the Spanish West Indies but obliged to remain inactive there till most of his men perished and he himself died of a broken heart) with the successful attack of Admiral Vernon in 1739 on Porto Bello.

Glover, SIMON and CATHARINE, two of the principal characters in Scott's 'Fair Maid of Perth' (q.v.).

Glowry, CHRISTOPHER and SCYTHROP, characters in Peacock's 'Nightmare Abbey' (q.v.).

Glozel, a hamlet near Vichy, in the centre of France, where in 1924 the son of a local farmer, by name Fradin, discovered the remains of an old glass-furnace, and in 1925-6, in association with Dr. Morlet of Vichy, a number of antique tablets inscribed with alphabetical signs, and other objects connecting the tablets with neolithic culture. These discoveries, if genuine, involved a reconsideration of current theories regarding neolithic civilization. But their genuineness was contested and an acrimonious controversy arose on the subject. The French government, in 1927, appointed an international commission to investigate the matter, which reported that the antiquity of the objects discovered at Glozel had not been established.

Glubbdubdrib, in 'Gulliver's Travels' (q.v.), the island of sorcerers, where Homer and Aristotle, Descartes and Gassendi, and many kings and generals are called up at Gulliver's request, and he learns the untrustworthy character of history.

Gluck, CHRISTOPH WILLIBALD (1714-87), a famous operatic composer born in Bavaria, was the son of a gamekeeper. He spent ten years (1754-64) in Vienna as director of the court opera, subsequently went to Paris, and finally retired to Vienna. He visited London in 1745. His first great opera was 'Orfeo' (1762), which was followed by 'Alceste' (1766), 'Iphigénie en Aulide' (1774), 'Armide' (1777), and 'Iphigénie en Tauride' (1779). A celebrated contention arose in Paris in 1776 between his followers and those of Piccini (q.v.), in substance a dispute as to the relative merits of the German and Italian schools of music.

Glumdalclitch, in 'Gulliver's Travels' (q.v.), the farmer's daughter who attended on Gulliver during his visit to Brobdingnag.

Glums, see Peter Wilkins.

GLYN, ELINOR (Mrs. Clayton Glyn, 1864-1944), authoress, born in Toronto, Canada. Among her novels were: 'The Visits of Elizabeth' (1900), 'Three Weeks' (1907), 'The Career of Katherine Bush' (1917), 'Man and Maid' (1922), 'Six Days' (1924). Some of her works have been filmed.

Gnome, from modern Latin gnomus, used by Paracelsus, though perhaps not invented by him, to signify beings that have earth for their element, through which they move as fishes through the water. The word as generally used means one of a race of diminutive spirits fabled to inhabit the earth and to be guardians of its treasures. Also the name of an early type of aeroplane engine.

Gnomie, from Gr. γνῶμη, consisting of gnomes or general maxims, sententious.

Gnostic, from Gr. γνῶσις knowledge, the designation given to certain heretical sects among the early Christians, prominent in the 2nd cent. A.D., who claimed special knowledge, in particular how the divine element in man, the soul, became detached from the divine world, and how it may be reunited to its proper sphere. Their religion was essentially mystic in character. It differentiated between the initiated and the uninitiated, observed a great variety of sacraments and had sacred formulas for combating demons. It was allied to Manichaeism (q.v.), and partook of its oriental dualism and asceticism.

Gobbo, LAUNCELOT, the clown in Shakespeare's 'Merchant of Venice' (q.v.), servant to Shylock; OLD GOBBO is his father.

Gobelin Tapestry, the tapestry made at the 'Gobelins', the State factory of tapestry in Paris, named after Jean Gobelin (d. 1476), head of a family of dyers who settled in Paris about 1450 and made a great reputation by the discovery of a scarlet dye. In the 16th cent. the works were purchased for Louis XIV, and since then (with a short break during the Revolution) have been run as a State concern for the manufacture of upholstery, furniture, and carpets.

Goblin, from French gobelin, an obsolete word of uncertain derivation, means a mischievous and ugly demon.

Goblin Market, a poem by C. Rossetti (q.v.), published in 1862.

The poem is a fairy tale, in which some see an allegory. Laura yields to the allurements of the fruits offered for sale by the goblins (worldly pleasures), pines for more of them, which the goblins refuse, falls sick, and nearly dies. Her sister Lizzy, for Laura's sake, braves their temptations and redeems her sister.

God and Mammon, The Triumph of Mammon, the first two parts of a blank verse trilogy (the third was never written) by Davidson (q.v.), published in 1907.

The eldest son of Christian, king of Thule, called Mammon, and expelled from the kingdom because of his atheism and blasphemy, returns, kills the king and his younger brother, appropriates the latter's bride, and triumphantly ascends the throne. The poem is an expression of materialistic idealism.

God from the machine, see Deus ex machina.

God save the King, see National Anthem.

Godiva, the wife of Leofric, earl of Mercia, one of Edward the Confessor's great earls. According to legend, her husband having imposed a tax on the inhabitants of Coventry, she importuned him to remit it, which he jestingly promised to do if she would ride naked through the streets at noonday. She took him at his word, directed the people to keep within doors and shut their windows, and complied with his condition. Peeping Tom, who looked out, was struck blind.

The story is told by Drayton in his 'Polyolbion' (q.v.), xiii; by Leigh Hunt; and by Tennyson in his 'Godiva'. Lady Godiva figures, as the mother of Hereward, in C. Kingsley's 'Hereward the Wake' (q.v.), and in one of Landor's 'Imaginary Conversations' (q.v.).

GODLEY, ALFRED DENIS (1856-1925), classical scholar and writer of light verse, public orator at the University of Oxford, 1910-25. He edited Tacitus's Histories (1887, 1890), translated the Odes of Horace (1898) and Herodotus (Loeb Series, 1921-3), and was joint editor of the 'Classical Review', 1910-20. His verse, much of which deals with University life, appears in 'Verses to Order' (1892), 'Lyra Frivola' (1899), 'Second Strings' (1902), 'The Casual Ward' (1912), 'Echoes from the Oxford Magazine' (1896), 'Reliquiae A. D. Godley' (1926).

Godmer, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', II. x. 11, a British giant, son of Albion, slain by Canutus.

Godolphin, a novel by Bulwer Lytton (q.v.).

Godolphin Barb, one of the Arab stallions imported about 1700 by Mr. Darley. He was the ancestor of many of our race-horses.

GODWIN, MRS. MARY WOLLSTONECRAFT (1759-97), née Wollstonecraft, kept a school at Newington Green with her sister Eliza, and subsequently became governess to Lord Kingsborough's children. After this she was employed for five years by Johnson, a London publisher. In Paris she formed a connexion with Gilbert Imlay (1793-5), an American, by whom she had a daughter, Fanny; his infidelity drove her to attempted suicide. She married William Godwin in 1797, and died at the birth of her daughter Mary, the future Mrs. Shelley. Her 'Vindication of the Rights of Woman' (1792) was a courageous attack on the conventions of the day.

GODWIN, WILLIAM (1756-1836), educated at Hoxton Academy, was at first a dissenting minister, but became an atheist and a philosopher of anarchical views. He believed that men acted according to reason, that it was impossible to be rationally persuaded and not act accordingly, that reason taught benevolence, and that therefore rational creatures could live in harmony without laws and institutions. He married Mary Wollstonecraft (see Godwin, Mrs. M. W.) in 1797, who died at the birth of her daughter, the future wife of Shelley. Godwin subsequently married Mrs. Clairmont, whose daughter by her first marriage, Clara Mary Jane Clairmont (q.v.), bore a daughter, Allegra, to Lord Byron (q.v.).

Godwin published in 1793 his 'Enquiry concerning Political Justice', in which he exposed his philosophical and political views, in 1794 the 'Adventures of Caleb Williams' (q.v.), and in 1799 'St. Leon', novels designed to propagate these views. This last contains a portrait of Mary Wollstonecraft, of whom he also wrote a remarkable life ('Memoirs of the author of a Vindication of the Rights of Woman', 1798). Godwin produced a 'Life' of Chaucer in 1803.

Goëmot, the name under which Gogmagog (q.v.) figures in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene' (II. x. 10).

GOËS

Goës, BENEDICT, see Cathay.

GOETHE, JOHANN WOLFGANG von (1749-1832), born at Frankfort-on-the-Main, the son of an Imperial Councillor, was trained for the law against his inclination. In 1775 he was invited by the duke of Weimar to his court, and thereafter spent the greater part of his life in Weimar, occupying positions in the government of increasing importance until 1786. In 1791 he was appointed director of the ducal theatre, a post which he retained for twenty-two years. Throughout his life he devoted much time to the study of painting, for which he had only a mediocre gift. Apart from this, he divided his energies mainly between scientific research and literature. In the former sphere he evolved a new theory of the character of light, which he expounded and defended at length in the 'Farbenlehre' (1810); this he considered his greatest work. He also made important discoveries in connexion with plant and animal life.

In the sphere of literature, apart from his great dramatic poem 'Faust' (q.v.), his principal works were (i) 'Goetz von Berlichingen' (1771), a drama dealing with the story of a predatory knight of the German Empire in the 16th cent. The play was translated by Sir Walter Scott, who borrowed scenes from it for 'Ivanhoe' and 'Anne of Geierstein'. (ii) 'The Sorrows of Young Werther' (first published 1774, altered 1787), a romance in epistolary form, based on two incidents in the author's life. Werther falls in love with Charlotte, who is betrothed to Albert, and gives himself up to a few weeks' happiness, while Albert is absent. Then he tears himself away. Albert and Charlotte are married, and despair gradually comes over Werther, who finally takes his own life. The romance was translated into English and French. (iii) 'Egmont', a play dealing with the revolt of the Netherlands against the power of Spain. (iv) 'Iphigenie auf Tauris' (1787), a drama based on the play of Euripides. (v) 'Hermann und Dorothea' (1797), a poem founded on the expulsion of the Protestants by the archbishop of Salzburg in 1732, but with the scene shifted to France under the Revolution. It was translated by Thomas Holcroft and others. (vi) 'Wahlverwandtschaften' (1808), a romance dealing with the 'elective affinities' of a married couple for two other persons. (vii) 'West-östlicher Divan' (1819), a collection of poems recording passing experiences and opinions on philosophical problems, modelled on the 'Divan' of the Persian poet Hafiz. (viii) 'Dichtung und Wahrheit' ('Poetry and Truth'), completed in 1831, an autobiography in which those experiences are selected which had most influenced the author's development. (ix) 'Wilhelm Meisters Lehrjahre', written at intervals between 1786 and 1830, a romance of biographical interest, the first six books of which tell the story of a stage-struck youth, who travels about the country with a theatrical company; among its members are Mignon and the Harper, whose songs, particularly 'Kennst du das Land', are well known. To the 'Lehrjahre' Goethe added in the last years of his life the 'Wanderjahre', a miscellany treating, through the medium of Meister's travels, with educational and sociological questions. (Part of this was translated by Carlyle.) Mention should also be made of Goethe's beautiful lyrics, ballads, and love-songs.

Goethe and Schiller came together in 1794, and were much associated until the latter's death in 1805. From 1823 to the end of his life Goethe was attended by Johann Eckermann, whose faithful record of Goethe's conversations has been translated into English. In 1806 he married Christiane Vulpius, who had been his mistress since 1789, and who bore him four children.

Gog and Magog. In Gen. x. 2, Magog is a son of Japhet. In Ezek. xxxviii and xxxix, Gog is the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal, who shall come from his 'place out of the north parts'; and the land of Magog is also referred to as his territory. In Rev. xx. 7-9, Gog and Magog represent the nations of the earth that are deceived by Satan.

In the cycle of legends relating to Alexander the Great, Gog and Magog were allies of the Indian king Porus, in his resistance to that conqueror. They were shut off by the great wall built by Alexander in the Caucasus. They were presumably Scythian tribes. (There is a reference to this in c. xviii of the Koran. Sale in his notes thereto says that Yajuj and Majuj are the Arabian names of two barbarous tribes descended from Japhet against whom Dhu'l-karnain or Alexander built a rampart.) See also under Gogmagog.

Gogmagog and Corineus: Gogmagog (called Goëmagot by Geoffrey of Monmouth and Spenser, 'Faerie Queene', III. ix. 50) was the chief of the giants of Albion whom Brute (q.v.) destroyed. Corineus was one of Brute's companions. He wrestled with Gogmagog and threw him into the sea, and Cornwall was assigned to him as a reward. The statues called Gog and Magog in the Guildhall in London are said to represent Gogmagog and Corineus. The original statues were destroyed in the Great Fire, and were replaced by new ones in 1709. See also under Gog and Magog.

Gogmagog Hill, a hill three miles SE. of Cambridge. It is referred to in C. Kingsley's 'Hereward the Wake' (q.v.).

GOGOL, NIKOLAI VASILIEVICH (1809-52), Russian novelist, is best known in England for his masterpiece 'Dead Souls' (1837, English translation, 1887), a picaresque romance, satirizing the provincial Russian society of the day. Each Russian landlord paid a poll-tax on his serfs, a census of whom was made every ten years, and continued to pay it in the interval though the serfs might die. Chichikov, an adventurer, hits on the idea of acquiring these 'dead souls' from their owners, and depositing the title to them as security for loans from a bank which believes them to be live serfs. Chichikov travels about the country on his mission, and the characters he meets with are portrayed with delightful humour. Gogol's other well-known work, 'The Inspector-General' (1836, English translation, 1892), is a play satirizing Russian government officials.

Goldels, according to legend, the first Celtic invaders of Ireland. The name is used to signify the Scots-Irish or Gaelic branch of the Celtic race, as distinguished from the Brythonic branch, the Britons of Wales, Cornwall, and Brittany.

Golagros and Gawain, an alliterative poem in Middle English, of 105 stanzas of thirteen lines, contained in a pamphlet printed in Scotland in 1508. It deals with incidents on a pilgrimage of Arthur and his knights to the Holy Land. Golagros is lord of a castle on the Rhône, and is defeated in single combat by Gawain.

Golden Age, THE, the first and best age of the world, in which, according to the Greek and Roman poets, man lived in a state of ideal prosperity and happiness. It was thought to have occurred under the reign of Saturn (q.v.) on earth.

Golden Ass, The, a satire by Apuleius of Madaura in Africa (b. c. A.D. 114). It takes the form of the supposed autobiography of the author, who is transformed into an ass by the mistake of the servant of an enchantress. He passes from master to master, observing the vices and follies of men, and finally recovers human form by the intervention of the goddess Isis. The story includes a number of episodes, of which the best known is the beautiful allegory of 'Cupid and Psyche' (q.v.). The work is imitated from the Λούκιος ἢ ὄνος attributed to Lucian, or from an original common to both. It was translated into English in the 16th cent. by W. Adlington.

Golden Bough, The, a comparative study of the beliefs and institutions of mankind, by Sir J. G. Frazer (q.v.), in 11 volumes, published in 1890-1915.

This work began with a treatise on the ancient rule of the priesthood or sacred kingship of the grove of Nemi or Aricia near Rome, by which a candidate for the priesthood could obtain the office only by slaying the priest, and held it until he was himself slain. The grove was devoted to the worship of Diana Nemorensis. In it grew, according to legend, a tree of which no bough might be broken, save by a runaway slave. If he succeeded, he might fight the priest, and if he slew him, take over his office. The 'Golden Bough' which Aeneas broke off at the bidding of the Sybil before venturing to the nether world (Virgil, 'Aeneid', vi. 136) was believed to be a branch of this tree. The explanation by Frazer of the priest of Aricia as an embodiment of the tree-spirit, slain in his character of incarnate deity, led to the discussion of a vast number of other primitive customs and superstitions, contained in the successive volumes of this monumental work.

Golden Hind, The, originally named 'The Pelican', a ship of 100 tons in which Drake circumnavigated the globe.

Golden Horde, a Mongol tribe who possessed the khanate of Kiptchak, and extended their dominion over eastern Russia, and western and central Asia, from the 13th cent. till 1480, when they were overthrown by Ivan III of Russia.

Golden Horn, THE, the harbour of Constantinople, a curved arm of the Bosphorus. The name dates from remote antiquity. The epithet 'golden' was expressive of the riches which every wind wafted from the most distant countries into the secure and capacious port' (Gibbon).

Golden Legend, The, a medieval manual of ecclesiastical lore: lives of saints, commentary on the church service, homilies for saints' days, &c. A version of this compilation from various sources was published by Caxton (q.v.) and was his most popular production. One of its sources was the 'Legenda Aurea' of Jacobus a Voragine (Jacopo de' Varazze, 1230-98), archbishop of Genoa.

Golden Legend, The, a poem by Longfellow (q.v.), published in 1852.

Prince Henry of Hohenneck suffers from a leprosy, from which he can be cured only if a maiden will give her life as the price. Elsie, a farmer's daughter, decides to make the sacrifice, and Prince Henry under the advice of Lucifer decides reluctantly to accept it. At the door of the convent of Salerno, where her life is to be surrendered, Henry, struck with remorse, at the last moment saves her, and is himself cured by the relics of St. Matthew. The story is taken from 'Der arme Heinrich' of Hartmann von der Auë, a German minnesinger of the 12th cent.

GOLDING

Golding, ARTHUR (1536?-1605?), translator of Latin and French works, including Ovid's 'Metamorphoses' (1565-7), Caesar's 'Gallic War' (1565), and Justin's abbreviation of Trogus Pompeius (1570). His translations are clear, faithful, and fluent, and his Ovid was known to Shakespeare.

GOLDONI, CARLO (1707-93), Italian writer of stage comedies, most of whose working life was spent in Venice, the social background of which gave him the material of his plays. His significance in the history of Italian literature lies in the new impetus he gave to stage comedy, which, for the generation preceding his own, had been largely the monopoly of the 'Commedia dell'Arte', that loosely conceived form of semi-spontaneous playing which, starting with the fresh impulses and inspirations of its popular origins, had become by the middle of the 18th cent. a worn and decadent form. In later life Goldoni lived in France, where, after a successful career, he was impoverished by the Revolution, and died a pauper. His best-known plays are 'La Bottega di Caffè', 'La Locandiera', 'La Donna di Garbo', 'Gli Innamorati', and 'La Casa Nova'.

GOLDSMITH, OLIVER (1730-74), the second son of an Irish clergyman, was born probably at Pallasmore in the county of Longford, or perhaps at Elphin, Roscommon. He entered Trinity College, Dublin, as a sizar in 1744, and ran away to Cork in consequence of 'personal chastisement' from his tutor. He returned, however, and graduated B.A. in 1749. In 1751 he presented himself for ordination but was rejected. He then studied medicine at Edinburgh and at Leyden, and during 1755-6 wandered about France, Switzerland, and Italy, obtaining it is said a medical degree at some foreign university. He reached London in destitution in 1756, and supported himself with difficulty as a physician in Southwark, an usher at Peckham, and a hack-writer on Griffiths' 'Monthly Review'. He failed in 1758 to qualify for a medical appointment in India, and in the same year published, under the pseudonym 'James Willington', his notable translation of 'The Memoirs of a Protestant, condemned to the Gallies of France for his Religion' (Jean Marteilhe of Bergerac, a victim of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes). He published in 1759 his 'Enquiry into the present State of Polite Learning' (q.v.), and about this time became acquainted with Thomas Percy, afterwards bishop of Dromore. He published during October and November 1759 his little periodical 'The Bee', including the 'Elegy on Mrs. Mary Blaize', 'A City Night-Piece', and 'The Farn Machine'. He contributed to various magazines, writing 'A Reverie in the Boar's Head Tavern' and the 'Adventures of a Strolling Player' for Smollett's 'British Magazine'; he was also employed by John Newbery, the publisher, in whose 'Public Ledger' Goldsmith's 'Chinese Letters' appeared, subsequently republished as the 'Citizen of the World' (q.v.), in 1762.

He made the acquaintance of Samuel Johnson (q.v.) in 1761, and was one of the original members of 'The Club'. The manuscript of his 'Vicar of Wakefield' (q.v.) was sold, probably in 1762, by Johnson for Goldsmith for £60, and the proceeds saved him from arrest for debt. His poem 'The Traveler' (q.v.) appeared in 1764 and was welcomed by the public. It introduced him to his only patron, Lord Clare. In the same year appeared his 'History of England in a Series of Letters'. Goldsmith tried once more in 1765 to set up as a physician, with no success. The 'Vicar of Wakefield', the publication of which had been delayed for unexplained reasons, appeared in 1766. About this time he removed from Islington, where he had been living, to the Temple, first to Garden Court, then to Brick Court. He wrote as hack-work for booksellers a life of Voltaire (1761), a good memoir of Beau Nash (1762), a 'History of Rome' (1769), lives of Parnell and Bolingbroke (1770), and an English history (1771). His first comedy 'The Good-natur'd Man' (q.v.) was rejected by Garrick, but produced at Covent Garden in 1768. It was a moderate success and brought him £500. His second comedy, 'The Stoops to Conquer' (q.v.), was played at Covent Garden in 1773 with immense success; in this year he adapted as a farce Sedley's adaptation 'The Grumbler'. In 1770 appeared 'The Deserted Village' (q.v.), and in 1771 took place his altercation with Evans, publisher of the 'London Packet', in which was published the letter of 'Tom Tickle' abusing Goldsmith and impertinently alluding to his friend Miss Horneck. Goldsmith's 'Retaliation' (q.v.), his 'History of Greece', and 'Animated Nature' (with 'tygers' in Canada) were his last works (published in 1774). The pleasant light verses entitled 'The Haunch of Venison' appeared posthumously in 1776. Goldsmith was buried in the Temple Church, a monument at the expense of 'The Club' being erected to him in Westminster Abbey. His Latin epitaph (by Johnson) states that he adorned whatever he touched. Boswell's 'Life of Johnson' contains many anecdotes about Goldsmith, which represent him as a ridiculous, blundering, envious and vain creature, but tender-hearted, simple, and generous, with flashes of brilliancy now and then in his conversation. Johnson, who was quite awake to his absurdities, had a high respect for his worth and literary abilities.

The first collected edition (1801) of Goldsmith's works contains the life by Bishop Percy, for which Goldsmith had supplied materials. The best edition is that of J. W. M. Gibbs (1885-6). The best Lives are Forster's (1848) and Prior's (1837). There is a recent critical edition of Goldsmith's Letters by K. C. Balderston (1928).

Golgotha, the hill of the Crucifixion near

GOLGOTHA

Jerusalem, from an Aramaic word meaning 'skull'; it is used to signify a place of interment, and in 18th-cent. university slang, a place where heads of colleges and halls assemble.

Goliardic verse, from GOLIARD, one of the class of educated jesters, buffoons, and authors of loose or satirical Latin verse, who flourished chiefly in the 12th and 13th cents. in Germany, France, and England. In the 12th and 13th cents. the Goliards were supposed to take their name from a certain Goliath (q.v.). The Old French word 'goliard' (from L. gula) means glutton. [OED.]

Gollas, a person dignified with the names of episcopus and archipoeta in satirical Latin poems of the 12th and 13th cents. (see Goliardic verse) and represented as the embodiment of the vices attributed to the monks. According to Scherer, 'History of German Literature', I. iv, he was a poet of unknown name, attached to the court of the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa, whose praises he sang. The 'Apocalypse', 'Confession', and 'Metamorphosis' of this bishop have been attributed to Walter Map (q.v.). In the 'Confession' occur the lines, placed in the bishop's mouth and subsequently converted to the uses of a drinking-song:

Meum est propositum in taberna mori:
Vinum sit appositum morientis ori,
Ut dicant cum venerint angelorum chori,
'Deus sit propitius huic potatori'.

GONCOURT, EDMOND HUOT DE (1822-96), and his brother JULES (1830-70), French authors and collaborators, wrote a 'History of French Society during the Revolution', a 'History of Marie Antoinette', novels ('Germinie Lacerteux', &c.), and plays. They founded in 1896 a literary society, which was officially recognized in 1903, composed of ten members who award an annual prize of 5,000 fr. to the best imaginative work in prose (known as the Prix Goncourt).

Gondibert, a romantic epic by D'Avenant (q.v.), published in 1651.

This work, which was never finished, consists of some 1,700 quatrains. It is a tale of chivalry, of which the scene is Lombardy and the court of King Aribert. Duke Gondibert loves BIRTHA, and is therefore impervious to the love of Rhodaling, the king's daughter, who in turn is loved by Prince Oswald. Oswald attempts to destroy Gondibert. But before any issue is reached, the author frankly declares himself bored with his poem.

Gondomar, DON DIEGO SARMIENTO DE ACUÑA, MARQUIS DE, the Spanish Ambassador in the reign of James I. He was the enemy of Sir Walter Raleigh, and caused

GOODY TWO-SHOES

Middleton to be imprisoned for his play, 'A Game at Chess' (q.v.).

Gondwanaland, the name given by the geologist Eduard Suess (q.v.) to a supposed ancient continent uniting India, Australia, and Africa. It was so called from the Gondwana geological beds in India. Gondwana is the historical name of a region in India roughly corresponding to the Central Provinces, the home of the Gonds, an aboriginal tribe still inhabiting it. Cf. Lemuria.

Goneril and Regan, in Shakespeare's 'King Lear' (q.v.), the elder daughters of the king.

Gongorism, an affected type of diction and style introduced into Spanish literature in the 16th cent. by the poet Don Luis de Góngora y Argote (1561-1627), a style akin to Euphuism (q.v.) in England and Marinism (see Marino) in Italy. But Góngora was none the less a poet of genius, and both his earlier and his latest verses were simple and unaffected.

Good Companions, The, a novel by John Boynton Priestley, published in 1929. It has been dramatized.

Goodfellow, ROBIN, see Robin Goodfellow.

Good-natur'd Man, The, a comedy by Goldsmith (q.v.), produced in 1768.

Mr. Honeywood is an open-hearted but foolishly good-natured and credulous young man, who gives away to the importunate what he owes to his creditors. His uncle, Sir William Honeywood, decides to teach him a lesson by having him arrested for debt and letting him see who are his true friends. Young Honeywood is in love with Miss Richland, a lady of fortune, and she with him, but he is too diffident to propose to her. He even recommends to her the suit of Lofty, a government official to whom he believes himself indebted for release from arrest. In fact it is Miss Richland who has secured his release, and the impostor Lofty is amusingly exposed. Honeywood, being cured of his folly by this experience, is by his uncle's intervention united to Miss Richland. The plot is complicated by a subordinate love-affair. Leontine, the son of Croaker, Miss Richland's doleful guardian, is destined by his father to marry Miss Richland. But Leontine, having been sent to Lyons to fetch his sister, who has been educated there for the last ten years, brings back instead Olivia, a young lady with whom he has fallen in love, and who personates the sister. Leontine, to prevent suspicion, proposes to Miss Richland, expecting to be refused. But she, knowing the truth about Olivia, mischievously accepts him. Whereupon Leontine and Olivia attempt to elope. The attempt is defeated by Sir William, who, however, obtains old Croaker's consent to the match.

Goody Two-Shoes, a nursery tale, said to have been written by Goldsmith (q.v.), published by Newbery (q.v.).

GOOD THOUGHTS IN BAD TIMES

Good Thoughts in Bad Times, a collection of reflections by Fuller (q.v.), published in 1645 at Exeter, where Fuller was living as chaplain to Sir Ralph Hopton. It was followed in 1647 by 'Good Thoughts in Worse Times', and in 1660, at the Restoration, by 'Mixt Contemplations in Better Times'. The work consists of meditations on his own shortcomings, observations on passages of scripture, and applications of historical incidents and anecdotes to current events, many of them whimsical and humorous, and most of them pithy and wise.

GOOGE, BARNABE (1504-94), a member of both universities, was a kinsman of Sir William Cecil, who employed him in Ireland, 1574-85. He published 'Eglogs, Epytaphes, and Sonnetes', 1563 (reprinted, 1871), and translations, including Heresbachius's 'Foure Bookes of Husbandrie', 1577. His eclogues are of interest as being, with those of Barclay (q.v.), the earliest examples of pastorals in English.

Goose, MOTHER, see Mother Goose's Tales.

Gorboduc, or Ferrex and Porrex, one of the earliest of English tragedies, of which the first three acts are by Thomas Norton (1532-84) and the last two by T. Sackville (q.v.). It was acted in the Inner Temple Hall in 1561. The play is constructed on the model of a Senecan tragedy, and the subject is taken from the legendary chronicles of Britain. Gorboduc and Videna are king and queen, Ferrex and Porrex are their two sons, and the dukes of Cornwall, Albany, Logres, and Cumberland are the other chief characters. Ferrex and Porrex quarrel over the division of the kingdom. Ferrex is killed by Porrex, and Porrex is murdered in revenge by his mother. The duke of Albany tries to seize the kingdom and civil war breaks out. There is no action on the stage, the events being narrated in blank verse.

The legend of Gorboduc is told by Geoffrey of Monmouth, and figures in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene' (II. x. 34 and 35), where Gorboduc is called Gorbogud.

Gordius, the father of Midas (q.v.), a Phrygian peasant who became king, in consequence of an oracle which told the Phrygians, in a time of sedition, that their troubles would cease if they appointed king the first man they met approaching the temple of Jupiter in a wagon. Gordius was the man thus chosen. He dedicated his wagon to Jupiter. The knot with which the yoke was fastened to the pole was so artful that the legend arose that whoever could untie it would gain the empire of Asia. Alexander the Great cut the Gordian knot with his sword and applied the legend to himself.

GORDON, ADAM LINDSAY (1833-70), Australian poet, went to Australia in 1853, where he joined the mounted police. He spent most of his life in Australia among horses, and this is reflected in much of his poetry, for instance in his well-known pieces, 'The Sick Stockrider', 'How we beat the Favourite', 'The Ride from the Wreck', and 'Wolf and Hound'. Much of his best work is collected in 'Sea Spray and Smoke Drift' (1867), 'Bush Ballads and Galloping Rhymes' (1870). Gordon committed suicide.

Gordon, CHARLES GEORGE (1833-85), 'Chinese Gordon', an officer of the Royal Engineers, who commanded the Chinese forces against the Taiping rebels in 1863-4 and put down the rebellion. He was governor of the Egyptian equatorial provinces of Africa, 1874-6, and governor-general of the Sudan, 1877-80, where he put down the slave trade. He was sent by the British government in 1884 to rescue the Egyptian garrisons in the Sudan previous to abandonment, was hemmed in at Khartoum, and there killed, after having sustained a siege of 317 days; he was the only Englishman there after the murder of his companions, Colonel Stewart and Frank Power. His Chinese diaries, Khartoum journals, and several volumes of his letters have been published.

Gordon Riots, THE, in 1780, led by Lord George Gordon, were intended to compel parliament to repeal the Act of 1778 for the relief of Roman Catholics. They resulted in much tumult and the burning of a number of houses in London; also in the establishment of a regular police force. They figure in Dickens's 'Barnaby Rudge' (q.v.).

GORE, CHARLES (1853-1932), educated at Harrow and Balliol College, Oxford, bishop of Oxford from 1911 to 1919, was editor of, and contributor to, 'Lux Mundi' (q.v.), and published a number of works on religious subjects: 'Epistle to the Ephesians' (1898), 'Epistle to the Romans' (1899), 'Epistle of St. John' (1920), 'The Old Theology and the New Religion' (1908), 'The Religion of the Church' (1916), &c.

GORE, MRS. CATHERINE GRACE FRANCES (1709-1861), née Moody, published about seventy works between 1824 and 1862, including the novels 'Mrs. Armytage' (1836) and 'Mothers and Daughters' (1831), which are her best; 'Cecil, or the Adventures of a Coxcomb' (1841); and 'The Banker's Wife' (1843). Of her plays, 'The School for Coquettes' was acted in 1831, and 'Lords and Commons' and 'Quid pro Quo' in 1844. Her novels were parodied by Thackeray in 'Lords and Liveries', one of the 'Novels by Eminent Hands'.

Gorges, SIR ARTHUR, see Alcyon.

Gorgius Midas, SIR, see Midas (Sir Gorgius).

Gorgons, THE, three sisters, daughters of Phorcys and Ceto, whose names were Stheno, Eurjâlê, and Medusa. Of these the first two were immortal; Medusa (q.v.) was mortal and is the most celebrated. According to the mythologists, their hair was entwined with serpents, their hands were of brass, their body covered with impenetrable scales, their teeth like a wild boar's tusks, and they turned to stones all on whom they fixed their eyes.

Gorham Case, THE, an ecclesiastical lawsuit in 1848 arising out of the refusal of the bishop of Exeter (Henry Phillpotts) to institute the Rev. Cornelius Gorham into the living of Brampton-Speke, on the ground of his alleged unorthodoxy in the matter of infant baptism. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council decided in favour of Mr. Gorham.

GORKY, MAXIM (1868–1936), the pseudonym of Alexei Maximovich Peshkov, the well-known Russian writer and revolutionary. He was obliged to begin earning his bread at nine years of age, and educated himself. He first became famous through the short realistic stories that he published in 1895–1900, dealing principally with thieves and tramps and other outcasts. His later work, which comprises plays and novels, is specially notable for his autobiography in three parts, of which 'My Childhood' (Eng. transl. 1915) is the first. The second part, 'In the World', appeared in 1918, and the third, 'Reminiscences of my Youth', in 1924. An important volume of his 'Reminiscences of Tolstoy' appeared in 1920.

Gorlols, in the Arthurian legend, duke of Cornwall and husband of Igraine (q.v.).

GOSSE, SIR EDMUND (1849–1928), the son of Philip H. Gosse, an eminent zoologist and a Plymouth Brother, his relations with whom are described in his 'Father and Son' (first published anonymously in 1907). Gosse was privately educated and entered the British Museum as assistant librarian in 1867. In 1875 he became translator to the board of trade, a post which he held until 1904, when he became librarian to the House of Lords till 1914. He devoted much attention to the northern languages, and published 'Ethical Conditions of Early Scandinavian Peoples' in 1875, and 'Northern Studies' (essays on Danish, Swedish, Norwegian, and Dutch poets) in 1879. He wrote an admirable life of Ibsen in 1908, and in 1911 published a description of 'Two Visits to Denmark', paid many years before. Gosse was Clark lecturer at Trinity College, Cambridge, from 1884 to 1890, and his inaugural course 'From Shakespeare to Pope' (1885) gave rise to some controversy between him and Churton Collins. He published the 'Life and Letters of John Donne' in 1899, lives of Gray (1882), Jeremy Taylor (1904), and Sir Thomas Browne (1905) for the English Men of Letters series; also lives of Congreve (1888) and Swinburne (1917). His collected poems appeared in 1911, and his 'Life and Letters', by the Hon. E. Charteris, in 1931. Gosse had known almost all his literary contemporaries, and was a specially close friend of Swinburne in earlier years, of Stevenson, and of Henry James (qq.v.).

GOTHIC

GOSSON, STEPHEN (1554–1624), was educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford. His plays are not now extant but were ranked by Meres among 'the best for pastorall'. He was converted by Puritan censures and attacked poets and players in his 'Schoole of Abuse' (1579), defended it in 'Ephemerides of Phialo' (1579), and replied to Lodge and 'The Play of Playes' in 'Playes confuted in Fiue Actions' (1582). He evoked, by his unauthorized dedication of his 'Schoole of Abuse' to Sir Philip Sidney, Sidney's 'Apologie for Poetrie' (published 1595). He was rector of Great Wigborough, 1591, and St. Botolph's, Bishopsgate, 1600.

Gotha, Almanach de, a genealogical, diplomatic, and statistical annual, covering all the states of the world, published in French by Justus Perthes of Gotha since 1763.

Gotham, and Gothamite, names frequently applied to New York City and its inhabitants.

Gotham, WISE MEN OF. For some reason, which is not clearly established, a reputation for folly was from very early times attributed to the inhabitants of Gotham, a village in Nottinghamshire. There is reference to such a tradition in the Towneley 'Mysteries' (q.v.). The tradition once established, it seems probable that many new stories of folly were fathered on the village. These were collected in the 'Merry Tales of Gotham by A. B.' (perhaps Andrew Borde, physician, c. 1490–1549), of which a 1630 edition is extant.

The origin of the tradition is perhaps to be found in certain customary law tenures belonging to the place or neighbourhood (Laird's 'Nottinghamshire'). According to Stapleton ('The Merry Tales of Gotham') the explanation most widely accepted is that recorded by Throsby in his 'History of Nottinghamshire' (1797): 'King John, passing through this place towards Nottingham, intending to go over the meadows I have just described, was prevented by the villagers, they apprehending that the ground over which a king passed was for ever after to become a public road. The king, incensed at their proceedings, sent from his court some of his servants to inquire of them the reason for their incivility, that he might punish them. . . . The villagers, hearing of the approach of the king's servants, thought of an expedient to turn away his majesty's displeasure. When the messengers arrived at Gotham, they found some of the inhabitants engaged in endeavouring to drown an eel in a pool of water . . . and some in hedging in a cuckoo which had perched upon an old bush. In short they were all employed in some foolish way or other, which convinced the king's servants that it was a village of fools.'

Gothic, a style of architecture prevalent in Western Europe from the 12th to the 16th cents., of which the chief characteristic is the pointed arch. The name appears to have been taken in the first instance from the

GOTHIC

French, and employed to denote any style of building that was not classical (Greek or Roman). The most usual names for the successive periods of this style in England are EARLY ENGLISH, DECORATED, and PERPENDICULAR. [OED.]

GOTHIC or BLACK-LETTER TYPE is that most commonly used for printing German. It is descended from the Gothic characters.

Gothic Revival, the reintroduction in England of Gothic architecture towards the middle of the 19th cent. Its origin can be traced to the 18th cent., when the Society of Antiquaries was founded and Horace Walpole was building at Strawberry Hill. 'The year [1840] in which the foundation-stone of the [new] Parliament Houses was laid may be taken as the turning-point in the History of the Revival' [Eastlake].

Goths, TIM, a Germanic tribe, who, in the 3rd, 4th, and 5th cents., invaded both the Eastern and the Western Empires. The Ostrogoths were the Eastern division of the tribe, which founded a kingdom in Italy; the Visigoths were the western division, which founded a kingdom in Spain. The word 'Goth' is applied in a transferred sense to one who behaves like a barbarian, especially in the destruction or neglect of works of art.

Götterdämmerung, 'Twilight of the Gods', the last of Wagner's operas in the series of the 'Ring der Nibelungen' (q.v.). It follows the 'Siegfried' (q.v.).

Siegfried leaves Brynhilde, having given her the Nibelung ring, and comes to the Hall of the Gibichungs. Owing to a magic potion, he forgets Brynhilde and falls in love with Guttrune. In order to obtain her he undertakes to win Brynhilde for Gunther, Guttrune's brother. This he does, taking Gunther's shape with the help of the tarn-helm, and takes from Brynhilde the ring. Later she sees it on his finger, when she comes, as Gunther's bride, to the Gibichung hall, and thus discovers the trick that has been played upon her. She bitterly upbraids Siegfried, and with Hagen and Gunther plots Siegfried's death. Siegfried is treacherously slain by Hagen, who hopes to get the ring. But Brynhilde places it on her finger before she throws herself on Siegfried's pyre. The Rhine rises, envelops the pyre, and the Rhine-maidens recover the ring.

GOULD, NATHANIEL (1857-1919), known as Nat Gould, journalist and novelist. His first book, 'The Double Event', published when he was working as a journalist in Australia, achieved immediate success; he subsequently wrote about 130 novels, all concerned with horse-racing. He also wrote two books on Australian life, 'On and Off the Turf' (1895) and 'Town and Bush' (1896), as well as 'The Magic of Sport: Mainly Autobiographical' (1909).

Gounod, CHARLES FRANÇOIS (1818-93),

GRACE

French musical composer. He wrote a number of operas, of which the best known are 'Faust' (1859) and 'Roméo et Juliette' (1867), church music, and many shorter pieces.

Governour, The, a treatise on politics and education by Elyot (q.v.).

Gow, HENRY, or Henry Smith, a character in Scott's 'The Fair Maid of Perth' (q.v.).

GOWER, JOHN (1330?-1408), of a Kentish family and a man of some wealth, probably lived mostly in London and was well known at court in his later years. He became blind in 1400, died at the priory of St. Mary Overies, Southwark, and was buried in the church (now St. Saviour's), where he is commemorated by a fine tomb and effigy. He was a friend of Chaucer, who called him 'moral Gower'. Of his chief works the 'Speculum Meditantis' (q.v.) or 'Mirour de l'Omme' is written in French, the 'Vox Clamantis' (q.v., c. 1382?) in Latin, and the 'Confessio Amantis' (q.v., 1390) in English. His later works include a series of ballades in French ('Cinkante Ballades'), an English poem 'In Praise of Peace', and a Latin poem in leonine hexameters, 'Cronica Tripertita', relating the events of the last years of Richard II's reign, including his deposition.

Gower, a character in Shakespeare's 'Henry V' (q.v.).

Gowkthrapple, a pulpit-drumming Puritan preacher in Scott's 'Waverley' (q.v.).

Goya y Lucientes, FRANCISCO (1746-1828), Spanish painter, born near Saragossa. He was commissioned to paint cartoons for tapestries for the Prado palace at Madrid, and was appointed court painter in 1786. He painted portraits and scenes of contemporary life with a brilliant and sometimes cynical realism. Among his portraits are two of the duke of Wellington.

Graal, HOLY, see Grail.

Grace, LADY, a character in Vanbrugh's and Cibber's 'The Provok'd Husband' (q.v.).

Grace, WILLIAM GILBERT (1848-1915), the great cricketer, was educated for the medical profession and began to practise as a surgeon in Bristol in 1879. He was famous chiefly as a batsman, but was first-rate both as a bowler and a fieldsman. His first great scores were made in 1866 (224, not out, for England against Surrey, and 173, not out, for Gentlemen of the South against Players of the South). In 1871 he made over 200 twice and over 100 eight times. Before his day a score of 50 on the rough wickets of the time was noteworthy, and a century a rare event. After 1877 his supremacy was less marked, but in 1895 and 1896 he showed a striking return to the form of his best days. He was a big heavy man, bluff and downright in manner, but his genuine kindness of heart won him many friends. His brother, Edward Mills Grace, also attained great distinction in the game.

GRACE ABOUNDING

Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners, or the brief Relation of the exceeding Mercy of God in Christ to his poor Servant John Bunyan, a homiletic narrative by Bunyan (q.v.), published in 1666.

The author relates his spiritual history, his mean birth, wicked childhood and youth, his escapes from death by various accidents and the perils of military service, and his gradual awakening to religion as a result of reading two works of devotion owned by his wife. He tells how he went to Bedford and there entered a small religious community, and recounts his spiritual experiences, temptations, and final call to the ministry. The book is written with intense fervour and sincerity.

Gracechurch, London, originally Grass Church. 'Then higher in Grasse Streete is the parish church of Saint Bennet called Grasse Church, of the Herbe market there kept' (Stow).

Graces, THE, called CHĀRTĒS by the Greeks, daughters of Zeus; Euphrosyne, Aglaia, and Thalia by name. They were goddesses of beauty and grace, who distributed joy and gentleness.

Gracioso, the buffoon of Spanish comedy.

Gradasso, in the 'Orlando Innamorato' (q.v.), the king of Sericane, who invades Spain, overcomes its king Marsilio, and presses Charlemagne back to Paris. His object is to secure Bayardo and Durindana (qq.v.), which he succeeds in doing, but not by his prowess. He is killed with Agramant by Orlando, in the great fight at Lipadusa.

Gradgrind, MR., LOUISA, and TOM, leading characters in Dickens's 'Hard Times' (q.v.).

Graeme or AVENEL, ROLAND, the hero of Scott's 'The Abbot' (q.v.).

Graevius, JOHANN GEORG (GREFFE) (1632-1703), Dutch scholar and antiquary, professor at Utrecht, the foremost Latinist of his day, a friend of Bentley.

Graham of Claverhouse, JOHN (1649?-89), first Viscount Dundee, a Royalist officer employed by the Scottish Privy Council in executing the severities of the government in Scotland during the reigns of Charles II and James II. In 1688, when James 'forsook his own cause', Dundee's life was in danger even in Scotland, and he determined to raise the Highlands for James (after the manner of his collateral, Montrose, in 1644) and was killed at the battle of Killiecrankie. He figures prominently in Scott's 'Old Mortality' (q.v.).

GRAHAME, KENNETH (1859-1932), author of 'The Golden Age' (1895), studies of childhood in an English countryside setting, which proved extremely popular. 'Dream Days', a sequel, followed in 1898. Grahame also wrote 'The Wind in the Willows' (1908), a book for children which many of their elders have also enjoyed.

Grææ or PHORCIDS, THE, the three daughters of the sea-god Phorcys, and sisters of the Gorgons (q.v.). They had one tooth and one eye between them.

GRAIL

Grail, THE HOLY. The word 'Grail' in medieval legend signified the vessel used by our Saviour at the Last Supper, in which Joseph of Arimathea received the Saviour's blood at the Cross. Its etymology is commonly referred to a popular Latin form cratalis from L. cratus altered from L. crater a cup. [OED.]

The Grail cycle, as a whole, embodies two distinct legends: (1) that of the quest by Perceval for certain talismans; this is probably the more ancient legend and, in its original form, of a pagan and mythological character (see John Rhys, 'Studies in the Arthurian Legend'). (2) The early history of the Holy Grail (see Alfred Nutt, 'The Legends of the Holy Grail'). See also under Boron.

In the earliest English poems dealing with the latter subject ('Joseph of Arimathea' of the 14th cent. and the 'History of the Holy Grail' by Henry Lovelich of the 15th cent.) based on the French prose 'Grand Saint Graal', Joseph of Arimathea goes to Sarras, carrying the dish containing Christ's blood. He tells the story of Christ to Evalak, king of Sarras. Joseph aids him to defeat Tholomer, king of Babylon, by means of prayer to Christ, before a shield marked with a red cross. Evalak and his brother-in-law are baptized by the names of Mordziens and Naciens (who figures in later narratives). Joseph goes on a missionary journey, leaving the Grail in the care of two guardians, and is imprisoned in North Wales. (For another version of the legend see Titivel.)

This narrative is in part reproduced and continued in Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur'. Launcelot is brought to the castle of King Pelles, and by enchantment has intercourse with the king's daughter Elaine, supposing her to be Guinevere. Their son (Galahad) is brought by an old man at Pentecost to the knights seated at the Round Table, and set in the vacant 'Siege Perilous' (see Round Table). The knights know him as destined to achieve the adventure of the Grail. In a burst of thunder and light the Holy Grail enters the hall, but none may see it. The knights, led by Gawain, vow to undertake its quest. The hermit Naciens warns them that none can achieve it who is not clean of his sins. Galahad obtains in an abbey a white shield with a red cross, which Joseph of Arimathea had given to King Evalak. Then follow numerous adventures by various knights in the course of their quest. Launcelot has several glimpses of the Grail, but on each occasion is warned to withdraw because of his sins, so that he repents (but only temporarily). Gawain wearies of the quest and gives it up. Finally Galahad, Percival, and Bors, all qualified by their purity for the adventure, come to the castle of Carbonek, see a marvellous vision of the Saviour and partake of his body, receive the Grail from his hands, and convey it to Sarraas. Galahad prays that when he shall ask for death he may receive it, and the request is granted him. Galahad becomes king of Sarraas, and after a year dies. The Grail is borne up to heaven and never seen again.

For Tennyson's idyll on this subject, see Holy Grail.

Grainne, in the legends relating to the Irish hero Finn, the daughter of King Cormac. Finn, though a great warrior and hunter, was unfortunate in love. He sought to marry Grainne, but she fell in love with Finn's nephew Diarmait O'Duibhne and eloped with him. The long story of their flight and Finn's unsuccessful pursuit ends in Finn's temporary acceptance of the situation; but Finn finally caused the death of Diarmait.

Grammar of Assent, The, a philosophical and religious treatise by Newman (q.v.), published in 1870.

The author examines in this work, on lines somewhat similar to those of Coleridge's 'Aids to Reflection' (q.v.), the nature of belief. Assent or belief, he holds, is an act of apprehension, subjective in character, incapable of logical proof, though rational. Logic deals with what is 'notional' or abstract, assent with what is real and concrete. The real universe is not logical, and the premises of logic are not realities but assumptions. We reach certainties, not through logic, but by intuitive perception (the 'illative' sense), from 'the cumulation of probabilities', 'probabilities too fine to avail separately, too subtle and circuitous to be convertible into syllogisms'. It is the 'living mind' of the individual that determines the process. 'It follows that what to one intellect is a proof is not so to another, and that the certainty of a proposition does properly consist in the certitude of the mind that contemplates it.'

Grammont, see Gramont.

Gramont, Mémoires de la Vie du Comte de, an anonymous work published at Cologne in 1713, written by Anthony Hamilton (1646?-1720), third son of Sir George Hamilton and grandson of the earl of Abercorn. Anthony Hamilton was the brother-in-law of the Comte de Gramont, who married Elizabeth Hamilton in 1663. The memoirs were edited (in French) by Horace Walpole and translated into English (with many errors) by Boyer (q.v.) in 1714; and this translation, revised and annotated by Sir W. Scott, was reissued in 1811.

The first part of the memoirs, dealing with Gramont's life on the Continent down to the time of his banishment from the French court, was probably dictated by Gramont to Hamilton. The second part, relating to the English court, appears to be Hamilton's own work. It is an important source of information, but its trustworthiness on details is doubtful.

GRANGERIZE

Granby, JOHN MANNERS, Marquis of (1721-70), commanded the Blues at the battle of Minden (1759), where his advance was stayed by orders of Lord George Sackville. He was afterwards commander-in-chief.

Granby, THE MARQUIS OF, in Dickens's 'Pickwick Papers' (q.v.), the inn at Dorking kept by the second Mrs. Tony Weller.

GRAND, SARAH (pseudonym of Mrs. David C. M'Fall, née Frances Elizabeth Clarke) (1862-1943), novelist, best known for her novel 'The Heavenly Twins' (1893). She was six times mayor of Bath.

Grand Question Debated, The, a poem by Swift (q.v.), published in 1729.

The question is whether a building belonging to Sir A. Acheson, known as Hamilton's Bawn, shall be turned into a barracks or a malthouse. Sir Arthur urges the profit to be derived from the malthouse, his wife the advantage of military society. Hannah, her maid, emphasizes this in a spirited picture of the arrival of the garrison, with drums and trumpets and the gold-laced captain. The poem is largely a satire on the military ignoramus.

Grand Remonstrance, an indictment drawn up by the House of Commons in the autumn of 1641 of the unconstitutional and unwise acts of Charles I from the beginning of his reign, and a demand for ministers responsible to parliament and for the settlement of Church matters by an assembly of divines selected by parliament.

Grand Siècle, Le, the age of Louis XIV of France, whose reign extended from 1643 to 1715, and was signalized by military conquests (many of which, however, had to be abandoned, and left his kingdom exhausted) and by literary and artistic splendour.

Grandgousler, the father of Gargantua (q.v.).

Grandison, CARDINAL, a character in Disraeli's 'Lothair' (q.v.).

GRANT, JAMES (1822-87), served for three years in the 62nd Regiment. Of his numerous novels the best are 'The Romance of War' (1845) and 'Adventures of an Aide-de-Camp' (1848). His other works include memoirs of Kirkcaldy of Grange, Sir J. Hepburn, and Montrose; 'British Battles on Land and Sea' (1873, with continuation, 1884); and 'Old and New Edinburgh' (1880).

GRANT DUFF, JAMES, see Duff.

Granta, THE, the old name of the river Cam, which it retains above Cambridge.

Granta, The, a Cambridge University undergraduate periodical started in 1889 by Murray Guthrie to replace the 'Gadfly', which came to an end owing to an article of a personal character. The name 'Granta' was appropriated by Guthrie from Oscar Browning, who intended it for a paper that he was about to edit. Guthrie, the first editor, was succeeded by R. C. Lehmann, and the last editor before the war of 1914-18 was John Norman of Emmanuel College, who was killed at the Dardanelles in 1915. Among distinguished contributors to the 'Granta' have been J. K. Stephen, Owen Seaman, Barry Pain, and 'F. Anstey' (Thomas Anstey Guthrie).

Grantly, ARCHDEACON, a prominent character in A. Trollope's 'The Warden' (q.v.), 'Barchester Towers' (q.v.), and other novels of the Barsetshire series. Mrs. Grantly is the elder daughter of Mr. Harding (the Warden); and Griselda, their beautiful but frigid and astute daughter, marries Lord Dumbello.

Grantorto, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', v. xii, the tyrant from whom Sir Artegall rescues Irena (Ireland). He probably represents the spirit of rebellion.

GRANVILLE-BARKER, see Barker.

Gratiano, a character in Shakespeare's 'Merchant of Venice' (q.v.).

Graustark, a romantic novel of 'love behind the throne' in the imaginary kingdom of Graustark, by George Barr M'Cutcheon, published in 1901. The novel enjoyed such popularity that a sequel was demanded, and provided in 'Beverly of Graustark' (1904).

Grave Poem, a fragment of 24 lines in Old English, probably of the 12th cent., describing in gloomy and poignant terms the fate of the body committed to the grave, and beginning:

For thee was a house built ere thou wast born.

The translation by Longfellow is widely known.

For another poem on 'The Grave' see Blair.

GRAY

Graveairs, LADY, a character in Cibber's 'The Careless Husband' (q.v.).

Graves, a district of France in the Bordeaux region on the left bank of the Garonne, producing well-known wines, less esteemed than those of Médoc. The ordinary Graves is a light dry white wine.

GRAVES, ALFRED PERCIVAL (1846-1931), born in Dublin, an inspector of schools, 1875-1910, published many volumes of Irish songs and ballads, and an autobiography, 'To Return to All That' (1930). He composed the popular 'Father O'Flynn', written in 1875, first published in the 'Spectator'.

GRAVES, RICHARD (1715-1804), educated at Pembroke College, Oxford, and a fellow of All Souls, was for many years rector of Claverton near Bath. At Pembroke he was contemporary with Whitefield, whom he satirizes in 'The Spiritual Quixote'; and became intimate with Shenstone, whom he depicts in the same work and in 'Columella', and of whom he published a 'Recollection' in 1788. His principal novels appeared as follows: 'The Spiritual Quixote' (q.v., 1772); 'Columella, the Distressed Anchorite' (1776); 'Eugenius or Anecdotes of the Golden Vale' (1785); 'Plexippus or the Aspiring Plebeian' (1790); interesting less for their plots than for the picture they give of the social conditions of the time.

Graveyard School, the imitators of Robert Blair and Edward Young (qq.v.).

Gray, GIDEON, the surgeon in Scott's 'The Surgeon's Daughter' (q.v.). His daughter is JANET.

GRAY, THOMAS (1716-71), was born in London, and educated at Eton with Horace Walpole, and at Peterhouse, Cambridge. He accompanied Horace Walpole on a tour on the Continent in 1739-41, but they quarrelled in 1741 and returned home separately. Their friendship was renewed in 1744. Gray then resided at Cambridge, removing from Peterhouse to Pembroke College in 1756 in consequence of a practical joke by undergraduates. He refused the laureateship in 1757, and was appointed professor of history and modern languages at Cambridge in 1768. He was buried at Stoke Poges in Bucks, a village with which the 'Elegy in a Country Churchyard' was perhaps identified. Here some of his relations lived and his mother was buried.

His work as an English poet began in 1742, when he wrote his odes 'On Spring', 'On a Distant Prospect of Eton College', and 'On Adversity', and the 'Sonnet on the Death of West' (his friend Richard West, to whose memory he also indited some fine lines in his Latin poem 'De Principiis Cogitandi'). About the same year he began the 'Elegy in a Country Churchyard' (q.v.), which was finished in 1750. The 'Ode on the Death of a favourite Cat' (Walpole's) was written about 1747. In 1754 Gray finished his Pindaric ode on 'The Progress of Poesy' (q.v.) and in 1757 a second Pindaric ode 'The Bard' (q.v.). These were published by Walpole in 1757. The popularity of his 'Elegy' led to the general recognition of Gray as the foremost poet of the day and to the offer of the laureateship on the death of Colley Cibber. In his later years he devoted attention to Icelandic and Celtic verse and in imitation of this wrote the lays 'The Fatal Sisters' and 'The Descent of Odin' (1761). Gray's poems were republished in 1768 by Dodale and by Foulis. In 1769 he wrote his fine ode on the installation of the duke of Grafton as chancellor of the University of Cambridge and took a journey among the English Lakes, which is commemorated in the 'Journal' published in 1775, his most finished prose work. His letters are among the best in the language (Paget Toynbee, 1915); they reveal his character and humorous spirit.

Gray's Inn, Holborn, one of the old inns of court. The manor on which it stands was granted to Reginald de Grey, Justiciar of Chester, 1294, who let part of it as a hospitium for law students (G. R. Stirling Taylor). In its hall Shakespeare's 'Comedy of Errors' was acted in Dec. 1594. Laud, Francis Bacon, and Southey were students there, and Tonson (q.v.) lived there.

Great Commoner, THE, a name sometimes given to William Pitt the elder (q.v.).

Great Duke of Florence, The, a romantic comedy by Massinger (q.v.), acted in 1627 and printed in 1636; one of Massinger's best plays.

Giovanni, nephew of the widowed duke of Florence, has for three years been entrusted to a tutor, Charomonte, at whose house he has fallen in love with Charomonte's daughter, Lidia, when he is recalled to his uncle's court. The messenger who goes to fetch him brings to the duke so fervent an account of Lidia's beauty, that the duke sends his favourite, Sanazarro, to report upon her, with the idea of making her his second wife. Sanazarro is himself so struck with Lidia's beauty that for his own ends he conceals it from the Duke, and persuades Giovanni also to dispraise her. Perplexed by these contradictory reports, the duke goes to Charomonte's house to see for himself. Giovanni sends warning to Lidia, and an attempt is made to keep up the deception, Lidia's maid impersonating her before the duke. But Charomonte has not been made a party to the scheme and unwittingly reveals it. However, in the end, the duke remembers his vow never to remarry, and Giovanni and Lidia obtain their pardon.

Great Eastern, The, a steamship, the largest of its day, designed by I. K. Brunel (q.v.) and launched in 1858. It was 692 ft. long and had a displacement of 12,000 tons. It was designed for the Atlantic passenger service, but was mostly employed in cable-laying and was broken up in 1886.

Great Elector, THE, Frederick William, Elector of Brandenburg (1620-88).

Great Expectations, a novel by Dickens (q.v.), which first appeared in 'All the Year Round' in 1860-1, and was published in book form in the latter year.

It is the story of the development of the character of Philip Pirrip, commonly known as 'Pip', a village boy brought up by his termagant sister, the wife of the gentle, humorous, kindly blacksmith Joe Gargery. He is introduced to the house of Miss Havisham, a lady half-crazed by the desertion of her lover on her bridal night, who, in a spirit of revenge, has brought up the girl Estella to use her beauty as a means of torturing men. Pip falls in love with Estella, and aspires to become a gentleman. Money and expectations of more wealth come to him from a mysterious source, which he believes to be Miss Havisham. He goes to London, and in his new mode of life meanly abandons the devoted Joe Gargery, a humble connexion of whom he is now ashamed. Misfortunes come upon him. His unknown benefactor proves to be an escaped convict, Abel Magwitch, to whom he, as a boy, had rendered a service; his great expectations fade away and he is penniless. Estella marries his sulky enemy, Bentley Drummle, by whom she is cruelly ill-treated. Taught by adversity, Pip returns to Joe Gargery and honest labour, and is finally reunited to Estella, who has also learnt her lesson. Other notable characters in the book are Joe's uncle, the impudent old impostor Pumblechook; Jaggers, the skilful Old Bailey lawyer, and his good-hearted clerk Wemmick; and Pip's friend in London, Herbert Pocket.

It appears from Forster's 'Life' of Dickens that the author originally devised a less happy ending to the story, which he altered in deference to the advice of Lytton.

Great Go, formerly university slang for the final examination for the degree of B.A. at Oxford. The term is now obsolete. See Greats.

Great Harry, The, or Henry Grâce à Dieu, a great ship of Henry VIII's navy, of 1,000 tons burden. Refitted in 1515, she carried a crew of 700 men, and 50 large and 200 small guns. She was burnt in 1553.

Greek Fire, a combustible composition for setting fire to an enemy's ships or works, so called from being used by the Greeks of Constantinople. The components were naphtha, nitre, and sulphur, and it was discharged through tubes or carried by means of arrows. Bury (Gibbon, vi. 9, 10, and 540) says there was more than one kind of mixture and that it was propelled through the tubes by true gunpowder: if the Greeks had used this powder to propel solid missiles they would have revolutionized warfare. But the secret was lost, and it was one of the three things, said the Emperor Constantine Porphyrogenitus, 'that must never be given to the barbarians'.

Greeley, HORACE (1811-72), founder of the 'New York Tribune' (1841), and one of the prominent figures in the history of American journalism, who did much to raise its political and literary standards.

GREEN, JOHN RICHARD (1837-83), educated at Magdalen College School and Jesus College, Oxford, was a frequent contributor to the 'Saturday Review', but is best known by his 'Short History of the English People', published in 1874. This work owed its great popularity to its simple style and generous outlook, for the author shows his interest in the life of the humbler classes of the population, and includes in the scope of his work all the aspects, social, political, economic, and intellectual, of the national history. It was enlarged in 'The History of the English People' (1877-80). 'The Making of England' and 'The Conquest of England', in which he developed more fully certain parts of the 'History', appeared in 1881 and 1883. Some of Green's contributions to the 'Saturday Review' were republished as 'Studies from England and Italy' in 1876.

GREEN, Mrs. MARY ANNE EVERETT (1818-95), was author of 'Letters of Royal Ladies of Great Britain' (published in 1846 under her maiden name of Wood), 'Lives of Princesses of Great Britain' (1849-55), and 'Life and Letters of Henrietta Maria' (1857). She edited at the Public Record Office forty-one volumes of Calendars of Domestic State Papers.

GREEN, MATTHEW (1696-1737), author of 'The Spleen', a poem in praise of the simple contemplative life, as a cure for boredom, written in witty, fluent, octosyllabic verse.

GREEN-SLEEVES

GREEN, THOMAS HILL (1836-82), educated at Rugby and Balliol College, Oxford, was appointed White's professor of moral philosophy in 1878. He was the 'Mr. Gray' of 'Robert Elsmere' (q.v.). Green's philosophical publications began with a criticism of Locke, Hume, and Berkeley in the form of two very full introductions to a new edition of Hume's 'Treatise' (1874). His philosophical views as set forth in his 'Prolegomena to Ethics' (1883) and in his collected 'Works' (1885-8) show a qualified acceptance of the doctrines of Hegel (q.v.) as speculatively true but requiring to be supplemented for practical purposes. He holds that Reality as known is a system of relations, presupposing the synthetic activity of the self. 'We believe that these questions cannot be worked out without leading to the conclusion that the real world is essentially a spiritual world, which forms one interrelated whole because related throughout to a single subject. . . . But when we have satisfied ourselves that the world in its truth or full reality is spiritual . . . we may still have to confess that a knowledge of it in its spiritual reality . . . is impossible to us.' From the freedom of man to seek his satisfaction where alone he can find it, in 'a complete realisation of what he has in him to be', he deduces the existence of God and the personal immortality of man.

Green, VERDANT, the hero of a novel of that name (1853-7) by E. Bradley (q.v.) ('Cuthbert Bede'). It is a humorous account of the adventures of an innocent undergraduate.

Green Knight, see Gawain and the Green Knight.

Green Mountain Boys, THE, an irregular force of some 300 men, led by Ethan Allen (q.v.), originally organized to defend the independence of the 'New Hampshire Grants' against the interference of the New York land-jobbers.

Green Mountain State, Vermont, see United States.

GREENAWAY, KATE (1846-1901), English artist and book illustrator. Of her 'Under the Window' (1879) 150,000 copies are said to have been sold. Her 'Birthday Book', 'Mother Goose', 'Little Ann', and other books for children had enormous success and are now highly valued. Her use of the quaint costume of the beginning of the 19th cent. lent humour to her fancy and so captured the public taste that it has been said that 'Kate Greenaway dressed the children of two continents'. Although she illustrated the 'Pied Piper of Hamelin' and other works, the artist preferred to provide her own text; the numerous verses which were found among her papers after her death show real talent. There is a life of her by H. M. Spielmann and G. S. Layard (1905). [E.B.]

Green-sleeves, the name of an inconstant lady-love, who is the subject of a ballad published in 1580. This, and the tune to which it was sung, became very popular, and both are mentioned by Shakespeare ('Merry Wives', II. i and v. v). The ballad is included in the 'Roxburghe Ballads'.

GREENE, ROBERT (1560?-92), was educated at St. John's College and Clare Hall, Cambridge, and was incorporated at Oxford in 1588. He appears from his own writings and the attacks of Gabriel Harvey (q.v.) to have been a witty Bohemian, of good intentions but poor performance, who drifted to a miserable end, and is said to have died after an illness brought on by a surfeit of pickled herrings and Rhenish wine. He was assailed by Harvey in 'Foure Letters' as 'The Ape of Euphues', and defended by Nashe (q.v.) in 'Strange Newes'. He probably had some share in the authorship of the original 'Henry VI' plays, which Shakespeare revised or re-wrote. Among his thirty-eight publications were pamphlets, romances, and five (posthumous) plays, including 'The Honorable Historie of frier Bacon and frier Bongay' (q.v.), acted in 1594. Of the romances, 'Menaphon' (q.v., 1589), reprinted as 'Greene's Arcadia' (1599, &c.), 'Pandosto, or Dorastus and Fawnia' (q.v., 1588), 'Philomela' (q.v., 1592), and 'Perimedes the Blacksmith' (1588), contain lyrical passages of great charm. One of the best known of these is Sephestia's song in 'Menaphon', 'Weepe not, my wanton'. His numerous pamphlets include 'Euphues, his Censure of Philautus' (a continuation of Lyly's work, 1587), 'Greene's Mourning Garment' (1590), 'Never Too Late' (1590), 'Farewell to Folly' (1591), 'A Quip for an Upstart Courtier' (1592, an account of a dispute between a spendthrift courtier and a tradesman, containing an interesting review of various trades), and the autobiographical 'Groatsworth of Wit bought with a Million of Repentance' (q.v., 1592), in which occurs the attack on Shakespeare. His autobiographical sketches, and his tracts on 'Conny-catching' (1591 and 1592), in which he describes the methods of London rogues and swindlers, male and female, throw light on the low life of the times. His plays and poems were edited by Dyce, 1831, his complete works by Grosart, 1881-6, and his plays and poems by Churton Collins, 1905.

Greenwich Hospital stands on the site of a royal residence erected in the reign of Edward I, where Henry VIII and his daughters, Mary and Elizabeth, were born. William III and Mary converted it into a hospital for disabled seamen, and new buildings designed by Wren were then erected. The patients of the old 'Dreadnought' (q.v.) Seamen's Hospital were transferred to it in 1870. The life in Greenwich Hospital is admirably depicted in Marryat's 'Poor Jack' (1840). The Naval Museum is also housed there.

Greenwich Observatory was erected by Charles II at the instance of Sir Jonas Moore, the mathematician, and Sir Christopher Wren, and here John Flamsteed, the first astronomer-royal, took up his residence in 1676. The meridian of Greenwich was adopted as the universal meridian at an international conference in Washington in 1884.

GREENWICH TIME is the mean time of the meridian of Greenwich.

GREG, WALTER WILSON (1875-), bibliographer, general editor of the Malone Society's publications since 1906. His writings include, besides much editorial work on Shakespeare and other Elizabethan texts, 'The Calculus of Variants' (1927), 'Principles of Emendation in Shakespeare' (1928), and 'Dramatic Documents from the Elizabethan Playhouses' (1931). His 'English Literary Autographs, 1550-1650' was published in three parts and supplement (1925-32).

Gregorian Calendar, see Calendar.

Gregorian chant, music, &c., the ancient system of ritual music, otherwise known as plain-chant or plain-song (where 'plain' has the sense of even, level), characterized by free rhythm and a limited scale. It is founded on the Antiphonarium, of which Pope Gregory I is presumed to have been the compiler.

GREGORY I, ST., 'The Great', Pope 590-604, one of the greatest of the early occupants of the see, a zealous propagator of Christianity and reformer of clerical and monastic discipline (see also Gregorian chant). It was he who sent Augustine (q.v.) to England. He was the author of the 'Cura Pastoralis' (see Alfred), 'Dialogues', 'Letters', homilies, &c. It is told of him that, seeing Anglo-Saxon boys offered for sale in the slave-market at Rome, he remarked: 'Not Angli but Angeli, if they were Christians.'

Gregory VII, see Hildebrand.

GREGORY, AUGUSTA, LADY (1852-1932), née Persse, married in 1881 Sir William Gregory, formerly M.P. for co. Galway and governor of Ceylon. She co-operated with W. B. Yeats (q.v.) in the creation of the Irish National Theatre, for which she wrote many plays. Her publications include: 'Cuchulain of Muirthemne' (1902); 'Gods and Fighting Men' (1904); 'Seven Short Plays' (1909, 'Spreading the News', 'Hyacinth Hulvey', 'The Rising of the Moon', 'The Jackdaw', 'The Workhouse Ward', 'The Travelling Man', 'The Gaol Gate'); 'The Kiltartan History Book' (1909); 'Irish Folk History Plays' (1912, 'Kincora', 'The White Cockade', 'Dervorgilla', 'The Canavans', 'The Deliverer', 'Grania'); 'New Comedies' (1913, 'Coats', 'The Full Moon', 'The Bogie Man', 'Damer's Gold', 'McDonough's Wife'); 'The Kiltartan Poetry Book' (1919); 'Three Wonder Plays' (1922); 'The Story brought by Brigit' (1924); 'Three Last Plays' (1928); 'My First Play' (1930); 'Coole' (1931); and adaptations of Molière.

Gregory of Tours (c. 540-94), bishop of Tours, our chief authority for the early Merovingian period of French history (translation, O. M. Dalton, 1927).

GRENDDEL

Grendel, see Beowulf.

GRENFELL, JULIAN HENRY (1888-1915), son of William Henry Grenfell, afterwards first baron Desborough, was educated at Eton and Balliol College, Oxford, obtained a commission in the army in 1910, and was killed early in the war of 1914-18. He is the author of the fine poem 'Into Battle'. The few other poems left by Grenfell are in lighter vein.

Grenville, SIR RICHARD (1541?-91), the naval commander who, when his ship the 'Revenge' was isolated off Flores, fought fifteen Spanish ships for fifteen hours, and was mortally wounded. The exploit is celebrated in Tennyson's poem 'The Revenge'; and Grenville figures in Kingsley's 'Westward Ho!' A curiously antagonistic interpretation of him occurs in Stevenson's essay, 'The English Admirals'.

Gresham, FRANK, one of the principal characters in Trollope's 'Dr. Thorne' (q.v.).

Gresham, SIR THOMAS (1519?-79), a celebrated financier and financial agent of the Crown, and an intimate friend of Cecil. He was the son of Sir Richard Gresham (1485?-1549), lord mayor of London, who initiated the design of the Royal Exchange (q.v.). This was built at the expense of Sir Thomas Gresham, who also founded Gresham College. The foolish story that he was a founding, and adopted his well-known crest because his life was saved by the chirping of a grasshopper, is disproved by the fact that the crest was used by his ancestor, James Gresham, in the 15th cent.

Gresham's Law, that in a bimetallic currency the dearer metal will drive out the cheaper; where dearer metal is that which is undervalued by the law at home, but in another country is dearer in terms of the commodities it will buy there; and cheaper metal is the converse; in other words 'bad money drives out good'. The law is attributed to Sir T. Gresham in allusion to the beginning of his letter of 1558 to Queen Elizabeth 'touching the fall of the exchange'. (See Lord Aldenham's 'Colloquy on Currency'.)

Gretchen, diminutive in German of Margaret, the principal female character in Pt. I of Goethe's 'Faust' (q.v.).

Gretna Green, a few miles NW. of Carlisle and just across the border, a spot celebrated for runaway marriages; for under Scottish law a declaration by the parties before witnesses of intention to marry constitutes a legal marriage. The declarations were in the latter part of the 18th cent. received by Joseph Paisley, known as a blacksmith. The practice was in 1856 made illegal unless one of the parties had lived in Scotland for 21 days.

Greuze, JEAN-BAPTISTE (1725-1805), a famous French genre and portrait painter.

GREY

Grève, PLACE DE, the open space in front of the present Hôtel de Ville in Paris, where, under the ancien régime, executions used to take place.

GREVILLE, CHARLES CAVENDISH FULKE (1794-1865), was clerk to the council from 1821 to 1859, and intimate with statesmen of both political parties, especially Wellington (to whom his brother Algernon Frederick was private secretary, 1827-42) and Palmerston. This, and his remarkable insight into character, give exceptional interest to the three series of 'Greville Memoirs', of which the first, covering the reigns of George IV and William IV, was published in 1874. The second, dealing with the years 1837-52, and the third with the years 1852-60, appeared, with some suppressions by the editor, Henry Reeve, in 1885 and 1887. A complete edition with the suppressed passages restored appeared in 1938. Greville published anonymously in 1845 'The Past and Present Policy of England to Ireland', advocating a liberal treatment in the matter of religious endowments.

GREVILLE, SIR FULKE, first Baron Brooke (1554-1628), educated at Jesus College, Cambridge, came to court with Sir Philip Sidney, and became a favourite of Elizabeth. He was a member of Gabriel Harvey's 'Areopagus', a member of parliament, and held various important offices. He was created a peer in 1621 and granted Warwick Castle and Knowle Park by James I. He befriended Bacon, Camden, Coke, Daniel, and D'Avenant. His end was tragic, for he was murdered by his servant Haywood, who thought himself omitted from his master's will. His epitaph reads: 'Servant to Queen Elizabeth, Councillor to King James, Friend to Sir Philip Sidney, Trophæum Peccati.'

Except the tragedy of 'Mustapha' (1609) and one or two poems in 'The Phoenix Nest' and 'England's Helicon', Greville's works appeared only after his death. A collection of works 'written in his youth' was printed in 1633, his 'Life of Sidney' in 1652, and his 'Remains' in 1670. His complete works were reprinted by Grosart in 1870. Of these the principal are the tragedies of 'Mustapha' and 'Alaham' (qq.v.), which Charles Lamb described as 'political treatises, not plays', but which contain some impressive choruses and striking phrases; and 'Caelica', a collection of 'sonnets' and songs, some of them love poems, others of a religious or philosophical cast. His life of Sir Philip Sidney gives vivid portraits of Queen Elizabeth, William of Orange, and Sidney. The latter's pastoral, 'Join, mates, in mirth with me', is addressed to Greville and Sir Edward Dyer (q.v.).

Grewglous, MR., a character in Dickens's 'Edwin Drood' (q.v.).

Zealand (1845-53), both of which colonies he raised from disorder to comparative prosperity, Cape Colony (1853-61), and again New Zealand (1861-7). He published 'Polynesian Mythology' (1855) and other works on the history, geography, and language of Australia and New Zealand.

GREY OF FALL'ODON, EDWARD GREY, Viscount (1862-1933), educated at Winchester and Balliol College, Oxford, foreign secretary, 1905-16; chancellor of Oxford University, 1928-33; author of 'Fly-Fishing' (1899), 'The Charm of Birds' (1927), 'Twenty-Five Years' (memoirs, 1925).

Grey Friars, Franciscans (q.v.).

Gride, ARTHUR, a character in Dickens's 'Nicholas Nickleby' (q.v.).

Griex, CHEVALIER DES, the hero of the Abbé Prévost's 'Manon Lescaut' (q.v.).

GRIFFIN, GERALD (1803-40), Irish dramatist and novelist, remembered for his novel 'The Collegians' (q.v., 1829), which Boucicault made the basis of his play 'Colleen Bawn' (q.v.). Griffin's play 'Gisippus' was produced at Drury Lane in 1842.

Griffin, GRIFFON, GRYPHON, a fabulous animal usually represented with the head and wings of an eagle and the body and hind-quarters of a lion. By the Greeks the griffins were believed to inhabit Scythia and to keep guard over the gold of that country (see Arimaspians).

Griffith Gaunt, or Jealousy, a novel by Reade (q.v.), published in 1866.

The story is set in the 18th cent. Griffith Gaunt, a Cumberland gentleman of no fortune, marries Kate Peyton, a Roman Catholic heiress, a woman of incalculable pride and temper. The harmony of the household is gradually broken by Kate's spiritual director, Father Leonard, an eloquent young priest who falls in love with Kate. Griffith, whose suspicions have been aroused by a designing maid-servant, finds them together under equivocal circumstances, and after a violent scene leaves his wife intending never to return. He is nursed through a severe illness by Mercy Vint, an innkeeper's daughter, and bigamously marries her under the name of Thomas Leicester, his illegitimate half-brother, who resembles him in appearance. He returns to his old home to recover a sum of money, accidentally meets Kate, is reconciled to her, and determines to break off with Mercy Vint. Before he effects the separation his crime is discovered by his wife, who furiously upbraids and threatens him. Griffith leaves the house, a pistol-shot and a cry of murder are heard, and he disappears. Some days later a disfigured body, believed to be his, is found in a neighbouring mere. Kate is tried for the murder of her husband, and is in danger of conviction, when Mercy intervenes and proves that the body is that of Tom Leicester. Griffith and Kate are once more reconciled, and Mercy marries Sir George Neville, a former suitor of Kate. The work, when it appeared, was severely criticized as immoral.

GRIMM

Grim, the fisherman in the story of 'Havelok the Dane' (q.v.), legendary founder of Grimsby.

GRIMALD, GRIMALDE, or GRIM-VALD, NICHOLAS (1519-62), of Christ's College, Cambridge, chaplain to Bishop Ridley, contributed to, and assisted in the compilation of, 'Tottel's Miscellany' (see Tottel). He published translations from Virgil and Cicero, and two Latin dramas.

Grimaldi, JOSEPH (1779-1837), a celebrated clown and pantomimist, who first appeared as an infant dancer at Sadler's Wells, and acted there and at Drury Lane for many years. He had a son of the same name who succeeded him as pantomimist and died in 1863. Grimaldi's 'Memoirs' were edited by Dickens (2 vols. 1838).

Grimalkin, probably from grey and malkin, a name given to a cat, especially an old she-cat, and contemptuously applied to a jealous or imperious old woman.

Grimbald, or GRIMBOLD, or GRYMBOLD, ST. (820?-903), a native of Flanders and a monk of St. Bertin's. Alfred, when king, summoned him to England for the promotion of learning, and appointed him abbot of the New Minster at Winchester. According to the entirely mythical history of Oxford, Grimbald was sent there to direct the recently established schools, but owing to the jealousy of the masters was obliged to withdraw. He is commemorated on 8 July.

Grimbert or GRYMBERT, the badger in 'Reynard the Fox' (q.v.).

Grimes, THOMAS, chimney-sweep, Tom's employer in C. Kingsley's 'The Water Babies' (q.v.).

Grimes, PETER, the subject of Letter xxii in Crabbe's 'The Borough' (q.v.). He was a villainous fellow who 'fish'd by water and filch'd by land', and killed his apprentices by ill-treatment, until, becoming suspect and forbidden to keep apprentices, he lived in solitude. Under the sting of guilty conscience he became insane, and died after undergoing awful terrors. B. Britten's opera 'Peter Grimes' was produced in 1945.

GRIMM, FRIEDRICH MELCHIOR (1723-1807), born at Ratisbon, author during 1753-73 of the greater part of a 'Correspondance littéraire', letters to German sovereigns containing a survey of French literary and artistic activities during that period. The 'Correspondance' was continued to 1790 by J. H. Meister.

GRIMM, JACOB LUDWIG CARL (1785-1863), and WILHELM CARL (1786-1859), brothers and Germans, were authors of works on German philology and German folk-lore, and are chiefly known in England by their fairy tales ('Kinder- und Hausmärchen'

Jacob Grimm in his 'Deutsche Grammatik' formulated Grimm's Law of the mutations of the consonants in the several Aryan languages.

GRIMMELSHAUSEN, HANS JACOB CHRISTOPH VON (1625?-76), German writer, author of 'Simplicissimus' (q.v.).

Grimwig, Mr., a character in Dickens's 'Oliver Twist' (q.v.).

Gringolet, Gawain's horse (e.g. in the story of 'Sir Gawain and the Green Knight', q.v.); French Gringalet, a word of unknown etymology, which appears in the 12th cent., signifying a kind of horse (Hatzfeld and Darmesteter). It has been said (by Prof. I. Gollancz) that the name belonged originally to the boat of the mythical hero Wade (q.v.); but it is found some centuries earlier as the name of Gawain's horse. The earliest authority for 'Gringalet' as the name of Wade's boat is Speght (in his edition of Chaucer, 1598).

Grip, in Dickens's 'Barnaby Rudge' (q.v.), Barnaby's raven.

Gripe, one of the chief characters in Vanbrugh's 'The Confederacy' (q.v.).

Gripe, Sir Francis, a character in Mrs. Centlivre's 'The Busybody' (q.v.).

Grippy, and LEDGY GRIPPY, Claud Walkinshaw and his wife, characters in Galt's 'The Entail' (q.v.).

Griselda, the type of long-suffering fortitude; see Patient Grisil.

Groat, a silver coin first issued in England by Edward I, and more permanently by Edward III, worth fourpence. None were struck after the time of Charles II, until the fourpenny piece was revived by William IV and continued to be issued until 1856. The word is taken from the Dutch groot, meaning great, in the sense of thick (i.e. a thick penny).

Groatsettars, THE MISSES, characters in Scott's 'The Pirate' (q.v.).

Groatworth of Wit bought with a Million of Repentance, A, an autobiographical prose tract by Greene (q.v.), published in 1592. It begins with the death of the miser Gorinius, who leaves the bulk of his large fortune to his elder son, and only 'an old Groate' to the younger, Roberto (i.e. the author), 'wherewith I wish him to buy a groatsworth of wit'. Roberto conspires with a courtesan to fleece his brother, Lucanio, but the courtesan betrays him to the latter, subsequently ruining Lucanio for her sole profit. The gradual degradation of Roberto is then narrated, and the tract ends with the curious 'Address' to his fellow playwrights, Marlowe, Lodge, and Peele, urging them to spend their wits to better purpose than the making of plays. It contains the well-known passage about the 'Crow, beautified with our Feathers', the 'Johannes Factotum', who 'is in his owne conceit the only Shake-scene in a Countrey', probably referring to Shakespeare, whose earliest plays were adaptations of works by his predecessors.

Groblian (German Grobheit, rudeness), the name of an imaginary personage, often referred to by writers of the 15th and 16th cents. in Germany as a type of boorishness. Sebastian Brant in his 'Narrenschiff' (see Ship of Fools) invented St. Grobianus as typical of ill-mannered and indecent behaviour. In 1549 F. Dedekind, a German student, wrote a poem in Latin elegiacs, 'Grobianus, De Morum Simplicitate', a burlesque of the generally uncivilized social conditions then prevailing in Germany, in the form of ironical advice on conduct given to a gallant. This was translated into German by Kaspar Scheidt, and into English, and suggested to Dekker his 'Guls Hornebooke' (q.v.).

Grocyn, WILLIAM (1446?-1519), educated at Winchester and New College, Oxford, held various ecclesiastical preferments. He studied in Italy with Linacre (q.v.) under Poliziano and Chalcondyles, and was instrumental in introducing the study of Greek at Oxford.

Grongar Hill, see Dyer.

GRONOVIVS, JOHANN FRIEDRICH (1611-71), a Dutch scholar and editor of Greek and Roman classics. His son, JAKOB GRONOVIVS (1645-1716), was professor of Greek at Leyden, and, like his father, an editor of classical authors.

GROSART, ALEXANDER BALLOCH (1827-1899), author and editor. His claim to remembrance rests on his reprints of rare Elizabethan and Jacobean literature. Between 1868 and 1886 he edited more than 130 volumes. He also published several original devotional works, and contributed to literary and theological periodicals.

GROSE, FRANCIS (1731?-91), antiquary and draughtsman, author of a 'Classical Dictionary of the Vulgar Tongue' (1785), reissued as 'Lexicon Balatronicum' (1811).

GROSSETESTE, ROBERT (d. 1253), bishop of Lincoln, was the author of a 'Compendium Scientiarum', a classification of the knowledge of his day; of works on philosophy, theology, and husbandry; and of an allegorical poem on the Virgin and Son, the 'Château d'Amour', in French (edited by R. F. Weymouth, 1864). 'He gave a powerful impulse to almost every department of intellectual activity' in England [F. S. Stevenson], and earned the commendation of Roger Bacon in the field of science, of Matthew Paris, of Wycliffe, and of Gower. Also he stood up to Popes (especially Innocent IV) against their encroachments on the Church of England.

Grosvenor Gallery, THE, Bond Street.

GROSVENOR GALLERY

London, for the exhibition of pictures of the modern school, erected by Sir Coutts Lindsay in 1876 (Haydn). It was especially associated for a time with the 'aesthetic' (q.v.) movement. Bunthorne in Gilbert and Sullivan's 'Patience' describes himself as:

A pallid and thin young man,
A haggard and lank young man,
A greenery-yallery, Grosvenor Gallery,
Foot-in-the-grave young man.

The Gallery is now closed.

GROTE, GEORGE (1794–1871), banker, educated at Charterhouse, was M.P. for the City of London from 1832 to 1841 and took an active part in favour of the reform movement, publishing a pamphlet on the subject in 1820 and another in 1831. He retired from parliament in order to devote himself to historical work. His famous 'History of Greece' in eight volumes, on which he had been intermittently at work since 1823, was published in 1846–56 and achieved immediate success. It has been translated into French and German. Grote also published works on the philosophies of Plato and Aristotle ('Plato and the other Companions of Socrates', 1865; 'Aristotle', 1872), and 'Fragments on Ethical Subjects' (1876). He was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Grotesque, from Italian grottesca, apparently from grotte, grottoes, the popular name in Rome for the chambers of ancient buildings which had been revealed by excavations and which contained those mural paintings which were typical examples of the 'grotesque' style; hence a kind of decorative painting or sculpture, consisting of representations of portions of human and animal forms, fantastically combined and interwoven with foliage and flowers. [OED.]

GROTIUS, HUGO (1583–1645), Dutch statesman and jurist, was born at Delft, studied law at Orleans and Leyden, and became the leader of the bar at The Hague. He wrote in 1601 a sacred drama in Latin, 'Adamus Exsul', with which Milton was probably familiar when he wrote 'Paradise Lost'. Grotius was Dutch ambassador in London in 1613, but his intimacy with Barneveld (who was executed in 1619 for conspiracy against the State) led to his condemnation to imprisonment for life. From this he escaped in a large box in which books were sent to him for the purpose of study, and took refuge in Paris. He became the ambassador of Queen Christina of Sweden at the French Court, and died, after shipwreck, in her service. He wrote a large number of works, including a Latin history of the revolt of the Netherlands. But his principal title to fame is his great treatise of international law, the 'De jure Belli et Pacis', published in 1625. In the midst of the Thirty Years War (1618–48) he asserted in this work the principle of a rule of law binding upon nations in their relations with one another.

GRYLL GRANGE

GROVE, SIR GEORGE (1820–1900), a writer on a great variety of subjects, is especially notable as having projected and edited the 'Dictionary of Music and Musicians' (4 vols. 1878–89, and later editions).

Growth of Love, The, a sonnet-sequence by R. Bridges (q.v.).

Grub Street, London, according to Samuel Johnson was 'originally the name of a street near Moorfields in London, much inhabited by writers of small histories, dictionaries, and temporary poems, whence any mean production is called grubstreet' ('Dictionary'). The name of the street was changed in the 19th cent. to Milton Street (Cripplegate). 'Grub Street' is current in modern usage as an epithet meaning 'of the nature of literary hack-work'.

According to Stow (1598), Grub Street was 'of late years inhabited for the most part by Bowyers, Fletchers, Bowstring makers, and such like', but in his time given up to bowling alleys and dicing houses. Neanias, in Randolph's 'Hey for Honesty' (iv. iii) says of Anus: 'Her eyes are Cupid's Grub Street: the blind archer makes his love-arrows there.'

Grub Street Journal, The, which appeared during 1730–8, vigorously attacked Pope's adversaries in the 'Dunciad' controversy. Pope probably had some part in its production.

Grubbinol, a shepherd in Gay's 'Shepherd's Week' (q.v.).

Grueby, JOHN, a character in Dickens's 'Barnaby Rudge' (q.v.), servant to Lord George Gordon.

Grundy, Mrs., the symbol of conventional propriety. For the origin of the expression see Speed the Plough.

Gryll, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', II. xii. 86, the hog in the Bower of Acrasia who repined greatly at being changed back into a man. The incident is taken from a dialogue of Plutarch, in which Gryllus is one of the Greeks transformed into swine by Circe (see also Gryll Grange).

Gryll Grange, the last novel of Peacock (q.v.), published in 1860 or early in 1861.

In it we have the house party that is the usual feature of most of his books, diversified by the addition of an eccentric young gentleman, Algernon Falconer, who lives in a tower, attended by seven 'Vestals', as beautiful and accomplished as they are virtuous. Mr. Gryll of Gryll Grange believes himself descended from Circe's Gryllus (see under Gryll), though he finds it difficult to establish the pedigree. The Rev. Dr. Opimian, 'a man of purple cheer, A rosy man right plump to see', an agreeable gourmet who combines much learning with conservative views, is the most notable of the characters. These discourse on many subjects, from the Greek theatre and ancient music to cooking and card-playing, with much display of curious learning and apt quotation. The slender thread of the plot, concerned with the love affairs of Mr. Falconer and Lord Curryfin, ends in a prodigious marriage, at which nine brides are wedded to nine bridegrooms.

GRYLL GRANGE

Gryphon, see Griffin.

Guanhamara, see Guinevere.

Guardian, The, a periodical started by Steele (q.v.) in March 1713. It professed at the outset to abstain from political questions, and Addison contributed fifty-one papers to it. It included also among its contributors Berkeley, Pope, and Gay. But Steele soon launched into political controversy, falling foul of the Tory 'Examiner' (q.v.). Owing to some disagreement with Tonson, the publisher, the 'Guardian' came to an abrupt end in October 1713 and was succeeded by the 'Englishman'.

GUARINI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA (1537-1612), an Italian poet, born at Ferrara, author of the pastoral drama, 'Il Pastor Fido' (1585), which had considerable vogue in England in the 17th cent. It was repeatedly translated into English, and also acted in a Latin version at Cambridge.

Gubbins or GUBBINGS, a contemptuous name formerly given to the inhabitants of a district near Brent Tor on the edge of Dartmoor (described as 'a Scythia within England' by Fuller), who are said to have been absolute savages. The 'King of the Gubbings' appears in C. Kingsley's 'Westward Ho!' (q.v.).

Gudrun, (1) the subject of a German national epic of the 13th cent., composed in Austria. She is the daughter of King Hetel, and betrothed to Herwig of Seeland. She is carried off by Hartmut of Normandy, and because she refuses to be his wife is set to do menial work. After thirteen years she is rescued, and marries Herwig [E.B. 11th ed.]. (2) In the 'Volsunga Saga' and in W. Morris's 'Sigurd the Volsung' (q.v.), the daughter of the king of the Niblungs; (3) the heroine of the Laxdaela Saga (see Gudrun, The Lovers of).

Gudrun, The Lovers of, one of the wanderers' tales in W. Morris's 'The Earthly Paradise' (q.v.), a translation of the Laxdaela Saga (see Saga).

It is the story of Gudrun, daughter of Oeuf, a great lord in Iceland, and of the many men who loved her, but in particular of Kiartan and his bosom friend and cousin Bodli. Gudrun passionately returns the love of Kiartan, who excels all in manly deeds and is kindly in disposition, but Kiartan, before he will marry her, goes with Bodli to Norway in search of fame, and there spends some years at the court of Olaf Trygvesson. Bodli returns to Iceland, and, yielding to the temptation of his passion for Gudrun, tells her that Kiartan now loves Ingibiorg, the sister of King Olaf, and will marry her. Broken-hearted, but at last convinced of Kiartan's unfaithfulness, Gudrun marries Bodli. Then Kiartan returns to claim his bride. Gudrun curses the miserable Bodli, and Kiartan, likewise broken-hearted, half contemptuously spares him. Bodli, driven by despair and the taunts of those about him, joins in an ambush prepared by Kiartan's enemies, and slays his friend, to be slain later by Kiartan's brothers. Gudrun later marries again.

GUIDO DA COLONNA

Guebres (pron. Gē'bers), adherents of the ancient Persian religion, fire-worshippers, Zoroastrians. The name is more or less obsolete.

Guelphs and the Ghibellines, THE, the two great parties in medieval Italian politics, supporting respectively the popes and the emperors. GUELPH is the name of the princely family represented in modern times by the ducal house of Brunswick, and WELF is said to have been used at the battle of Weinsberg in 1140 as a war-cry by the partisans of the duke of Bavaria, who belonged to this family and fought against the Emperor Conrad III. GHIBELLINE is said to be a corruption of Wanblinghi, the name of an estate belonging to the Hohenstaufen family, used as a war-cry by the partisans of the emperor at the same battle. [OED.]

Guendolen, in Scott's 'Bridal of Triermain' (q.v.), a fay who beguiles King Arthur into loving her, and becomes the mother of Gyneth. See also Guendolen.

Guerre, MARTIN, a Gascon gentleman of the 16th cent., who after ten years of married life disappeared from the country. Subsequently, a certain Arnaud du Thil, bearing a close resemblance to Guerre, presented himself as the missing man, of whose circumstances he had made a careful study. He was recognized by Martin Guerre's wife as her husband, and lived with her until a soldier published the fact that the true Martin Guerre was living in Flanders. After a long trial, which excited the greatest interest, and the final reappearance of Guerre himself, du Thil was sentenced and executed in 1560.

Guest, STEPHEN, a character in G. Eliot's 'The Mill on the Floss' (q.v.).

Gueux, meaning 'beggars', a name first given in contempt to the Protestant nobles who opposed Margaret of Parma (Regent of the Netherlands, on behalf of Philip II of Spain), and afterwards adopted by various bodies of Dutch and Flemish partisans in the wars with the Spaniards in the 16th cent.

GUICCIARDINI, FRANCESCO (1483-1540), a Florentine, the best historian of the Renaissance period in Italy.

Guiderius, in Shakespeare's 'Cymbeline' (q.v.), the elder son of the king.

GUIDO DA COLONNA, or DELLE COLONNE, a 13th-cent. Sicilian writer of Latin romances, author of a 'Historia Trojana' which was in fact a prose version of a poem of Benoit de Sainte-Maure (q.v.), though Guido did not acknowledge this. His romance was translated in poems attributed to Barbour and Huchoun, and by Lydgate in his 'Troy Book'. The story of 'Troilus and Cressida', taken by Guido from Benoît de Sainte-Maure, was in turn developed by Boccaccio, Chaucer, Henryson, and Shakespeare (qq.v.).

GUIDO DA COLONNA

Guido Franceschini, COUNT, one of the principal characters in R. Browning's 'The Ring and the Book' (q.v.).

Guignol, the chief character in the popular French puppet-show of that name, similar to our 'Punch and Judy'. The word is also used for the theatre where the show is performed. GRAND GUIGNOL is a term applied to a theatre presenting plays of a gruesome character (resembling in this respect the play of 'Punch and Judy', q.v.).

Guild of St. George, see Ruskin.

Gulldenstern, a character in Shakespeare's 'Hamlet' (q.v.).

GUILDFORD, JOHN OF, and NICHOLAS OF, see Owl and the Nightingale.

Guildhall, THE, the town hall of the city of London. The name signifies a hall where a trade guild met, but from its use as a meeting-place for the corporation was often synonymous with town hall. [OED.] According to another view the name is derived from the peace guilds or frith guilds of Athelstane (see Lethaby, 'London before the Conquest'). The present Guildhall was built early in the 15th cent., replacing an earlier hall in Aldermanbury. The interior of the hall was burnt out in the Great Fire of 1666, and was restored. It was severely damaged in an air-raid in December 1940.

GUILLAUME DE LORRIS, see Roman de la Rose.

Guillotin, JOSEPH IGNACE (1738-1814), a French physician, member of the Constituent Assembly, who, from humanitarian motives, proposed to decapitate persons condemned to death by means of the machine, the guillotine, to which his name was given, though he did not invent it [Larive et Fleury].

Guinea, the name of an English gold coin. In 1663 the newly issued 'gold 20s. piece' commanded a premium, and was ere long generally taken for 21s. or 22s. By a curious freak of chance the Guinea gold money, struck from the intake from the African Company, was so prevalent at this time, that the coin which official documents still called a pound was usually nicknamed a "guinea", and the name stuck to it till 1813, when the last guineas were coined (in spite of the existence of paper currency in Great Britain) to supply Wellington's army in the Pyrenees. By that time the gold guinea was worth 27s. in bank-notes. In 1816, when monometallism was adopted, the gold £1 was substituted for the 21s. guinea. (See Oman, 'Coinage of England' (1931), from which the above quotation is taken.)

GUIZOT

Guinea, Chrysal, or the Adventures of a, see Adventures of a Guinea.

Guinevere, the wife of King Arthur (q.v.) in the Arthurian legend. The name figures in various forms in the early romances. In Geoffrey of Monmouth she is Guanhamara, of a noble Roman family, brought up in the household of Cadur, duke of Cornwall. In Layamon's 'Brut' she is Wenhaver, a relative of Cadur of Cornwall. In 'Arthur and Merlin' (13th cent.) she is Guenour, daughter of Leodegran, king of Carohaise. For her story see Arthur and Launcelot. A more subtle and favourable view of her character than is found in the old romances is given in W. Morris's 'Defence of Guenevere' (1858) and in Tennyson's idyll 'Guinevere' (1899, q.v.). See also Awntyrs of Arthure at the Terne Wathelyne.

Guinevere, one of Tennyson's 'Idylls of the King' (q.v.), published in 1859.

The poem describes how Guinevere, under the growing stress of conscience and fear of exposure, bids Lancelot leave her and withdraw to his own lands. They meet for the last time, when the voice of the spying Modred is heard. Lancelot rushes out and hurls him headlong; then bids the queen fly with him to 'his castle overseas'. But she, declaring that she is shamed for ever, betakes herself to the nunnery at Almesbury. There, after a period of sorrowful meditation, she is visited by Arthur, and falls prostrate at his feet. He denounces the evil that she has wrought in the wreck of his high hopes, and finally forgives her and bids her farewell. Heart-broken and contrite, she remains with the nuns, becomes their abbess, and after three years dies.

GUINEY, LOUISE IMOGEN (1867-1920), American writer and poet. Her works include 'The White Sail' (1887), 'A Roadside Harp' (1893), 'England and Yesterday' (1898)—verse; 'Little English Gallery' (1894), 'Patris' (1897)—prose. An account of her life and works is in 'Louise Imogen Guiney', by E. M. Tenison (1923).

Guinness, a celebrated kind of stout (a dark brown bitterish beer brewed from malt partly charred or browned), brewed by the firm of Guinness of Dublin.

Guiscardo, see Sigismonda.

Guise, the name of a branch of the princely house of Lorraine, especially prominent in the campaigns of violence and intrigue directed in the 16th cent. against the Huguenots. The best-known member of the family is Henri de Guise, le Balafre (q.v., 1550-88). Mary of Guise (his aunt, 1515-60), was the queen of James V of Scotland and mother of Mary Stuart.

GUIZOT, FRANÇOIS (1787-1874), French statesman and historian, a minister under Louis Philippe, to the failure of whose conservative policy is attributed the revolution of 1848. He was a Protestant. Among his historical works were the 'Histoire de la Révolution d'Angleterre', 'Histoire de la Civilisation', 'Essais sur l'Histoire de France', &c.

Gulbeyaz, in Byron's 'Don Juan' (q.v.), the sultana to whom the hero is sold as a slave.

Gullistan, 'the rose garden', the name of the principal poem of the Persian poet Sadi (q.v.), a work of edification in which moral instruction is mingled with tales and other lighter matter.

Gulliver's Travels, a satire by Swift (q.v.), published in 1726.

Swift probably got the idea of a satire in the form of a narrative of travels at the meetings of the Scriblerus Club (q.v.), and intended it to form part of the 'Memoirs of Scriblerus'. Scriblerus indeed is described in the 'Memoirs' as visiting the same countries as Gulliver. Swift appears to have worked at the book from as early as 1720.

In the first part Lemuel Gulliver, a surgeon on a merchant ship, relates his shipwreck on the island of Lilliput, the inhabitants of which are six inches high, everything on the island being in proportion of one inch to one foot as compared with things as we know them. Owing to this diminutive scale, the pomp of the emperor, the civil feuds of the inhabitants, the war with their neighbours across the channel, are made to look ridiculous. The English political parties and religious dissensions are satirized in the description of the wearers of high heels and low heels, and of the controversy on the question whether eggs should be broken at the big or small end.

In the second part Gulliver is accidentally left ashore on Brobdignag, where the inhabitants are as tall as steeples, and everything else is in proportion. Here the king, after inquiring into the manners, government, and learning of Europe, sums up his impression of what Gulliver tells him as follows: 'By what I have gathered from your own relation . . . I cannot but conclude the bulk of your natives to be the most pernicious race of little odious vermin that nature ever suffered to crawl upon the surface of the earth.'

The third part is occupied with a visit to the flying island of Laputa, and its neighbouring continent and capital Lagado. Here the satire is directed against philosophers, men of science, historians, and projectors, with special reference to the South Sea Bubble. In Laputa Gulliver finds the wise men so wrapped up in their speculations as to be utter dotards in practical affairs. At Lagado he visits the Academy of Projectors, where professors are engaged in extracting sunshine from cucumbers and similar absurd enterprises. In the Island of Sorcerers he is enabled to call up the great men of old, and discovers, from their answers to his questions, the deceptions of history. The Struldbrugs, a race endowed with immortality, so far from finding this a boon, turn out to be the most miserable of mankind.

The bitterness and misanthropy of Swift, of which there are indications in the second and third parts of the 'Travels', are accentuated in the fourth, describing the country of the Houyhnhnms, or horses endowed with reason. Here the simplicity and virtues of the horses are contrasted with the disgusting brutality of the Yahoos, beasts in the shape of men.

The whole work, with the exception of certain passages, has the rare merit of appealing to both old and young, as a powerful satire on man and human institutions, and as a fascinating tale of travels in wonderland.

Gulnare, a character in Byron's 'The Corsair' (q.v.).

Guls Hornebooke, The, a satirical book of manners, by Dekker (q.v.), published in 1609. It is an attack on the fops and gallants of the day under the guise of ironical instructions how they may make themselves conspicuous in places of public resort by their offensive conduct. The occupations of a young man of leisure are described; his dressing, his walk in 'Paul's' (q.v.), his meal at the 'ordinary', the visit to the playhouse, &c.

Gummidge, Mrs., a character in Dickens's 'David Copperfield' (q.v.), a 'lone lorn creature'.

Gunnar, in the 'Volsunga Saga' and W. Morris's 'Sigurd the Volsung' (q.v.), the king of the Niblungs and the husband of Brynhild.

Gunner's Daughter, the gun to which seamen were lashed to be flogged.

Gunning, MARIA (1733-60) and ELIZABETH (1734-90), daughters of James Gunning of Castlecoote, Roscommon, famous beauties. Maria became countess of Coventry; Elizabeth, duchess of Hamilton and of Argyll.

GUNNING, Mrs. SUSANNAH (1740?-1800), née Minifie, of Fairwater, Somersetshire, married John Gunning (the brother of Maria and Elizabeth Gunning, q.v.), a man of dissolute life, from whom she separated. Before her marriage, and after her separation, she wrote a number of novels of a harmless description, and without much plot. These include 'The Histories of Lady Frances S— and Lady Caroline S—' (with her sister Margaret, 1763); 'Barford Abbey' (1768); the 'Count de Poland' (1780); 'Memoirs of Mary' (1793), &c.

Gunpowder Plot, the plot of a few Roman Catholics to blow up the Houses of Parliament on 5 Nov. 1605, while king, lords, and commons were assembled there. The plot was devised by Robert Catesby, and Guy Fawkes was chosen to put it into execution. But it was betrayed, and Fawkes arrested on 4 Nov. The conspirators who were taken alive were executed; Catesby was killed while resisting arrest.

Gunther, in the Nibelungenlied (q.v.), the brother of Kriemhild.

Guppy, a character in Dickens's 'Bleak House' (q.v.).

GURNEY

GURNEY, THOMAS (1705–70), appointed shorthand-writer at the Old Bailey, 1737 (?1748), the first shorthand-writer to hold an official appointment. His 'Brachygraphy' (1750), originally an improvement of W. Mason's 'Shorthand', has been frequently reissued and improved. It is his grandson, William Brodie Gurney, shorthand-writer to the Houses of Parliament (1813), who is referred to by Byron in 'Don Juan', i. 189.

Gurth, the Saxon swineherd in Scott's 'Ivanhoe' (q.v.).

Gushtasp, one of the later legendary kings of Persia whose story is told in the Shah-nameh of Firdusi (q.v.). He was the father of Isfendiyyar (q.v.).

Gustavus Adolphus (1594–1632), king of Sweden (1611–32). In 1630 he invaded Germany, and carried out his celebrated campaign, in which he defeated Tilly at Breitenfeld near Leipzig and Wallenstein at Lützen, but fell in the latter battle.

Gustavus Vasa liberated the Swedes in 1521 from the Danish yoke and ascended the throne of Sweden in 1523. A tragedy on the subject was written by H. Brooke (q.v.).

Guster, a character in Dickens's 'Bleak House' (q.v.).

Gutenberg, JOHANN (c. 1398–1468), one of the earliest of German printers, inventor of movable printing types. He received pecuniary help from Johann Fust (q.v.) and started printing about 1454. He probably produced the Mazarin (q.v.) Vulgate Bible of 1456.

Guthlac, St. (d. 714), a young nobleman of Mercia who became a hermit at Crowland or Croyland in Lincolnshire. Æthelbald, king of Mercia, built a church over his tomb, which later became the Abbey of Crowland. His life is the subject of an Anglo-Saxon poem. There are frequent references to St. Guthlac and the abbey in C. Kingsley's 'Hereward the Wake' (q.v.).

GUTHRIE, THOMAS ANSTEE, see Anstey.

Gutter Lane, in the city of London, formerly Guthuron's Lane or Gudrun's Lane, was probably named after Guthrum the Dane (Lethaby), who defeated Alfred, and subsequently ceded London to him. It was the street of the goldsmiths before Stow's time, when they were for the most part removed to the Cheap. Stow speaks of 'fine silver, of such as . . . was commonly called silver of Guthuron's lane'.

Guy, THOMAS (1645?–1742), the founder of Guy's Hospital, set up as a bookseller in London in 1668 and was one of the Oxford University printers, 1679–92. He greatly increased his fortune by selling his South Sea stock. He lived a penurious life but was liberal in benefactions, erecting the hospital that bears his name at a cost of some £18,000 and leaving £200,000 for its endowment, besides other charitable bequests.

GUY MANNERING

Guy Fawkes, see Gunpowder Plot.

Guy Livingstone, or Thorough, a novel by G. A. Lawrence (q.v.), published in 1857.

This novel shows a revolt against the moral and domestic conventions of the period. The hero is an officer of the Life Guards, very wealthy, of colossal size and strength, and a great sportsman, who beats prize-fighters and performs other exploits, but whose lack of principle involves him in amatory difficulties. He becomes engaged to Constance Brandon, but is discovered by her kissing Flora Bellasys, and Constance presently dies of a broken heart. Contrasted with Guy is Bruce, who doesn't hunt, is a muff with a gun, and is generally despicable. He is engaged to Guy's cousin Isabel, but Guy's friend Forrester elopes with Isabel a month before the intended wedding, and they live happily until Bruce meets Forrester and kills him, to be subsequently tracked down by Guy. The latter, whose truculence has been somewhat softened by his experiences, dies from a fall in the hunting field.

This crude piece of melodrama was parodied by Bret Harte in his 'Guy Heavystone'.

Guy Mannering, a novel by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1815.

The story, laid in the 18th cent., centres in the fortunes of young Harry Bertram, son of the laird of Ellangowan in the county of Dumfries, who is kidnapped by smugglers when a child, and carried to Holland. This is done at the instigation of a rascally lawyer, Glossin, who has hopes of acquiring on easy terms the Ellangowan estate, in default of an heir male. Bertram, ignorant of his parentage, and bearing the name of Brown, goes to India, joins the army, and serves with distinction under Colonel Guy Mannering. Bertram (or Brown) is suspected by Mannering of paying attentions to his wife, and is wounded by him in a duel and left for dead. In reality Bertram is in love with Julia, Mannering's daughter. Recovering from his wound, he follows her to England and the neighbourhood of Ellangowan. Here Bertram is recognized by the old gipsy, Meg Merrilies. Meanwhile Glossin has got possession of the Ellangowan property, but the return of Bertram, and the possibility that he may learn the secret of his parentage, threaten the exposure and ruin of Glossin. This discovery Meg Merrilies, devoted to the Ellangowan family, is determined to effect. To save himself Glossin lays a desperate plot with Dirk Hatteraick, the smuggler captain who had originally kidnapped the child, to carry him off once more and make away with him. The plot is frustrated by Meg Merrilies, with the help of Bertram's good friend, the sturdy Lowland farmer, Dandy Dinmont. Hatteraick and Glossin are captured, and Hatteraick, after murdering Glossin in prison as the author of his misfortunes, takes his own life. Bertram is acknowledged and restored to his property and to Mannering's favour, and marries Julia.

GUY MANNERING

The novel includes the notable character of Dominie Sampson, the uncouth simple-minded tutor of the little Harry Bertram.

Guy of Gisborne, in a ballad included in Percy's 'Reliques', a yeoman sworn to take Robin Hood. He meets the outlaw in the forest and, after a contest in archery, is slain by him.

Guy of Warwick, a popular verse romance, containing some 7,000 lines, of the early 14th cent. Guy is the son of Siward, steward of Rohand, earl of Warwick. The poem recounts his exploits undertaken in order to win the hand of Felice, daughter of the earl. He rescues the daughter of the emperor of Germany, fights against the Saracens, and slays the Soldan. Having returned to England, where he is honourably received by King Æthelstan, he marries Felice, but before long returns to the Holy Land and performs many notable exploits. He comes once more to England, where he encounters the Danish giant Colbrand (the account of this combat is famous), slays the dun cow of Dunsmore, and a winged dragon in Northumberland. He then turns hermit, receiving his bread daily from Felice, his wife, who knows him not, until, when dying, he sends her his ring.

The legend was accepted as authentic by the chroniclers and versified by Lydgate about 1450, and the Beauchamp earls assumed descent from Guy. The story of the encounter between Guy and Colbrand is also told in Drayton's 'Polyolbion', xii. 130 et seq., and other feats of Guy in xiii. 327 et seq.

Guyon, SIR, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', the knight of Temperance. His various exploits, the conquest of Pyrochles, the visit to the cave of Mammon, the capture of Acrasia, and the destruction of her Bower of Bliss, are related in Bk. II. v-xii.

Guzman de Alfarache, a Spanish picaresque romance, the second of its kind (the successor of 'Lazarillo de Tormes', q.v.), by Mateo Aleman (1547-c. 1614). It was translated into English (as 'The Rogue') in 1622 and published with an introductory poem by Ben Jonson. Guzman is by turns scullion, thief, gentleman, beggar, soldier, page to a cardinal and to a French ambassador, and his career gives occasion for 'sketches of character and humorous descriptions to which it would be difficult to produce anything superior' (Hazlitt).

Gwawl, see Mabinogion.

Gwendolen or GUENDOLENE, the legendary wife of King Locrine, who threw Estrildis and Sabrina into the Severn (see Estrildis). See also Guendolen.

Gwendolen Harleth, the heroine of G. Eliot's 'Daniel Deronda' (q.v.).

Gwyn, ELLEANOR (1650-87), generally known as Nell Gwyn, orange-girl, actress, and mistress of Charles II. One of her sons was created duke of St. Albans in 1684. She was illiterate, but good in comedy, prologues, and epilogues. 'There is a story that she induced King Charles to found Chelsea Hospital. Charles's dying request to his brother, according to Burnet and Evelyn, was 'Don't let poor Nelly starve'. She figures in Scott's 'Peveril of the Peak' (q.v.).

Gwynedd or GWYNETH, North Wales.

Gyges, a Lydian shepherd, who, according to Plato ('Rep.' ii. 359), descended into a chasm of the earth, where he found a brazen horse. Opening its side he saw within it the body of a man of unusual size. From his finger Gyges took a brazen ring, which, when he wore it, made him invisible. By means of this he introduced himself to the queen, murdered her husband, married her, and usurped the crown of Lydia.

According to Herodotus (i. 7 et seq.), the king, Candaules, boasted of his wife's beauty to Gyges, and allowed him to see her unveiled. She thereupon persuaded Gyges to murder her husband.

Gymnosophists (from Gr. γυμνός naked), a sect of ancient Hindu philosophers of ascetic habits (known to the Greeks through the reports of the companions of Alexander) who wore little or no clothing, ate no flesh, and gave themselves to mystical contemplation.

Gyneth, in Scott's 'Bridal of Triermain' (q.v.), the daughter of King Arthur and Guendolen (q.v.).

H

Habakkuk Mucklewrath, a crazy covenanting preacher in Scott's 'Old Mortality' (q.v.).

Habeas Corpus, a writ requiring the production in court of the body of a person who has been imprisoned, in order that the lawfulness of the imprisonment may be investigated. The right to sue for such a writ was an old common-law right, gradually built up by lawyers, who professed that it was based on Magna Carta. The HABEAS CORPUS ACT is the name commonly given to the Act of 1679 by which the granting and enforcement of this writ were much facilitated.

HABINGTON, WILLIAM (1605-64), educated at St. Omer and Paris, married Lucy Herbert, daughter of the first Baron Powis, and celebrated her in 'Castara', a collection of love poems, first published (anonymously) in 1634. A later edition (1635) contained in addition some elegies on a friend, and the final edition of 1640 a number of sacred poems. In the latter year Habington also published a tragi-comedy, 'The Queene of Arragon'.

Habitant, a native of Canada (also of Louisiana) of French descent.

Habsburg, see Hapsburg.

Hackney, the London suburb, was probably Hacon's Ey, the island of Hacon, a Danish name. The Knights Templars had an estate there, which, at the dissolution, was granted to the 6th earl of Northumberland, who as Lord Percy was to have married Anne Boleyn [Loftie].

A HACKNEY horse is from the old French haquenée, an ambling horse or mare. The word came to be used for horses kept for hire, whence HACK, HACKNEY-COACH, &c.

Hades or PLUTO, in Greek mythology, the god of the nether world, the son of Cronos and Rhea, and brother of Zeus and Poseidon. He received, as his share of his father's empire, the kingdom of the infernal regions. He desired to marry Proserpine (q.v.), a virgin goddess of great beauty, and in order to defeat the reluctance of her mother Demeter (Ceres) carried her off as she was gathering flowers in the plain of Enna in Sicily, so that she became queen of the nether world.

The name 'Hades' was transferred to this kingdom, a gloomy sunless abode, where, according to Homer, the ghosts of the dead flit about like bats. Its approach was barred by the rivers Styx, Acheron, Cocytus, and Phlegethon (see Styx). Tartarus was the region of Hades in which the most impious of men suffered retribution. The asphodel meadows were reserved for those who deserved neither bliss nor extreme punishment. The shades of the blessed were conveyed elsewhere (see Elysium, Fortunate Isles), but Virgil places Elysium in Hades.

Hadhith, in the Mohammedan religion, the tradition relating to the life of Mohammed, handed down by the companions of the prophet. It came to be regarded as an independent revelation comparable for sanctity with the Koran. The traditions were collected and sifted in the 3rd cent. of the Mohammedan era.

Hadrian (PUBLIUS AELIUS HADRIANUS) (A.D. 76-138) was Roman emperor from 117 to 138. He was a patron of art and learning. He visited Britain and caused the wall to be built between the Solway and the mouth of the Tyne, known as HADRIAN'S WALL.

Haemony, in Milton's 'Comus', a herb 'more medicinal than moly' (q.v.) and potent against 'enchantments, mildew, blast, or damp, Or ghastly Furies' apparition'.

HAKLUYT

HAFIZ, SHAMS-ED-DIN MUHAMMAD (d. c. 1390), a famous Persian poet and philosopher, born at Shiraz. He sang of love and flowers and nightingales, and the mutability of life, and is said by his enemies to have been given to dissipation. His tomb is still visited by pilgrims. His principal work is the 'Diwan', a collection of short pieces, called 'ghazals', of anacreontic character, in which some commentators see a mystic meaning. Hafiz and Sadi (q.v.) were buried near one another at Shiraz.

Hagen, a character in the 'Nibelungenlied' (q.v.).

Hagenbach, ARCHIBALD OF, a character in Scott's 'Anne of Geierstein' (q.v.).

Haggadah, a legend, anecdote, or the like, introduced in the Talmud (q.v.) to illustrate a point of the law; hence the legendary element of the Talmud, as distinguished from the HALACHAH, the legal teaching.

HAGGARD, SIR HENRY RIDER (1856-1925), author of many popular romances, including 'King Solomon's Mines' (1886), 'She' (1887), 'Allan Quatermain' (1887), 'Ayesha, or the Return of She' (1905). He collaborated with Andrew Lang (q.v.) in 'The World's Desire' (1891).

Haldée, a character in Byron's 'Don Juan' (q.v.).

Hall, Columbia!, an American patriotic song written in 1798 by Joseph Hopkinson (1770-1842), an eminent American lawyer, to the tune of 'The President's March', for the benefit performance of an actor, Gilbert Fox.

Haj or HAJJ, the pilgrimage to Mecca, imposed as a moral obligation on all Mohammedans. HAJJI is a title conferred on those who have performed the pilgrimage.

Hajji Baba of Ispahan, The Adventures of, see Morier.

Hākī'm in Mohammedan countries and India means a physician; whereas HĀKIM (from a different root) means a judge, ruler, or governor. In Browning's 'Return of the Druses' (q.v.), HAKIM is the vanished chief of the Druses.

HAKLUYT, RICHARD (1552?-1616), of a Herefordshire family, was educated at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford. He was chaplain to Sir Edward Stafford, ambassador at Paris, 1583-8. Here he learnt much of the maritime enterprises of other nations, and found that the English were reputed for 'their sluggish security'. He accordingly decided to devote himself to collecting and publishing the accounts of English explorations, and to this purpose he gave the remainder of his life. He had already been amassing material, for in 1582 he published 'Divers Voyages touching the Discovery of America'. In 1587 he published in Paris a revised edition of the 'De Orbe Novo' of Peter Martyr of Anghiera (subsequently translated into English by Michael Lok), and in the same year appeared his 'Notable History, containing four Voyages made by certain French Captains into Florida'. His 'Principall Navigations, Voiages, and Discoveries of the English Nation' was issued in 1589, and, much enlarged, in three volumes, 1598-1600. He therein gave to the world some account of the voyages of the Cabots, and narratives of Sir Hugh Willoughby's voyage to the N.E. in search of Cathay, Sir John Hawkins's voyage to Guinea and the West Indies, Drake's voyages of 1570-2 and his circumnavigation, Sir Humphrey Gilbert's last voyage in which he perished, Martin Frobisher's search for the N.W. Passage, John Davy's Arctic voyages, and the voyages of Raleigh, James Lancaster, and others. He thus brought to light the hitherto obscure achievements of English navigators, and gave a great impetus to discovery and colonization. Hakluyt was rector of Wetheringsett in 1590, and archdeacon of Westminster in 1603. He is buried in Westminster Abbey. He left unpublished a number of papers which came into the hands of Purchas (q.v.).

HAKLUYT

Halachah, see Haggadah.

Halagaver Court, according to a Cornish proverb (quoted by W. C. Hazlitt from Ray's 'Collection'), a jocular imaginary court for judging people who go slovenly in their attire.

Halcombe, MARIAN, a character in Wilkie Collins's 'The Woman in White' (q.v.).

Halcro, CLAUD, a character in Scott's 'The Pirate' (q.v.).

Halcyonē or ALCYONE, a daughter of Aeolus and the wife of Ceyx. Her husband perished in a shipwreck. Halcyone was warned in a dream of her husband's fate, and when she found, on the morrow, his body on the shore, she threw herself into the sea. Halcyone and Ceyx were changed into birds, which are fabled to keep the waters calm while they are nesting. Hence the expression 'Halcyon days'.

HALDANE, RICHARD BURDON, Viscount (1856-1928), educated at Edinburgh and Göttingen Universities; secretary of state for war, 1905-12; lord chancellor, 1912-15 and 1924; author of a 'Life of Adrian Smith' (1887), 'Pathway to Reality' (Gifford Lecture, 1903), 'Reign of Relativity' (1921), 'Philosophy of Humanism' (1922), 'Human Experience' (1926). With J. Kemp he translated Schopenhauer's 'World as Will and Idea' (1883-6).

Hale, MR., MRS., MARGARET, and FREDERICK, characters in Mrs. Gaskell's 'North and South' (q.v.).

HALE, SIR MATTHEW (1609-76), educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, became lord chief justice, and was a voluminous writer on many subjects; but much of his best work was left in manuscript, and published long after his death. His principal legal works were a 'History of the Common Law of England' (1713) and a 'Historia Placitorum Coronae' (1736). He was the subject of a biography by Burnet (q.v.).

Hale, NATHAN (1755-76), American hero of the War of Independence, who was hanged as a spy, and whose dying utterance—'I regret that I have but one life to give for my country'—is among the famous 'last words' of history.

HALES, ALEXANDER OF, see Alexander of Hales.

HALIBURTON, THOMAS CHANDLER (1796-1865), born at Windsor, Nova Scotia, became a judge of the supreme court of the province. Of the shrewd sayings of the Yankee clock-maker 'Sam Slick', the literary work by which he is best known, the first series appeared in 1837, the second in 1838, and the third in 1840, subsequently republished in one volume. Under its humorous disguise, the work is in reality a piece of political propaganda, designed to stimulate reform in the author's native province. 'The Attaché, or Sam Slick in England' was published in 1843-4; 'The Old Judge, or Life in a Colony', in 1849; 'Traits of American Humour', in 1852; 'Sam Slick's Wise Saws', in 1853; and 'Nature and Human Nature' in 1855.

HALIFAX, MARQUESS OF, see Savile.

Halkett, COLONEL and CECILIA, characters in Meredith's 'Beauchamp's Career' (q.v.).

HALL, EDWARD (d. 1547), educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, was the author of a chronicle entitled 'The Union of the Noble and Illustre Families of Lancaster and York', which was prohibited by Queen Mary, and which is interesting for the account it gives of the times of Henry VIII and the vivid description of his court and of the Field of the Cloth of Gold.

HALL, JOSEPH (1574-1656), was educated at Ashby-de-la-Zouch and Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and was bishop of Exeter 1627-41, and Norwich 1641-7. He was impeached in 1641 in the course of the attack of that year on episcopacy, and imprisoned in 1642, his episcopal revenues were sequestered in 1643, and his cathedral desecrated. He was expelled from his palace about 1647. He published his 'Virgidemiarum Sex Libri' (q.v.), vol. i in 1597, and vol. ii in 1598 (W. Grosart, 1879). His 'Characters of Virtues and Vices' (1608) are sketches on the model of Theophrastus (q.v.), designed with an educative and moral purpose. Besides satires and controversial works against Brownists and Presbyterians, he published poems (ed. Singer, 1824, Grosart, 1879), meditations, devotional works, and autobiographical tracts, also 'Observations of some Specialities of Divine Providence', 'Hard Measure', 1647, and 'The Shaking of the Olive Tree' (posthumous, 1660); collective editions were issued, 1808, 1837, and 1863. Hall claimed to be the first of English satirists, and although Lodge and Donne may in some respects have anticipated him, he certainly introduced the Juvenalian satire in English.

HALLAM, ARTHUR HENRY (1811-33), educated at Eton and Trinity College, Cambridge, the close friend of Lord Tennyson, died suddenly at Vienna at an early age. He is chiefly remembered as the subject of Tennyson's 'In Memoriam' (q.v.). His own 'Remains' (in verse and prose) appeared in 1834.

HALLAM, HENRY (1777-1859), historian, was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford. He spent some ten years on the preparation of his first published work. 'A View of the State of Europe during the Middle Ages' (1818), a survey of the process of formation of the principal European States. Hallam's best-known work, his 'Constitutional History of England' to the death of George II, appeared in 1827. It is essentially the story of the conflict of the British principles of law with the claims of royal prerogative. The work was subsequently continued by Sir T. E. May (q.v.). Hallam's last great work was an 'Introduction to the Literature of Europe during the Fifteenth, Sixteenth, and Seventeenth Centuries' (1837-9).

Byron, in 'English Bards and Scotch Reviewers' (q.v.), sneers at 'classic Hallam much renowned for Greek'. A note explains that Hallam reviewed Payne Knight in the 'Edinburgh Review' and condemned certain Greek verses, not knowing that they were by Pindar. The article was probably not by Hallam.

Hallel, a hymn of praise, consisting of Psalms cxlii-cxviii, sung at the Jewish feasts of the Passover, Pentecost, Dedication, and Tabernacles, and in shortened form at other feasts.

Hallelujah, from two Hebrew words meaning 'praise Jehovah'. HALLELUJAH-LASS was a popular name for a female member of the Salvation Army.

Halley, EDMUND (1656-1742), the astronomer, was educated at St. Paul's School and Queen's College, Oxford. He originated by his suggestions Newton's 'Principia', which he introduced to the Royal Society and published at his own expense. Among the great mass of his valuable astronomical work may be mentioned his accurate prediction of the return in 1758 of the comet (named after him) of 1531, 1607, and 1682. He became astronomer-royal in 1721.

HALLIWELL, afterwards HALLIWELL-PHILLIPS, JAMES ORCHARD (1820-89), scholar and librarian of Jesus College, Cambridge, was a noted Shakespearean scholar. His published works include: 'Life of Shakespeare' (1848), 'Shakespearean Forgeries at Bridgewater House' (1853),

'Curiosities of Modern Shakespearean Criticism' (1853), 'Dictionary of Old English Plays' (1860), 'Outlines of the Life of Shakespeare' (1881; 7th ed., 1887), and numerous notes on the separate plays and on Shakespeareana in general.

Hamilton, EMMA, LADY (1761?-1815), née Lyon, went to London in 1778, probably as nursemaid to the family of Dr. Richard Budd, and is said to have been the 'Goddess of Health' in the 'Temple of Health' opened by the quack doctor, James Graham, in the Adelphi about 1780. After living, as Emily Hart, under the protection of various men, and coming under the refining influence of Romney, who painted her many times, she married Sir William Hamilton (1730-1803), British ambassador at Naples, in 1791. She first saw Nelson in 1793, and became intimate with him in 1798. She gave birth to her daughter Horatia in 1801. She claimed to have rendered important political services at Naples, but these claims, though endorsed by Nelson, were ignored by the British Government. Owing to her extravagance, she died in obscurity and poverty, in spite of legacies from Nelson and Hamilton.

HAMILTON, WILLIAM, OF BANGOUR (1704-54), author of the melodious 'Braes of Yarrow', published in Ramsay's 'Miscellany' (1724-32), and of the Jacobite 'Ode to the Battle of Gladsmuir'. He made the earliest Homeric translation into English blank verse.

HAMILTON, SIR WILLIAM (1788-1856), the philosopher, was educated at Glasgow and Balliol College, Oxford. His philosophical reputation was made by a number of articles which appeared in the 'Edinburgh Review' from 1829 to 1836 (republished in 1852 as 'Discussions on Philosophy and Literature, Education and University Reform'), of which the most important were those on 'the Philosophy of the Unconditioned', 'the Philosophy of Perception', and 'Logic'. He was elected to the chair of logic and metaphysics at Edinburgh in 1836. His 'Lectures on Metaphysics and Logic' appeared in 1859-60, after his death.

HAMILTON

A man of great philosophical erudition rather than a great philosophical thinker, Hamilton represents the influence of Kant upon the common-sense philosophy of the Scottish school as set forth by Reid. He maintained, like the latter, our immediate consciousness of a perceiving subject and an external reality, and distinguished between the primary and objectively real qualities, and the secondary or subjective qualities; he also expounded the doctrine of the phenomenal and relative quality of all knowledge, according to which we must remain ignorant of ultimate reality, since knowledge, whether of mind or matter, must be conditioned by the knowing mind and cannot therefore be knowledge of the thing-in-itself. If we attempt to know the unconditioned, we are faced by two contradictory propositions, both inconceivable, and one of which must be true: the unconditioned is either the Absolute (i.e. limited) or the Infinite. We cannot conceive time or space, for instance, as either limited or infinite.

In Logic, Hamilton introduced a modification of the traditional doctrine, known as the 'Quantification of the Predicate', which has been further elaborated by mathematicians. Hamilton's philosophical views were vigorously attacked by J. S. Mill (q.v.) in his 'Examination of Sir W. Hamilton's Philosophy' (q.v.).

HAMILTON, WILLIAM GERARD, see Single-speech Hamilton.

HAMILTON, SIR WILLIAM ROWAN (1805-65), educated at Trinity College, Dublin, showed extraordinary precocity of mathematical genius, detecting at 16 an error in Laplace's 'Mécanique céleste', and in his undergraduate days predicting conical refraction from mathematical analysis. He was appointed Andrews professor of astronomy in 1827, and royal astronomer of Ireland. His fame rests principally on his discovery of the science of quaternions, a higher branch of the calculus ('Lectures on Quaternions', 1853; 'Elements of Quaternions', 1866). His 'Mathematical Papers', edited by A. W. Conway and J. L. Synge, are now in course of publication. Hamilton had considerable poetical gifts, and was a close friend of Wordsworth.

Hamlet, a tragedy by Shakespeare (q.v.), probably produced before 1603-4, published imperfectly in quarto in 1603, and fully in quarto in 1604, and with some omissions in the first folio. The story is in Saxo Grammaticus and was accessible in Belleforest's 'Histoires Tragiques'. There was also an earlier play on the subject, not now extant.

A noble king of Denmark has been murdered by his brother Claudius, after Claudius had seduced Gertrude, the king's wife. Claudius has supplanted on the throne the dead man's son, Hamlet, and married with indecent haste the dead man's widow. Hamlet meets the ghost of his dead father, who relates the circumstances of the murder and demands vengeance. Hamlet vows obedience; but his melancholy, introspective, and scrupulous nature makes him irresolute and dilatory in action. He counterfeits madness to escape the suspicion that he is threatening danger to the king. His behaviour is attributed to love for Ophelia (daughter of Polonius, the lord chamberlain), whom he has previously courted but now treats rudely. He tests the ghost's story by having a play acted before the king reproducing the circumstances of the murder, and the king betrays himself. A scene follows in which Hamlet violently upbraids the queen. Thinking he hears the king listening behind the arras, he draws his sword and kills instead Polonius. The king now determines to destroy Hamlet. He sends him on a mission to England, with intent to have him killed there. But pirates capture Hamlet and send him back to Denmark. He arrives to find that Ophelia, crazed with grief, has perished by drowning. Her brother Laertes, a strong contrast to the character of Hamlet, has hurried home to take vengeance for the death of his father Polonius. The king contrives a fencing match between Hamlet and Laertes, in which the latter uses a poisoned sword, and kills Hamlet; but not before Hamlet has mortally wounded Laertes and stabbed the king; while Gertrude has drunk a poisoned cup intended for her son.

Hamley, MR., MRS., OSBORNE, and ROGER, characters in Mrs. Gaskell's 'Wives and Daughters' (q.v.).

Hampden, JOHN (1594-1643), educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, and M.P. for Grampound, Wendover, and subsequently Buckinghamshire, is famous as the leader of the resistance to the imposition of ship-money (q.v.). He was impeached in 1642, but escaped the king's attempt to arrest him. He was mortally wounded in a skirmish at Chalgrove Field, near Oxford.

Hampton Court, on the Thames, some twelve miles W. of the centre of London, was built by Cardinal Wolsey on land that had formerly belonged to the knights of St. John, and was ceded by him to Henry VIII. For two centuries it was a favourite residence of the English sovereigns. In William III's reign part of it was rebuilt by Wren.

Hand of Ethelberta, The, a novel by Hardy (q.v.), published in 1876. As the author states in the preface, this is a 'somewhat frivolous narrative' and one in which the drawing-room is 'sketched in many cases from the point of view of the servants' hall'.

Ethelberta is one of a numerous family, sons and daughters of a butler, Chickerel by name. An ambitious and masterful young woman, she marries the son of the house where she is a governess, and is soon left a widow of one-and-twenty. The story is occupied with her spirited endeavour to maintain the social position she has acquired, while concealing her relationship with the butler, and yet actively helping her brothers and sisters. After humiliating experiences, she finally secures a wicked old peer for a husband, and rules him with a firm hand. Christopher Julian, the musician, her faithful admirer, whom she has alternately encouraged and snubbed, is in the end left to marry her pink-cheeked sister Picotee.

HAND OF ETHELBERTA

Handel, originally HAENDEL, GEORGE FREDERICK (1685-1759), born in Saxony, came to England in 1710, after composing some of his operas and oratorios. His opera 'Rinaldo' was produced with great success at the Queen's Theatre, Haymarket, in 1711. He settled permanently in England in 1712. He was organist for the duke of Chandos at Canons Whitchurch, near Edgware (1718-20). It was here that he composed 'Esther', his first English oratorio (performed 1720), and 'Acis and Galatea' (performed 1720 or 1721). From 1720 to 1728 he was director of a speculative operatic venture known as the Royal Academy of Music. About this time a rivalry sprang up between Handel and the musician Buononcini, which divided the music-loving public and occasioned the epigram, variously attributed to Pope, Swift, and Byrom:

Strange all this difference should be "Twixt Tweedledum and Tweedledee.

Handel was appointed court composer in 1727 and produced a number of operas at Covent Garden and Lincoln's Inn Fields, also musical settings for Dryden's 'Ode on St. Cecilia's Day' and 'Alexander's Feast'. His oratorio 'Israel in Egypt' was composed in 1738; the 'Messiah' was first heard (in Dublin) in 1742; his last oratorio 'Jephthah' was produced at Covent Garden in 1752. Handel was buried in Westminster Abbey. He carried choral music to its highest point, but in instrumental did not advance beyond his contemporaries.

Handlyng Synne, a translation, in eight-syllabled verse, of the 'Manuel des Pechiez' of William of Wadington, by Robert Mannyng (1288-1338) of Brunne (Bourne in Lincolnshire), a Gilbertine monk, written between 1303 and 1338. The author sets forth, with illustrative stories, the ten commandments, then the seven deadly sins, then the sin of sacrilege, then the seven sacraments, dealing finally with shrift. Mannyng is a good story-teller, and his work throws much light on the manners of the time, notably on the tyranny and rapacity of the lords and knights. See Colbek.

HANSOM

Hanging Garden of Babylon: Diodorus Siculus in his description of Babylon (II. i) relates that there was likewise a hanging garden near the Citadel, not built by Semiramis but by a later Prince, called Cyrus, for the sake of a courtesan who being a Persian and coveting meadows on mountain tops, desired the King by an artificial plantation to imitate the land in Persia. This garden was four hundred foot square, and the ascent up to it was as to the top of a mountain . . . and the highest arch upon which the platform of the garden was laid was fifty cubits high, and the garden itself was surrounded with battlements and bulwarks' (G. Booth's translation).

Hans Carvel, a fabliau by Matthew Prior (q.v.). The subject of it, a coarse jest on the method of retaining a wife's fidelity, has been treated in the Facetiae of Poggio, by Rabelais (III. xxviii), and other writers.

Hansard, the official reports of the proceedings of the Houses of Parliament, colloquially so called because they were for a long period compiled by Messrs. Hansard. Luke Hansard (1752-1828) commenced printing the 'House of Commons' Journals' in 1774. 'Hansard' is now no more than an established familiar title. The name disappeared from the title-page of the Reports from 1892 onwards; the Reports were published by Reuter's Telegram Company in 1892, Eyre & Spottiswoode, 1893-4, and subsequently by a number of other firms in succession; they are now a regular publication of His Majesty's Stationery Office.

Hanse, THE, from a MHG. word meaning association, merchants' guild, was the name of a famous political and commercial league, also called the HANSEATIC LEAGUE, of Germanic towns, signed in 1241. The Hanse towns and their confederates numbered about one hundred in the 14th cent., their commercial object being to carry on trade between the east and west of Northern Europe. They had their own fleet and army, and waged war with Denmark. But their strength decayed during the Thirty Years War (1618-48) and finally only Lübeck, Hamburg, and Bremen remained in the League. This endured until the 19th cent., when its remaining property was sold and the three cities entered the North German Confederation. The Hanse had a house in London (Guildhalla Teutonicorum; see also Steelyard) and enjoyed certain privileges (withdrawn in 1567), together with the obligation of maintaining Bishopsgate.

The word 'hanse' was also used in English for an association of merchants trading with foreign parts, for the merchant guild of a town, and for the monopolies and privileges possessed by it.

Hansom, JOSEPH ALOYSIUS (1803-82), an architect who erected the Birmingham town hall, and in 1834 registered his invention of a 'Patent Safety Cab', from which the hansom cab, although differing in many respects, took its name. The latter is a low-hung two-wheeled cabriolet holding two persons inside, the driver being mounted on a dickey behind and the reins going over the roof.

Hapsburg or HABSBURG, HOUSE OF, the family to which the Imperial dynasty of Austria traced its descent. Rodolph, count of Hapsburg, was chosen 'Holy Roman' emperor in 1273. Charles VI, the last ruler of Austria of the male Hapsburg line, died in 1740. His daughter Maria Theresa became queen of Hungary, and from her and her husband, Francis, duke of Lorraine, the modern Hapsburgs are descended. The last of this line, the emperor Charles I, abdicated in 1918 (when Austria and Hungary were proclaimed separate republics); he died in 1922. The Spanish Hapsburgs are descended from Philip II of Spain (d. 1598), son of Charles V of Austria. The title Hapsburg is derived from the castle of Habsburg, near Aarau in Switzerland, built by Werner, bishop of Strasburg, in the 11th cent.

Harapha, in Milton's 'Samson Agonistes', the giant of Gath who comes to mock the blind Samson in prison.

Hard Cash, a novel by Reade (q.v.), published in 1863, a sequel to 'Love me little, love me long'; it was perhaps the best known of the author's propagandist novels and was designed to expose the abuses prevailing in lunatic asylums. It gave rise to lively protests in certain quarters.

The first part of the story is chiefly occupied with the voyage from India of David Dodd, a sea-captain, who is bringing home the 'hard cash', the accumulated savings which he destines for his family's support. The narrative of his encounters with pirates, and of the storm, shipwrecks, and other adventures that follow, is vividly told. Dodd entrusts his fortune to the scoundrelly banker, Richard Hardie, in ignorance that he is bankrupt; and the discovery of the loss of his hard-earned savings deprives him of his reason. Hardie, to prevent his son Alfred, who is engaged to Dodd's daughter, from revealing his appropriation of Dodd's money, has Alfred confined as a lunatic. The second portion of the book is devoted to the exposure of the horrors of the private asylum in which Dodd and young Hardie are confined; to the subsequent life of Dodd as an ordinary seaman, after his escape from the asylum; and to the exposure of old Hardie and the recovery of Dodd's fortune.

Hard Times, a novel by Dickens (q.v.), published in 1854.

Thomas Gradgrind, a citizen of Coketown, an industrial centre, is an 'eminently practical man', who believes in facts and statistics, and nothing else, and brings up his children, Louisa and young Tom, accordingly, ruthlessly repressing the imaginative and spiritual sides of their nature. He marries Louisa to Josiah Bounderby, a manufacturer, humbug, and curmudgeon, thirty years older than herself. Louisa consents partly from the indifference and cynicism engendered by her father's treatment, partly from a desire to help her brother, who is employed by Bounderby and who is the only person she loves. James Harthouse, a young politician, without heart or principles, comes to Coketown, is thrown into contact with her, and, taking advantage of her unhappy life with Bounderby, attempts to seduce her. The better side of her nature is awakened by this experience, and at the crisis she flees for protection to her father, who in turn is awakened to the folly of his system. He shelters her from Bounderby and the couple are permanently separated. But further trouble is in store for Gradgrind. His son, young Tom, has robbed the bank of his employer, and though he contrives for a time to throw the suspicion on a blameless artisan, Stephen Blackpool, is finally detected and hustled out of the country. Among the notable minor characters are Seary, the proprietor of a circus; Jupe, a performer in his troupe; and Cissy, the latter's daughter.

HARDY

Hardcastle, SQUIRE, MRS., and MISS, characters in Goldsmith's 'She Stoops to Conquer' (q.v.).

HARDENBERG, FRIEDRICH LEOPOLD VON (1772-1801), German romantic poet and novelist, author of poems religious, mystic, and secular, including 'Hymns of Night', laments on the death of his lovely Sophie von Kühn, and the novels 'Heinrich von Ofterdingen' and 'Die Lehrlinge zu Sais' ('The Disciples at Sais'). He wrote under the pseudonym 'Novalis'.

Hardicanute, king of England, 1040-2, son of Cnut. He divided the kingdom with Harold I on Cnut's death in 1035, but did not come to England until Harold's death in 1040.

Harding, THE REV. SEPTIMUS, the principal character in A. Trollope's 'The Warden' (q.v.), who also takes a prominent part in its sequel 'Barchester Towers' (q.v.). His death occurs in 'The Last Chronicle of Barset'.

Hardy, MR. and LETITIA, characters in Mrs. Cowley's 'The Belle's Stratagem' (q.v.).

HARDY, THOMAS (1840-1928), born at Upper Bockhampton, near Dorchester, was the son of a builder. In early life he practised architecture. The underlying theme of much of Hardy's writing, of many of the novels, the short poems, and the great epic-drama 'The Dynasts', is the struggle of man against the force, neutral and indifferent to his sufferings as Hardy conceives it, that rules the world; or, in another aspect, the ironies and disappointments of life and love. His strong sense of humour is seen principally in his rustic characters. Hardy's novels, according to his own classification, divide themselves into three groups; the chief of them are dealt with separately under their titles.

HARDY

I. Novels of Character and Environment—'Under the Greenwood Tree', 1872; 'Far from the Madding Crowd', 1874; 'The Return of the Native', 1878; 'The Mayor of Casterbridge', 1886; 'The Woodlanders', 1887; 'Wessex Tales', 1888; 'Tess of the D'Urbervilles', 1891; 'Life's Little Ironies', 1894; 'Jude the Obscure', 1896 (in the edition of the 'Works' of that year).

II. Romances and Fantasies—'A Pair of Blue Eyes', 1873; 'The Trumpet-Major', 1880; 'Two on a Tower', 1882; 'A Group of Noble Dames', 1891; 'The Well-Beloved', published serially in 1892, revised and reissued in 1897.

III. Novels of Ingenuity—'Desperate Remedies', 1871; 'The Hand of Ethelberta', 1876; 'A Laodicean', 1881. 'A Changed Man, The Waiting Supper, and other Tales' (1913) is a reprint of 'a dozen minor novels' belonging to the various groups. For the topography of the novels see Hermann Lea's 'Thomas Hardy's Wessex', written with the novelist's help.

Seven volumes of Hardy's lyrics were published at various dates from 1898 to 1928; these were subsequently included in his 'Collected Poems'. His great epic-drama 'The Dynasts' (q.v.) was published in three parts: Pt. I, 1904, Pt. II, 1906, Pt. III, 1908. His Arthurian drama, 'The Famous Tragedy of the Queen of Cornwall' (q.v.), was produced in 1923.

Hardy, Sir Thomas Masterman (1769–1839), Nelson's flag-captain in various ships and finally in the 'Victory'. Nelson died in his arms.

HARE, JULIUS CHARLES (1795–1855), educated at Charterhouse and Trinity College, Cambridge, was rector of Hurstmonceux and subsequently archdeacon of Lewes. He was joint author with his brother Augustus of 'Guesses at Truth' (1827), a collection of observations on philosophy, religion, literature, and many other subjects, supplemented in the edition of 1837 by longer essays. He also collaborated with Connop Thirlwall (q.v.) in a translation of the 'Roman History' of Niebuhr (q.v.), published in 1828–32. The first volume having been attacked in the 'Quarterly Review', the translators published in 1829 a 'Vindication of Niebuhr's History'. He also wrote 'The Victory of Faith' (1840), 'The Mission of the Comforter' (1846), and 'Miscellaneous Pamphlets on Church Questions' (1855).

Hare, William, the accomplice of the murderer William Burke (q.v.). He was set at liberty from the Tolbooth, the law officers having decided that he could not legally be put on his trial.

Haredale, Geoffrey and Emma, characters in Dickens's 'Barnaby Rudge' (q.v.).

Harington, the name currently given to the copper farthing when first issued in the reign of James I, a patent for the issue having been given to Lord Harington of Exton.

HARLEY

HARINGTON or HARRINGTON, JAMES (1611–77), educated at Trinity College, Oxford, was for some time in the service of the Elector Palatine, and attended Charles I in his captivity in spite of his republican principles. He published in 1656 'The Commonwealth of Oceana' (q.v.), a political romance, and several tracts in defence of it. Harington was founder of the Rota Club (q.v., 1659–60). He was imprisoned after the Restoration.

HARINGTON, Sir John (1561–1612), godson of Queen Elizabeth, was educated at Eton and Christ's College, Cambridge. He translated Ariosto's 'Orlando Furioso' (q.v.), by Queen Elizabeth's direction. His Rabelaisian 'Metamorphosis of Ajax' ('a jakes', 1596) and other satires led to his banishment from the court. He accompanied Essex to Ireland, and was deputed to appease the Queen's anger against him, unsuccessfully. His letters and miscellaneous writings, in 'Nugae Antiquae', appeared in 1769.

Harkness, Edward Stephen, see Pilgrim Trust.

HARLAND, HENRY (1861–1905), American author, born in St. Petersburg, Russia, educated at Harvard University. He became editor of the 'Yellow Book' in 1894, thereby figuring prominently in the literary life of London. His successful novel, 'The Cardinal's Snuff-Box', was published in 1900, after which came 'Lady Paramount' in 1902.

Harleian MSS., THE, were collected by Robert and Edward Harley, the first and second earls of Oxford (1661–1724, 1689–1741), and are now in the British Museum, having been purchased for the nation under an act of 1754.

Harleian Miscellany, a reprint of a selection of tracts from the library of Edward Harley, 2nd earl of Oxford, edited by William Oldys, his secretary, and Samuel Johnson, published in 1744–6 by Thomas Osborne.

Harleian Society, THE, was founded in 1869 for the publication of heraldic visitations, pedigrees, &c.

Harlequin, from the Italian arlecchino, originally a character in Italian comedy, a mixture of childlike ignorance, wit, and grace, always in love, always in trouble, easily despairing, easily consoled; in English pantomime a mute character supposed to be invisible to the clown and the pantaloone, the rival of the clown in the affections of Columbine. The Italian word is possibly the same as the old French Hellequin, Hennequin, one of a troop of demon horsemen riding by night. [OED.]

Harleth, Gwendolen, the heroine of G. Eliot's 'Daniel Deronda' (q.v.).

Harley, the principal character in 'The Man of Feeling' of H. Mackenzie (q.v.).

Harley, Adrian, in Meredith's 'The Ordeal' of Richard Feverel' (q.v.), the cynical 'wise youth' and tutor of Richard, drawn from Meredith's friend Maurice Fitz-Gerald.

Harley Street, used allusively of medical specialists, from the fact that many medical specialists live in or near this street, which is in the West End of London.

Harlowe, CLARISSA, see Clarissa Harlowe.

Harmattan, a parching land-wind, which blows from the NE. during December, January, and February in the Sahara and W. Sudan, very occasionally reaching even the Guinea coast.

Harmodius and Aristogeiton: when the brothers Hippias and Hipparchus, the sons of Peisistratus, were tyrants of Athens (527-514 B.C.), Hipparchus, disappointed in a disreputable love-affair, avenged himself by a public insult to the family of the person concerned, Harmodius. The latter, his friend Aristogeiton, and some others, joined in a conspiracy to slay the tyrants at the festival of the Panathenaea. Owing to an error, Hipparchus was killed before Hippias arrived, Harmodius was immediately struck down by the guards, and Aristogeiton tortured in vain before death to make him reveal the names of the conspirators. Subsequently Hippias was expelled, and Harmodius and Aristogeiton, though they had been engaged in an act of private vengeance, came to be highly honoured as patriots and liberators of the State.

Harmon, JOHN, alias JOHN ROKESMITH, alias JULIUS HANDFORD, the hero of Dickens's 'Our Mutual Friend' (q.v.).

Harmonia, a daughter of Ares and Aphrodite, who married Cadmus (q.v.). Cadmus gave her the famous necklace which he had received from Hephaestus (or from Europa) and which became fatal to all who possessed it.

Harmontous Blacksmith, The, an air in a harpsichord suite written (1720) by Handel (q.v.) for his pupils, the daughters of the Prince of Wales.

Harold, an historical drama by A. Tennyson (q.v.), published in 1876. It presents in dramatic form the events dealt with in Bulwer Lytton's romance of the same name (see below).

Harold, the Last of the Saxon Kings, an historical romance by Bulwer Lytton (q.v.), published in 1848.

The story deals with the latter years of the reign of Edward the Confessor and the short reign of Harold, from the visit of Harold to William, duke of Normandy, to his death at Senlac. With this is woven the romance of Harold's love for Edith the Fair, whom, owing to their relationship, he is forbidden by the Church to marry. For political reasons, and at Edith's behest, he marries Aldyth, sister of the northern earls Eadwine and Morkere. But when he lies dead on the field of Senlac, Edith seeks him out and dies beside him, thus fulfilling the saying of Hilda, the Saxon prophetess, that they should be united.

Harold, Childe, see Childe Harold.

Harold I, son of Canute, king of England, 1035-1040.

Harold II, son of Godwine, king of England in 1066, killed in that year at the battle of Hastings or Senlac. See Harold, the Last of the Saxon Kings.

Harold the Dauntless, a poem by Sir W. Scott, published in 1817. Harold is the son of Witikind, a Danish Viking, converted to Christianity by St. Cuthbert and granted lands between the Wear and the Tyne. Harold, like his father a fierce warrior, comes to England to claim these lands, which have been resumed at his father's death. A probation is imposed on him, that he shall spend a night in a lonely castle. In the course of this he sees visions, which lead to his conversion.

Haroun-al-Raschid (763-809), caliph of Bagdad, who figures in many tales of the 'Arabian Nights' (q.v.), together with Ja'far, his vizier, and Mesrour his executioner. He was the most powerful and vigorous of the Abbasid Caliphs, his rule extending from India to Africa. He entertained friendly relations with Charlemagne, who was almost his exact contemporary.

Harpagon, a character in Molière's 'L'Avaré' (q.v.), the typical miser, whose avarice causes him to be surrounded by persons who deceive him. See Euclio.

Harper's Monthly, an American periodical, founded in 1850 by Messrs. Harper & Brothers of New York, originally for the avowed purpose of reproducing in America the work of distinguished English contributors to magazines (such as Dickens and Bulwer Lytton). It subsequently became truly American in character.

Harpier, in Shakespeare's 'Macbeth', iv. i. 3 ('Harpier cries, 'tis time, 'tis time'), apparently an error for Harpy. [OED.]

Harpies, THE, in Greek HARPYIAE, winged monsters, by name Aello, Ocypêtê, and Celaeno, who were supposed to carry off persons or things. They plundered Aeneas during his voyage to Italy. See also under Phineus.

Harpocrâtês, the Roman equivalent of the Egyptian Horus (q.v.), who was called 'Harpechrat' in his character of the youthful sun, born afresh every morning, and represented sitting with his finger in his mouth, an attitude symbolical of childhood. From a misunderstanding of this attitude, he came to be regarded by the Greeks and Romans as the god of silence.

HARPUR, CHARLES (1817-68), Australian poet, published a number of volumes of verse ('Thoughts: a series of sonnets', 1845; 'A Poet's Home', 1862; 'The Tower of the Dream', 1865, &c.), many of which give a good presentment of the scenery and life of the Australian bush. His best poem is 'The Creek of the Four Graves'. A collected edition of his poems was issued in 1883.

Harriet Byron, the heroine of Richardson's 'Sir Charles Grandison' (q.v.).

Harriet Smith, a character in Jane Austen's 'Emma' (q.v.).

Harrington, see Harington.

Harris, Mrs., in Dickens's 'Martin Chuzzlewit' (q.v.), the mythical friend of Mrs. Gamp.

HARRIS, FRANK (1856-1931), successively editor of the 'Fortnightly Review', the 'Saturday Review', and 'Vanity Fair'; founder and editor of the 'Candid Friend'. His books include: 'The Man Shakespeare' (1909), 'The Women of Shakespeare' (1911), 'Oscar Wilde' (1920); his plays are: 'Mr. and Mrs. Daventry' (1900), 'Shakespeare and his Love' (1910), 'Women of Shakespeare' (1911).

HARRIS, JOEL CHANDLER (1848-1908), American author, was born at Eatonton, Georgia, and devoted from childhood to English literature. To this taste he added an extraordinary knowledge of negro myth and custom and of negro dialect and idiom, which he reproduced in his famous 'Uncle Remus' series. These contain a great number of folk-lore tales, relating to a variety of animals, with the rabbit as hero and the fox next in importance, told by a negro to a little boy and interspersed with comments on many other subjects. The principal volumes of this series were 'Uncle Remus, his Songs and Sayings' (1880), 'Uncle Remus and his Friends' (1892), 'Mr. Rabbit at Home' (1895), 'The Tar-Baby' (1904), 'Told by Uncle Remus' (1905), 'Uncle Remus and Brer Rabbit' (1906), 'Uncle Remus and the Little Boy' (1910).

Harrison, Dr., a character in Fielding's 'Amelia' (q.v.).

HARRISON, FREDERIC (1831-1923), educated at King's College, London, and Wadham College, Oxford, was professor of jurisprudence and international law to the Inns of Court from 1877 to 1889, and from 1880 to 1905 president of the English Positivist Committee, formed to represent in this country the philosophic doctrines of Auguste Comte (q.v.). He was author of many works, including: 'The Meaning of History' (1862, enlarged 1894), 'Order and Progress' (1875), 'The Choice of Books' (1886), 'Oliver Cromwell' (1888), 'Introduction to Comte's Positive Philosophy' (1896), 'Victorian Literature' (1895), 'William the Silent' (1897), 'Byzantine History in the Early Middle Ages' (1900), 'Ruskin' (1902), 'Chatham' (1905), 'The Philosophy of Common Sense' (1907), 'Among my Books' (1912), 'The Positive Evolution of Religion' (1912).

HARRY RICHMOND

HARRISON, WILLIAM (1534-93), born in London and educated at Westminster School, Cambridge, and Oxford, was rector of Radwinter and canon of Windsor. He was the author of the admirable 'Description of England' included in the 'Chronicles' of Holinshed (q.v.), and translator of Bellenden's Scottish version of Boece's 'Description of Scotland', also included in the same.

Harrow School, at Harrow-on-the-Hill, Middlesex, founded and endowed by John Lyon (c. 1514-91), of Preston, under Letters Patent and a Charter granted by Queen Elizabeth. Rodney was the first of the many great men educated at Harrow, a list which includes Samuel Parr, Bryan Waller Procter ('Barry Cornwall'), Theodore Hook, James Morier, Lord Byron (q.v.), besides several prime ministers (Perceval, Sir Robert Peel, Lord Aberdeen, Lord Palmerston, Mr. Baldwin, and Mr. Churchill). The founder made special provision for the encouragement of archery at the school, and Sir Gilbert Talbot in 1684 presented a silver arrow to be shot for annually. Arrow shooting was regarded as peculiarly characteristic of the school (Sir John Fischer Williams, 'Harrow').

Harrowing of Hell, The, a poem of some 250 lines in octosyllabic couplets of the late 13th or 14th cent. It consists of a narrative introduction, followed by speeches, as in a drama, assigned to Christ, Satan, the Door-Keeper, and persons in Hell (Adam, Eve, Abraham, David, John, Moses). Christ reproves Satan and claims Adam. Satan retorts with a threat to seduce a man for each soul that Christ releases. Christ breaks in the door, binds Satan, and frees his servants.

HARRY THE MINSTREL, or BLIND HARRY, see Henry the Minstrel.

Harry Richmond, The Adventures of, a novel by G. Meredith (q.v.), published in 1871.

The father of Harry Richmond is the son of an actress and of a royal personage. Obsessed with the idea of the royal blood in his veins, a man of florid imagination, amusing gifts, little scruple, and a lunatic's cleverness in the pursuit of his monomania, his one object in life is to obtain an exalted position for his son. As a teacher of singing he has entered the house of the wealthy Squire Beltham, has fascinated both his daughters, carried off and married one of them, driven her crazy and to an early grave, and incurred the deep hatred of the bluff old squire, who strives to attach his grandson to himself and save him from his father. The conflict between the two makes the comedy of the story. The dominating influence in the early life of Harry Richmond is an intense love for this fascinating buffoon, which develops, as understanding comes, into loyalty and compassion. The father leads a life of semi-regal splendour, interrupted by periods in a debtor's prison and by wanderings among the courts of petty German princes, to which his audacity and talents gain him admission. At one of these Harry Richmond and the romantic Princess Ottilia, daughter of the reigning duke, fall in love; and the masterly if unscrupulous manœuvres of Harry's father to overcome the obstacles to so absurd a match, and the humiliations to which Harry is in consequence exposed, make the central feature of the story. On the other side we have the squire's attempts to marry his grandson to the typical if somewhat commonplace English girl, Janet Ilchester. Finally the father's crazy schemes and illusions are shattered, and the squire's designs, after his death, are realized.

HARTE, FRANCIS BRET (1836-1902), born at Albany, New York, was taken to California when 18, where he probably saw something of mining life. But he was of studious and literary tastes and worked on various newspapers and periodicals in San Francisco, to which he contributed the short stories which made him famous. Notable among these were 'The Luck of Roaring Camp' (1868), and 'Tennessee's Partner' and 'The Outcasts of Poker Flat' (included in the 1870 collection). His humorous-pathetic verse includes: 'Jim', 'Her Letter', and 'Plain Language from Truthful James'. Bret Harte was American consul at Crefeld in Germany (1878-80) and at Glasgow (1880-5), after which he lived in England.

Hartford Wits, THE, a group of writers who flourished during the last two decades of the 18th cent. at Hartford and New Haven, Connecticut, U.S.A., now chiefly remembered for their vigorous political verse satires. Chief among them were Timothy Dwight, Joel Barlow, John Trumbull, David Humphreys, Richard Alsop, Lemuel Hopkins, and Theodore Dwight. They were all either graduates of Yale or associated with that college.

Harthacnut, see Hardicanute.

Harthouse, JAMES, a character in Dickens's 'Hard Times' (q.v.).

Hartley, ADAM, a character in Scott's 'The Surgeon's Daughter' (q.v.).

HARTLEY, DAVID (1705-57), philosopher, was educated at Bradford Grammar School and Jesus College, Cambridge, and practised as a physician. In his 'Observations on Man, his Frame, Duty, and Expectations', published in 1749, he repudiated the view of Shaftesbury and Hutcheson that the 'moral sense' is instinctively innate in us, and attributed it to the association of ideas, i.e. the tendency of ideas which have occurred together, or in immediate succession, to recall one another. From this association of the ideas of pain and pleasure with certain actions, he traces the evolution of the higher pleasures out of the lower, until the mind is carried to 'the pure love of God, as our highest and ultimate perfection'. With this psychological doctrine he combined a physical theory of 'vibrations' or 'vibratuncles' in the 'medullary substance' of the brain.

Harun-al-Rashid, see Haroun-al-Raschid.

Harût and Marût, in the Koran (c. ii), two angels sent to tempt men and teach them sorcery. According to another version of the legend (Sale), they were sent to administer justice on earth. Zohara (or the planet Venus) came before them, and complained of her husband. They both fell in love with her and were diverted from their duty, and now suffer punishment in Babel. See also Loves of the Angels.

Harvard, JOHN (1607-38), of humble origin, M.A. of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, settled in Charlestown, Massachusetts, and bequeathed half his estate and all his books to the newly founded educational institution at Cambridge, Massachusetts, known in memory of him as HARVARD COLLEGE. He is commemorated also by the Harvard Chapel in St. Saviour's, Southwark, where he was baptized.

HARVEY, GABRIEL (1545?-1630), son of a rope-maker at Saffron Walden, was educated at Christ's College, Cambridge. As fellow of Pembroke Hall he became acquainted with Spenser, over whom he exercised some literary influence, not always for the best. He published satirical verses in 1579 which gave offence at court; attacked Robert Greene in 'Foure Letters' in 1592; wrote 'Pierce's Supererogation' and the 'Trimming of Thomas Nashe' (1593 and 1597) against Nashe, both disputants being silenced by authority. His English works (he also wrote in Latin on rhetoric), including correspondence with Spenser, were edited by Dr. Grosart. Harvey tried, with others, to introduce the classical metres into English, and claimed to be the father of the English hexameter. His literary judgement may be further gauged by his condemnation of the 'Faerie Queene'.

HARVEY, WILLIAM (1578-1657), educated at King's School, Canterbury, Caius College, Cambridge, and at Padua, expounded his theory of the circulation of the blood to the College of Physicians in 1616. But his treatise on the subject, 'Exercitatio Anatomica de Motu Cordis et Sanguinis in Animalibus', was not published until 1628. His second great work, 'Exercitationes de Generatione Animalium', appeared in 1651. His collected Latin works were edited by Dr. Lawrence in 1766. An English edition (Sydenham Society) appeared in 1847. Harvey was physician to Charles I and was present with him at the battle of Edgehill (1642).

Alids and Abbasides (q.q.v.). The contests of the HASHIMITES with the Umayyads (q.v.) for the caliphate occupy the early period of Mohammedan history.

Hastings, a character in Goldsmith's 'She Stoops to Conquer' (q.v.).

Hastings, WARREN (1732-1818), the first governor-general of British India, was educated at Westminster School and went to India in 1750. He was appointed governor of Bengal in 1772, and in 1778 threw himself energetically into the struggle with the Mah-rattas, obtaining money for the purpose by despotic methods. In 1780 he wounded in a duel Sir P. Francis (q.v.), his chief opponent in the council; and in the same year drove Hyder Ali from the Carnatic. He left India in 1785, was impeached on the ground of corruption and cruelty in his administration, and acquitted after a trial of 145 days, extending, with long intervals, from 1788 to 1795. Burke and Fox were among the prosecutors.

Hatchway, LIBUTENANT, a character in Smollett's 'Peregrine Pickle' (q.v.).

Hathaway, ANNE, the wife of Shakespeare (q.v.).

Hatter, THE MAD, in Lewis Carroll's 'Alice in Wonderland' (q.v.). 'In that direction,' the Cheshire Cat said, 'lives a Hatter: and in that direction lives a March Hare. Visit either you like: they are both mad.' The illustration of the Mad Hatter is said (by those who remember him) to have been taken from an upholsterer in Oxford High Street, by name Carter. For the proverb, 'Mad as a hatter', the earliest quotation given in OED. is from Halliburton's 'Clockmaker' (1837-40). W. C. Hazlitt ('English Proverbs') refers to the dedication to the 'Hospital for Incurable Fools' (1600), from which it appears that there was living at that time an eccentric character, known as John Hodgson, alias John Hatter, who was possibly the origin of the expression.

Hatteralck, DIRK, the smuggler captain in Scott's 'Guy Mannering' (q.v.).

Hatto, see Bishop Hatto.

HATTON, SIR CHRISTOPHER (1540-91), is said to have attracted the attention of Queen Elizabeth by his graceful dancing (alluded to by Sheridan, 'The Critic', II. 1), became her favourite, and received grants of offices and estates (including Ely Place, see Holborn). Hatton was lord chancellor, 1587-91, and chancellor of Oxford, 1588. He was the friend and patron of Spenser and Churchyard, and wrote Act IV of 'Tancred and Gismund' (q.v.).

Hatton Garden, see Holborn.

Haunch of Venison, The, a poetical epistle to Lord Clare, by Goldsmith (q.v.), written about 1770.

Haunted Man and the Ghost's Bargain, The, a Christmas book by Dickens (q.v.) published in 1848.

HAWCUBITES

Redlaw, a learned man in chemistry, is haunted by the memories of a life blighted by sorrow and wrong. His Evil Genius tempts him to think that these memories are his curse, and makes a bargain with him by which he shall forget them; but on condition that he communicates this power of oblivion to all with whom he comes in contact. He discovers with horror that with remembrance of the past he blots out from his own life and the lives of those about him (in particular the delightful Tetterbys), gratitude, repentance, compassion, and forbearance. He prays to be released from his bargain, which is effected by the influence of the good angel, Milly Swidger.

HAUPTMANN, GERHART (1862-1946), German dramatist. His chief works are: 'Das Friedensfest' (1890), 'Die Weber' (1892), 'Die Versunkene Glocke' (1896), 'Der Arme Heinrich' (1901), 'Rose Bernd' (1903).

Haussmann, GEORGES EUGÈNE, BARON (1809-91), French administrator, who as prefect of the Seine in 1853 directed the modernization of the streets of Paris.

Haut Brion, see Claret.

Haut-ton, SIR ORAN, the orang-outang in Peacock's 'Melincourt' (q.v.).

Havelok the Dane, The Lay of, one of the oldest verse romances in English, dating from the early 14th cent. and containing 3,000 lines. It tells the story of Havelok, son of Birkabeyne, king of Denmark, and of Goldborough, daughter of Æthelwold, king of England. These are excluded from their rights by their respective guardians, Godard and Godrich. Godard hands Havelok over to a fisherman, Grim, to drown; but the latter, warned by a mystic light about the boy's head, escapes with him to England and lands at the future Grimsby. Havelok, taking service as scullion in Earl Godrich's household, and distinguishing himself by his strength and athletic skill, is chosen by Godrich as husband for Goldborough, whom Godrich seeks to degrade. The mystic flame reveals to her the identity of her husband. Havelok, with Grim, returns to Denmark, where, with the help of the Earl Ubbe, he defeats Godard and becomes king. Godard is hanged and Godrich burnt at the stake.

The name Havelok (Abloyc) is said [E.B. 11th ed.] to correspond in Welsh to Anlaf or Olaf, and Havelok as scullion bore the name Cuaran. The historical Anlaf Curan was son of a Viking chief Sihtric, king of Northumbria in 925. Anlaf, being driven into exile, took refuge in Scotland and married the daughter of Constantine III. He was defeated with Constantine at Brunanburh.

Havisham, Miss, a character in Dickens's 'Great Expectations' (q.v.).

Hawcubites, a band of dissolute young men who infested the streets of London in the beginning of the 18th cent., street-bullies.

HAWES

HAWES, STEPHEN (d. 1523?), a poet of the school of Chaucer and Lydgate, was groom of the chamber to Henry VII. His 'Passetyme of Pleasure, or History of Graunde Amoure and la Bel Pucel' (q.v.) was first printed by Wynkyn de Worde, 1509. His 'Example of Virtue', a poem in the seven-line Chaucerian stanza, an allegory of life spent in the pursuit of purity, much after the manner of the 'Passetyme of Pleasure', was also printed by Wynkyn de Worde, in 1512.

Hawk, Sir Mulberry, a character in Dickens's 'Nicholas Nickleby' (q.v.).

HAWKER, ROBERT STEPHEN (1803-75), educated at Pembroke College, Oxford, was vicar of Morwenstow in Cornwall. As a poet he is remembered principally for his 'Song of the Western Men' (with the refrain 'And shall Trelawny die?'). But he wrote other fine poems, 'Queen Gwennivar's Round' and 'The Silent Tower of Bottreaux' among them. In 1864 he published part of a long poem, 'The Quest of the Sangraal'. (See Baring-Gould's 'Vicar of Morwenstow'.)

HAWKINS, ANTHONY HOPE (1863-1933), author (as 'Anthony Hope') of 'The Prisoner of Zenda' (q.v., 1894), 'Rupert of Hentzau' (1898), 'The Dolly Dialogues' (q.v., 1894), and other novels and plays.

Hawkins, Jim, the narrator and hero of Stevenson's 'Treasure Island' (q.v.).

HAWKINS, SIR JOHN (1532-95), naval commander, led expeditions in 1562, 1564, and 1567 to the W. African and Spanish-American coasts, slave-trading, and fighting the Spaniards; these expeditions, together with the actions of Drake, contributed to bring about the breach with Spain. He published 'A True Declaration of the Troublesome voyage of Mr. John Hawkins to Guinea and the West Indies in . . . 1567 and 1568' (1569). He commanded an expedition sent to the Portuguese coast in 1590, and died at sea while serving with Drake's expedition to the West Indies.

His son, SIR RICHARD HAWKINS (1562?-1622), also a famous naval commander, published in 1622 'Observations . . . in his voiage into the South Sea; A.D. 1593'.

Hawkwood, Sir John (d. 1394), the famous condottiere, figures in Froissart as 'Hacoude'. Machiavelli calls him 'Giovanni Acuto'. He was the leader of the body of English mercenaries known as the White Company and fought for one Italian city or another, and for pope or prince, from 1360 to 1390. He was finally commander-in-chief of the Florentine forces, died at Florence, and was buried in the Duomo (his body was subsequently removed to England). He is said to have started life as a tailor's apprentice.

HAWTHORNE, NATHANIEL (1804-64), born at Salem, Massachusetts, was a descendant of Major William Hathorne, one of the Puritan settlers in America, the 'grave, bearded, sable-cloaked and steeple-crowned progenitor' whose portrait we have in the Introduction to 'The Scarlet Letter'. He was educated at Bowdoin College (Brunswick, Maine). He received an appointment in the custom house of his native town in 1846, and in 1853 was American Consul at Liverpool. He subsequently visited Italy, where he wrote the romance 'Transformation' or 'The Marble Faun' (q.v., 1860). But he is best known as the author of 'The Scarlet Letter' (q.v., 1850) and 'The House of the Seven Gables' (q.v., 1851). His other principal works were 'The Blithedale Romance' (1852), and several volumes of short stories, 'Twice-Told Tales' (1837-42), 'Mosses from an Old Manse' (1846), 'The Snow Image' (1852), and 'Tanglewood Tales' (1853, stories for children).

Hawthorne was a moralist, much occupied with the mystery of sin, the paradox of its occasionally regenerative power, and the compensation for unmerited suffering and for crime. The optimistic answers of Emerson (q.v.) to these problems left him unconvinced. And with one or other aspect of them he deals in his three principal romances, against a background (except in 'The Marble Faun') of Puritan New England. The subject of 'The Blithedale Romance' (a satire on the Brook Farm experiment of the New England transcendentalists) is somewhat different. It illustrates the dangers of philanthropy adopted as a profession; for Hollingsworth, the ardent social reformer, in the pursuit of his ideal, deadens his own heart and ruins the lives of those near him.

Haydn, Franz Josef (1732-1809), the composer, was born in Austria, the son of a wheelwright who was also organist of his village church. In 1760 he became Capellmeister to Prince Paul, and subsequently to his brother Prince Nicholas, Esterhazy, and thus obtained an assured position. He has been described as 'the father of modern instrumental music', and it may be noted that Beethoven received lessons from him. He twice visited England, and received an honorary degree at Oxford. He composed three oratorios, a number of masses, cantatas, and songs, more than 100 symphonies, and many concertos, quartets, &c.

HAYDON, BENJAMIN ROBERT (1786-1846), a historical painter, and the author of 'Lectures on Painting and Design' (1844-6), is principally remembered for his sincere and delightful autobiography, edited by Tom Taylor in 1853; also on account of the severe strictures passed on him by Ruskin in 'Modern Painters', and as the object of Keats's youthful enthusiasm. There is a sonnet on him by Wordsworth. He was one of the experts who gave evidence about the Elgin Marbles, and one of the few who recognized that they were of first-class merit and not late inferior works.

HAYLEY, WILLIAM (1745-1820), poet, of Eton and Trinity Hall, Cambridge; friend of Cowper, Blake, Romney, and Southey; author of lives of Milton, Cowper, and Romney, and of an amusing autobiography.

Haymarket, THE, London, so called from the Hay Market established there in 1664, and maintained until 1830. Her Majesty's Theatre, Haymarket (called also the Opera House), was the first opera house in London (1705). The first performances in England of Handel's operas were given there. The present His Majesty's Theatre occupies half the original site, the rest of the site being occupied by the Carlton Hotel. The Haymarket Theatre, on the opposite side of the street, was also built at the beginning of the 18th cent., and was Foote's theatre from 1747, and later that of the Bancrofts.

Hayraddin, the Maugrabin or gipsy, a character in Scott's 'Quentin Durward' (q.v.).

Hayston, FRANK, the laird of Bucklaw, a character in Scott's 'The Bride of Lammermoor' (q.v.).

HAYWARD, ABRAHAM (1801-84), is chiefly remembered as the author of 'The Art of Dining' (1852) and of many essays and contributions to periodicals, republished in three series of 'Essays' (1858, 1873, 1874), which include a vigorous attack on the theory of those who would identify 'Junius' with Sir Philip Francis. He was a focus of social-literary intercourse in the thirties, forties, and fifties of the last century ['London Mercury', Jan.-Feb. 1932].

HAYWARD, SIR JOHN (1564?-1627), educated at Pembroke College, Cambridge, was the author of various historical works, in which he emulated the style of the great Roman historians. His 'First Part of the Life and Raigne of Henrie the IIII' (1599), dedicated to Essex, gave offence to Elizabeth and led to his imprisonment. His other chief works were the 'Lives of the III Normans, Kings of England' (1613), the 'Life and Raigne of King Edward the Sixt' (1630), and 'The Beginning of the Reign of Elizabeth' (1636), the last two printed posthumously.

HAYWOOD, MRS. ELIZA (1693?-1756), née Fowler, after writing plays and libellous memoirs, issued in 1744-6 the periodical 'The Female Spectator', followed by 'The Parrot' (1747), and subsequently produced two lively novels, 'The History of Betsy Thoughtless' (1751) and 'The History of Jammy and Jenny Jessamy' (1753).

HAZLITT

Hazard, a character in Shirley's 'The Gamester' (q.v.).

Hazard of New Fortunes, A, a novel by W. D. Howells (q.v.).

HAZLITT, WILLIAM (1778-1830), born at Maidstone, the son of a Unitarian minister of strong liberal views, spent most of his youth at the secluded village of Wern near Shrewsbury. His early relations with S. T. Coleridge and Wordsworth are described in his essay 'My First Acquaintance with Poets'. He was a quarrelsome and unamiable man, of a curiously divided nature, almost as much an artist as a thinker and writer. At first he showed an inclination for painting, but he soon gave this up for literature. In London he became the friend of Lamb and other literary men, and in 1808 married Sarah Stoddart, a friend of Mary Lamb, from whom he was divorced in 1822. In 1824 he married Mrs. Bridgewater. From 1812 onwards he wrote abundantly for various periodicals, including the 'Edinburgh Review', on the Liberal side. His chief writings divide themselves into three classes: (1) those on art and the drama, including the pleasant 'Notes on a Journey through France and Italy' (1826), written after his second marriage; the 'Conversations of James Northcote' (1830, republished with an introductory essay by E. Gosse in 1894); and 'A View of the English Stage' (1818-21). (2) The essays on miscellaneous subjects, which contain some of his best work (e.g. 'The Feeling of Immortality in Youth', 'Going a Journey', 'Going to a Fight'). (3) The essays in literary criticism, which in the opinion of some are his chief title to fame. The best of these are included in his 'Characters of Shakespeare's Plays' (1817-18), 'Lectures on the English Poets' (1818-19), 'English Comic Writers' (1819), 'Dramatic Literature of the Age of Elizabeth' (1820), and 'Table Talk, or Original Essays on Men and Manners' (1821-2); while 'The Spirit of the Age' (1825) contains interesting appreciations of his contemporaries. Mention should be made of the posthumous 'Winterslow' and 'Sketches and Essays', which contain some of his best essays; also of his 'Characteristics', containing some notable aphorisms, and of the 'Liber Amoris' (1823), the record of a miserable love-affair. Of his ability in controversy his famous 'Letter to William Gifford' (1819) is an example. His 'Life of Napoleon' and a philosophical work, 'The Principles of Human Action', are of less importance.

HAZLITT, WILLIAM CAREW (1834-1913), bibliographer, grandson of William Hazlitt (q.v.), was author of a 'Handbook to the Popular, Political, and Dramatic Literature of Great Britain . . . to the Restoration' (1867), and of three series of 'Bibliographical Collections and Notes' (1876-89). His 'Confessions of a Collector' appeared in 1897.

HEADLONG HALL

Headlong Hall, a novel by Peacock (q.v.), published in 1816.

It contains hardly any plot, but much discourse between Mr. Foster, the optimist, Mr. Escot, the pessimist, Mr. Jenkinson, the 'statu-quo-ite', Dr. Gaster, a gluttonous cleric, and other characters, enlivened by burlesque incident, and a number of good songs.

Headrigg, Cuddir, in Scott's 'Old Mortality' (q.v.), ploughman to Lady Margaret Bellen-den, and MAUSE, his old covenanting mother.

Headstone, BRADLEY, a character in Dickens's 'Our Mutual Friend' (q.v.).

HEARN, LAFCADIO (1850-1904), was born in Santa Maura (otherwise known as Lefcas or Lefkada or Leucas), one of the Ionian Islands, his father, an Irishman, being surgeon of a British regiment quartered there, and his mother a Greek. He was educated at Ushaw College. He worked as a journalist in America, and resided for a time at St. Pierre, Martinique, an experience recorded in his 'Two Years in the French West Indies' (1890). In 1890 he moved to Japan, where he married a Japanese wife. He was lecturer on English Literature in the Imperial University, Tokyo, 1896-1903; and a subject of the Japanese Empire under the name of Yakumo Koizumi. His power of communicating impressions is shown in his remarkable 'Glimpses of Unfamiliar Japan' (1894). His 'Japan: an attempt at interpretation' (1904) was less successful. 'Karma', and other short stories, appeared in 1921. Hearn died in Japan.

HEARNE, THOMAS (1678-1735), historical antiquary, author of 'Reliquiae Bodleianae' (1703), and editor of a valuable collection of early English chronicles, of Leland's 'Itinerary', Camden's 'Annales', and other works. He was the 'Wormius' of Pope's 'Dunciad'. He might have held high office in Oxford University but for his staunch Jacobitism: he refused to take the oath of allegiance to George I. He was for a time second librarian of the Bodleian.

Heart of Midlothian, The, a novel by Sir W. Scott (q.v.), published in 1818, in the second series of 'Tales of My Landlord'.

The novel takes its name from the old Edinburgh Tolbooth or prison, known as the 'heart of Midlothian', and opens with the story of the Porteous riot of 1736. Captain John Porteous, commander of the City Guard, had, without sufficient justification, caused the death of a number of citizens by ordering his force to fire, and had himself fired, on the crowd on the occasion of the hanging of a convicted robber, by name Wilson. He had been sentenced to death but been reprieved; whereupon a body of the incensed citizens, headed by one Robertson, the associate of Wilson, broke into the Tolbooth, carried Porteous out, and hanged him. With these substantially historical events, Scott links the story of Jeanie and Effie Deans, which also has some basis in fact. Robertson, whose real name is George Staunton, a reckless young man of good family, is the lover of Effie Deans, who is imprisoned in the Tolbooth on a charge of child-murder, and the attack on the Tolbooth is partly designed by him with a view to the flight of Effie. But Effie refuses to escape. She is tried, and as her devoted half-sister Jeanie, in a poignant scene, refuses to give the false evidence which would secure her acquittal, is sentenced to death. Thereupon Jeanie sets out on foot for London, and through the influence of the duke of Argyle obtains an interview with Queen Caroline, and by her moving and dignified pleading obtains her sister's pardon. By the duke's favour, she is also enabled to marry her lover, the Presbyterian minister Reuben Butler; and her stern Cameronian father, 'Douce Davie Deans', is placed on a comfortable farm on the duke's estate, under the rule of the duke's agent, the Captain of Knockdunder. Effie marries her lover, and becomes Lady Staunton, and it comes to light that her child, whom she was accused of having murdered, is in fact alive. He had been carried away by Madge Wildfire, the insane daughter of Margaret Murdockson (an old harridan who had charge of Effie during her confinement), and made over to some banditti. Sir George Staunton, in his efforts to recover his son, comes upon the banditti unexpectedly, and is killed in the affray by the hand of his own son.

Among the notable minor characters of the story may be mentioned the officious Bartoline Saddletree, the law-loving harness-maker; and the Laird of Dumbiedikes, Jeanie's taciturn suitor. Reference may also be made to the beautiful lyrics placed in the mouth of Madge Wildfire, in particular to 'Proud Maisie', which she sings on her death-bed.

Heartbreak House, a play by G. B. Shaw (q.v.).

Heartfree, a character in Vanbrugh's 'The Provok'd Wife' (q.v.).

Heartwell, the 'Old Bachelor' (q.v.) in Congreve's comedy of that name.

Heathcliff, the central figure in Emily Brontë's 'Wuthering Heights' (q.v.).

Heathen Chinee, THE, in Bret Harte's humorous poem, 'Plain Language from Truthful James' ('That for ways that are dark, and for tricks that are vain, the Heathen Chinee is peculiar').

Heaven, THE SEVENTH. In the cosmographies based on the Ptolemaic system, the realms of space round the earth were divided into successive spheres or heavens, in which the sun, moon, and planets severally revolved. Their number varied in different computations from seven to eleven. The Jews (at least in later times) recognized seven heavens, the highest being the abode of God and the most exalted angels. According to the Koran also there are seven heavens. These conceptions have given rise to the expression in the seventh heaven, signifying 'supremely happy'.

Heaven and Earth, a drama by Lord Byron, published in the second number of 'The Liberal' (1822). It deals with the biblical legend of the marriage between angels and the daughters of men. The principal characters are the seraph Samiassa and Aholibamah, the granddaughter of Cain.

Heavenly Twins, THE, Castor (q.v.) and Pollux. Also the title of a novel by Sarah Grand (q.v.).

Hēbē, the daughter of Zeus and Hera, and the goddess of youth. She attended on Hera and filled the cups of the gods.

HEBER, REGINALD (1783-1826), educated at Brasenose College, Oxford, became incumbent of the living of Hodnet and in 1822 bishop of Calcutta. He wrote some well-known hymns and other verses and a pleasant 'Narrative of a Journey' in India (1828, 1844).

HEBER, RICHARD (1773-1833), half-brother of Reginald Heber (q.v.), travelled widely to collect his library of 150,000 volumes, and edited Persius and other classical authors. He is the 'Atticus' of 'Bibliomania' by T. F. Dibdin (q.v.), and Sir W. Scott in the introduction to the 6th canto of 'Marmion' exhorts him, at Christmas time, to Cease, then, my friend! a moment cease,

And leave these classic tomes in peace.

Hebrew Melodies, a collection of short poems by Lord Byron (q.v.), published in 1815. They were written in the autumn of 1814, when Byron was engaged to marry Miss Milbanke, and were set by I. Nathan to favourite airs sung in the religious services of the Jews. Most of them deal with scriptural subjects, but they include some love-songs, such as

She walks in Beauty, like the night
Of cloudless climes and starry skies.

Hebrides, The Journal of a Tour to the, see Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides. See also Journey to the Western Islands of Scotland.

Hēcātē, a Greek goddess associated with the lower world and with night, a queen of ghosts and magic, the protectress of enchanters and witches. In statues she was often represented in triple form, perhaps looking down three roads which met where her statue stood.

Hector, a son of Priam (q.v.) and Hecuba, the most valiant of the Trojans who fought against the Greeks. He married Andromache (q.v.), and was father of Astyanax. He was slain by Achilles (q.v.), in revenge for the death of Patroclus, whom Hector had killed; and his body was tied to the chariot of Achilles and dragged to the Greek ships. In medieval romance he is the great hero of the Trojan War.

HEGEL

Hector de Mares, see Ector de Maris.

Hēcūba, the wife of Priam, king of Troy, and mother of Hector, Paris, and Cassandra (qq.v.) among other children. After the capture of Troy she fell to the lot of Ulysses and embarked with the conquerors for Greece. At the Thracian Chersonese, where they landed, her daughter Polyxena was sacrificed at the instance of the ghost of Achilles, and Hecuba had the further grief of seeing the body of her son Polydorus washed up by the sea; he had been treacherously murdered by his host Polymestor, a Thracian king, on whom Hecuba now took vengeance. She was finally metamorphosed into a dog. She is the subject of a tragedy by Euripides.

Hedonism, from the Greek word meaning pleasure, the doctrine of ethics in which pleasure is regarded as the chief good, or the proper end of action. This was, in a certain sense, the doctrine of the Cyrenaic school (see Aristippus).

Heenan, JOHN C., the American pugilist, see Bemicia Boy.

Heep, URIAH, a character in Dickens's 'David Copperfield' (q.v.).

HEGEL, GEORG WILHELM FRIEDRICH (1770-1831), born at Stuttgart, was rector at Nuremberg gymnasium, 1808-16, and subsequently professor of philosophy at Heidelberg and at Berlin. His first important work was the 'Phaenomenology of Spirit', followed by his 'Logic' (1812-16), and later by the 'Philosophy of Right' embodying his political views.

Kant (q.v.) had left an essential dualism in his philosophy, nature opposed to spirit, object opposed to subject, the outer world composed of isolated unrelated substances whose nature is beyond the reach of knowledge. Hegel endeavours to bridge the gulf, and reduce duality to unity. He shows that all difference presupposes a unity, that a definite thought cannot be separated from its opposite, that the idea of fullness, e.g., cannot be separated from that of emptiness, that they are identical in difference. 'The whole thought reached in this way has again its opposite or negative, which it at once excludes and involves, and the process may be repeated in regard to it, with the result of reaching a still higher unity . . . and so on through an ever-widening sweep of differentiation and integration.' 'Reality—which at first is present to us as the Being of things which are regarded as standing each by itself, determined in quantity and quality, but as having no necessary relations to each other—comes in process of thought to be known as an endless aggregate of essentially related and transitory existences, each of which exists only as it determines, and is determined by, the others, according to universal laws, and finally is discovered to lie in a world of objects, each and all of which exist only in so far as they exist for intelligence, and in so far as intelligence is revealed or realized in them.' Duality and unity are thus blended in consciousness: 'the self exists as one self only as it opposes itself, as object, to itself, as subject, and immediately denies and transcends that opposition.' This doctrine Hegel reconciled with the essential teaching of the Christian religion, that man must 'die to live', that self-realization comes through self-abnegation. The natural self is essentially related to the world, the not-self, opposed to it. But there is a higher self which is in unity with the not-self; and realization of that higher self is achieved only by 'renunciation of that natural and immediate life of the self in which it is opposed to the not-self'. Only as this natural self dies can the higher self be developed.

See Prof. Edward Caird's 'Hegel' (Blackwood, 1883), on which the above brief statement of some of Hegel's chief positions is based. Other notable expositions of the Hegelian philosophy have been Prof. W. Wallace's translations, with Prolegomena, of Hegel's 'Logic' (1874) and 'Philosophy of Mind' (1894).

Hegira or HEJIRA or HIJRA, the flight of Mohammed from Mecca to Medina in A.D. 622, from which the Mohammedan era is reckoned.

Heidelberg, a beautiful town of romantic associations in southern Germany. Its university (founded in 1386) is a famous resort of foreign students.

Heidelberg, Mrs., a character in Colman and Garrick's 'Clandestine Marriage' (q.v.). Her illiteracy and mispronunciation of words bring her into some sort of kinship with Mrs. Malaprop (q.v.).

Heldsleck, see Champagne.

Helmdal, in Scandinavian mythology, one of the Vanir (q.v.), the warder of the gods, who guards the bridge Bifröst (q.v.). He is described as the son of nine mothers. He and Loki (q.v.) slay one another.

Helmskringla, a history of Norse kings from mythical times to 1177 by Snorri Sturlason (q.v.), containing graphic pictures of the domestic and adventurous life of the Vikings, and especially of King Olaf, of whose last fight on his ship, the 'Long Serpent', and death, there is a memorable account. It has a bearing on English history, covering as it does the reigns of the Danish kings, Sweyn, Canute, Harold, and Hardicanute. It describes the expedition of Olaf in aid of Æthelred, and the fight at London Bridge. The title ('the round world') is taken from the first words in the manuscript.

HEINE, HEINRICH (1797-1856), the German poet, was born of Jewish parents in Düsseldorf. Disappointed of his hopes of a Liberal régime in Germany as a sequence to the expulsion of Napoleon, and a sufferer from ill-health which culminated in almost complete paralysis during the last eight years of his life, he migrated to Paris after the revolution of 1830 and there spent his remaining days. He was baptized a Christian in 1835, but his true faith must be sought in his writings. His political works show him a radical and a cosmopolitan (he wrote both in German and French and many of his prose works exist in both languages). He was an acute critic of philosophy. But he was most famous as a lyrical poet, pre-eminent in wit and raillery, and the Romantic movement in Germany was in part checked by his irony. His chief works include the poems in the 'Buch der Lieder' (1827); the travel sketches in his 'Reisebilder' (1826-31); 'Philosophie und Literatur in Deutschland' (1834) and 'Die Romantische Schule' (1836); and among his later writings 'Neueste Gedichte' (1853-4), 'Atta Troll' (1847), and 'Romancero' (1851). His death-bed remark is characteristic: 'Dieu me pardonna: c'est son métier.' There is a sketch of Heine in Zangwill's 'Dreamers of the Ghetto'. There is also an essay on him by M. Arnold ('Essays in Criticism', 1st Series).

HEINSIUS, DANIEL (1580-1655), Dutch scholar, editor of Aristotle's 'Poetics', and author of a Latin work on tragedy. His son NICHOLAS HEINSIUS (1620-81), also a famous scholar, published critical editions of Roman poets, and travelled in England; his Virgil is most famous.

Heir-at-Law, The, a comedy by G. Colman the younger (q.v.).

Heir of Linne, The, the subject of a ballad in Percy's 'Reliques', a spendthrift who sells his estate to John o' Scales, wastes the proceeds, and goes to hang himself in a lonesome lodge which he has reserved by his father's direction. But the ceiling breaks with his weight, and reveals three chests full of treasure. He goes to John o' Scales, who refuses him a loan of forty pence, but offers to sell him back his estate for a hundred marks less than he gave for it, and is much disconcerted at being taken at his word.

Heir of Redclyffe, The, a novel by Miss Yonge (q.v.), published in 1853.

In this simple romance, Sir Guy Morville, the generous young heir of Redclyffe, falls in love with Amy, his guardian's daughter, but is suspected of gambling by his malevolent and conceited cousin Philip. In fact, he has paid the debts of a disreputable uncle, but rather than betray the latter, sacrifices his own character. He is banished from his guardian's household, until his gallant rescue of some shipwrecked sailors, and his uncle's intervention, rehabilitate him. Guy and Amy are now married, and on their honeymoon in Italy find Philip severely ill with fever. Guy forgives the injury done him by Philip, nurses him through his illness, catches the fever himself, and dies; and Philip, reduced to contrition by his adversary's generosity, inherits Redclyffe.

Heiress, The, a comedy by Burgoyne (q.v.).

HEJIRA

Hejira, see Hegira.

Hel, see Hell.

Helen, according to Greek legend, the most beautiful woman of her age, was daughter of Zeus and Leda (q.v.). When still a child she was carried off by Theseus (q.v.), but was recovered by her brothers. She selected Menelaus (q.v.), king of Sparta, for her husband, after her many suitors had bound themselves by an oath to defend her. She was subsequently seduced by Paris, son of Priam, king of Troy, and carried off to Troy. To get her back, Menelaus assembled the Greek princes who had been her suitors, and these resolved to make war on Troy for her recovery. After the fall of Troy she was reconciled with Menelaus and lived with him at Sparta.

Helen Huntingdon, or GRAHAM, the heroine of A. Brontë's 'The Tenant of Wildfell Hall' (q.v.).

Helen of Kirkconnell, the subject of an old ballad (included in Scott's 'Border Minstrelsy' and the 'Golden Treasury'), who throws herself before her lover when his rival fires at him, and dies to save him. The story is also the subject of Wordsworth's 'Ellen Irwin'.

Helena, (1) the heroine of Shakespeare's 'All's Well that Ends Well' (q.v.); (2) a character in his 'Midsummer Night's Dream' (q.v.); (3) Helen of Troy in Goethe's 'Faust' (q.v.).

Helena, Sr., the mother of the Emperor Constantine, converted to Christianity by her son. The legend that she was British has no contemporary authority. It is said that she discovered the True Cross, having instituted a search for it in consequence of the Emperor Constantine's vision of the sign of a cross in the sky, with the inscription 'In hoc signo vinces'. This is the Invention of the Cross, commemorated on 3 May. St. Helena is the 'Elene' of Cynewulf (q.v.).

The ISLAND OF SAINT HELENA in the S. Atlantic was discovered by the Portuguese on St. Helena's day, 21 May 1502. It was the place of Napoleon's captivity from 1815 until his death in 1821.

Helenore, see Ross (A.).

Helenus, a son of Priam and Hecuba, and a soothsayer, who revealed to the Greeks that they could not capture Troy without the help of Philoctetes (q.v.). After the capture of Troy he fell to the lot of Neoptolemus, and after the latter's death married Andromache, the widow of his brother Hector. Aeneas found him ruling in Epirus and was hospitably received by him.

Heliand, The, an Old Saxon paraphrase of the N.T., dating from the 9th cent. Fragments also survive of a paraphrase of the O.T. by the author of the 'Heliand'.

Hellas, see Knight of the Swan.

Hellcon, a mountain of Boeotia sacred to the Muses, who had a temple there. The Heliogabalus, see Elagabalus.

Hēlios, the Greek name of the sun-god, the son of (and sometimes identified with) Hyperion, and father of Phaethon (qq.v.).

Hell, a word derived from Old Norse Hel, 'the coverer up or hider', the Proserpine of northern mythology, the goddess of the infernal regions. Hel was the daughter of Loki (q.v.) and was cast by the Father of the Gods, who feared her evil influence, into Niflheim (q.v.), and given power over nine worlds, among which she distributed the dead. The word Hell is used in the authorized version of the N.T. as a rendering of the Greek words Hades, Gehenna, and Tartarus (qq.v.). In modern use the word has the sense of (1) the abode of the dead; (2) the place or state of punishment of the wicked after death; (3) something resembling hell, e.g. a place or state of wickedness or suffering; (4) a gaming-house.

For Dante's 'Hell' see Divina Commedia.

Hell-fire Clubs, associations of reckless and profligate young ruffians who were a nuisance to London chiefly in the early 18th cent. There was a later and more famous Hell-fire Club, founded about 1745, for which see Medmenham Abbey.

Hellas, the name used by the Greeks to signify the abode of the HELLENES, which the Romans called GRÆCIA, and we call Greece. Hellas was originally a small district in Thessaly. The name was attributed to a mythical ancestor HELLĒN, son of Deucalion and Pyrrha (qq.v.), and father of Aeolus, Xuthus, and Dorus, ancestors of the Aeolians, Ionians, and Dorians.

Hellas, a lyrical drama by P. B. Shelley (q.v.) composed at Pisa in 1821 and published in 1822. It was inspired by the Greek proclamation of independence, followed by the war of liberation from the Turkish yoke. In form it follows the 'Persae' of Aeschylus. The principal character is the Sultan Mahmud, who learns from successive messengers of the revolt in various parts of his dominions, and to whom the old Jew Ahasuerus calls up a vision of the fall of Stamboul. The poet puts some of his finest lyrics in the mouths of the chorus of Greek captive women.

Hellēn, HELLENES, see Hellas.

Hellenistic, a term applied to the civilization, language, and literature, Greek in its general character, but pervading people not exclusively Greek current in Asia Minor, Egypt, Syria, and other countries after the time of Alexander the Great. The HELLENISTIC AGE OF GREEK LITERATURE is that which extended, with Alexandria as its chief centre, from Alexander's death (323 B.C.) to the end of the Ptolemaic dynasty and the complete Roman subjugation of the Mediterranean world in the latter part of the 1st cent. B.C.

Hellenore, in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene', III. x, the wife of Malbecco, who elopes with Paridel (qq.v.).

Hellespont, see Argonauts.

Héloïse, see Abélard.

Helot, a class of serf in ancient Sparta. The expression DRUNKEN HELOT is an allusion to a statement by Plutarch that Helots were, on certain occasions, compelled to appear in a state of intoxication, in order to excite in the Spartan youth repugnance to drunken habits.

HELPS, SIR ARTHUR (1813-75), educated at Eton and Trinity College, Cambridge, became clerk of the privy council in 1860. Besides revising (at Queen Victoria's request) Prince Albert's speeches, published in 1862, and preparing for the press the Queen's 'Leaves from the Journal of Our Life in the Highlands' (1868), he acquired popularity by his 'Friends in Council' (four series, 1847-59), dialogues on ethical and aesthetic questions. His 'Conquerors of the New World' appeared in 1848, and 'The Spanish Conquest in America' in 1855-61. Helps also wrote dramas, 'Realmah' (a novel, 1868), and 'Brevia' (short essays, 1871).

Helvetia, Switzerland, the country formerly of the HELVETII, a people of the ancient Gallia Lugdunensis.

HELVÉTIUS, CLAUDE ARIEN (1715-71), see Philosophes.

HEMANS, MRS. FELICIA DOROTHEA (1793-1835), née Browne, married Captain Alfred Hemans in 1812, but separated from him in 1818. Her writings were highly popular in America, and she was the 'Egeria' of Maria Jane Jewsbury's 'Three Histories'. Her collected works (issued in 1839) include 'Translations from Camoens and other Poets', 'Lays of Many Lands', 'The Forest Sanctuary', and 'Songs of the Affections'. She is perhaps chiefly remembered as the author of 'Casabianca' ('The boy stood on the burning deck'), 'The Landing of the Pilgrim Fathers', 'England's Dead', and 'The Better Land'.

Heming or HEMINGES, JOHN (d. 1630) and Condell, HENRY (d. 1627), fellow actors of Shakespeare and joint editors of the first folio of his plays (1623). Heming is said to have been the first actor of Falstaff.

HEMINGWAY, ERNEST, American novelist, born in Illinois in 1898. His most important books are 'Fiesta' (called in the U.S. 'The Sun also Rises', 1926), 'Men without Women' (1927), 'Farewell to Arms' (1929). He is considered typical of a certain side of modern American writing. That is to say he is sophisticated, conscientiously unsentimental, and largely concerned with members of the various American colonies in Europe, especially in Paris.

HENRIADE

Hemistich, half of a line of verse.

Henchard, MICHAEL, the principal character in Hardy's 'The Mayor of Casterbridge' (q.v.).

Hendecasyllabic, a verse of eleven syllables, a metre used by Catullus (---o---o---o) and imitated by Tennyson:

O you chorus of indolent reviewers.

Hendiadys, from the Greek words meaning 'one by means of two', a figure of speech by which a single complex idea is expressed by two words joined by a conjunction, e.g. 'Such as sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, being fast bound in misery and iron' (Ps. cvii. 10).

Hengist and Horsa, the traditional leaders of the Jutes who landed at Ebbsfleet in or about 449, and were given by Vortigern the Isle of Thanet for a dwelling-place. The names signify 'horse' and 'mare', and may be those of real warriors.

HENLEY, JOHN (1692-1756), generally known as 'Orator Henley', educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, and a contributor to the 'Spectator' as 'Dr. Quir', claimed to be a restorer of church oratory. He published works on oratory, theology, and grammar. He was caricatured by Hogarth and ridiculed by Pope:

Still break the benches, Henley, with thy strain,
While Sherlock, Hare, and Gibson preach in vain.

('Dunciad', iii. 203.)

HENLEY, WILLIAM ERNEST (1849-1903), born at Gloucester and a pupil there of T. E. Brown (q.v.), was a cripple from boyhood. He did a great deal of miscellaneous literary work, as editor at various times of the 'Magazine of Art', the 'National Observer', the 'New Review', &c. He was a friend of R. L. Stevenson (q.v.), with whom he collaborated in the plays 'Deacon Brodie', 'Beau Austin', 'Admiral Guinea', and 'Macaire' (1892). He compiled 'Lyra Heroica' (1891), a book of verse for boys, and was joint compiler of the 'Slang Dictionary' (1894-1904). His poetical work includes the 'Book of Verses' (1888), 'The Song of the Sword' (1892, revised 1893), 'London Voluntaries' (1893), 'Hawthorn and Laverder' (1899), and the remarkable volume entitled 'In Hospital' (1903), written in an Edinburgh infirmary. His collected works were published in 1908. Among his best-known pieces are 'Invictus' ('Out of the night that covers me'), the ballad with the refrain

I was a king in Babylon
And you were a Christian slave, and 'England, my England'. Henley is portrayed as 'Burly' in R. L. Stevenson's essay, 'Talk and Talkers'.

Henriade, La, a poem in ten cantos by Voltaire (q.v.), exalting Henri IV, published in 1723.

HENRIETTA TEMPLE

Henrietta Temple, a novel by Disraeli (q.v.), published in 1837.

Ferdinand Armine, the son of noble but impoverished parents, a brilliant and impetuous youth, enters the army, gets into debt, and being disappointed of his grandfather's heritage, which was counted on to redress the family fortunes, proposes to his wealthy cousin, Katherine Grandison, and is accepted. But his own heart is not engaged, and, the wedding being postponed until a year after his grandfather's recent death, Ferdinand falls desperately in love with the beautiful but penniless Henrietta Temple, and, carried away by his passion, becomes engaged to her also. When his previous entanglement is revealed, Henrietta, shocked by his perfidy, falls seriously ill and leaves the country, while Ferdinand nearly succumbs to brain fever. Henrietta meets in Italy the admirable Lord Montfort, and under pressure from her father consents to marry him. Before the wedding is celebrated, she again meets Ferdinand, is touched by his sufferings, and discovers that her heart is still his. Katherine, who has forgiven and released Ferdinand, and the latter's resourceful friend Count Mirabel, set to work to straighten out the imbroglio, with the result that Lord Montfort renounces Henrietta, who has unexpectedly become a rich heiress, and marries Katherine; while Ferdinand, released from the sponging-house to which his debts have brought him, marries Henrietta.

Henri IV, king of France, 1589–1610. He had been king of Navarre since 1570 and had married Marguerite de Valois, sister of Charles IX. He figures in Macaulay's lay, 'Ivry'.

Henry I, king of England, 1100–35.

Henry II, king of England, 1154–89. This was a period of (Latin) literary eminence: see Glanville, Dialogus de Scaccario, Map, Giraldus Cambrensis.

Henry III, king of England, 1216–72.

Henry IV, king of England, 1399–1413.

Henry IV, King, Parts I and II, a historical drama by Shakespeare (q.v.), produced about 1597, and printed in quarto, Pt. I in 1598, and Pt. II in 1600.

The subject of Pt. I is the rebellion of the Percys, assisted by Douglas, and in concert with Mortimer and Glendower; and its defeat by the king and the Prince of Wales at Shrewsbury (1403). Falstaff (q.v.) first appears in this play. The Prince of Wales associates with him and his boon companions, Poins, Bardolph, and Peto, in their riotous life. Poins and the prince contrive that the others shall set on some travellers at Gadshill and rob them, and be robbed in their turn by themselves. The plot succeeds, and leads to Falstaff's well-known fabrication to explain the loss of the booty, and his exposure. At the battle of Shrewsbury, Falstaff finds the body of the lately slain Hotspur, and pretends to have killed him.

HENRY VI

Pt. II deals with the rebellion of Archbishop Scroop, Mowbray, and Hastings; while in the comic under-plot, the story of Falstaff's doings is continued, with those of the prince, Pistol (q.v.), Poins, Mistress Quickly (q.v.), and Doll Tearsheet. Falstaff, summoned to the army for the repression of the rebellion, falls in with Justices Shallow and Silence (qq.v.) in the course of his recruiting, makes a butt of them, and extracts a thousand pounds from the former. Henry IV dies, and Falstaff conceives that the Prince's accession to the throne will make himself all-powerful. He is rudely disabused when he encounters the new king, is banished from his presence, and thrown into prison.

The play is notable, among other things, for the memories of Shakespeare's early life in Warwickshire interwoven in the story.

Henry V, king of England, 1413–22.

Henry V, King, a historical drama by Shakespeare (q.v.), performed in 1599, an imperfect draft being printed in 1600, the corrected text appearing in the first folio (1623).

The play deals with the arrest of Lord Scroop, Sir Thomas Grey, and the earl of Cambridge for treason; the invasion of France and siege and capture of Harfleur; the battle of Agincourt (1415); and Henry's wooing of Katharine of France. The knaves Nym and Bardolph and the braggart Pistol, who is made to eat the leek by the choleric Welshman Fluellen, provide relief from the more serious theme. The death of Falstaff is related by Mistress Quickly (II. iii).

Henry VI, king of England, 1422–61, restored for six months, 1470–1, and then murdered in the Tower of London in 1471.

Henry VI, King, Parts I, II, and III, a historical drama ascribed to Shakespeare (q.v.). The extent to which it was actually written or revised by him is uncertain. The three parts were acted about 1592; the first part was published in 1623, the second part anonymously in 1594 as 'The first part of the contention betwixt the two famous houses of Yorke and Lancaster', and the third part in 1595, as 'The True Tragedie of Richard, Duke of Yorke, and the death of good King Henrie the Sixt'. The second and third parts (with modifications of the text) appeared, together with the first part, in the folio of 1623. Various commentators have found the hands of Marlowe, Kyd, Peele, Greene, Lodge, and Nash, as well as Shakespeare, in different passages of the play, but the question of authorship remains undecided. The play probably evoked Greene's famous censure of Shakespeare in his 'Groatsworth of Wit' (q.v.).

Pt. I deals with the wars in France during the early years of Henry VI, the relief of Orleans by the French and the gradual expulsion of the English from a large part of France. The French are guided and inspired by Joan of Arc, who in accordance with the ideas of the time is represented as a 'minister of hell' and a wanton. On the English side, the commanding figure of Talbot, until his death near Bordeaux, throws the other leaders into the shade. At home, the play deals with the dissensions between the nobles, and the beginning of the strife of York and Lancaster.

Pt. II presents the marriage of Henry to Margaret of Anjou, the intrigues of the Yorkist faction, and the other chief historical events, including Jack Cade's rebellion, down to the battle of St. Albans (1455) and the death of Somerset.

Pt. III takes us from Henry's surrender of the succession to the crown to the duke of York, and Queen Margaret's revolt against the disinheriting of her son, to the battle of Tewkesbury in 1471, concluding with the murder of Henry VI by Richard, duke of Gloucester, whose ambitious and unscrupulous character (as subsequently developed in 'King Richard III') is here first indicated.

HENRY VII, king of England, 1485-1509. His life was written by Francis Bacon (q.v.).

HENRY VIII, king of England, 1509-47. His life was written by Lord Herbert of Cherbury (q.v.). His book, 'A defence of the Seven Sacraments', directed against Luther's teaching, was printed in 1521 and presented to Leo X, who thereupon conferred on Henry the title 'Defender of the Faith'.

Henry VIII, a historical drama by Shakespeare (q.v.), with parts perhaps written by a collaborator, probably Fletcher. It was acted in 1613 and included in the folio of 1623.

It deals with the accusation and execution of the duke of Buckingham; the question of the royal divorce (vividly depicting the dignity and resignation of Queen Katharine); the pride and fall of Cardinal Wolsey and his death; the advancement and coronation of Anne Boleyn; the triumph of Cranmer over his enemies; and the christening of the Princess Elizabeth. The firing of the cannon at the end of Act I caused the burning of the Globe Theatre in 1613.

Henry and Emma, see Prior.

Henry Grâce à Dieu, The, see Great Harry.

Henry of Hohenek, PRINCE, the subject of the story of Longfellow's 'Golden Legend' (q.v.).

HENRY OF HUNTINGDON (1084?-1155), archdeacon of Huntingdon, compiled at the request of Bishop Alexander of Lincoln a 'Historia Anglorum', which in its latest form extends to 1154.

HENRY THE MINSTREL, or BLIND HARRY or HARY (fl. 1470-92), Scottish poet; probably a native of Lothian. He wrote a spirited poem on the life of Sir William Wallace, containing some 12,000 lines in heroic couplets, which purports to be based on a work by John Blair, Wallace's chaplain. It is inspired by violent animosity against the English. Its chronology and general accuracy have been questioned, but in some instances corroborated. The best printed editions are those of Jamieson (1820) and Moir (Scottish Text Society, 1884-9); William Hamilton of Gilbertfield's modern version (1722) became more familiar than the original.

HENRYSON or HENDERSON, ROBERT (1430?-1506), a Scottish poet of the school of Chaucer. He was probably a clerical schoolmaster attached to Dunfermline Abbey. His 'Tale of Orpheus' was first printed in 1508. His 'Testament of Cresseid' (q.v.) was attributed to Chaucer till 1721, though printed as his own in 1593. His 'Morall Fables of Esope the Phrygian' were printed in 1621. 'The Poems of Robert Henryson' were edited by G. Gregory Smith for the Scottish Text Society, 3 vols., 1906-14.

Henslowe, PHILIP (d. 1616), a theatrical manager who rebuilt and managed till 1603 the Rose playhouse on Bankside, and subsequently managed other theatres. He employed a number of the minor Elizabethan dramatists, including Munday, Chettle, Day, Samuel Rowley, and Drayton, and his diary contains valuable information as to their works.

HENTY, GEORGE ALFRED (1832-1902), writer for boys, who also published some twelve orthodox novels, including 'Dr. Thorndyke's Secret' (1898).

Heorot, in 'Beowulf' (q.v.), the palace of Hrothgar.

Hepburn, PHILIP, a character in Mrs. Gaskell's 'Sylvia's Lovers' (q.v.).

Hephaestus, the Greek god of fire, called by the Romans Vulcan (q.v.).

Hepplewhite, GEORGE (d. 1786), a famous cabinet-maker, of whom little is known except that he carried on his business in St. Giles', Cripplegate. His work is distinguished by a delicacy and grace that replaced the greater massiveness of Chippendale. He excelled especially in the designs of chairs, and made considerable use of painting and inlay.

Heptameron, The, a collection of tales of love (depicted not as vulgar gallantry, but as a serious and sometimes a tragic passion), linked by the fiction that the narrators are travellers detained in an inn by a flood, and composed, according to the explicit statement of Brantôme, by Marguerite, sister of Francis I and queen of Navarre (1492-1549). The name 'Heptameron', meaning 'seven days' (on the analogy of Boccaccio's 'Decameron'), was given by a later editor to what were originally called the 'Contes de la Reine de Navarre'.

Heptarchy, THE, the seven kingdoms reckoned to have been established in Britain by the Angles and Saxons (5th-9th cents.). The term appears to have been introduced by 16th-cent. historians, in accordance with their notion that there were seven Angle and Saxon kingdoms so related that one of their rulers had always the supreme position. The correctness of the designation has often been called in question. [OED.]

Hera, known as JUNO by the Romans, was the daughter of Cronos and Rhea and the sister and wife of Zeus or Jupiter. She is represented in mythology as pursuing with inexorable jealousy the mistresses of Zeus and their children, Ino, Semele, Hercules, &c. She was mother of Ares (Mars), Hebe, and Hephaestus (Vulcan). She was worshipped as the queen of the heavens, the goddess representative of women, especially of wives, and protectress of marriage. The peacock among birds was specially sacred to her. Her worship was widespread, but particularly developed in Argos.

Hērāclēs, see Hercules.

HERACLĪTUS, of Ephesus, a philosopher who wrote, about 500 B.C., a work 'Concerning Nature' (περί φύσεως), in which he maintained that all things are in a state of flux, coming into existence and passing away, and that fire, the type of this constant change, is their origin. From the passing impressions of experience, the mind derives, according to Heraclitus, a false idea of the permanence of the external world, which is really in a harmonious process of constant change. The melancholy view of Heraclitus as to the changing and fleeting character of life led to his being known as the 'weeping philosopher'.

Heralds' College or COLLEGE OF ARMS, a royal corporation, founded in 1483, exercising jurisdiction in matters armorial, and now recording proved pedigrees, and granting armorial bearings. The members of this corporation are: Garter principal king-of-arms, Clarenceux king-of-arms south of the Trent, Norroy king-of-arms north of the Trent; heralds: Windsor, Chester, Richmond, Somerset, York, and Lancaster; pursuivants: Rouge Croix, Bluemantle, Rouge Dragon, Portcullis. Another king-of-arms, not a member of this corporation, has been attached to the order of the Bath since the reign of George I; and an officer-of-arms, without a title, attends the order of St. Michael and St. George. There is no college or corporation of heralds in Scotland or Ireland. In Scotland 'Lyon king-of-arms' is the head of the office of arms; in Ireland 'Ulster king-of-arms'.

HERBERT, EDWARD, first Baron Herbert of Cherbury (1583-1648), philosopher, historian, poet, and diplomatist, was the elder brother of the poet, G. Herbert (q.v.). He was educated at University College, Oxford, and had a career full of incident as a diplomatist (he was ambassador to France, 1619-24), traveller, and soldier (on the Royalist side, until he submitted to parliament and received a pension). His 'Autobiography' (which extends only to 1624) was first printed by Horace Walpole in 1764 and edited by Sir Sidney Lee in 1886. His 'De Veritate' in Latin (published in Paris in 1624, in London 1625), the chief of his philosophical works, is the first purely metaphysical work by an Englishman, and important as advancing a theory of knowledge substantially the same as that of the Cambridge Platonists (see Cudworth). He is known as the 'Father of Deism', for he maintained that among the 'common notions' apprehended by instinct are the existence of God, the duty of worship and repentance, and future rewards and punishment. This 'natural religion', he held, had been vitiated by superstition and dogma. His 'Life of Henry VIII' was published in 1649. His poems, which show grace and freshness, were edited by Churton Collins in 1881. They are noteworthy for his use of the metre subsequently adopted by Tennyson in his 'In Memoriam'.

HERCULES

HERBERT, GEORGE (1593-1633), was younger brother of Lord Herbert of Cherbury (q.v.), and was educated at Westminster and Trinity College, Cambridge, where he was public orator from 1619 to 1627. He took orders and accepted in 1630 the living of Bemerton, where he died. His verse is almost entirely included in 'The Temple', a collection of 160 poems of a religious character, marked by quaint and ingenious imagery rather than exaltation, and occasionally marred by extravagant conceits and bathos. This work was published in 1633. His chief prose work 'A Priest to the Temple', described by Izaak Walton as containing 'plain, prudent, useful rules for the country parson', set forth with fervent piety, was first printed in his 'Remains', 1652. His complete works were edited by Dr. Grosart, 1874. I. Walton (q.v.) wrote a life of George Herbert, which appeared in 1670.

Herbert, MARY, see Pembroke.

Hercules, or in Greek Hērāclēs, was the son of Zeus and Alcmena (see Amphitryon). Hera's jealousy of Alcmena extended to her son. She sought to destroy the infant by sending two serpents to devour him, but he seized and crushed them in his hands. He was instructed in the various arts of war and music, and became the most valiant and accomplished of men. In his youth occurred the incident of the 'CHOICE OF HERCULES'. He sat in a lonely place in doubt which course of life to follow. Virtue and Pleasure appeared to him, and offered him, one a life of toil and glory, the other a life of ease and enjoyment. Hercules chose the former. After various exploits he married Megara, the daughter of Creon, but being driven mad by Hera, killed his children. By direction of an oracle he submitted himself to the authority of Eurystheus, king of Argos and Mycenae, and at the order of the latter undertook a number of enterprises, known as the twelve 'LABOURS OF HERCULES'. These were as follows: (1) the destruction of the lion of Nemea, which Hercules strangled, and whose skin he afterwards wore; (2) the destruction of the Lernaean hydra, a creature with many heads, each of which when cut off gave place to two new ones; (3) the capture of an incredibly swift stag; (4) the capture of a destructive wild boar; (5) the cleansing of the stables of Augeas (q.v.); (6) the destruction of the carnivorous birds near lake Stymphalus; (7) the capture of the Cretan wild bull; (8) the capture of the mares of Diomedes, which fed on human flesh; (9) the obtaining of the girdle of the queen of the Amazons; (10) the destruction of the monster Geryon, king of Gades, and the capture of his flocks; (11) the obtaining of apples from the garden of the Hesperides (q.v.); (12) the bringing from hell of the three-headed dog, Cerberus (q.v.). Many other achievements are credited to him. He was again the victim of an attack of insanity, killed Iphitus (brother of Iolë, with whom Heracles had fallen in love), and was sold as a slave to Omphale (q.v.). For his destruction by the cloak of Nessus, see under Deianira. After his death he obtained divine honours, having devoted the labours of his life to the benefit of mankind. See Ex pede Herculem.

Hercules, Pillars or Columns of, a name given to two mountains opposite one another at the entrance of the Mediterranean, called Calpe (Gibraltar) and Abyla, supposed to have been parted by the arm of Hercules.

Hercynian Forest, the Roman name for an ill-defined tract of wooded mountains in southern and central Germany.

HERDER, JOHANN GOTTFRIED (1744-1803), German poet and critic, a leader of German thought towards the romantic revival, a contemporary of, and fellow spirit to, Lessing (q.v.). He was an ardent Hellenist and a student of German folk-lore and of the philosophy of history.

Hereward the Wake (fl. 1070), an outlaw, a legendary account of whose wanderings is given by the 15th-cent. forger who called himself Ingulf of Croyland in his 'Gesta Herewardi'. He headed a rising of English against William the Conqueror at Ely in 1070, and with the assistance of the Danish fleet plundered Peterborough in the same year. He was joined by Morcar and other refugees, and escaped when his allies surrendered to William. He is said to have subsequently been pardoned by William, and, according to Geoffrey Gaimar, to have been slain by Normans in Maine.

The last of the completed novels of C. Kingsley (q.v.) bears this name, and was published in 1865. It is based on the legends of Hereward's exploits and extraordinary strength. The earlier and more attractive part of the book deals with his youth (Kingsley makes him the son of Leofric of Mercia and the Lady Godiva), his outlawry for robbing a monastery, his numerous exploits in England and Flanders, and his marriage with the learned and noble-hearted Torfrida. Then comes the Conquest, and Hereward's gallant efforts to save England from the Normans, but the story becomes involved in the political details of the subjugation of the country. The love of Hereward for the faithful Torfrida gives way to the wiles and attractions of a rival, and hero and heroine end their lives in sorrow. See also Swallow.

HERGESHEIMER, JOSEPH (1880-1954), American writer, born at Philadelphia. His best-known books are 'The Three Black Pennys' (1917), 'Java Head' (1919), 'Linda Condon' (1919), 'Cythera' (1922), 'The Bright Shawl' (1922), 'Tampico' (1926), 'The Party Dress' (1930).

Hergest, RED BOOK OF, a Welsh manuscript of the 14th-15th cents. containing the 'Mabinogion' (q.v.), the 'Triads' (q.v.), Welsh translations of British chronicles, &c.

Hermæ, quadrangular pillars surmounted by a bust of the god Hermes (q.v.). These were extremely numerous in ancient Athens, where they were erected at street corners, before houses, and on the high roads. Just before the sailing of the Sicilian expedition (415 B.C.) Athens was thrown into perturbation by the mutilation in a single night of all the Hermæ in the city. The outrage was attributed by public opinion to Alcibiades, but the mystery was never explained.

Hermadad, a Spanish word meaning 'brotherhood', originally the name in Spain of popular combinations formed chiefly to resist the exactions of the nobles, to which were subsequently given general police functions. Isabella of Castile in 1476 converted this popular institution into an organized constabulary, the SANTA HERMANDAD, the 'Holy Brotherhood' in English translations of 'Don Quixote'.

Hermann und Dorothea, see Goethe.

Hermaphrôditus, a son of Hermes and Aphrodite, was beloved by Salmacis, the nymph of a fountain in which he bathed. As he continued deaf to her entreaties, she closely embraced him and prayed the gods to make the twain one body, which they did. Hence 'Hermaphrodite', a name for a being combining both sexes in a single body.

Hermegylde, in Chaucer's 'Man of Lawes Tale' (see Canterbury Tales), the wife of the constable of Northumberland, to whose coast Constance is borne when set adrift on the sea.

Hermensul, see Irmensul.

Hermes, called MERCURY by the Romans, was the son of Zeus and Maia, the inventor of the lyre (he placed strings across the shell of a tortoise), and the messenger and herald of the gods. He was regarded as the god of luck and wealth, the patron of travellers and merchants, and of thieves. It was he who conducted the souls of the dead to the infernal regions. He is generally represented as equipped with the caduceus, a rod entwined with two serpents, the pétasus or broad-brimmed hat, and talaria or winged sandals.

Hermes Trismegistus, the 'thrice great Hermes' of Milton's 'Il Penseroso', the name given by the Neoplatonists and the devotees of mysticism and alchemy to the Egyptian god THOTH, regarded as more or less identical with the Grecian Hermes, and as the author of all mystical doctrines. From the 3rd cent. onwards the name was applied to the author of various Neoplatonic writings, some of which have survived, notably the Ποιμάνδρης, a word of uncertain derivation, used to signify the Divine Intelligence. Hence HERMETIC PHILOSOPHY, alchemy; HERMETIC BOOKS, the philosophical, theosophical, and other writings ascribed to Hermes Trismegistus.

Hermia, a character in Shakespeare's 'Midsummer Night's Dream' (q.v.).

Hermiōnē, (1) daughter of Menelaus and Helen, and the wife, first of Neoptolemus, then of Orestes; (2) in Shakespeare's 'The Winter's Tale' (q.v.), the wife of Leontes. For the Hermione mentioned in Milton's 'Paradise Lost', ix. 506, see Harmonia.

Hermit, The, a poem by T. Parnell (q.v.).

Hermit, The, or Edwin and Angelina, a ballad by Goldsmith (q.v.), written in 1764, and included in the 'Vicar of Wakefield' (q.v.). Angelina, benighted in the wilderness, and sorrowing for her lost Edwin, whom she believes dead, is welcomed to the Hermit's cell and in answer to his questions reveals the cause of her sorrow. Whereupon the Hermit acknowledges himself to be Edwin.

Hermit of Hampole, THE, Richard Rolle (q.v.).

Hermitage, a celebrated wine produced on the left bank of the Rhône near Valence. There are red, white, and straw-coloured varieties. According to tradition it was first grown by a hermit who built his cell (the ruins of which may still be seen) on the hill where the wine is now produced. Red Hermitage is said to be made from a grape originally brought from Shiraz in Persia.

Hermitage, THE, a museum in Leningrad containing a splendid gallery of paintings, and collections of ancient sculpture and other antiquities.

Hermod or HERMODR, in Scandinavian mythology, one of the Æsir (q.v.), a son of Odin. It is he who undertakes the voyage to hell to bring back the dead Balder to the upper world (see Balder Dead).

Hernsprong, or Man as he is not, see Bage.

Hernani, a tragedy (1830) by V. Hugo (q.v.), in which Count Hernani, in love with Elvira and about to marry her, takes his own life at the blast of a horn sounded by his enemy, Don Ruy Gomez, to fulfil the pledge that he has given to do so. Verdi's opera 'Ernani' is founded on Hugo's drama.

Herne the Hunter, a spectral hunter of mediæval legend, said to have been originally a keeper in Windsor Forest, who figures in Shakespeare's 'Merry Wives', iv. iv, and in Harrison Ainsworth's 'Windsor Castle'.

Hero, (1) a beautiful priestess of Aphrodite at Sestos on the European shore of the Hellespont, beloved of Leander, a youth of Abýdos on the opposite shore. Leander at night was used to swim across to Hero, who directed his course by holding up a lighted torch. One tempestuous night Leander was drowned, and Hero in despair threw herself into the sea. (2) The heroine of Shakespeare's 'Much Ado about Nothing' (q.v.).

Hero and Leander, see above under Hero (1). The story has been made the subject of poems by Marlowe and T. Hood (qq.v.), and of a burlesque by T. Nashe (q.v.) in his 'Praise of Red Herring'.

Herod, TO OUT-HEROD, to outdo Herod (represented in the old miracle plays as a blustering tyrant) in violence; to outdo in any excess of evil or extravagance—a Shakespearean expression ('Hamlet', iii. ii) which has come into current use.

Herod Agrippa I (d. A.D. 44), MARCUS JULIUS AGRIPPA, grandson of Herod the Great (q.v.), ruler of the tetrarchies of north-eastern Palestine. He persecuted the Christians and died a horrible death (Acts xii). It was before his son, Agrippa II (c. A.D. 27–100), that Paul was brought (Acts xxv; the Bernice there referred to was his sister).

Herod the Great, of Idumæan origin, king of Judæa, 40–4 B.C. His father Antipater had been appointed by Julius Caesar procurator of Judæa in 47 B.C., and Herod himself had been governor of Galilee. In 40 Herod was named by the Roman senate king of Judæa. His rule was a cruel despotism. In a fit of jealousy he put to death his wife Mariamne and his sons by her, Alexander and Aristobulus, and other murders are attributed to him. According to Matt. ii, he ordered the slaughter of all the children in Bethlehem, in order that the infant Jesus should be destroyed.

HERODAS, a Greek writer of mimes (q.v.) of the 3rd cent. B.C. Seven of these, recovered in an Egyptian papyrus, were published by Dr. Kenyon in 1891 (there is an edition by W. Headlam, 1922).

Herodias, the sister of Herod Agrippa I, granddaughter of Herod the Great, the wife of Herod Philip (son of Herod the Great) and afterwards of his half-brother Herod Antipas, whom she caused to imprison and execute John the Baptist. She was the mother of Salome (q.v.).

HERODOTUS (c. 480–c. 425 B.C.), a Greek historian, born at Halicarnassus, at that time a city under Persian rule. He is known as 'the father of history', for he was the first to collect his materials systematically, test their accuracy so far as he was able, and arrange them agreeably. His work, the first masterpiece of Greek prose, is divided into nine books, each called after one of the Muses, but the division was probably made by Alexandrian editors. He travelled widely in Europe, Asia, and Africa. The main theme of his work is the enmity between Asia and Europe. He traces it from mythical times, through the reign of Croesus in Lydia, the rise of the Persian monarchy, the expedition of Cambyses into Egypt (with details of Egyptian history), that of Darius against the Scythians, the Ionian revolt, and the struggle between Persia and Greece.

Heroes and Hero-Worship, see Carlyle (T.).

Heroic poetry, the same as Epic (q.v.).

Heroic verse, that used in epic poetry: in Greek and Latin poetry, the hexameter; in English, the iambic of five feet or ten syllables; in French, the alexandrine of twelve syllables.

Herostratus, an Ephesian who set the temple of Artemis at Ephesus on fire in 356 B.C., according to his own confession in order to immortalize himself. On the night that he did this Alexander the Great was born.

HERRICK, ROBERT (1591-1633), was born in London, and was apprenticed for ten years to his uncle, a goldsmith. He then went to St. John's College, Cambridge, but graduated from Trinity Hall in 1617. He was incumbent of Dean Prior, in Devonshire, from 1629 to 1647, when he was ejected; after which he lived in Westminster, until restored to his living in 1662. He was a devoted admirer of Ben Jonson. His chief work is the 'Hesperides' (1648), a collection of some 1,200 poems, mostly written in Devonshire, as the title suggests, the best of which are aptly described in his own lines:

I sing of brooks, of blossoms, birds, and bowers,
Of April, May, of June, and July flowers;
I sing of maypoles, hock-carts, wassails, wakes,
Of bridegrooms, brides, and of their bridal-cakes.

His 'Noble Numbers' (published in one book with 'Hesperides', but bearing on its separate title-page the date 1647) is a collection of short poems dealing with sacred subjects. His poems show great diversity of form, from imitations of Horace and Catullus, epistles, eclogues, and epigrams, to love-poetry and simple folk-songs. Complete editions have been published by T. Maitland (1823), E. Walford (1859), W. C. Hazlitt (1869), and Dr. Grosart (1876). The most recent complete edition is in the Oxford English Texts, edited by F. W. Moorman. Several of his pieces were set to music by Henry Lawes and others.

HERVEY

HERRICK, ROBERT (1868-1938), American author, born at Cambridge, Mass., and educated at Harvard. His interest in social science is reflected in his best novels. Among his principal works are: 'The Common Lot' (1904), 'The Memoirs of an American Citizen' (1905), 'Together' (1908), and 'The Master of the Inn' (1908).

Herschel, SIR JOHN FREDERICK WILLIAM (1792-1871), astronomer, son of Sir W. Herschel (q.v.). He was senior wrangler, and subsequently fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge. He was secretary to the Royal Society, 1824-7, president of the Astronomical Society, 1827-32, and master of the Mint, 1850-5. He discovered a great number of double stars and nebulae, and did a vast amount of work in connexion with these and other branches of astronomical science.

Herschel, SIR WILLIAM (1738-1822), astronomer, born at Hanover, was sent to England by his parents in 1757 and became organist at Halifax, and subsequently at the Octagon Chapel, Bath. He began to construct optical instruments in 1773 and to observe stars. He discovered Uranus in 1781, and in 1782 exhibited his telescope to George III, by whom he was appointed court astronomer. His great forty-foot reflector was begun in 1785 and finished in 1811. He discovered many stars and nebulae, and contributed greatly to the knowledge of astronomy. He was the first president of the Astronomical Society.

Hertha or NERTHUS, according to Tacitus, a goddess of some ancient Germanic tribes, representing the earth or fertility.

'Hertha' is the title of one of Swinburne's 'Songs before Sunrise' (q.v.); the author rated it 'highest as a single piece, finding in it the most of lyric force and music combined with the most of condensed and clarified thought'. In it he gives voice to his religious unorthodoxy, and sings of the emancipation of the soul under the influence of Hertha, the earth-goddess, the spirit of life.

Hertzian Waves, named after Heinrich Hertz (1857-94), a German physicist, who confirmed experimentally Maxwell's theory of electro-magnetic waves, and showed how they could be detected and that they were capable of reflection, refraction, and polarization, like the waves of light and heat. These waves are the basis of Marconi's system of wireless telegraphy.

Ilervé Riel, the subject of a poem by R. Browning (q.v.), a Breton sailor who piloted a French squadron to safety in St. Malo harbour after the defeat of the fleet at La Hogue in 1692. As a reward he asked for a whole day's holiday, nothing more. (In fact, he appears to have asked for an absolute discharge—Nicoll and Wise, 'Literary Anecdotes').

HERVEY, JAMES (1714-58), educated at Lincoln College, Oxford, was rector of Collingtree and Weston Favell in Northamptonshire, and was prominent in the early Methodist movement. His 'Meditations among the Tombs', 'Reflections in a Flower Garden', and 'Contemplations on the Night', published in 1746-7, were extremely popular, but are marked by a pompous and affected style.

HERVEY, JOHN, Baron Hervey of Ickworth (1696-1743), as vice-chamberlain exercised great influence over Queen Caroline. He was a close friend of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu (q.v.) and engaged in controversy with Pope, by whom he was attacked in 'The Dunciad' and 'Bathos' as 'Lord Fanny', and as the 'Sporus' of the 'Epistle to Arbuthnot'. His 'Memoirs of the Reign of George II' give a vivid satirical picture of the court. They were edited by J. W. Croker in 1848. A new edition in 3 vols., by R. Sedgwick, was published in 1931.

HESIOD (8th cent. B.C.?), one of the earliest of Greek poets, was born at Ascra in Boeotia, where he tended his father's sheep on the slopes of Mt. Helicon. He was author of 'Works and Days', a poem addressed to his brother Perses, urging him to toil, and descriptive of agricultural life in Boeotia; probably of the 'Theogony', containing a mythical account of the origin of the world and the genealogy of the gods, differing in many details from that of Homer; and of a 'Catalogue of Women', who, being beloved by the gods, had become mothers of heroes. Of this last work only fragments survive. Legend says that Hesiod was murdered at Oenoe in Locria.

Hesiônê, daughter of Laomedon, king of Troy, and sister of Priam. She was chained by her father on a rock to be devoured by a monster in order to appease the anger of Apollo and Poseidon, whom he had cheated of their pay for building the walls of Troy. Hercules promised to deliver her, for a reward of six horses, and killed the monster. But Laomedon then refused to surrender the horses. Hercules, incensed at his treachery, besieged Troy, slew Laomedon, and gave Hesione to his friend Telamon, by whom she became the mother of Teucer.

Hesperia, the western land, for the Greek poets was Italy. The Roman poets similarly gave the name to Spain, as lying west of Italy.

Hespêrides, nymphs appointed to guard the golden apples that Gê gave to Hera on the day of her nuptials with Zeus. They grew in a garden beyond the sea protected by a fearful dragon. One of the labours of Hercules was to secure these apples, which he did after slaying the dragon; or, according to another account, with the help of Atlas, whom he for the purpose relieved of the burden of the heavens.

Hesperides, the title of the collection of secular poems written by Herrick (q.v.).

HEY FOR HONESTY

Hesperus, the Evening Star, the planet Venus.

Hessel, PHOEBE (1713-1821), a female soldier and centenarian. When 15 years of age she fell in love with one Golding, a private in 'Kirke's Lambs', and donning the dress of a man enlisted in the 5th Regiment of Foot and followed her lover to the West Indies. She served at Fontenoy and received a bayonet wound in the arm. After Golding's death she married a fisherman of Brighton named Hessel, became a 'character' in Brighton of the Regency, and was a favourite of the Prince Regent. She died an inmate of Brighton Workhouse at the age of 108. (Letter to 'The Times' from the editor of the 'Sussex County Magazine', Sept. 1930.)

Hester Rose, a character in Mrs. Gaskell's 'Sylvia's Lovers' (q.v.).

Hestia, the Greek goddess of the hearth, daughter of Cronos and Rhea, akin to the Roman Vesta (q.v.).

Hetty Sorrel, a character in George Eliot's 'Adam Bede' (q.v.).
